Adde also hereunto a passage in a Caldaick Commentary upon Ecclesiastes, which telleth how Solomon, that great King, under whose principality peace and justice mutually embraced as sisters, to shew what account he made of those who well managed matters of right, caused a most sumptuous Palace to be erected for them of most exquisite workmanship, called the House of Judgement, and through excess of favour, ordained they should partake of the wine of offerings, which was presented on the Altars of the living God, and which came from a vine planted
Exod. 32. and manured by the hand of Solomon himself. Is it not to place justice in heaven, to admit it to the communication of the honours and offerings of God? So the people of Israel supposing one day that Moses was lost, instantly asked of Aaron Gods to govern them, as thinking there must be some divinitie to supply the loss of this great States-man. Why then do you wonder if S. Augustine in the book he composed of Order, praiseth the practise of Pythagorus, who never taught politick science to his disciples, till they had passed through many long trials, esteeming the other arts were apt to debausch the mind, but that this applied lively colours, and as it is said, varnished and perfected up the table.

It is not very hard at this time to conclude, what the excellency of a brave States-man is, but the discovery of him is very rare. And I will tell you, that considering well the tables which Delbenius hath made upon Aristotle his Phylosophy, and comparing them with other exquisite pieces, I have seen two Cities very different, both which bare the title of Policy: but the one in effect was false Policy, and the other the City of Verity. I will present them unto you plainly and sincerely, according to the like design of S. Augustine in his City of God, and according to the Idæa's of ancient Sages, not glancing at our times, which I will neither praise nor condemn, my nature and profession having disposed me to much ignorance of worldly affairs.

The second SECTION.

The table of Babylon drawn from sundry conceptions of the most singular wits of Antiquity

WE then have beheld the City of wicked Policy in those ancient paintings, to be built upon ruines, in a land of quick-silver, wholly cemented with bloud, Earth-quakes are there very frequent, and I know not what kind of outragious winds blow so dangerously, as if they would tear all in pieces.

The waters were there infected, the air killed those which breathed in it, the viands produced death under a false apparence of life. The inhabitants saw nothing but wolves and foxes by their sides, ravens and owls on their houses, comets over their heads, serpents and scorpions at their feet, which were there seen as abundantly strewed, as Plutarch. de curiosit. ἀνοφράστοπόλω. flowers in the ennamell of the spring. The gates resembled those fatall portalls, whereof histories make mention, that were never opened, but to pass away carrion and ordure: and withall this the Citizens were so powerfully charmed, that they esteemed themselves most happie, supposing to sleep on thorns was to live among violets and roses.

It is verily a wonder that without there were some shadowes of pietie, but within not so much as a Temple. For in truth the Burgesses of this Citie never looked up to heaven but to blaspheme it, and all of them greedily sought for earth covered with a vail of sky-colour.

I saw no other Gods there, but Honour, Gain, and Pleasure, to which souls and bodies were sacrificed in much greater number than Solomon slaughtered oxen in the solemnitie of his most magnificent Sacrifices. I saw huge caves, where there were all sorts of beasts, and likewise many monsters, that much resembled the Harpyes, Gorgons, and chymæra's of antiquitie.

I perceived also some solitarie dens, where I was certified great sacriledges were committed, of power to make darkness, which served them for a cover, to blush for shame, being unable to deceive the eys of God.

The men which walked in the streets appeared like Centaures, and were clothed with an habit spotted over like the skin of a Panther. The Chirurgians who dissected some of them newly dead, gave assurance they had found two hearts in them. Howsoever it is certain they shewed, as it is said, marvellous cunning in their words, and had no other pastime all the day, but to lay snares, not sparing their greatest friends: for indeed they were extreamly treacherous and cruell in all which concerned their own interests.

As I more attentively considered their orders and distinctions, I saw there were three labyrinths, very different. In the first, which was at the very entrance, stood the least wicked, who were not as yet practised in black mischiefs, contenting themselves to exercise some slight tricks of wit; for they in good earnest deceived one another, and took much pleasure in mutuall cousenage, and called this kind of sport legier-demain. I saw there many creatures that served their masters not forgetting their own affairs, and who mowed the meadow, whilest it was plenty. I saw Merchants some of which foisted in false wares, others disguised them, others overprized them, others sware without end, and some likewise swallowed up perjuries as sweetly as the most delicate viand. I saw Artificers who used many deceits in their manufactures, and better understood the trade of lying, than any other. I also saw some who sold wind, silence, and time, and had excellent inventions to get money. Some by certain influences drew it out, as doth lightening, not touching the purse. Others had inventions of quintessences: Others traffiqued about stars, and sold good fortune in little boxes of smoak: Others had shops of the secrets of Arts, & made themselves able to give beauty, youth, health & immortalitie, to those that would buy them. Others made dice and mathematicall cards: Others lead Bears; others extracted infamous coin from the planet of Venus; others in the qualitie of mercenaries made Odes and love sonnets for the Pandora's of the time; and which was most ridiculous, certain young wits among all these were seen, who laboured to patch up together rimes or prose very little to the purpose, to whom Gold and incense was given, with which they were so puffed up, that they esteemed the most solid wisdom of the world to be but meer ignorance in comparison of their works. One cannot tell all the tricks of this imposture, and how many sleights the spirit, watchfull for it's own interests, found to come to the end of its intentions. Conscience checked some; but they answered, one could not live in the world without these tricks, and that they were as necessary as to breath.

In

Cyprian epist. ad Donatum. Inter leges ipsa delinquitur, inter jura peccatur.

In the second labyrinth I saw the corruptions of justice described by S. Cyprian in the Epistle he addresseth to his friend Donatus, when he speaketh of Rome the Idolatress. All was replenished (saith this Prelate) with goodly Precepts, excellent laws, and sage ordinances: but in the midst of so many lights, God and men were offended with so much impudence, as if these laws were made to no other end, but to be transgressed. Never is innocencie so ill intreated, as in the place where profession is made to defend it. The serpents of the desert have less gall and spleen than those Pleaders, whom I saw turmojled with a spirit of giddiness, and dissevered with the sword of division. Their clamours were so loud that they made the whole house of justice to eccho again, as are the waves heard to rore on the shore of the Ægean sea. I saw gibbets, wheels, and boyling cauldrons prepared for some miserable criminals, because they were yet, as it is said, but little theeves; but were they much greater, their crimes had rather been crowned than chastised.

Fures privatorum furtorum in compedibus publici in arro vitam agunt Cato.

From thence I viewed fields weeping, filled with standing waters, which were said to be gathered together from the tears of Widdows, Orphans, and an infinite number of other persons, who live under great oppression. I saw some who were in the water up to the neck, and some who lifted up an arm withall their strength to offer up some papers, wherein were the laws of Charlemain and Lewis the twelfth which expresly command the causes of the poor may be handled before any other business: but it was replied, such ordinances were quite out of use. These miserable creatures solicited their Attorneys, and they betraied them; complained to their advocates and they perplexed them; implored the assistance of Judges, and they sold them, notwithstanding were esteemed honest men, and still enemies to these corruptions.

I saw two great Registers, whereof the one was called the Cabale of favour; and the other the Cabale of monie where it is said there were mischiefs as black as the spirits of the abyss, but they must not be divulged. There was also a very great quantitie of Pleaders, who sought to stretch out suits, as Shoomakers a piece of leather with their teeth, and mutter out propositions of errours, reviews, incompetencies, rejections, oppositions, and compulsorie causes, with so many other hideous words, that I asked whether these men spake the language of the Canadas or Chinois

Old Pettifoggers appeared, all over worm-eaten with mischiefs, who could scarce breath from their lips, yet had strong apprehension of death, through fear to leave the exercise of suits. The like was found in souls already half damned, who were very solicitous in manner of treachery; one bare false witness, another invented a contract, another forged a Will, another supposed a crime, another had a shop of all sorts of slanders and diabolicall falsifications; the audacious sale of a word prostituted to sin, flew between Heaven and earth about twilight with the wings of an owl; and to consummate the sublimitie of mischief, right yielded to iniquitie. It was to do wrong to the wicked, not to imitate those. Crimes, said they were alteady sufficiently authorised by the great multitude of complices.

Rispelliones.

In the third Labyrinth, I saw men who had little else of man in them but shape and skin. They were neat to an enchanted river, which must be passed and repassed over seven times, as it is said, to become absolute in craft. There were likewise others seen already transformed into unknown monsters, and others who had no more but the little finger or tip of the nose of men. I saw some who were like little Apes, which pushed and scratched one another, and brake through the throng, with all their force to climb up to the top of a tree, which was said to be the tree of Honour.

Lylius Giraldus in pictura favoris.

At the entrance there was I know not what kind of fantalin of Divinity, called Worldly favour. It seemed in apparence to have a body and consistence, but was in effect a true spectre of smoak, cloathed with a mantle tissued with clouds and wind. There stood about it Phylosophers, who would undertake to derive the Genealogie, and set the Horoscope of it. One said she was the daughter of beautie, the other of hazard, the other of babble; that fortune was her nursing-mother, and that if she had her exaltation in the sign of the Ram, she should find her declination in the Ballance. Howsoever, she then appeared very sprightfull and spruce. Flatterie failed not to court her, throwing roses and flower-de-luces upon her. But at the same time envy slily stealing into the throng, gnawed the border of her garment. Riches, disdain, presumption and boldness did nothing but cry round about her. Make place, make place, and to raise her the higher, they sought to lay the great God of Justinian under her feet. She was so disdainfull of knowledges, she had formerly acquired, that nothing was so cold as her discourse, and if she had eys, they were for no use but to behold her own interests. When I saw she paced along in a way all shining with ice, and that she danced on a rope, I lost sight of her, not troubling my self any further to follow this spirit: but I understood that all those who promised themselves the seven wonders of the world, had been paid in coin of leaves.

There likewise I viewed men whom you would have taken for geese, so simple of countenance were they, but they swam in Pactolus, having but one foot onely of a goose, for the other hidden under feathers was the tallon of a Harpy, which did onely attend to catch golden fish. I saw also some plunged in a huge heap of pistolets, so that neither heads nor bodies appeared, but onely one tip of a toe made like the paw of a Griphon, as a notable painter not long since delineated covetuousness. Going somewhat further I discovered the Den of Bacchus, where I saw fifes, timbrels, ivy, and goat-skinns, huge smoke of roasts, feasts, and men buried in wine and good cheer. Beyond it they passed to the grots of Lust, where crimes were done, which would make the most innocent pens guiltie in writing them; for as there must be an extream impudence to commit them, so ought much shamefastness be used to conceal them. Nothing so much astonished me, as to see Ecclesiasticks without religion, Ladies without shame, young maids tainted, who knew so much of that whereof they should be ignorant, that the most prostituted could teach them nothing.

Aquila Anserina. Stapl.

Afterward the sport turning into bloud, I saw strange treacheries, horrible circumventions, execrable treasons, which spake of nothing but of tying halters and mingling poisons, I also saw some who made it their practise to kill men openly, and said there was no safetie for them in innocency, but much rather in the enormities of sacriledges.

I thought I had seen all, when I afterwards perceived a chamber hideously black, said to be the study of Lucifer, and that the brave spirits of this time studied there, under the regency of Herod, Tiberius, and Pilate, to find out the way how to believe in God no longer, and to know all the refined policy of former ages.

I should be tedious and troublesome to decipher all the particulars of this prodigious Citie. The painting hath told much of it, but the greatest unhappiness which I saw there, is, that it is more true than I could wish. For not to touch upon the honour of so many good men, which are yet both in the body of justice, and in all other companies, I must tell you you that among the ſons of Seth there are many Children of Cain, which make up this Babylon.

The third SECTION.

The deſtruction of Babylon, and the government of the Divine Providence over the Eſtates of the World.

I Courteouſly beſeech you, O ingenious Politician, to run your eyes over theſe lines which I have traced, to ſtay a little your haſt, and to conſider with me the knot of all this policy, the ſource, progreſſe, iſſue, and remedy of all theſe diſorders, perhaps you may find more reaſon in my diſcourſes than your paſſion can expect. Conſult awhile with your heart, ſound your ſoul, go to the bottom of your conſcience. I fear there may be ſome pits of the abyſs, and graſhoppers of the Apocalyps, which are thoſe black vapours, that have hitherto eclipſed all the lights of your underſtanding. I will not conceal from you that there are three ſorts of ſouls, one virginal, another already changed and ſomewhat corrupted, the reſt ſhameleſs, ſuch as thoſe which are called in Scripture vaſt and giant-like-ſouls. I do not think to find by your proceedings, that you have a virgin-ſoul, nor will I likewiſe perſwade my ſelf, you have the ſoul of a giant, which expecteth no other remedy but thunder: I ſhould rather believe you have a ſtomack depraved by ſome wicked principles, whereinto either the unhappineſs of your education, the preſumption of your ability, or tickling-hope of good ſucceſs in worldly affairs hath thrown you. Wil you that I touch with a finger the beginning of your diſorder? You have been too much flattered upon the excellency of your wit, which is not, to ſpeak truly, one of the ſhalloweſt of the time: but there is much wanting of the ſingularity you imagine. You have inſenſibly retired your ſelf from that great judgement which S. Denys calleth the eternal hearth of all the moſt purified lights, and moſt chaſt affections, and by withdrawing your ſelf have taken a great quantity of falſe lights into your corrupt underſtanding, and much coldneſs into your heart, which have brought upon you a remiſneſs in good manners, and a notable diſorder in all the parts of your ſoul. You have ſeen heaven, and all the hopes of the other life, as Mathematicians make us to behold in a dark chamber, whatſoever paſſeth abroad, through a little cranny, in ſuch manner, that all things we ſee appear like ſhadows and landskips turned topſy-turvy.

Eccleſ. 23. in the Greek verſ. 5. γιγαντιάσις ψυχῆ.

Dioniſ. c. 1. de divinis nominibus.

Behold what happeneth after you have ſtopped up all the windows and acceſſes of heavenly light; you have made a little hole for the moon, and all the bleſſings of the other life have ſeemed very ſlender to your diſtruſtful ſpirit: you have put on a reſolution to make a fortune at what price ſoever, and to build on earth like Cain, after you have almoſt renounced the hopes of heaven. In doing this you have played the unruly Aſs, thinking to eſcape from the bands of the dependance you have on God: you have made your ſelf your bleſſing, your end your (a) God. Thereupon you have thought of the means you are to hold to arrive at this ſcope, already framed in your imagination. It ſeemeth to you all things ſucceeded according to your wit, travel, and induſtry uſed therein, with ſome ſmall help of fortune, God no whit at all intermedling with affairs here below. You have drawn abſurd conſequencies of the proſperity of ſome ſubtile ſpirits, not looking into the bottom of the buſineſs. The ſucceſs of your affairs, which ſeemed to you moſt proſperous, notwithſtanding your crimes and unlawfull proceedings, have emboldened you; miſchievous ſpirits, which dayly converſe with you, have confirmed you. In the end, behold your ſelf reduced as it were to this point, as to ſuppoſe you are to hold on a courſe in all affairs and governments of the world, which may be craftie, captious, worldly, and independent of divine laws, if not for ſome popular apparence.

(a) Aug. l. 3. de libero arbit. c. 24. Cui bonum non eſt Deus, ſibi ipſi vult eſſe bonum ſuum ſicut ſibi eſt Deus.

If this be ſo, I demand of you, why then in the judgement of that great Politician Thucidides, and all other well underſtanding men, is it obſerved that theſe curious wits, deſpoiled of the fear of God, have alwayes been moſt turbulent and unhappy in the manage both of their own affairs and the publick alſo: as on the contrary, thoſe who had not ſo much knowledge and invention, but purſued the general inſtinct of God, have held their eſtates better governed in ſimplicitie, more proſperous in the ignorance of evil, and much more firm in the laſting of their felicity? Never was there a more refined wit than Achitophel of whom the Scripture ſaid, men conſulted with him as with a God: yet never was there any more unhappy in his practiſe. For having diſpoſed of the affairs of the Kingdom, and thoſe of his own houſe, there remaining none to be provided for but his own perſon, he took a halter and ſtrangled himſelf, becauſe they approved not one of his counſels.

Vide Lipſium in notis ad 3. lib. politic. c. 4. p. 125.

Conſilium Achitophel quaſi ſiquis conſulerit Deum. 2. Reg. 2.

When we behold in Hiſtories a large liſt of theſe moſt curious Politicians, who have had ſo ill ſucceſs either in their own perſons, or in their poſterity, as I preſently will produce very many, we muſt undoubtedly ſay, this kind of way is ever dangerous in its enterpriſes, but not infallible in the ſucceſſes thereof. If you become as wicked as a little Poliphemus, it would be very hard to deny a firſt cauſe of all the creatures which are in the world, of it ſelf abſolute, independent, and eternal. For were the world full of wheels and revolutions, even from earth to heaven, ſtill muſt we neceſſarily come to the laſt wheel, to the laſt revolution, which is to give motion to all the other, and to take it of no other, and that is God. Were you as bruitiſh as a Leſtrigon, you could not deny an eternal Verity. For in what time will you ſay there hath not been a verity? Should you aſſign the ſpace of ten millions of years, and all that may be imagined beyond it, you would ever find this Verity: and ſhould you ſay, it was not then, and that in ſaying ſo you were ſincere, which cannot be; yet would you ſpeak a truth even in denying a truth, ſo much is her eſſence neceſſary: and this eternal Verity which ſerves as a baſis for all other verities, is that which we call God. Were you as unnatural as a monſter, you knew not how to deny there were a ſovereign Being in the world, which holdeth the firſt degree of all excellencies in ſuch ſort, that we cannot imagine any thing more excellent; and that is God.

Ratio D. Anſelmi dialog. de veritate c. 1.

Beſides, it is neceſſary to infer what S. Thomas hath moſt divinely ſayd, that all things which are by borrowing and participation, have relation of neceſſity to that, which is by eſſence and nature. So the ſtars, the pretious ſtones have relation to the ſun; and things hot to the fire as the ſcope of their excellency. Now it is certain that men, Cities, and Kingdoms, have but a borrowed being, becauſe they are not made by themſelves, and therefore it is neceſſary to affirm there is an intellectual power in a ſupreme degree, whereunto all theſe intelligences, even of men which conſtituted theſe States and Republickes, do relate; and this relation is nothing elſe but providence.

D. Thom. opuſcul. 2. cap. 21. Quæ ſunt per participationem reducuntur in id quod eſt per eſſentiam.

Verily if you ſhould behold on a Theather about ten thouſand white beards, that were come thither to decide decide a matter by a common conſent, would you take your ſelf to be wiſe to enter into Councel not called, and to reject the opinions of all thoſe, who have delivered their ſentences, publiſhing an opinion abſolutely new, and directly contrary to ſo many good judgements?

And I ask of you, that were now ſo many excellent Magiſtrates raiſed again, as have governed all ſorts of Kingdoms and Common-wealths in the Ages paſt, ſhould we not ſee more than a million of men moſt accompliſhed in knowledge, virtue, and experience, who had mannaged the world in the fear, and under the laws of this Divine Providence? It would then be a notable ſpectacle, to ſee you enter into the Hall of ſuch a Councel with a downy chin, to give all this aſſembly the lie, and ſay, There is nothing but humane policie, diſſimulation, and the tricks of flattery to be valued in affairs, without the expectation of any thing from God, would you not be ridiculous? Yet this is it which you do, ſo much hath ſin ſtupified you. If you have the leaſt ſpark of the underſtanding of a man, when you foſter ſuch thoughts in your minds, do you think it were fit to prefer ſome mouldy reaſons of a carnal ſpirit, and the capriches of your ſenſual imaginations before the voice of nature, and the ſtates of the whole world, aſſembled together to condemn your bruitiſhneſs? If there be no Providence to chaſtiſe the perverſe, and recompence the juſt, conclude, we muſt live in the world like a ſparrow-hawk, or Pike, called the Tyrant of the water, and to have no other meaſure of virtue, but your talon and throat. Is it not to open the gate to all injuſtices, perjuries, treacheries, and all poſſible abominations? For what monſter will not that ſoul be capable of, which conceiveth nothing of God? I have ſome reaſon, ſay you, and for this cauſe you are of opinion, this belief ſhould be entertained to amuze the people.

In ſaying this, you diſcover a great weakneſs of judgement; for it muſt be concluded, according to your propoſition, that all what ever was in the world, either of juſtice, temperance, modeſty, courteſie, patience, honeſty, peace and tranquility, were derived from an imaginary belief, touching Providence, from an errour, a folly, an illuſion: which is as abſurd, as to ſay grapes grow upon thiſtles, & roſes ſpring from the ice of winter. And tell me not, I pray, that a falſe belief ſeeks to procure good effects, as it appeareth in the virtues of Pagans. For I hold, that what good the Pagans have done, they have not acted it with relation to the adulteries of Jupiter, nor the murders of bloudy Mars: but in honour of a Divinity, which they thought avenged iniquity, and rewarded virtue. In this general belief, which was the true root of their moral virtues, there happened no abuſe, although they in particular were deceived in their judgement.

Your goodly objections of aw proceed from an infamous Diagoras, or Plinie, who thought to have found a great ſecret in ſaying, The belief of a Divine Providence was a jolly invention, becauſe it kept the world in aw. Deſerved he not well to be curſed as a Traytour to all mankind? Deſerved not he well to be broiled alive in the throat of hell, as indeed he waslooſing, his life in the flames of Veſuvius, ſince he vaunteth himſelf to have diſcovered a ſecret, which would be able, were it true, to let looſe the bridle to all profanations and bruitiſhneſs of a life the moſt ſavage that might be imagined? Ever would it be more to the purpoſe to tolerate an evil well conferred, than to introduce a good ill digeſted, ſay the wiſe: and what crime is it then to invent falſe ſecrets, the ignorance whereof is ſo wholeſom, and the verity whereof would be ſo prodigiouſly hurtfull? Why do you not rather take into your conſideration the ſage diſcourſe of the Philoſopher Simplitius, who ſaid: When I imagine a God unto my ſelf, I figure a great Maſter, whom I know of neceſſitie to be endowed with a moſt ſtable ſcience, and a moſt excellent will. And for this cauſe I conclude, he cannot be ignorant of the things he hath produced, ſeeing this ignorance falleth not even upon beaſts moſt ſtupid; and I ſay, that he knowing them, governeth them without pain, Omnipotent though he be: there being no greatneſs nor multitude of burdens, which can weaken the forces and vigour of this infinite Spirit. As there is not any thing too great for his capacity, ſo is there nothing too little for his bounty. Nothing eſcapeth his Paternal Providence, nor doth he think it a matter unworthy of his care to govern a butter-flie, ſince he eſteemed it a thing conſonant to his bounty, to create a butter-flie. Now for us to think that he knowing, able, and willing to govern the world, is diverted from it through pleaſures and contentments he taketh for his own delights, is a moſt groſs imagination; for why ſhould we attribute to God apprehenſions and aſſertions, which we would be aſhamed to give to men, if they made not profeſſion to be of the number of the altogether idle?

Behold how this ſingular wit diſcourſeth and verily it is to be wholly ignorant of God, to have any conceit of him leſs than infinite. Independent Sovereigntie cannot admit a companion; and the inexhauſtible force of a Creatour, who made all, ſufficeth to govern all. An Angel coſt him no more in the making than a ſilk-worm, and a ſilk-worm coſt him no leſs to produce it than an Angel. Why do you not judge that which is to be made, by it which is already made? When you entered into the world, the Divine Providence, as a harbinger, prepared your lodging for you, it was not in your power to make your ſelf then either rich or poor, Maſter or ſervant, King or ſubject; your affairs were diſpatched, and your counſel not asked. God alſo in ſilence draweth out the web of your life; if you deſire to be happy, you have nothing to do, but to contribute your free-will to his work. But if you have ſet up your reſt to become a Politician, contrary to the decrees of Providence, and to bend the byaſs to your pretended intereſts, is it not to do the ſame thing, which a frog ſhould, if ſhe ſought to ſwim againſt the current of Rhodanus or Danubius? Would not it be as ridiculous, as if a flie ſhould ſeek to ſoar up to heaven, and fix her little feet, to ſtay the courſe of the Primum Mobile? You ſay, I preſs you, and if you can proſper well in the affairs of the world by theſe ways of piety and honeſty, which are ever annexed to a firm belief of a divine Providence, you would rather take this ſame than any other. To it I anſwer that which Laertius ſpeaketh of the Philoſopher Byon, who having before been an atheiſt, & afterward by chance diſpoſing himſelf to invoke the falſe gods, became moſt ſuperſtitious in their ſervice, under hope of ſome temporal commodities, which he thought to gain. O great fool (ſaith this Authour) who could not propoſe gods to himſelf, unleſs he made them mercenary, and would needs have the belief of a Divinitie depend on the ſucceſſes of his perſon and houſe. God (ſaith S. Auguſtine) engageth not his promiſe to make us happy according to the world, ſo ſoon as we become honeſt men. If you ſay unto him: O God, where is your juſtice, to ſuffer the wicked ſo to flouriſh, & good men to be afflicted? He will anſwer, Where is your faith? where is that promiſe I have made you? Have you made your ſelf a Chriſtian to be happy in the world? This were to make a virtue beggerly, wanton, and intereſſed, which muſt ever be payed with proſperities: we may well ſay, it reſigned it ſelf to God for good morſels, and not for honeſty. It is much to be feared, leſt the pleaſures of the preſent, may make it looſe the taſt of the recompence promiſed in Heaven, as it is ſaid the dogs, which hunted among the flowers of Mount Gibel, loſt heretofore the tracks of the hare.

Againſt the ancient ſaying touched by Tertullian: Non licet Deos noſſe gratis. Diogen. Laer. lib. 4.

Aug. Enar. 2. in Pſal. 25. Dic tibi Deo; Hæc eſt juſtitia tua ut mali floreant, boni laborent: & Deus tibi reſpondet, Hæc eſt fides tua: Hoccine tibi promiſi, & ad hoc Chriſtianus factus es, ut in ſeculo floreres?

Irridendum, ægre curam rerum humanarum quicquid eſt ſummum, ſed credi, & uſu vitæ eſt. Plin. l. 2. c. 7.

O proditorem generis humani. Vives 1. de verit. fidei lib. 9.

If following good Policie, we should be unhappy towards the world, we might ever comfort the captivity of our body by the liberty of our mind, and guild our chains of glory with our virtues. We should enter into the community of great spirits, who have done all good, to endure all evil; we should much more rejoyce to be in the bottom of the prison with S. Paul, than in the heaven on earth, which Cosroes the Persian King caused to be built. But God is not so harsh to a good conscience, that he desireth to hold it still in the incommodities of present life: but much otherwise, if you will well discourse, there will be found an infinite number of good Princes, excellent Magistrates, and all sorts of persons qualified, who pursuing the way of honesty, have been most prosperous in the mannage of affairs. And if you consider your Politicians, who make profession to refine all the world, either you have seen but the first station of their plaistered felicity, or have ever found great labyrinths, horrible confusions, fortunes little lasting, dejection in their posterity, hatred, and the execration of Ages.

I think, I have fully illustrated these truths in the histories which I have written of Herod, Theodosius, Maximus, Eugenius, Constantine, Diocletian, Constans, Julian, and divers others.

And if you yet desire to behold with a ready eye, how there is no policie powerfull against God, and how he surprizeth the most subtile, making snares of their greatest cunning to captive them; behold Joseph, sold by his wicked brothers, for fear he should be honoured, and yet see him honoured because he was sold. Behold Haman, who practised the ruin of the Hebrews, to raise himself; and see him raised on a gibbet of fifty cubits high, to humble him. Behold Jonas, who would also be a Politician contrary to the counsels of his Master; yet tempests pursued him, the lot served him for an arrest, the sea for a Mistress of constancy, the belly of a Whale, which should be his sepulcher, for a Palace. He came to the haven by ship-wrack, much more safe in the entrails of a fish, than in a ship. Behold Pharaoh, who becomes crafty, and thinketh by ruinating the Israelites, his Scepter is throughly established: God surprizeth him in subtility, and makes him know the oppression of this poor people, is the instrument of his ruin. A little child, which lieth floating on the waters of Nilus, in a cradle of bulrushes, as a worm hidden in straw, and whose afflicted mother measureth his tomb with her eyes in every billow of this faithless element, is delivered from peril by the very bloud of Pharaoh, to turn the Diadem of Pharaoh into dust, and bury him all enflamed in a gulf of the Red-sea. Behold Jeroboam, who revolting against his Prince, raised a State by ambition, and a Religion out of fantasie, having seen the Altars crack with the horrour of his crime, yet his heart still remaining more obdurate than stone, in the end he is so chastised by the hand of God, that there was not left so much as one handfull of dust of his house upon the face of the earth. Behold Absalom, who thought the means to mount up to a Throne, was to make a foot-stool by force of Arms of the crowned head of his father: yet see him entangled in a tree, transfixed with three spears, and thrown into a deep pit, which left nothing of him alive, but the memory of his misery. Behold Saul, who makes shew punctually to obey the law of God under the direction of Samuel, he afterwards learns to become cunning, plotting designs, and seeking in all points his own petty interests: but in the end David, whose life he judged incompatible with his own estate, dismounted him, using no other Policie, but by making himself an honest man.

Domus Jeroboam eversa est, & deleta de superficie terræ. 3 Reg. 15.

Behold the Monarchies of the world, so much disputed on, behold Scepters hanging on a silken thread, the Empires, and lives of Otho, Vitellius, Galba, Piso, Balbinus, Florianus, Basilius, Silvanus, Tacitus, Quintilius, Maximus, Michael Colophates. Behold the fall of Parmenio under Alexander, Sejanus under Tyberius, Cleander under Commodus, Ablavius under Constantine, Eutropius under Arcadius, Vigilius under Frederick, Brocas under Philip, Cabreca under Peter, and so many of the like kind.

Either you shall make your self wholly insensible, or must affirm, that to raise a State, and build a fortune, you are to proceed securely therein, with a very great tie upon the maxims of faith, religion, and honesty, unless you will expect in the course of an uncertain life a most certain ruin. And yet you still doubt to enter into the Citie of good Policie. Oh, had you once tasted those delights, you would become wholly enamoured of them, but I see it is fit I make a piece of painting for you, to oppose that wicked Policie.

The fourth SECTION.

The Table of the Citie of God, otherwise called, The Citie of honest men; drawn out of many excellent conceits of ancient Authours, and things practised in some former Common-wealths.

I Will tell you than, that I have seen in the idæa of Plato this Divine Agathopolis, and that my mind is still much pleased with the remembrance of this spectacle. Expect not I should describe unto you the Countrey nor Citie with curiositie of language, for I leave that to Poets and Oratours, who have more leisure than I. Onely I intreat you to believe, that all which delicate pens of antiquitie have written of Elisian fields, and the fortunate Islands, are in it to be found, with many advantages, which we may much better conceive than expresse. The Heavens are there smiling, the air wholsom, the waters good, the seasons temperate, the winds calm, the ground fertile, the abode delightfull, the hills and valleys watered with goodly fountains, shadowed with many trees, covered with vines, enamelled with flowers, tapistred with meadows, bristled with ears of corn; on what side soever you turn, it seemeth the Providence of God hath taken much pleasure to embellish this territory with his own hands.

I will not speak to you at all of the walls, Towwers, Bulwarks, Bastions, Theaters, Amphitheaters, Colosseses, Edifices, and other the like; for herein this fortunate Citie hath not grounded its greatness, although there were to be seen buildings, as admirable, as if the Angels of Heaven were come down on earth, to undertake the direction thereof. I took it for a good presage, when I saw at the enterance of the Citie a great number of minds, modest, stout, and resolved, who went to the fountains to draw water, and bare the pitcher on their shoulders, as that ancient Rebecca, of whom it is spoken in Scripture, labouring like bees in a bright summers day. I saw over the gate of the Citie a great statue of the Sun in the sign of Libra, which made me suppose, that all was mannaged within it, as are the days and the nights in the Equinoctial. I was not deceived in the judgement I made upon it, for there were not so much as clocks out of order, in such sort, that they struck all together, and mutually met at every hour of the day.

It was a contentment to me to walk on a pavement, even and smooth, and to behold streets very fair, where there was neither stench, dirt, channels,

riels, coach-man, caroch, nor lash of whips, smoak of roasts, criers, much tattle, running up and down, sinks, perfumes of Carpet-knights, waggish tricks of lacheys, nor sleights of cut-purses proud gates of Redomonts, nor leaders of Bears, nor Mountebanks, nor petty faggers, quarrelers, drunkards, ale-houses, nor any of those which draw tribute from humane flesh. The whole world there was busied, and there was not an idle boy: onely you might see children very yong, who played at a most innocent game, and bare in their childish faces the goodness of fathers and mothers, imprinted with an excellent character.

I learned the principal scope of their great felicity, was a most genuine simplicity, which reigned amongst all the inhabitants; not that they were stupid, or witless; for accosting them, I soon perceived they had spirits clear-sighted and well purified; but all their study was to make a harmony between their heart and tongue, and to proceed in all things they undertook with marvellous freedom: they were infinitely amazed when it was told them, there were in other Countreys counterfeit men, who spake contrary to their knowledge, and thinking one thing in their hearts, affirmed the contrary with their tongues. They thought it impossible, and used comparisons of their clocks, where the wheel and the hand went ever a like pace. And when I insisted, and grounded my self upon experience of what I had seen and heard, they concluded it may well then be said, those men there are spiritual Centaurs, composed of two natures.

And it being told them, there were Ladies and Gentlewomen in other Provinces, which wore sumptuous apparel, plaited, bumbasted, slashed, loaden with precious stones and chains, which had the spoils of the dead upon their heads, draw-bridges tyed to their feet, and that they bestowed a quarter of their lives in combing, and plaistering their faces: the women of this Countrey had much compassion hereof, and spake with tears in their eyes: Alas poor creatures! we may well say they have committed enormous sins, to carry themselves thus. And when it was answered, the greatest ambition which these Ladies had in the world, was to use this custom, they made many signs of the Cross, asking whether they were innocents, they would not absolutely say, fools?

Hereunto was added a tale, that in the year of an universal peace, there was a Ladie, who travelling with her husband into some other Province, had learned a certain manner how to beautifie her face, which she very curiously made use of; the rest perceiving it, caused her to play at King and Queen, which was a pastime, where the Ladie, who became Empress by the custom of the game, commanded the rest what she thought good, and all yielded obedience to her. The Empress chosen, imposed upon all her train to wash their faces, which this counterfeit woman being inforced to do, as the water dissolved the painting, and that she appeared as she was, the confusion of her forehead was so excessive, that she as it were died with grief, not daring afterward to undertake the like. Their attire port, gate, countenance, words, houses, moveables, tables, recreations, were carried with simplicity, yet accompanied with majesty, civility, decorum, and seasoned with as true pleasures, as humane life may afford.

I saw many old men of an hundred years and upward, who were yet very fresh, whereat I was much amazed, and one of them looking on me: "Why "(saith he) do you wonder? We live here on inno-"cent meats, whereby it cometh to pass, that we do "not so much as know the names of diseases, of which "(it is said) you have huge registers, which are the "purchasers of your intemperance. We have here no "desire to drie up our entrails, and shorten our days; "we are all great in the obedience we tender to the "law: all rich in the contentment of our desires; and "all pleased with the happiness one of another. We "have no passion to wear our hearts, nor cares to pre-"judice our lives, nor avarice to burn us up alive in "our houses, nor ambition to make us wings fastened "on with wax, to fly up to the clouds, and make "both land and sea famous by our falls. We have an "excellent law, which is, never to proceed against the "law of nature; and to tell you the truth, the ignо-"rance of sins, wherein we live, serves us better than "all the precepts of virtue do others.

"There is no war among us but against vices, which "we rather desire to vanquish, than all sorts of mon-"sters. We know not what plagues mean, because "we neither infect the air nor land with blasphemies "or bloud. The seasons of the year have with us the "same equality which our spirits enjoy, and the sun "smileth on us in all his mansions, as we endeavour "to have a charity perpetually smiling, and the bow-"els of compassion towards our like. When we "would behold goodly Theaters, we reduce into our "memory the vanities of men, to bewail them so "much as they are frivolous. We see this great spe-"ctacle of the world, which it is very hard to imitate, "and to fault it, is a crime.

"The greatest eloquence among us, is truth, and "the first science we teach our children, is that which "instructeth them not to tell a lie. Above all, we "endeavour piously to honour and serve God, uni-"ting us to his Spirit, and submitting our ways to "the main stream of his Providence.

I stood very attentive to hear this old man speak: for I was in a good place; yet not contenting my self simply with what he had said, I needs would see their Churches, their devotions, their laws, and their justice, their commerce, and their Policie. I saw the places dedicated to the service of God, were exceedingly well governed, observed, and frequented, and that their devotion was not a slight fore of apish tricks, nor affected countenances, but a solid belief of the Divinity with most pure affections. They had no great store of bells, nor took any pride to ring them, nor to publish festivals with much noise, nor to set up Fairs at the enterance into Churches, nor to sell jewels, nor wear rich apparel, nor to glory in their kitchins. Their great solemnities were better known by silence and devotion, than by any other exteriour ostent. It was a blessing, to behold that heresie had altered nothing, either in their doctrine or manners; for they had ever declared themselves enemies of all innovation: and as it is said that fishes are silent, and draw near to the source of waters, so they banishing from their Citie all those contentious disputations, let their mouthes to the fountains of verity.

Thither came at the time whilest I was there, an able man, who thought to preach Controversies to them, and difficult distinctions of School-divinity; but the better sort of French-men demanded whether he preached in Hebrew or no. They could not endure any one should perplex their consciences, by vehemently raising up an infinite number of too subtile arguments, and many times unhonest; so much they feared to bring any mixture upon their innocency, finding more assistance in the lights of good nature, than the subtilities of men.

I considered how at their going from Church, they went to visit goodly great Hospitals, which were excellently well founded, and administered for the help of the poor, as well forreigners as domesticks: and I saw the most curious Ladies went confidently into them with chatitle in their hands, humbling themselves to the services of the most indigent. This made me so enamoured of their government, that I judged it the quintessence of the same Theologie.

And verily, when I sought to inform my self of their laws, I found they had as few, as their soundest men had medicines. They were all grounded on the doctrine of the Saviour of the world, namely on that word, which forbiddeth us to do that to others, which we would not to be done to our selves. Their state was Monarchal under the government of a good King, whom they honoured as a visible Divinity. This King had a Councel composed of the prime men of the world, who lived like Angels, and spake as Oracles; so much reverence they bare them, that when they appeared in the streets, they were seen to pass along with a certain silence mingled with veneration, as if they had been animated Reliques.

I likewise saw old Captains grown white in forreign wars, under the shadow of Palm-trees, and a flourishing warlike troup, readily disposed to do bravely upon occasion. The obedience was there so great, that if a souldier had his arm ready up to strike, upon the first sound of retreat, he would withhold the blow. All rewards were for virtues, and Fortune much complained, that she in this Countrey had neither Altar nor credit. Very rarely should you see a man advanced, but by long and faithfull trials of his merit: so that honours were there fastened, as it is said, with lyme and cement, because they sought for nothing more honourable from great actions, than the contentment to have done them.

All was there so peaceable, that it seemed this whole Citie was the nest of Halcyons, which calmeth the brow of Heaven, and appeaseth tempests. The Citizens entertained one another, as the fingers on the hand, every one taking part of the good of his fellow: and it was a matter as rare to see a quarrel, as a monster brought from the utmost limits of Africk.

Needs must I confess I took a singular content, when one day passing through a street, I heard two old men, who discoursed in their language of forreign Countreys, and the one said to his companion, that duels and quarrels were used there: the other would not believe him at all, thinking that two men who bare one and the same figure, could not contend one with another: but he persisted, and said he knew it to be true, and that the source of all their debates, was to say: It is mine, It is not: It is so, Yea, No. This narration so enkindled them, that they resolved to imitate those of whom they spake, and to have at least once in their lives a quarrel. But what endeavour soever they used, they would never confidently say, Yea, No. For as soon as one had pronounced, Yea, and began to make shew of contestation, the other said, Take it, I yield it. I leave you to think, whether any thing might be seen more pure than these souls.

This narration is found in the lives of the holy Anchorets.

In their commerces they so much feared to wrong their neighbours, that you would have said, they studied to deceive themselves, for fear to get from another; and if any one had gained ought by some mis-reckoning, he was half dead, and rose oftentimes at midnight to hasten to make restitution, it being otherwise impossible for him to enjoy any repose.

I saw their Palace, which was a very beautifull piece, but the manner of suits and processes were there very rare; yet had I notwithstanding a vehement desire to hear them plead, at which time it was told me, that the next day a notable cause was to come to a hearing.

I failed not to be present thereat, and saw two men of the same condition, like those of whom S. Chrysostom wrote the history, who pleaded for a treasure. The matter was, the one had sold his land, and the other had bought it. The seller quickly laid hold of his money, and the buyer being entered into possession, had begun to till the field, to have corn from thence: but not thinking thereof, he found gold in it; for coming to plow the land, he made discovery of a great treasure. But he, as much astonished as if he had found some venemous creature, or some mischievous piece of witch-craft, went directly to the seller to advertise him of what had passed, and wished him to take his gold again: but the other being unwilling to understand him in that kind, caused him to be called before the Judges. This was a business then handled with so much concourse of people, that never have I seen a cause so notorious. I had much ado to understand any thing of it, but certain broken words. The plaintive spake, How? Must men be used thus? You have sold me a field, and not given me notice there was a treasure hidden in it, why have you deceived me, why have you used such foul play with me? The defendant lifted up his hands to Heaven, and said: I swear and protest unto you by the faith of an honest man, that I did not thus purposely. I sold you my land in all simplicity, not having the least suspition that there was any treasure. Well Sir, if you sold it with a sincere intention (saith the other to him) God pardon you, but I pray you come and take away your treasure. He again: Why should I take it? It belongs to you. The other: To me? What injustice is this! I bought land, and not gold. You purchased the land, answered the defendant, and all the appurtenances, it is reason that you possess all. The poor plaintif replied, sighing: Would you use me in this fashion, and charge me with such unhappiness? Rather take your land again. I will not, said his adversary: it belongeth to you. Good God deliver me from such an unfortunate chance, I will have care how I engage my self in the like. In the end, the treasure was adjudged to him that bought the land, whereat he was much troubled, so that his friends had business enough to comfort him.

Chrysostom. ad Popul. Antio.

Oh Age! Oh goodness! Oh golden poverty! How much art thou now estranged from our manners! I saw not there the Tornielle nor criminal process; for crimes were banished from thence, both by great severity of laws, and the excellent disposition of the people.

Every one was made to render an account very exactly of the means he had to live on. And there was a certain girdle, as that of which Nicholas Damascene speaketh in his Policie, wherewith the just wideness of the waist was measured; and if any one were grown too gross, he had much ado to escape, unless he brought good witness that this happened not to him through idleness or excess of diet.

If a detractour were found, all his teeth were knocked out one after another: If a thief, melted gold was poured down his throat: If an homicide, he was put to be fed on by vulturs in an iron cage: If a blasphemer, his lips were seared with a hot iron, and his mouth sowed up: If a drunkard, he was put into a sack, and thrown into the water: If one unchaste, he was burnt with a soft fire, such horrour had they of vice.

Great volumes would be necessary to recount all the wonders of this celestial Agathopolis, which require some other scope than that which I have undertaken. I will content my self to tell you for conclusion, that I saw in the middest of the Citie a great Pyramis of white marble, on which was set the statue of Justice, clothed with a robe all embroidered with stars, holding in one hand a book of laws, and in the other an ear of corn; about her were also pourtrayed in embossed work, truth, wisdom, and the arts; and somewhat lower were beheld the statues of all the great States-men, with certain excellent precepts of Policie, engraven in brass; some copies whereof I have drawn out, which I, my Politician, desire to impart unto you.

The

The fifth Section.

Sage Precepts drawn out of the Monuments of the divine Agathopolis.

HE is the greateſt States-man, who to himſelf ſeemeth the leaſt. Imagine not your greatneſs conſiſteth wholly to ſet up the Common-wealth of Plato and Xenophon in your own imagination, nor to lay together a huge heap of precepts, nor to know Cabales or myſteries, nor to make profeſſion of great ſubtilities and ſtratagems: we have ſeen by the experience of all Ages, that in affairs there is a certain ſtroke of the Divine Providence, which dazeleth all the wiſe, diſarmeth the ſtrong, and blindeth all the moſt politick, with their own proper lights.

Ordinarily the moſt unhappy in States have been thoſe, who have made the greateſt ſhew of knowledge, to deceive under humane Policie. That is it which ruined Jeroboam, which undid Saul, which overthrew the Common-wealth of the Athenians, and which made Machiavel with his great liſt of precepts to be diſaſterous in all his undertakings. Theſe kind of ſubtile men better underſtand the myſterie of diſputation, than how to live, to diſcourſe than to counſel, and to ſpeak, than to do. They all have as it were three things much oppoſite to good counſels.

The firſt is, that they are variable, fickle, and uncapable of repoſe; which is the cauſe, that as the Sun ſometimes draweth up a great quantitie of vapours which he cannot diſſipate, ſo they likewiſe, by this vivacitie perpetually active, do amaſs together a great heap of affairs, which their judgement can never diſſolve. The ſecond is, that they ſwim in an infinite confuſion of reaſons and inventions, reſembling oftentimes bodies charged with too great abundance of bloud; who through a notable exceſs find death in the treaſure of life. The third is, that ſeeking to withdraw themſelves from common underſtanding, they figure to themſelves ſubtilities, and chymæraes, which are as the Towers of the Lamiæ (as Tertullian ſpeaks) on which no man hath thought, or ever will; which is the cauſe that their ſpirit floating in this great tyde of thoughts, ſeldom meeteth with the diſpatch of an affair.

Adde likewiſe to this, that God is pleaſed to ſtupifie all theſe great profeſſours of knowledge, and make them drink in the cup of errour, in ſuch ſort, that we coming to diſcourſe concerning their judgement, find they have committed many faults in the government of Common-wealths, which the ſimpleſt peaſants would not have done in the direction of their own houſes.

This hath been well obſerved by the Prophet Iſaiah, when he ſaid of the Councellours of Pharaoh: The Princes of Tanais are become fools, the Princes of Memphis are withered away, they have deceived Ægypt with all the ſtrength and beautie of her people: God hath ſent amongſt them a ſpirit of giddineſs, and made them reel up and down in all their actions like drunken men. The holy Job hath ſaid the ſame in theſe terms: God ſuffereth theſe wiſe Councellours to fall into the hazards of ſenſeleſs men. God maketh the Judges ſtupid, taketh away the ſword and belt from Kings, to engirt their reins with a cord: God maketh the Prieſts to appear infamous, ſupplanteth the principal of the people, changeth the lips of truth-ſpeakers, taketh away the doctrine of old men, and poureth out contempt upon Princes.

Iſaiah 19.

Job 12.

Behold the menaces which the Sovereign Maſter pronounceth againſt thoſe who wander from the true way; and therefore, my Politician, without perplexing your ſpirit with an infinity of precepts, which have been touched by a great diverſitie of pens, I affirm, that all which you may here expect, conſiſteth in four things, which are as four elements of your perfection, to wit, Conſcience, Capacitie, Diſcretion, and Courage.

The firſt and moſt neceſſary inſtruments of all arts, and namely of this profeſſion, is Conſcience; which verily is the moſt ancient Governeſs of the ſoul, and the moſt holy Miſtreſs of life.

It is that, which will inſtantly diſpoſe you to the end, whereunto you are to pretend in the exerciſe of an office. It is that which will tell you, that having given your ſelf to the publick, you are taken away from your ſelf: that you muſt not enter into this Sanctuary of juſtice with a beggarly, baſe, or mercenary intention, but to aim ſincerely at God, and the good of the Common-wealth. It is that, which will diſcover unto you thoſe three wicked gulfs of ambition, avarice, and impuritie, which have ſwollowed all ſpirits diſ-united from God. It is that which will teach you, that what is done in Heaven, is proportionably acted in a Mathematical circle; and that which is done in the great Regiment of Angels, ought to be done in the great government of men. It is that, which will firmly ſupport you on the baſis of the Eternal Providence. It is that, which will render you next unto God, by often thinking on God, and will make you ſpeak what you think, and do what you ſpeak.

It is that, which will inſtruct you, that the ſpirit of man is like a Sun-dyal, which is of no uſe but when the Sun reflecteth on it; and that you likewiſe expect not your underſtanding may have any true light and direction for the government of people, if not enlightened with a ray of God.

Beſides, it will give you means to enter into a holy liſt of piety and juſtice, which are the two fundamental pillars of all great eſtates. Piety will aſſign you two ſorts of devotion, the one common, the other ſingular.

The common will cauſe you pioufly to honour and ſerve God, you firſt having moſt pure and chaſte beliefs in that which concerneth true faith, without any mixture of curioſities and ſtrange opinions: for it is a very great ſecret in matter of religion, not to believe of God but what he is; and that man ever knows him ſufficiently, who is holily ignorant of him, eſteeming him infinitly to tranſcend his knowledges. Secondly, it will apply you to divine Worſhip and publick ceremonies, in a manner free, cordial, and Religious, for the ſatisfaction of your interiour, and the example of the publick.

Inſuſpicabilis ſecreti reverendæque majeſtatis cognitio eſt, Deum non noſſe, niſi Deum. S. Zeno ſerm. de Nativit.

Singular devotion will move you to conſider, how being a publick perſon, and charged with affairs which expect the motion of the Divine Providence, you have a great dependance on Heaven, and that it therefore will ſhew you according to the proportion of your time and leiſure, ſome hour of retirement to negotiate particularly with God, in imitation of Moſes, that great States-man, who had ſo familiar a recourſe to the Tabernacle. For if that be true which S. Gregorie Nazianzen ſaith, that we ought to have God in mind, as often as we breath, it is ſo much the more ſuitable to States-men, as they have moſt need to ſuck in this life-giving ſpirit, as from the fountain of the Word, by the means of prayer.

Saint John Damaſcene in a Dialogue he made againſt the Manichees, holdeth this opinion, That the greateſt Angels are as clocks, which come in the end to languiſh and faint, if God do not continually draw them upward by the breath of his ſpirit: ſo muſt we ſay, that the goodlieſt Spirits, and ſtrongeſt Intelligences leſſen and wax old every moment, if they reſume not vigour in the intellectual ſource, by the virtue of devotion.

When you shall be instructed in these principles, this wise Mistress, whom I call your conscience, will make you find in a right course the perfection of justice, which consisteth in four principal things.

The first is, neither to act, nor shew to your subjects the least suspition of evil or sin. For you must begin your government by your own example; and since your spirit is the first wheel whereunto all the other are fastened, it is necessary to give it a good motion. It is held, when the Sun stood still in the time of Josuah, the Moon and all the Stars made the like pause. Governours and Masters have this proper to themselves, that in all they do, they pour forth their spirits into such of their subjects, who are for the most part neither good nor bad, but by the relation they have to the life of those, on whom their fortunes depend.

Peccare & non cohibere peccantes, juxta æstima. Dositheus l. Italicorum.

The second is, not to suffer an evil, since, as said Agapetus to the Emperour Justinian, to commit and permit crimes, when one hath full power to hinder them, is as it were one and the same thing. There are no flatteries so charming, nor importunities so forcible, which should ever make a well composed spirit to bend to the permission of a sin, which he knoweth to be against the honour of God, and the tranquilitie of his conscience. Fabricianus a Roman Captain, in ruining a Fortress of the Samnites, kept their Venus, which he sent to Rome for the beauty of the workmanship, and it is thought the aspect of this statue was the first occasion of making his wife an adulteress, and caused him afterward to serve as a victim to the loves of this unchaste woman by horrible massacre. It happeneth oftentimes, that Masters of families, who seem very innocent in their persons, retain scandals in their houses, through a certain pusillanimity and dissimulation, which draw upon them the chastisements of God, and disasters very extraordinary. The Scripture saith, the High Priest Eli was the lamp of God, before he was extinguished by a wicked toleration of the excesses of his children, which rent his house, and buried him in publick ruins. Take good heed there be not some houshold servant raised by your indulgence, who rendereth your favours odious, and liberalities criminal, by abuse of the power which you have put into his hands. Alkabicius the Astrologer observeth, there are stars of their own nature benign, and which would ever behold us favourably, were it not the neighbour-hood of some others malign altered their sweet inclinations. And there are many Masters and Mistresses to be found in the world, endued with a humour exceedingly good, if the near approaches which bad servants make to their persons did not destroy this temper. That man is truly stout and happy, who findeth or maketh men of honour well disposed, faithfully affected, industrious, vigilant, laborious, indefatigable, sober in speech, prompt in execution, patient and able in their charges; for good souldiers make glorious Captains, and good Officers great States-men.

1 Reg. 33. juxta 70. ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς θεοῦ.

Qualities of an Officer.

The third condition of the zeal of justice is, that you never be pleased an ill act be done under the shadow that you were not of counsel thereunto, or that it never came to your knowledge. You may very well rejoyce, not to have at all contributed to evil, yea not to the birth of evil; for this were otherwise to betray your conscience, which ought to have the same capacity to abhor all vices, and embrace all virtues, as faith inclineth to believe all veritjes revealed unto it. I leave you to think, what conscience Sextus Pompeius of elder time had, to whom, as he entertained Augustus and Mark Anthonie in his ship, and being in the heat of his feast, a servant came to tell him, if so he pleased, he quickly would put these two Princes into his power, thereby to make him Monarch of the world: He a little while thinking on this matter, said to him who brought the news, Thou shouldst have done it, and never told me of it. This well shewed he bare some respect to fidelity, but was very far from that perfection which hateth evil, yea, even that which is out of the compass of ones own knowledge.

The fourth is, that you must correct disorders, as much as you possibly may, declaring you have a natural horrour against all sins, which resist laws both divine and humane, and that the love of honestly hath made you to pass it as it were into your nature. I do not see where the virtue of a great States-man may shew it self with more lustre, than in the exercise of justice. S. Gregorie the Great saith, A mixture of oyl and wine must be made to heal the wounds of men in such sort, that mindes may not be ulcered with too much severity, nor grow remiss by an excess of indulgence. The rod must be used to touch, and the staff to support; love should not soften, nor rigour transport matters into despair. Moses, the first States-man, burned inwardly with the fire of charity, and was outwardly wholly enkindled with the flames of the zeal of justice. As a loving father he offered his soul to God, even to the wish to be blotted out of the book of life to save his people: as a Judge he took the sword, and bathed it in the bloud of Idolaters. He was in all kinds both a couragious Embassadour, and an admirable mediatour, pleading before God the cause of his people with prayers, and before his people the cause of God with the sword.

Greg. in Job. 29. Justitiâ firmatur solium. Prov. 16.

It is to do all, to execute good justice; God hath set you on high for no other cause, but to behold vices beneath: if you exalt them, they will trample you under foot, you shall perpetually drink the greatest part of the poison you mingled for others; and when you shall break down the hedge, the snake (as the Scripture threateneth) will sting you the first. When a good conscience hath accommodated you with this condition, so that you have no other intention but to advance goodness in your own person, and in those who belong to you, you are not a little advanced in the perfections of a great States-man: yet it is fit, Conscience, Science, and Capacity be had for the discharge of great employments, and especially by him, who makes profession to govern men sometimes as untractable as Hydra's of many heads.

Everti in terrum inde magis vitia despice. Calisd.

Eccles. 10.8

Campanus Bishop of Terni, of whom we have some Works in the Bibliotheca Patrum, in the book which he composed of magistracy, requireth four conditions in him: A wit vigorous, a carriage neither dejected nor unpleasing, a prudence full of maturity, when there is occasion to consult upon an affair, and a promptness to take time in the instant, to execute that which hath once been well resolved on.

Campanus Interamnensis Episcop.

He saith a vigorous wit, for it is very fit the soul should be full of lights and flames which is to serve others for a guide; and as there is no wit so great which hath not many defects, so it is very necessary it be polished by good letters, which unite and incorporate in one sole man the faculties of many others, and by the conference of the wise, which taketh away all that which excellent natures do as yet retain of terrestrial, to make them appear in their best lustre.

A man, saith this Authour, who thinketh to know all, and do all, without having any need of the counsel of others, is necessarily of two things the one, either a God amongst mortals, or a beast among men. The Scripture speaking of the great sea of brass, which Solomon made in the Temple, saith in the book of Paralipomenon, that it contained three thousand measures, and the third book of Kings affords it but two thousand. This seemeth to involve some contradiction, which

2 Paral. 4.5.

3 Reg. 7.16.

Tostatus

Tostatus cleareth in saying, this great vessel in truth amounted to three thousand measures, but that there was never poured out any more thereof than two thousand. So is it with the wits of men how capable soever; we are not to cloy them with charges and affairs so far as to exhaust them, but to divide burdens in proportion, since there is none but God alone of ability for all. The presumption of those who will undertake above their forces, so to leave nothing for others to do, much more hurteth than would stupidity.

Nigrum sanguinis regnantem discernit, & præstat humano generi, nè de optimo Principi possit errari. Calliod. Var. l. 1. Ep. 2.

He addeth, to wit, the shape of body, which is not a little recommendable in the stature, figure, port, gate, age, countenance, speech, and even in the very habit. All this when it is eminent, surprizeth minds, and striketh its stroak to give estimation to a man before we enter into his interiour: but if the house answer not to the frontispiece, what may we else say, but that nature hath built up a goodly mansion to lodge therein a handsom beast?

What he hath said in the third and fourth place of prudence natural and acquired, which some have to deliberate and well resolve on an affair, accompanied with a stout resolution and a very strict execution, is verily most necessary in a great States-man.

There are ordinarily two great rocks in this sea of affairs, which have in them oppositions very contrary in negotiation of things important. The one is irresolution, and the other obstinacy in opinion. Irresolution ever holds men suspended in the air, and tormenteth subjects who expect their dispatches and directions from the counsel of those who deliberate. Obstinacy through a false presumption of ability, will never forgo what hath been once proposed, and resembleth a rude Portress, which driveth all good advise from the house. One would not believe the hurt this last plague draweth upon all good counsels, and how hard it is to be cured. Verily it is a prodigie, that God, who discovereth from the superiour vaults of Heaven to the bottom of the abyss, the least atoms of the world, and who is so clear-sighted, that hell hath not darkness thick enough to hide it self before him; notwithstanding all-wise as he is, to dissolve our pride, he feigneth some repentance in his actions; but we, whose thoughts are timorous, fore-sighters uncertain, actions confused, oftentimes have so much arrogance, as to be desirous to make good our faults, for fear to confess our errours.

Jer. 26. 13.

Diminutio majestatis fecisse mutanda. Seneca.

A maxim of Politicians maintaineth, it is to diminish authority, to do that which must be undone; for ever it is better to stifle a monster in his birth which one hath begot, than shortly after to foment and nourish it with humane bloud. Ahasuerus revoking the cruel Edict, which he made concerning the massacre of the Hebrews, yieldeth a pertinent reason thereof, saying, This diversities of decrees proceeded not from the levity of his spirit, but from the alterations of times, which make way for affairs that are treated.

Esther. 16.

As for execution which followeth deliberation, it is verily the hardest piece: for there are many to be found, who deliberate, as the rat in the fable, to hang a little bell about the cats neck, to fortifie their Common-wealth against surprizes. Counsel is received by all with applause; but when they come to execution, every one turns his back. It is not to be imagined, how much a man who executeth affairs prudently resolved on, either of himself, or by such as are very trusty, hath eminence above others in matter of government. King Antigonus said, his warfare was rather a warfare of times and occasions, than arms: and Polybius writeth, that the least things which are done in war are those which are handled with sword and violence; but the most eminent are executed by the knowledge, how duly to manage an occasion.

Polyb. l. 10. c. 9.

Behold in a nearer degree the qualities which form the capacity of a States-man, not enlarging my self to speak here of others, especially of those that are put into the number of blessings, which the common sort attribute to fortune.

But a man may have all possible inclinations, and might notwithstanding be ever like those musicians, who performed all their musick inwardly, no man hearing any of it outwardly, if he produced not himself in direction, which is the application of all the gifts of grace and nature, that a man can have for the practise and course of affairs.

Nil vile, nil cupidum Judices decet. Claras suæ maculas reddunt, si illis, ad quos multi respiciunt, aliquid reprehensum fordescat. Calliodorus.

This direction will teach you a marvellous secret, which is to proportion your self to time, place, persons, affairs treated, and to measure your self in such manner, that your actions may be profitable for all the world. It will bring you forth from behind the curtain, and advance you on the Theater, to see and to be seen reciprocally by all those who have eyes. There it is, where you are not to present any thing that is sordid, dejected, proud, furious, light, fearfull, nor passionate: for great fortunes have this property, to extrude all the blemishes of the heart into the forehead; and although much art may be used to hide ones self, they make a man appear naked, who never is well clothed with habiliments of fortune, if he have not true ornaments of virtue.

What think you, if men be now adays so curious as to vaunt to see spots in the Sun, where will they not find fault, especially if they have a subject given them? Great excuses serve for no other purpose, but to cover vice, which truth discovereth, and fame publisheth, with as many trumpets as men have mouthes.

This sage advise will tell you, that it is not necessary you, shewing your self in publick, must therefore make all your defects appear, and what ever you bear upon your heart, as if you had a breast of christal, but also that the way will to cover your passions, is to have none. I say not, you ought to be without resentments and inclinations, for as those places, where there is neither sound nor motion, favour ill, so souls thus deafened are not always the most purified: but I propounce, you must so repress all motions which combat against reason, that they sparkle not in publick, both to your own disadvantage, and the ill example of those who behold you.

Philosophers have noted, that thunders which flie about break of day are the most dangerous, and you shall observe if a man in the first rays of his dignity early discover covetousness, love, hatred, revenge, avarice, and other passions, which much hasten to the prejudice of the publick, and that the voice of the people be raised up, as the roaring of thunder, he looseth as much reputation, as if he were already corrupted in mind.

Discretion will also shew you the way how to manage your dignity in a manner neither too harsh arrogant, nor haughty; but sweet, affable, and communicative: and with it to retain an honest and temperate gravity, thereby to villifie the character which God hath imprinted on those, whom he calleth to charges and commands.

It was a pleasant mockery to behold those Kings of Egypt appear daily in new habits, with the figures of beasts, birds and fishes, to put terrour upon the people, and give subject to Poets to make fables of Proteus. This affected gravity, is not in the manners of Great men, who naturally love nothing of singularity above others, but the eminence of their excellent qualities. Our spirits are not so base and childish, as to be satisfied with semblances: they desire some thing more solid; and he is ever best esteemed among the wise, who is more respected for the interiour than the outward seeming.

Discretion will discover unto you the conditions, manners, inclinations, abilities, and wants of those whom you are to govern, and with a finger shew you the bent, which way you must encline, to lay hold of men. It is at this day no small matter, to mannage humours, which are as different as they are incompatible. The problem of the wolf, the goat, and the colewort, is daily renewed. If a ferri-man find himself much troubled to pass these three things severally from one side of the river to the other, that the wolf may do no hurt to the goat, nor the goat to the colewort in his absence; what prudence think you must a States-man have, to accord so many dogs and hares, hawks and doves? Saint Gregorie saith, Paradise hath nothing in it but blessed souls, and hell is filled with miserable: but the world wherein we live, containeth merchants very different. You shall behold under your government a great number of simple, innocent, poor, and afflicted creatures. Think God hath principally created you for them, open your heart with an amorous compassion, extend to them the bowels of your charity, stretch out affectionately to them your helpfull hands, take their requests, lend ear to their cries, cause their affairs to be speedily dispatched, not drawing them along in delays which may devour them, strengthen your arm against those that oppress them, redeem the prey out of the Lions throat, and the Harpies talons.

A notable practise given by King Theodorick to Cassiodorus.

Proprio censu negletto sine invidiâ lucri mprum divitias vetuisti: Et unde vix soles reportari patientiæ silentium, voces miliaverunt tibi laudantium.

For this it is, that Kings, Princes, States, and Officers are made. To actions of this kind is it, that God promiseth all the blessings of Heaven and admirations of earth. For this sort of processes are crowns of glory prepared. By this means a man diveth into the bottom of the heart and good opinion of people. This is the cause, that one hath so many souls and lives at command, as there are men, who the more sweetly breath air by the liberality wherewith they are obliged. The greatness of man before God, is not to replenish earth with armies, and make rivers of bloud, and to raise up mountains of dead bodies, but to do justice to a poor orphan, to wipe away the tears of a forlorn widow, to steep in oyl (as the Scripture speaketh) the yoke of people which live on gall and worm-wood. For, not touching here any thing in particular, we know, that in all Realms of Christendom there are very many persons, who sigh under necessities almost intolerable to the most savage, and who daily charge eares with complaints, and Altars with vows for their deliverance.

Now that we have a King so well disposed to justice, and near his person so sage a Councel, a Parliament so zealous for the publick good, so many honourable men, endowed with so sincere intentions, when may we reasonably expect the comfort of people, if not at this hour, when miseries are eminent, clamours piercing, and dispositions very good? Alas, if there be any thing in the world, wherein a great States-man may be seen to oblige the present, and replenish the future times with admiration of his vertues, it is in procuring the advancement of so holy an affair, for which Heaven is in expectation, and the hands of so many thousands of people are daily lifted upon Altars.

Such and so many Officers, for not having had any other aim in charges, but the accommodation of their own affairs, have passed away like phantasms, leaving nothing here behind them but ordure, nor bearing ought with them into the other world but crimes. They have found, that the souls of the wounded have cried to Heaven against them, and that God hath not let it pass without revenge, as speaketh holy Job in the four and twentieth Chapter, where he at large explicateth both the calamity of the poor, and the chastisement of the rich who persecute them. But all those who have constantly addicted themselves to the maintenance of justice, and the consolation of afflicted persons, besides the Crowns which they enjoy in Heaven, live gloriously in the memory of men. Their mouthes, which are opened for justice, after they are shut up as Temples, are truly worthy to have lillies and roses strewed on the marble which incloseth them, and that their posterity may also reap the good odour of the virtues of their noble ancestours, which hath made it march with up-rear'd head before the face of the people.

Anima vulneratorum clamavit, & Deus in ul am abire non patitur.

Regnavit fecultat tunc fi ditior, cùm remittit, & acquirit nobiles thesauros famæ, negletâ vilitate pecuniæ. Cassiod. l. 1. Epist. 16.

You on the other part shall behold travels and laudable actions, which good judgement will invite you to recompence; wherein you must shew your self generous and liberal. For, although virtue be always well enough payed with its own merit, yet must we affirm it to be one of the greatest disorders which may happen in a State, when in sowing benefits, nought else is reaped but ingratitude, and that to be capable of rewards, one must become remarkeable in crimes.

On the other side, there will be many defects presented, that must be corrected, which are either of persons very well conditioned, fallen into some slight offence by surprize; and such as these ought to be handled with much sweetness and clemency; or they are covert vices of some wicked consciences, which you neither ought, nor may as yet manifest; and here much industry and wisdom must be used to dislodge sin, and draw the winding serpent out of his den, as by the hand of the wise woman spoken of in Scripture: or they are publick sins, of men resolved, who sin without hope of amendment to the infection of a Common-wealth; and here is it, you are to strengthen your self with all your power, to take away the evil and evil men.

These are the precepts which S. Bonaventure giveth in his Treatise of the Wings of the Seraphin.

This discretion whereof I speak, will shew you the manner of proceeding in affairs; for it much importeth to lay hold of them by a certain handle which rendereth them much more easie. We see by experience, that those who make them spectacles of chrystal cut into diamond points, for one pistolet on a table, think they see a huge treasure, in such sort their eyes are filled with illusions, and yet their hand if they know not the secret, will be much troubled to find out the piece of gold they seek for.

This daily happeneth in the course of the world; affairs have an infinity of faces, which present themselves to our thoughts even then, when they are most subtile; but they are hollow imaginations, and he is really an able man, who knoweth how to lay his finger upon the point of a business, and grasp it, as it is said, at the right end.

You expect not here I should speak to you of the mannage of revenues, artillerie, arms, sea-affairs, fortifications, petitions, and decrees, they being matters much alienated from my profession, from whence I can derive no glory but by the confession of mine own ignorance. Every one must look into the substance, extent, and the quality of affairs he treateth, must learn what is profitable to be known for the discharge of his place, inform himself of that which he cannot of himself fore-know, willingly hearken to advices, examine and weigh them with maturity. Avoid above all, six obstacles of good affairs, which are, Disorder, Confusion, Passion, Sollicitude, Irresolution, Precipitation; to do all things warily, and peaceably, so that no anxiety be shewed, like unto Sejanus, a man who had more spirit than conscience, and of whom it is said, that in the middest of his greatest employments, he seemed ever idle.

Alia ejus similima. Velleius.

There

There are ſome who give out many precepts upon every office, and do as if one ſhould make a large diſcourſe to a man by teaching him to go. Experience, which is a wiſe Miſtreſs, ſo ſoon as ſhe encountereth with a man endowed with ſome capacity, ſheweth him much more than books.

Finally, your laſt liverie is Courage, which is exceedingly neceſſary for men of your profeſſion. Caliſtenes a diſciple of Ariſtotle obſerveth, that the earthquake of the Iſle of Delos, was an unlucky preſage to the Cities of Buris and Helice, which were ſwallowed up in a gulf. So when the bodies of States-men, which are as this Iſland of the Sun, tremble and bow to favour, what may we expect but an abſolute deſolation of Provinces? It is neceſſary to have a great courage to ſtrengthen the arm againſt ſo great authority of iniquities and violences of men of quality, who will confound elements, and mix ſtars with the duſt of the earth, to come to the end of their exorbitant pretenſions.

A great courage, ſay I, to reſiſt the ſecret allurements, which occur on the part of allies and friends, eſpecially of powerfull women, to whom nature hath afforded ſuch dangerous attractives, that it is many times much eaſier to defend ones ſelf from the horns of bulls, the tuſks of bores, and the throat of Lions, than from the cunning practiſes of ſuch creatures.

A great courage in the manage of affairs, and words, that are to be uſed with certain perſons, who are quickly angry and heated in their harneſs: what a brave virtue is it to endure and temper them with a mildneſs of ſpirit, peaceable, and charitable; as it is ſaid, that with a honey-comb fountains of troubled water are cleanſed and purified. An Ancient ſaid, that he who can well ſuffer an injury is worthy of an Empire; his onely ſilence will diſarm a paſſionate man, and throw proſtrate at his feet the ſame, who ſeemed to roar over his head.

Avicen. de diluviis.

See La journée

A great courage alſo to tolerate the ingratefull, who often caſt ſtones againſt thoſe, who gave them honey; like unto thoſe Atlantes, who ſhot arrows againſt the Sun.

A great courage likewiſe in the bad ſucceſs of affairs, which cannot always proſper according to the meaſure of our travel and good deſires. And to tell you it in a word, a very able courage, when a man is ready to ſuffer the loſs of office, diſgrace, baniſhment, poverty, impriſonment, and permit rather to have the heart turned out of your belly, than any good reſolution to be pulled from you, which may be conceived for the Weal-publick.

If you deſire to arrive at theſe precious endowments, let the Scripture be ever repreſented before your eyes, as the pillar of clouds and flames, which conducted the army of the living God. There it is, where you ſhall learn maxims of State, ſcored out with moſt vigorous reflections of the wiſdom of God, and where you ſhall trample under foot with a generous contempt ſo many illuſions, which wretched ſouls ſeek for in the mouth of Pythoniſſes and Sorcerers. Read the books of Wiſdom, the Prophets, the book of holy Job, and the divine Pſalms of the King, choſen out according to Gods own heart. Conſider the ſtream of ſo many Hiſtories written in this theater of wonders, which are characters of fire, wherewith the Divine Providence is pleaſed to be figured to mortal eyes, that we may learn the puniſhment of crimes, and the crowns of virtues.

Repreſent unto your ſelves often in your idæaes, thoſe great States-men, who have flouriſhed in the courſe of all Ages, and derive light and fire from their examples, to illuminate and inflame you in the ſelf ſame liſt. Behold him who had been refined above all others in the ſchool of God, I mean Moſes. Who hath there been more humble in refuſing charges, more obedient in accepting them, more faithfull in exerciſing them, more induſtrious in executing the commandements of God, more vigilant in government of the people, more ſevere in the correction of vices, more patient in ſufferance of the infirmities of ſubjects, and more zealous in the cordial love he bare to the whole world?

Moſes Dei de proximo arbiter. Tertul. de Monogamia. Auguſt. l. 22. contr. Fauſt. cap. 69.

With theſe gifts he became the God of Monarchs, he ruined the ſtate of his enemies, he unlooſed the chains of an infinite number of ſlaves, he opened ſeas, he manured wilderneſſes, he marched in the front of ſix hundred thouſand men at arms, he lived laborious amongſt ſhepheards, chaſte in the Courts of Kings, temperate in government, a companion of Angels in his retirement, and as it were a cabinet-friend of God, having continually Heaven for object, and all greatneſs in contempt. He had blotted out all that which was man in him, by the purity of a converſation wholly celeſtial. The fleſh was in him under ſuch ſubjection, and the ſpirit in ſuch Empire, that he merited the name of God, in the reſemblance of whom he was transformed by the ſuperabundance of his virtues.

Omnem iſtam ſecundum corpus habitationem, cæleſtis puritate converſationis obduxerat, mentem regens, carnem ſubjiciens, nomine Dei vocatus eſt, ad cujus ſimilitudinem ſe perfectæ virtutis libertate formaverit. Ambroſ. l. 2. de Cain & Abel.

Behold that great diſciple of Moſes, Joſuah: what piety in the ſervice of the Omnipotent, what ſweetneſs in government, what greatneſs of ſpirit in noble enterprizes, what patience in difficulties, what prudence in direction, what diſpatch in expeditions? It is no wonder if at the ſight of theſe eminent qualities, walls and Cities fell, Giants waxed pale, rivers retired back, the ſun ſtood ſtill, and one and thirty Kings underwent the yoke.

Behold Samuel, the Father, Maſter, and Judge of two Kings, the Doctour of Prophets, the Sanctuary of the poor, the pillar of the Church. Is it not a magnificent ſpectacle to ſee him go out of charge after ſo long a government, and ſo great a diverſitie of affairs, with a heart ſo untainted, and hands undefiled, as if he had perpetually converſed with Angels? Is it not a moſt heroical action which he did in the firſt of Kings, when after the election of Saul, having voluntarily reſigned his dignity, he ſhewed himſelf with up-rear'd head in the midſt of the people, and gave liberty to all the world, from the leaſt to the greateſt, to complain and make information againſt him before the King newly choſen? If it may be found, that in his magiſtracy, he ever did the leaſt wrong to any man, he is there ready to afford all ſatisfaction that may be thought fit. But as he had lived moſt innocently, at this word was liſted up a loud crie, proceeding from a general conſent of the people, which highly proclaimed the integritie of his juſtice. Is not this a praiſe of more value, than millions of gold and Empires.

1 Reg. 22. Loquimini de me coram Domino, & coram Chriſto ejus.

But above all, reflect often on the Wiſdom of God Incarnate, Jeſus Chriſt, the Saviour of the world, as the prime model of all States-men, which the Prophet Iſaiah hath exactly repreſented in the eleventh Chapter of his Propheſie, where he figureth the Redeemer unto us in quality of a Judge, to ſerve for an inſtruction and an example to all poſterity. Firſt, for as much as concerneth his perfections, he gave him ſeven ſorts of ſpirits very conſonant to a true Politician, to wit, the ſpirit of Wiſdom and Underſtanding, the ſpirit of Counſel and Strength, the ſpirit of Science, of Piety, and the Fear of God, wherewith he was wholly repleniſhed. Then deſcribing his manner of proceeding, he ſaith: He ſhall not judge according to humane apparences, by the inconſiderate views of carnal eyes, and the relation of a raſh tongue; but he ſhall do juſtice to the poor, and fortifie himſelf with all kind of vigour, for the defence of ſo many gentle ſouls, as are oppreſſed in the world.

To this purpoſe he ſhall ſtrike the earth with the words words of his mouth, using his tongue as a rod of correction, and shall overthrow the wicked with the breath of his lips.

Justice shall be so familiar to him, that he shall make use of it, as of a girdle of honour, or a rich bawdrick, which brave Capeins wear. The effects of his government shall be so eminent, that the wolf under his reign shall be seen to cohabit with the lamb, the leopard with the goat, the calf with the lion, and little children to play with basilisks and aspicks: willing in these allegories to signifie, that he shall mollifie the most savage humours by his laws, to reduce them to the temper of reason.

Behold somewhat near, how this divine Writer describeth the Policie of the King of Monarchs.

All those who have insisted in his steps, have been glorious in the memory of men; and he that would number up through all Ages so many great States-men, should make a large Volume.

I will not at this time produce Melon Injuriosus, Carmerus, Robert, Ausbert surnamed the Man of God, Oenus, Godegrandus, Ledwardus, Eginardus, Raoul, Fulbertus, Hildwinus, Monsieur Stephen of France, Guarinus, William of Mountaigue, Henrie Arnaudus of Corgues, Rochfort, and the most famous Thomas More; not speaking of so many other lights of Ages, which have illustrated us much nearer, where we may find a large list of uncorrupted men.

Many have so worthily filled the chairs of justice, that they have deserved to pass forward to Altars, there to possess the prime places of Prelacies.

I satisfie my self to draw out of Marcianus, Cassiodorus, Baronius, and ancient Manuscripts, the life of Boetius, where you may observe the body of History sufficiently replenished with matters very considerable.

BOETIUS.

The first Section.

His great Nobilitie.

BEhold here how I make a great States-man to walk along in his rank, the honour of the gown, and the singular ornament of the purple garment; who hath had the priviledge to revive learning in his life, and at his death to bury all the Roman greatness in his tomb.

It is the most Illustrious Boetius, whom I have selected almost in the first Ages of Christianitie, as the most accomplished personage, that hath flourished in the quality of a man of the long robe throughout Christendom. For if you consider his extraction, it was the noblest of his time; if you regard his means, he was of the most honestly rich; if you reflect on his wit, he dazeled the eyes of the most learned; if you behold his innocency, his life was as a pearl without blemish; if you weigh his dignity, he had been three times Consul of Rome; if you enquire after

after his negotiations and government, you shall find he lived in the greatest revolutions of the Roman Empire, when affairs were most thorny. If you will observe his constancy, you shall see a pillar of diamond not to be shaken with all the counterbuffs of iniquity: and if a brave death may set a seal upon a good life, you will be enforced to admire him, beholding him to die on a scaffold, for the defence of piety and justice, which are the two poles that support all the great Policie of this Universe.

The unhappiness is, there hath not been some Authour found in that iron Age, to have written the acts of this great man in a stile suitable to his merit; we should have discovered marvellous treasures: but since I must make my way through so great a scarcity of Writers, who have handled this subject, I will endeavour to render it as little irksom in stile, as it is profitable in matter.

As for the first quality I have observed in him, which is his great Nobility, it is certain he summed up a thousand years, since his Ancestours began to be resplendent with singular lustre in the Citie of Rome, which is no small space, to say, that ten Ages which waste rocks, and wear elements, had not altered the honour of this great Family.

He was descended from the house of those great Manlii, whose hearts extended as far as the Roman Empire. The most celebrated amongst them, named Marcus Manlius, defended the Capitol against the Gauls in the extream necessity of the Romans, and redeemed as it were from the abyss the Citie, which God had chosen to command over so many nations. He was a man truly valorous, who wanted nothing but to have been born in an ample Kingdom, and not in a Republick jealous of the greatness of its subjects: For, he having too much courted the People to the prejudice of Magistrates, was accused to have sought a change of government, and was precipitated from the Capitol which he had defended; to the end the theater of his glory might be turned into the scaffold of his punishment.

Never could any thing be seen more deplorable than this brave Captain, when pleading his cause, where he was upon question of his last unhappiness, having produced about four hundred Citizens, delivered from great necessities by his means, then thirtie spoils of noble enemies, whom he had slain with his own hand, then ten Crowns, then fourty other prizes of valour; as he beheld the incensed Judges much enclining to his ruin, he shewed his naked breast, as yet covered over with honourable scars received in so many great battels for his Countrey; and then turning his eyes & his up-reard hands to heaven towards the Capitol, he prayed the Gods to give the People of Rome the same understanding for the preservation of his person, that they had afforded him for the safety of the Weal-publick, in the defence of the Citie of Rome.

This spectacle was so ravishing, that it was impossible to condemn him in sight of this noble fortress, which subsisted not but by his valour: but his enemies causing him to be carried into another place, exercised a heavy judgement, and an act odious to posterity, which was attended by great sterilities and pestilences, attributed to the death of this noble personage. The other Manlius very eminent, was he, who slew in single combat the Captain of the Gauls, in sight of both the Armies. For this man advancing himself on a bridge, assailed, and defended by both parts, challenged aloud the most valorous among the Romans to combat man to man; which being understood, Manlius slowly came forth with the leave of his Dictatour, and having well observed his adversary, who immeasurably braved it, he struck him so nimbly, that he fell down stark dead in the list: then taking his chain off all bloudy, he hung it about his own neck, from whence he was surnamed Torquatus; which title did afterward likewise remain unto his whole posterity.

The third of this race much renowned in histories by an act, one of the severest ever exercised, was that Torquatus, who caused his sons head to be cut off, for having charged and vanquished his enemy without leave. The young man tickled with the honour of his Ancestours, seeing a fair occasion to fight, took the opportunity. And not expecting the permission of his father, overthrew the enemies of the Roman people, in killing with his own hands a man of note, in single combat. whereupon full of joy, he returneth with the applause of the souldiers, and hasteneth to seek out his father, who commanded the Army, bearing in his hands the spoils of his enemies, and saying aloud: Father, behold the cause, why I may be esteemed your son. But the father turning his eyes away, caused the trumpet to be sounded, to gather all the souldiers together, and in the middest of a great Assembly, as General he pronounced sentence against his son, and said unto him: SON, Since without any respect, either of the dignitie of a Consul wherewith the Common-wealth hath honoured me, or the majestie of the title of a father, which nature hath afforded me above you, you have fought contrary to my Edict, dissolving the sacred knot of military discipline, which hath hitherto maintained the greatness of the Roman State: I well see you have reduced affairs to such necessitie, that either I must forget the Common-wealth, or my self and mine. But God forbid the publick suffer for our faults, and that we must expiate the temeritie of one young man, by the disasters of so many innocent persons. Here an act of State must be performed, which is for the present somewhat odious, but shall be profitable for you & through all posteritie. My son, I have sense of nature, as a father, and as a Captain I resent also the flashes of this youthfull virtue, which is so charming in its illusion: but since I must either by your impunitie annul, or by your bloud seal the commandment of the Consuls; you being of my bloud, I cannot think you so degenerate, as to deny to re-establish by your punishment the Laws of arms, which you by your errour have destroyed.

Thereupon he commanded the executioner to bind him, and lead him to the place of punishment, to be beheaded, wherewith the Assembly was so astonished, as if all the Captains had their heads under the same sword. For every one was drenched in a deep silence, until the bloud of this young Prince was seen to gush forth; for then the souldiers spared neither sorrow nor execrations, taking the body by main force to cover it with its spoils, and enterre it with all honour.

I had a desire to touch this particularly, thereby to teach the Reader, that the great constancy which Boetius witnessed in the whole course of his life, and especially at his death, was in him hereditary.

It were a long piece of work for him, who would prosecute all the acts of the Ancestours of Boetius, since by the report of Saint Hierom, this family hath been so illustrious, that scarcely can one man be found therein, which hath not enjoyed or deserved the Consulship.

Wherefore I may well say, it was a very particular Providence of God, upon this admirable man, which being pleased to raise him to the condition of a great States-man, hath caused him to be nobly born. For although it cannot be denied, but that many descended from very mean extraction, have sometimes exceedingly well improved in the manage of States, yet must we affirm, they have stood in much need of time, diligence, and eminent virtues to give a counterpoize to this defect of bloud. Ordinarily those who arise from these degrees, being derived from base birth, are many times envied, and little respected, spected, whereby finding themselves offended, they often take harsh ways, to become powerfull in the minds of subjects by strong hand: whereas such as are of race noble and illustrious, cannot have so few other parts, but that they may easily enter into hearts, as into a house which the virtue of Ancestours hath beforehand wholly purchased for them. And though this seem expedient in all places, yet is it much more necessary in a State, where is a great number of noble men and generous spirits, and where every one thinks himself sufficient enough to perform that which another doth.

Presumption equalleth them all in ability, at the least according to their imaginations, were it not that the uncontrolable supereminencie of houses makes them yield to reason. And although base nobility be very shamefull, yet is it much more tolerable than a servile spirit, which hath power in its hands without any moderation.

There are four things, saith the Wise-man, which cause earth-quakes here below, A servant imperious, a rich fool, a woman scornfull when she is married, and a maid-servant become the heir of her Mistress: that is, saith he, the fourth thing which the world cannot endure. Education maketh manners, and every one is readily that which he hath learned in youth, were it not, that through a great strength of courage ill inclinations are resisted.

Prover. 30.

Boetius, who in his excellent Nobility was endowed with so sweet a temper of spirit, seemed to be created of God to govern men. On the other part his family, which was rich and powerfull, gave also much increase to his command, as that which alienated him from the corruptions, that easily fasten on a necessitous fortune. A man who feareth poverty, is ever to be feared, and a rich innocent cannot meet with any thing more dangerous than a hungry judge.

Saint Thomas hath said very well, that a poverty virtuous and free from covetousnes, is an admirable quality for a States-man: but where shall we now adays find such a poverty, in a time, when riot is so exorbitant, that the greatest houses are therewith impeached? The innocent riches of our great Consul fell out to be much to the purpose, so that they might be employed for aid of the poor, in a time which happened in one of the sicklest Ages of the world, ruined by so many incursions of Barbarians, not naming the other scourges, which then fought against the sins of men.

Lib. 4. cap. 15. de regim. Princip.

Adde hereunto, that there is much malice in the manners of men, not found in books, and that their actions being very innocent, when they come to measure others by their own level, they find themselves deceived. Besides, the sedentary and retired life spent in the entertainment of their books, rendereth them very timorous, and softeneth their brow, which should always be as it were of brass, to endure the shock of strong impudencies, which may insinuate themselves into the corruptions of the times.

This may be confirmed by the example of Theodates King of the Goths, who with all the Philosophy of Plato, wherein he was exceedingly studious, very ill mannaged his affairs.

As also by Michael the Emperour, surnamed of the Grecians, Parapanicius, as who would say, The Schollar: for he perpetually had table-books and pens in his hand, to compose Orations, Verses, and Histories, resigning the whole government of his affairs to an Eunuch, named Nicephorus, who through his insatiable avarice drew much hatred upon the head of this Emperour.

I verily affirm, if you take learning in these excesses, one may very well say, that it would not onely become unprofitable, but also dangerous to principality. It is not my intention to prove learned men are capable of the mannage of great affairs for the onely consideration of the advantage they have in letters, for then Governours of Provinces were to be taken out of the Regencies of schools; but I say, that sciences well mannaged, adde a marvellous lustre to one in government. For first, they vindicate him from stupidity and a savage life, which maketh a man without sight or knowledge of virtue, to be in a State, as was Poliphemus, made blind by Ulysses, in his den. Besides, they cleanse, refine, and store the soul, made to know great and divine lights. Afterwards, they open the understanding by the reading of so many excellent books, and even unloose the tongue, which is an instrument very necessary to mannage hearts. Finally, they make a man more mild, civil, and courteous, and I could say also more awfull and worthy of credit.

For if some unhappy Princes were produced, who being unfurnished of other talents, have made ill use of letters, by abusing them through want of judgement, as one may all the best things in the world; this nothing at all in substance lessenetli the truth of our proposition, since we may oppose against them a large list of Law-makers, Princes, and Governours, who have exceedingly well made use of the knowledge of learning. For if we make account of the policie of God, which is ever the most assured, know we not, that he having chosen Moses to constitute him the Governour of so great a State, was willing he might have a good tast of all the sciences then in request among the Ægyptians? And Philo saith, that he there learned Arithmetick, Geometrie, Musick, and all the greatest secrets of their Philosophie, contained in their Hieroglyphicks. Know we not that Solomon had a heart as large as the sea, wherein God lodged so many knowledges of things both divine and humane, that he penetrated whatsoever the understanding of man, enlightened with rays from God, might comprehend?

Are we so little versed in History, that we cannot reckon up the names of all the greatest Princes, who have been very learned, as Alexander, Julius Cæsar, Augustus, Adrian, Antoninus, Constantine, Theodosius, Gratian, Charlemaigne, Alphonsus, yea, even Solyman the great Turk? What a cloud of witnesses should we have, did we now collect all the names and histories of learned States-men? For if letters give ornament to such as are wholly eminent in military profession, by a much stronger reason we are to think they are able to advance the lustre of an excellent Go-

The second Section.

The eminent wisdom and learning of Boetius.

EXperience, the wisest Mistress of the world, hath sometimes caused the saying of Plato to be questioned, who thought Common-wealths happy when they fell into the hands of Philosophers, or of men who sought to become Philosophers. For in effect it is observed, that those so knowing men meet not always with the bent of common understanding, having their spirits more estranged from civil life. They please themselves with great Ideaes, as if they conversed in the Common-wealth of Plato with demy-gods, not at all yielding to infirmities of nature. And although they use some endeavour to render themselves conversable, yet doth the sweetnes of repose inebriate and withdraw them from affairs: but if they force themselves to attend them, noise amazeth them, diversitie of humours not always suitable to their understanding distasteth them, labour somewhat painfull overwhelmeth them, and the heap of so many incident occasions confoundeth them.

Governour, vowed to the Robe, and to a life peaceable, as Seneca and Cicero.

I have been the more willing purpoſely to uſe this Preface, to the end that coming preſently to ſpeak of the great learning of our Boetius, it might not diminiſh the credit we ought to have of his abilitie in ſtate-affairs. It is ſometimes ſo dangerous to be learned among groſs ſpirits, that the tenth Age, which was very dull, made as it were the good Pope Silveſter the II. paſs for a Magician, becauſe he underſtood Geometrie. And it is not above four-ſcore years ago, that to know Greek and Negromancie, were as it were one and the ſame thing in the opinion of the ignorant.

Vide Bor. Ann. 990.

He that proceedeth by ſuch bruitiſh ways, would take Boetius for a Devil, ſuch knowledge had he: for it muſt be confeſſed, that in the revolution of ſo many ages, there hath not been many ſeen who arrived to ſuch a degree of ſcience. As our ſpirits are limited, ſo every one freely taketh his ſhare, according as his inclination leadeth him, his aim moveth him, his underſtanding tranſporteth him, his labour ſupporteth him: and he that cannot prevail in one ſcience, applieth himſelf to another, ſince the diverſitie of arts is ſo great, that it is able to ſatisfie the moſt curious, allure the moſt nice, and encourage the weakeſt. But as for our Boetius, he entred into the ſecrets of all ſciences, and as there was nothing too holy for his great virtue, ſo might not any thing be found ſo elate, as to exempt it ſelf from the vivacitie of his ſpirit.

Julius Scaliger hath very well given teſtimonie of him according to his merit, when he ſaid, the wit, learning, induſtry, and wiſdom of Severinus Boetius, challenged all the Authors of the world as well Græcians as Latines, not excepting any. He addeth, that all which he compoſed in Poeſie was divine, and that nothing might be found either more elegant or grave; in ſuch manner, that the abundance of ſupereminent conceits choaked not the grace, nor curioſitie, took any thing from the proprietie thereof.

Scalig. in Hypercritico.

And whereas he writeth, that his proſe ſeemed not equal to the verſe, but retained ſomewhat of the barbariſm of that Age, I aſſure my ſelf Scaliger may have taken ſome works falſly attributed to Boetius, as there are in the great Maſs compiled under his name, which have likewiſe deceived Cardinal Baronius, who imputeth the book of the Diſcipline of Schollars to him, which is one of the moſt filly pieces that could come from a man alienated from common ſenſe.

Among other things this Author ſaith, that he hath been in the Citie of Julius Cæſar, called Paris to take the air, and that he there hath ſeen many bad ſchollers, diſcourſing of Nations, and giving a face to the Univerſitie, as it had in later times; which will ſeem ridiculous to every one who ſhall conſider the life of Boetius, and the times wherein he flouriſhed. It is no wonder, if thoſe who have admitted ſuch works for pieces of Boetius, not through want of judgement, which hath been in theſe two perſonages, whom I mention very great, but for fault of giving time to examine them, they there have found matters, which with them have leſſened the opinion of ſuch an Author.

But this is very certain, that all which is extant of this brave Writer, hath in it vigour, grace, puritie, ſpirit, and excellent good conſequence: as appeareth in the books of Conſolation. As for the reſt he hath not ſo confined himſelf in this great eloquence, but that he entereth into the moſt profound queſtions of Philoſophie and Theologie: and ſhould he have no other honour, but to make Ariſtotle firſt ſpeak Latine, who was unknown in the Weſt, I ſhould make much more account of him, than if he had raiſed Orpheus up again with his Harp. The great knowledge he had of Geography, Arithmetick, Muſick, and all which concern the Mathematicks, was the cauſe, when any one ſtood in need of ſome piece of wit, they went preſently to Boetius, as the onely man of the Empire, who was eſteemed a true Library, animated with the ſpirit of all Arts. It is a pleaſant thing to read what the King Theodorick wrote to him in requiring a dial of him, to preſent it to the King of Burgundy. Behold the words of his great Secretarie Caſſiodorus.

It is not reaſonable to contemn the requeſts which Kings our neighbours with all confidence make unto us, and eſpecially when they require ſome ſlight things, which they account in the number of great treaſures. It happeneth oftentimes that the dalliances and conceits of wit obtain that by ſweetneſs, which arms cannot gain by force. If we needs muſt play, let us ſo uſe the matter our ſports may be made for the good of the publick, and let us ſearch for things ſerious even in pleaſures. The K. of Burgundie intreateth of me with much inſtance two dyals, the one circumvolved with water, the other with the ſun, and he prayeth me to ſend skilful maſters to ſhew him this invention. Let us afford entertainment to this Nation, to the end they may hold thoſe things for miracles, which we here daily uſe for recreation. I underſtand the report which their Embaſſadours have made of theſe & the like workmanſhips, which hath much amazed them, as a thing very extraordinarie. Now I know you are ſo accompliſhed in all ſorts of ſciences, that you have taſted in the fountain of all the induſtries, what others ſeek to practiſe by rote. For you, for this purpoſe remained in the Univerſitie of Athens, and have ſo fairly allied together the Romane robe with the Grecian mantle, that their doctrine by your means is become wholly Latine. You are ignorant of nothing that is in the ſpeculative, nothing which is in the practick; and all that, which the Athenians would attribute to themſelves of ſingularitie, you have tranſported into our City of Rome. Your tranſlations have made Ptolomy the Aſtrologian, Nichomachus the Arithmetician, Euclid the Geometrician, Plato the divine, Ariſtotle the Logician, Archimedes the Mathematician to ſpeak Latine. All ſciences diſperſed among ſo many men, and ſo many wits, through all ages, are in you altogether united: you have interpreted them all with ſuch perſpicuitie of diſcourſe, retaining the proprietie of language, that ſhould theſe Authours return to life again they would prefer your tranſlation before their own originals.

Afterward he enlargeth himſelf upon the praiſe of the Mathematicks, then returning to his diall, he ſaith, it is an admirable thing to ſee, that a little immoveable ſteel every day performeth as much way as the ſun, and that if the ſtars had underſtanding, they would envy dials, and return back again, for fear to be ſurprized by this prettie ſport of men, the hours would be aſhamed, that being the daughters of the day and night, they were painted with ſhadows. In the end, having given full ſcope to his wit, he concludes and ſaith: I pray you ſend us two dials ſo ſoon as you can, to the end you may be known by the figures of your ſpirit, in a Country, where no man ſhall ſee the print of your foot-ſteps. I would have them underſtand that our Senatours here are as learned as Doctours, that they may admire your inventions, and eſteem them as dreams, ſo that being awakened, they may confeſs they have nothing comparable to us.

Fugam ſolis æquiparat, quod motum ſemper ignorat. Invidèrent talibus, ſi aſtra ſentirent. Ubi eſt illud bovarum de lumine venientium ſingulare miraculum, ſi hæc & umbra demonſtrat Caſſiodorus l. variar. Epiſt. 45.

Caſſiodorus amaſſed together all the ſtrength of his wit, when he was to diſpatch letters to Boetius in the behalf of his King. Witneſs whereof yet is that other excellent Epiſtle of Muſick, where we learn that our great K. Clodoveus, having demanded a ſingular Player on the Lute of Theodorick, who then raigned in Italy, addreſs was preſently made to Boetius to chuſe him, with a magnificent letter, which ſtill retaineth a notable teſtimony of his ability. Angelus Politianus, who had throughly read him, holdeth opinion, that there is nothing to be found more ſharp than He in Logick, more ſubtile in the Mathematicks, more rich in Philoſophy, nor more ſublime in Theology, adding the judgement of Albertus Magnus, and of S. Thomas, who have commented upon his works, and aſſuring us that his ſentences were all as it were without appeal. Laurentius Valla calleth him the laſt of the learned, thereby willing to ſay, that all the glory of the excellent wits of antiquity, was buried with him.

Caſſiodorus variarum 16. Epiſt. 40.

But why go we about to ſearch out the teſtimonies of Authours, ſince we have ſtill ſome of his true works in our hands, which are the mirrours, wherein the wit of Boetius makes it ſelf to be ſeen with more advantage to all poſterity? It may be ſaid, he had too much Philoſophy for a States-man, but the bird is not burdened with her feathers, no more than the tree with his leaves and flowers. What wrong hath he done to the City of Rome, if when he ſaw himſelf to be taken from the Commonwealth, and in tearms where he could not aſſiſt it with his counſels, he honoured it with the riches of his wit, charming the ſharpneſs of troubles with the ſweetneſs of his retirement, and giving an account to poſterity of the time which he husbanded for it?

The third Section.

His enterance into the government of the State.

I Will willingly leave all digeſtion to come to my project, and ſeeing the life of Boetius furniſheth us, not with many ſlight matters, wherewith ordinarily volumes are ſtuffed, when men deſire to diſtend them beyond their merit, I reſt on negotiations of government, which ſhew a man as well as doth the needle the hours upon a true clock.

Boetius happened in a time, which gave him an admirable liſt to combat in, with firm footing againſt vices the moſt applauded, and to place his virtues in the bright ſplendour of light, not holding them ſtill impriſoned within the precincts of a library.

Behold here a ſtrong adverſary, that fortune put upon him, which exerciſed his conſtancy in rough affairs, and cauſed him in the end to paſs by the dint of ſword, ending a brave life by a Tragedie very bloudy, no whit abating his noble courage.

This is a hiſtory which verily hath given occaſion of much horrour to ſpirits the moſt ſtrong, and execration to mouthes the moſt innocent, to deteſt the tyranny of a barbarous ſword, purpled with the bloud of an honourable old man, by whoſe mouth all learning, and the beſt maximsof State did ſpeak. It is neceſſary, my Reader, well to deduce this narration, you firſt underſtand the humour, qualities, fortune, beginning, progreſs, and the end alſo of this Perſecutour.

You muſt therefore underſtand, that the City of Rome, which counteth its age, and continued before the Cæſars ſeaven hundred years, and after Auguſtus, who was the firſt Emperour, about five hundred twenty three, and generally from the foundation thereof, one thouſand two hundred twenty nine, was at that time involved in very great perplexities, the Emperours living then the age of flowers, and driving one another, as waves to be broken againſt the rocks.

One Nepos elected to the Empire, choſe for his Conſtable a man called Oreſtes, who ſought to take the Purple from his Maſter, to give it to his ſon, and verily he cauſed him aloud to be ſaluted Cæſar, and ſet the Diadem on his head, ſurnamming him Auguſtus, though afterward for contempt, the name of Auguſtulus was given unto him.

It is a fatal blow from the providence of God, that the Empire of the Weſt, which begun by an Auguſtus, muſt receive end by an Auguſtulus: as that of the Eaſt, having commenced under Conſtantine the Great, concluded afterward in the perſon of Conſtantinus Dragoſus, vanquiſhed by Mahomet.

Nepos ſeeing himſelf betrayed by him in whom he moſt confided, ſent for Odoacer King of the Heruli to his aid, who like the wolf in the fable reconciled the dogs that wortied one another, by eating them. For he defeated theſe two conteſting Princes; and ſeeing himſelf march in the fair fields of Italy with ſwords in hand, attended by ſtrong Legions, the great weakneſs of the Empire, ſo many times overwhelmed by civil wars, being unable to oppoſe his deſigns, he being entreated to help a friend, payeth himſelf by his own hands, and makes himſelf Maſter of his poſſeſſions: Experience ever teaching us, that forrain charities, have fingers ſome-what crooked to lay hold on that, which they make ſhew to ſuccour.

The Emperour Zeno, who reigned in Conſtantinople, underſtanding all this goodly buſineſs, diſpatcheth Theodorick into the Weſt, to make head againſt this uſurper: whether he had a purpoſe to throw the apple of diſcord between thoſe two ſtrangers, who in too near a degree cloſely courted his eſtate, to make them devour one another, or whether that he cordially loved this man, and that to oblige him, not hurting himſelf, he freely gave him a matter deſperate, he armed, and ſupported him with gold and ſtrength, to raiſe him to that throne, not having at that time any will thereunto.

This Theodorick was baſtard-ſon of Theodomire King of the Goths, born of a concubine called Aureliana. His father who ſought for land, which is very eaſily found out for a tomb, had much afflicted the Eaſtern Empire, oft-times making inrodes even to the gates of Conſtantinople; whereat Leo the Emperour, who then reigned being ſomewhat amazed, endeavoured to gain him by ſome honeſt compoſition, which was done: and the more firmly to bind this accord, Theodomire ſent his little ſon Theodorick, who was not above eight or nine years of age, in hoſtage to Conſtantinople. The Emperour beholding him to be of a good diſpoſition and a brave courage, very heartily loved him; and afterward Zeno, who ſucceeded both to the Empire and affections of Leo his father-in-law, much eſteemed this young man, who arrived to maturity of age ſerved him moſt couragiouſly in brave expeditions of war againſt the Gepides and Bulgarians, ſworn enemies of the Empire.

This occaſion whereof we ſpeak being offered, Theodorick flyeth like a Merlin to his prey, and leaving the Court of Conſtantinople came into Italy, attended by gallant troups, to decide the matter of Empire and life with Odoacer. He being full of fire, handled his adverſary very roughly, and defeated him in three battails, making him forſake the field, and inforcing him to immure himſelf in Ravenna, where he beſieged him, for the ſpace of three years, reſolved either to looſe his head in Italy, or encircle it with a Crown at Rome.

The father Theodomire being already deceaſed, his mother the fair Aureliana, who had reigned in affections, entertained an inſatiable deſire to command over the moſt important part of the world, and being then in the field, ſhe ſpared not to excite the ſouldiers, and advance a ſpur of fire very far into the heart of her ſon: whereupon it is recounted that

Odoacer

Odoacer, after ſo long a ſiege, being reduced to an extream ſcarcity of victuals, and ſeeing he could not any longer ſubſiſt, reſolved to ſeek in the hazard of arms, the remedy which he could not find in his languiſhment. He eſpied a time, when the aſſailants tired out with ſo long a reſiſtance, ſeemed now to relent, ſo that by the benefit of a fair night he made a ſally with his whole army, compoſed of people hungry as wolfs, and reſolved to conquer or die in this laſt battel. Their ſally was ſo furious and unexpected, that Theodorick, who was otherwiſe a great Captain, ſeeing the aſtoniſhment and diſorder of his ſouldiers, betook himſelf timely to flight, when this Aureliana his mother, moved with an ardent ambition, which gave her courage above her ſex, came before him, and taking him by the hand had confidence to ſay: My Son whither go you? You muſt of two things do one, either fight, or return into the womb of your mother. You have, as far as I can perceive, the enemy at your back, and fear on your forehead: turn your head againſt the one, and you ſhall chaſe away the other: If you perſiſt in this flight, I will rather make a wall of my body to ſtay you, than render my ſelf a confederate of ſuch an obloquie.

It is a ſtrange thing, that the words of a woman were ſtronger than the ſound of trumpets, arms, flight, and the black apprehenſions of death. This young Prince, changing his fear into a generous ſhame, ſpeedily rallyeth the troups that were beſt reſolved, and haſteneth to fall upon his enemy, with ſuch violence, that his ſouldiers ſeemed ſo many flying Dragons, who handled their matter ſo well, that the valiant Odoacer, notwithſtanding his beſt endeavour, was conſtrained to retire into Ravenna.

Some time after, ſeeing his enemy was invincible, he cauſed him to be ſought unto for peace, on ſuch condition, that they ſhould between them, divide the Kingdom of Italy, to which Theodorick, whether that he was wearied out with ſo long a war, or that he hoped the more eaſily to joyn the skin of the fox to that of the Lion, willingly conſented to this counterfeit peace. The agreement ſigned, he entered into Ravenna, and theſe Princes, who were both very brave ſouldiers, embraced before the face of two armies, mutually preventing each other with all manner of courteſie.

But oh good God! what cement was ever found able enough to entertain ambition and amity in one conſtant ſtate? and what world hath at any time been wide enough to lodge too ambitious men without a quarrel? Their converſation too frequent, firſt ſowed contempts and inſolencies among ſouldiers of different Nations, afterward jealouſie crept into the hearts of the Captains, and diſtruſt into the ſouls of the Sovereigns, who beheld and obſerved one another, as expecting who ſhould firſt begin.

Theodorick, whether he ſought for ſome pretext, which ever is ſoon enough found out to colour the greateſt miſchiefs, or whether he underſtood of a deſign intended on the part of his enemy, imagined the earth was not large enough to give elbow-room to his ambition, whileſt Odoacer ſhared the Throne with him; that there was but one ſun neceſſary in heaven, and one King in a Countrey; that he could not endure a Crown made creſcent-wiſe, but that it was very fit he ſhould furniſh out the roundneſs of its circle; and for the reſt that man would ſooneſt be King, who firſt prevented his adverſary.

Hereupon he reſolved on a horrible aſſaſſinate: for feigning all friendſhip and affection, he invited Odoacer to a magnificent feaſt which he had prepared for him to be the laſt of his life. It is a great matter, that there muſt be a bait always to ſurprize men and birds, and that the greateſt diſaſters ordinarily happen in the ſports and banquets, when ſenſuality predominateth, and reaſon is eclypſed. This miſerable King of the Heruli, made it well appear by his over-much confidence, that he had not ſo much miſchief in him, as was afterward imputed to his aſhes; for he very joyfully went to this banquet, accompanied with his ſon and all the principal of his Kingdom, and walked along with great alacrity, having no other intention but to make war againſt diſhes, and nothing leſs than at that time to entertain purpoſes of bloud and murder. The reſolution notwithſtanding is taken to make them all paſs by the dint of ſwords, in a place the moſt delightful, where pleaſures ſeem to make men as it were newly born. They entered into a great hall moſt magnificently furniſhed, and ſat down at the table; there was no ſpeech in the beginning, but of mirth, the ſpirit diſbanded thinketh on nothing but objects of pleaſure, when inſtantly the ſignal was given, and the Goths threw ſwords purpoſely out to offend the moſt ſober patience of the Heruli. They anſwered again what choller and wine ſuggeſted: Theodorick ſtood up, and taking his ſword ſlew Odoacer with his own hand; the reſt fell upon his ſon, and the Princes of the Kingdom. Never was there ſeen banquet of Centaures and Lapithes more unfortunately expreſſed. Tables and men were overwhelmed, wine ran mixt with bloud, the dreadful cries of the dying made thoſe tremble who were far enough out of danger, and gave matter of pity even to hang-men; yet for all this not a man was ſpared; the bodies mangled and bloudy were caſt one upon another, and the poor ſouls iſſued forth in the midſt of maſſacres and ſurfets to yeild an account in the Court-hall of Heaven.

Procopius ſaith that Theodorick took pretext, and treacherouſly ſlew him at a banquet.

Sigonius. l. 5. Occidentali de Imperio in fine.

So an ancient manuſcript obſerveth it, found in a Library at Rome.

What horrours of the abyſs and furies of Divels ſee you here? I would know, whether there be any beaſt in the world that had heaped together in one ſole body, the enraged hunger of wolves, the ſubtility of foxes, the ſtrength of Lions, the cruelty of Tygers and Panthers, the poiſon of Baſilisks, whether it may be more dangerous to man, than himſelf, when he is poſſeſſed with a miſchievous ambition.

Oh how happy would the lives of men be, were they not infected with theſe venemous paſſions, which transform reaſonable nature into more hideous monſters, than thoſe which Poets have ſet over the gates of hell. We ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory, how wickedneſs never eſcapeth the eye of God, and that if he come with feet of lead to chaſtiſe it, he notwithſtanding hath an arm of iron, to cut up treacheries by the root.

This murder divulged, the Heruli took arms to revenge their Prince, but the Centinels diſpoſed in many places of the City, hewed thoſe in pieces who ſhewed themſelves moſt forward.

Theodorick made a declaration very ample, wherein he expreſſed, that that which cauſed him to reſolve on ſuch an action, was nothing but the ſecurity of his perſon, againſt which Odoacer had a moſt evident deſign, which would inſtantly have appeared in the deprivation of his life and eſtate, had he not with all diligence prevented his enemy. That he did, what the law of nature ordained in ſo manifeſt a danger, but that he will hence forward witneſs all manner of clemency to ſuch as would throw themſeves into his arms, indifferently ſtretched out to accept the obedience of all the world.

The great diſtaſt of war every one had at that time, the little hope the moſt mutinous conceived to revenge their quarrel, and the authority of Zeno the Eaſtern Emperour, who ceaſed not to ſupport Theodorick, cauſed a great ſilence in arms, and afforded full liberty to this ambitious King of the Goths, to become Maſter of Italy.

As for the reſt, he ſeeing Rome was then as it were like a great oake overthrown, where every one hasteneth on all sides to get the spoil, and that the French, Visigoths, and Burgundians might aspire, as he, to the conquest of Italy; he made alliances with all those Princes, and especially with Clodoveus, who at that time reigned, whose sister he took in marriage. Besides, the Emperour Zeno, that had ever upheld him, happening to die, as Anastatius his successour made shew to cause an alteration in affairs, and would render himself absolute in the West, this man knew so well how to play his part, that he diverted his ambitions another way.

There is also a letter to be found in Cassiodorus, which he wrote to this Anastasius, deputing a solemn Embassage to him for the obtaining of peace, where among other things he saith: That it is good reason they should seek for peace, who have no cause to make war, and that the man wadeth far into wrong, who giveth no testimony of any disposition to receive conditions suteable to justice. As for himself, he acknowledged the Emperour, as the prime dignity raised above all other Kingdoms, and to be the support of the whole world, and that one of the greatest favours from God, which he hath at any time received, was to have learned in the Court of Constantinople, how he ought to govern the Romans. That he knows the authority of the Emperour is the onely model of all the policy in the world, and that so much as God hath exalted him above other Princes, so much would he humble himself under this Monarch, from whom he requireth most glorious amitie, that he may hereafter apply himself to all that which may appertaine to his honour and service..

The Emperour Anastasius, who according to the humours of his turbulent spirit cut himself work enough out in the East, not going to seek for it in the West, seeing that he set himself into the conditions of a suppliant, when his fortune might already put into his mouth words armed for command, suffered him to gnaw his bone in secure peace. The Romans considering, that besides force of arms he had the consent of two Emperours of the East, willingly received him, under hope they had to see some tranquility succeed after so many storms, which had afflicted their State.

Behold how from a Knight of fortune he arrived to the dignity of an Emperour: he being notwithstanding resolved never to take upon him the Title of Emperour, but contenting himself with the name of King, thereby to decline the jealousie of those, who were very capable of it. He that would consider the qualities of his person, which contributed to enthrone him in a place so eminent, shall find, that besides military virtue, he had other parts very worthy to govern, were it not that his spirit was drenched both in humane policy and long prosperities, which served as disloyal nurses to sin.

It seemeth that Sidonius Appollinaris had studied him, and summed him up even to the haires of his head, when in the second Epistle of his first book he so curiously describeth him, and saith among other things: He had a body exceedingly well proportioned, the top of his head well circled, his eyebrows thick, his hair long, his nose hooked, his lips soft, his teeth of ivory, his complexion white mingled with vermilion, which quickly blushed, more through shamefastnes than choller, his body very comely, his arms strong, his hands slender, his breast full, his leg plump, his feet small to support a great body.

He addeth, that concerning his manners, he ordinarily prayed before break of day in the presence of his Bishops, who were Arians, without noise or attendance, and that afterward he applied himself to affairs, and gave audience to Embassages and petitions, where he heard much and spake little, ever shewing himself very intentive in resolutions, and most prompt in the expedition of that which he had resolved on. From thence he went to survey his Arsenal, his Magazins, his stables, and his Treasures; or he went on hunting, being naturally so dexterous in shooting, that infallibly he would not miss the mark. After exercises he took his repast; where he loved to be entertained with serious things, and as for that which concerned his table, there might be seen (saith he) The nativeness of Grecians, the plenty of French, the promptness of Italians, and a discipline truly Royal. If after dinner he played at dice, his custom was to be silent when he won, to laugh when he lost, and never to be angry, but rather to take occasion to speak some good words, and ever handled dice as manly as arms.

For the rest, he was so good a gamester, that not disquieting himself at all, he rejoyced to see his subjects in humour against him, and so despoiled himself in game of affected gravity, that he seemed to have no other fear, but to be feared. It did him good then to be asked some favour, and such a one oftentimes lost in game with him, who won his suit.

About three of the clock the burden of affairs of the Kingdom had their turn, wherein he rendered himself very serious till the time of supper.

Ennodius in his Panegyrick saith, that he honoured the Royal purple with the rays of his countenance, and that there was not in the world a habit so beautiful, which he made not more lustrous by wearing it on his body: that his eyes had the serenity of the spring, and that his hands were worthy to give death to rebels, and matter of vows to his subjects: That all which Diadems perform in the person of other Emperours, nature had done in him; and that nothing in him was wanting but an heir: for the truth is, he dyed, not leaving any son to succeed him.

Reader, I have been willing to present unto you succinctly the great revolution of the Empire into which our Boetius fell; and the qualities of his Persecutour, who degenerated afterward into so much barbarism. But let us now behold, what he did by the counsel of our great Boetius in the manage of his Kingdom; to the end you may have so much the more horrour of wicked ingratitude, who slew this holy man, that was as the Intelligence and Angel Guardian of his State.

The fourth Section.

The enterance of Theodorick into Rome and his happy government by the counsel of Boetius.

Theodorick having pacified the City of Ravenna, and made himself Master of the most important places of his Kingdom, went to Rome with the most flourishing troops of Italy, where he was received in the manner of ancient triumphs; which exceedingly pleased the people, who at that time resembled the earth, which ariseth from the snows of winter, as from a tomb, to becom young again with the sweet breath of the spring.

So many years were slipt away wherein they had not seen any thing but divisions, troubles, famine, and bloud; when this Prince came to appear upon the triumphant Chariot, with his golden arms, which gave him a mervellous majesty, besides the graces he had from nature, they thought they beheld a star newly descended from heaven, and followed him with infinite acclamations in witness of affection.

He being alighted at the Palace, Boetius, who was the principal man of the world in nobility, wit, and and learning: was chosen out from all the Seate to make him an Oration: In which, being then in full vigour of eloquence, he most divinely acquitted himself. It is a great loss, that posterity hath not preserved so brave a monument of this rare spirit, to enchase it now presently in this work. From thence the King passed to the Circus, which was a large place appointed for Jousts and Tournaments, and staying himself at a place called the Palm of gold, he caused his throne to be magnificently seated in a place very high raised, and round about him benches for the Senatours, who appeared all of them cloathed with robes of their order.

There he made an Oration full of sweetness in presence of all the people, whereby he declared he had a purpose to revive the ancient magnificence of Rome, and vehemently to doune to conform himself to the fashions of those Emperours, who had been the most zealous for the Weal-publick: which made the whole world conceive most excellent hopes of his government.

All the City was then in pomp, like to a noble Lady, who having laid aside sorrow, suddenly appeareth in the bravery of a bright habit. Never day seemed to shine more resplendently to an afflicted people.

It was in the same time that S. Fulgentius coming from Affrick to Rome, after he had visited the Churches of the Martyrs, passed along by the Circus at the instant, when all these gallant ceremonies were performed, where he was so ravished, beholding the majesty of the Emperour, the glory of his Senate, the lustre of his nobility, the magnificence of the place, and the throng of innumerable people, that he cried out: Oh how beautiful is Jerusalem the celestial, since Rome the terrestrial at this day appeareth with such splendour! Good God! if you allow so much honour on earth, to those who follow vanity, what glory will you give in heaven to your Saints, who shall behold verity?

Quam speciosa debet esse Hierusalem illa cœlestis, si sic fulget Roma terrestris! Et si in hoc seculo datur tanti honoris dignitas diligentibus vanitatem, qualis honor & gloria tribuatur Sanctis contemplantibus veritatem?

The ceremony being ended, the King entertained all the Senate in a feast worthy of his greatness, and distributed liberalities to the people, which seemed to renew the face of ancient Rome. He disposed himself, presently to visit all the places of the City, to know the condition of his Senatours, to inform himself of the humour of the people, to observe the state of affairs, and to constitute the government.

It is most certain, he was indowed with a natural wit good enough, but he had withall so little experience in civil affairs, that he had much ado to sign ordinary dispatches.

Anonymus Author in ejus vitâ.

Behold the cause why a nameless Authour, who wrot his life in a very low stile, witnesseth, that he usually signing with four letters, caused them to be cut in copper, and clapping them on the paper fetched the draught of his pen round about to serve as a model, to the end that by this means he might give somewhat the better form to his writing. This want of experience caused him to tye himself constantly to two great States-men, whereof the first was our Boetius, whom he made Master of Offices, and Superintendent of his house, in such sort, that all passed by his counsel: the other was Cassiodorus, of whom he made use, as of a most able and faithful Secretary, to dictate all the letters and proceeding of the Kingdom.

Idem author testatur.

Boetius, whom he in the beginning loved as the apple of his eye, and honoured as his father, gave him the forms and maxims of all that excellent policy, which we behold so resplendent in his government. I will here couch some of them, that Politicians may see the happiness, which commonly waiteth on States guided by the ways of conscience.

The first maxim was, that King Theodorick, being an Arian, should not onely abstaine from persecuting and afflicting the Catholick Church in any kind whatsoever, either of himself or by any of his, but on the contrary should cherish, honour, protect and maintain it with all the extent of his authority, because the experience of Ages had made it appear, that those who were interessed in the perplexities of Religions contrary to the Catholick, had prospered very ill: and that not going any further, the deportments of the Emperour Anastasius, who then reigned in Constantinople, made it manifest enough, since he had involved himself in the hatred of the Clergy and people, to support with passion certaine novelties: and how on the contrary, ordinary practise had discovered that all Monarchs, who had entertained good correspondence and reciprock with Ecclesiasticks, were evermore honoured in their government, and much happier in the successe of their affairs.

Theodorus Anagnostes Οἱ τῆς Θεοῦ ἐκκλησίας, ὡς ἔστι συνθήκας ἀβλαβῶς ἐφύλαξεν εὐτυχέστατα ἐβασίλευσεν ἀγαθῶν.

Theodorick so well observed this maxim, that to witnes the zeal he bare to our Religion, he chused the head of one of his officers to be cut off, who having been bred in the Catholick Church, became an Arian, thinking by this means to be advanced into the good favour of his Master. But this brave King, My friend, saith he, since thou hast been disloyal to God, I can never think thou wilt be faithful to thy Prince. Thou shalt wash away the stain of thy treachery with thy blood, to teach posterity, that they must not mingle the interests of God, with the profane pretenses of thy fortunes.

He shewed himself very zealous to preserve peace in the Church in a most dangerous schism raised in his time. For Pope Anastasius being deceased, and they proceeding lawfully to the election of Symmachus, there was a Senatour of an unquiet spirit, who desirous to make a Pope at the devotion of the Emperour of Constantinople, so to countenance his Extravagancies, banded Altar against Altar: and caused an Antipope to be chosen, named Laurentius, which rent both Senate and Clergy into great partialities. But Theodorick very speedily quenched the fire, and being well informed of the business, seeing Symmachus was first elected, and supported by the soundest part, he maintained him with a strong hand against all the enterprises of adversaries, who durst not in the end resist his authority.

Besides, having published an Edict against the favourers of the Heruli, who perplexed the Province of Genoa and Milan whither they were retired; that fell out to be the cause of very many miseries and tears among the poor people, who having no support so helpful unto them as the Bishops, threw themselves into the arms of Epiphanes and Laurentius, both great Saints and great Prelates, the one of Pauia, the other of Milan. Epiphanes undertook to speak and said to the King:

Sir, Should I here reckon up all the favours which you have received from God, I might make you appear more sparing in your desires, than he hath been in his liberalities; since you have asked nothing of heaven which hath not ever surmounted your vows and hopes. But not to speak at this time of so many prodigies, is it not a very great wonder to see you do justice in the throne of your enemy, and to behold us pleading the cause of your servants, with such a confidence, in a place, which the terrour of arms had heretofore rendered so dreadful?

Sir, it is the Saviour of the world, who hath given into your hand this people, which hath charged us with their requests. Take good heed, how you offend him by ill using the gift he hath afforded you. Know how an invisible power hath led you by the hand into so many encounters and battels, that the air, rain, and seasons have favoured your standards, as if they had been to you engaged. Now is the time you must acknowledge so many benefits by your piety, not despising the tears of the afflicted, which are the sacrifices of suppliants. The examples of your Predeceſſours, who have been caſt out of the throne for their iniquity, ſhew, you cannot eſtabliſh it but in your virtues.

Upon this conſideration, your Countrey proſtrate at your feet, moſt humbly beggeth, you would be pleaſed to ſweeten the rigour of your laws, not onely by doing good to the innocent, but by pardoning the culpable. For very little would our clemency be, if we did onely abſtain to ſtrike thoſe who have given offence to none, not conſidering mercy is not made for any but the miſerable. In revenging your injuries you ſhall do like men of the earth, and by pardoning, ſhare in glory with that great Monarch of heaven, who daily maketh his ſun to ſhine on criminal heads, as well as the moſt innocent.

The King made a moſt courteous anſwer, ſaying: There was no reaſon that earthly powers ſhould reſiſt the prayers of Biſhops, who made heaven propitious: and that he remitted to all in general the puniſhments of death ordained by laws: but in ſo much that the ulcer muſt be purged, leaſt by ſhewing himſelf too indulgent to vices, he might make them paſs into example for poſterity, the conſideration of his ſtate required the Authours of ſedition ſhould be removed, to the end their preſence might not foment the evil.

Vitia tranſmittit ad poſteros qui præſentibus culpis ignoſcit.

The reply was found very reaſonable, and letters of grace inſtantly diſpatched by Urbicus, who was one of the chiefeſt officers in the Court for expeditions.

He ſatisfied not himſelf with this favour: but calling the good Biſhop into his cabinet, having highly commended him, ſent him among the Gauls to redeem the Italian priſoners there, by reaſon the Burgundians in certain incurſions had taken away very many: and others over-whelmed with the miſeries, which proceed from civil wars, were voluntarily ſtept aſide. The King gave commiſſion to the Biſhops to rally them to their troups, liberally defraying the charges that were neceſſary.

Caſſiodor. l. 2. c. 2. 29. There is alſo found one amongſt his letters addreſſed to Count Adela, wherein he witneſſeth, that though he had a great deſire to preſerve his people in full peace and repoſe, becauſe the glory of a Prince conſiſteth in the tranquility of his ſubjects; yet that he principally intended the Churches ſhould enjoy this favour, ſince in obliging them, the mercies and bleſſings of God were drawn on his kingdom: and purſuing this courſe, he commanded Duke Ida to cauſe all the Eccleſiaſtical poſſeſſions to be reſtored, which ſome had uſurped in Languedoc, after the death of Alarick. Obſerve the good foundations of piety which he laid by the counſel of Boetius.

The ſecond Maxim was, to bend all his endeavours, and imploy his beſt thoughts for the comfort of the people, becauſe there is not any way more powerful to gain the hearts of all the world, than by ſweetening the ſharpneſs of the times preſent, or the burdens of the paſſed. We have ſeen (ſaid he) by experience, that thoſe who are deſirous to poſſeſs gold without the love of the people, have been very unſafe; that Kings differ not from other men, but in being powerful to do good, and that the common ſort meaſure their greatneſs onely by their bounty: that is it, which heretofore made the Gods of Gentiles, and which maintaineth Monarchies on the firm rock of conſtancy.

Caſſiodor l. 4. ep. 36. Theodorick imbraced this care moſt particularly, for he punctually enquired after the loſſes of his poor ſubjects, and if he found any moleſted by the paſſage of ſome troups, or other like, he releaſed them of taxes and ordinary ſubſidies, as it may yet be ſeen in his letters, and namely in one which he wrot to Preſident Fauſtus, wherein he commanded him to hold his hand in this buſineſs, Becauſe (ſaith he) a body over-burdened ſinketh to the ground, and that it were better to deſpiſe a ſlight gain, than to deprive himſelf of pretious things received from the love of ſubjects. The river which glideth along (ſaid he) though it do no other ſpoil, ſtill worketh out its channel; ſo companies of ſouldiers, which paſs through towns and villages, though military diſcipline be there obſerved, fail not to bring thither with them much damage, and therefore it was his pleaſure, the places ſhould be recompenced which had been overcharged.

Lib. 3. Epiſt. 8.

For the ſame reaſon, he appointed fifteen hundred crowns of alms to be delivered to the venerable Biſhop S Severinus, to diſtribute them among the peaſants, which he knew had been vexed with the harbouring of certain warlick companies. Verily, as it is no ſmal temerity in particular men, who have neither any charge nor knowledge of affairs, to argue great men upon tributes, and the husbanding of their treaſures; ſo would it be a neglect to conceal from them upon occaſions the moderation they ought to uſe herein, ſince it is ſo exactly recommended by the law of God, and publiſhed in all hiſtories.

If a ſtranger raiſed from the bottom of barbariſm, ſhewed himſelf ſo Religious in matters of ſubſidies towards men, whom his arms had newly made tributary, Princes and Lords of Chriſtendom have good cauſe to conſider what they ow to a people, which is given them as to Fathers and Protectours of the publick. There is no doubt, but the exorbitancies committed in ſuch like affairs, are moſt important charges of conſcience, which much clog a ſoul in the agonies of death, and in the dreadful judgement of Almighty God.

There is alſo to be ſeen an Edict of the ſame Prince, where having underſtood that in the payment of taxes, the rich made the heavieſt part of the burden to fall upon the ſhoulders of the meaner, and that the undertakers of this buſineſs ill behaved themſelves therein; he deteſteth all theſe abuſes, as injuries done to his own perſon, and gave full liberty to thoſe who had been wronged to complain to him, that ſuch order might be taken, as he ſhould judge reaſonable. This manner of proceeding made him ſo beloved, that other Princes having paſſed away like dreams of one night, he reigned thirty years in a moſt ſupereminent degree of reſpect, which thoſe, even of the religion contrary to his own, bare him.

The third Maxim given him by Boetius was to make himſelf moſt exact in the exerciſe of juſtice, becauſe it is the baſis of thrones, and the ſpirit which animateth all government: and he ſo deeply impreſſed this in his heart, that the deſire he had to render every one what was his, was changed in him to a moſt ardent thirſt, and a continual hunger. He ſelected out the moſt untainted and uncorrupted Governours he could find, and ſpake theſe words unto them, related by Caſſiodorus:

Uſe the matters ſo, that Judges of Provinces may be very careful in the obſervation of laws; that Tribunals ſpare not to thunder out ſentences againſt ill manners; that theeves may fear the gates of your Palaces; that the adulterer may tremble before a chaſt Officer; that the forger may feel horrour at the voice of a Herauld, and that all crimes may be baniſhed from our territory: That no man oppreſs the poor; that perſecutours be apprehended and purſued as diſturbers of publick repoſe. You ſhall make a general peace when you have beaten down the authours of miſchiefs which are committed. Let Captains contain their ſouldiers in all manner of diſcipline, in ſuch ſort that the labourer, the merchant, the ſailer, and the artificer, may underſtand armis are not made, but for their defence. I will not likewiſe that my neareſt allies be pardoned in any caſe of juſtice; ſince I have taken the Common-wealth into my charge. I have deſpoiled my ſelf of my proper intereſts. I wiſh well to mine, but in the generality.

Caſſiodor. var. l. 22. Mihi propria cura diſplicuit, poſtquam generalem cœpi cogitare cuſtodiam.

Opto meis bene ſed quod poſſit eſſe commune.

Purſuing the maxims I will recount an admirable paſſage, passage, which he used among others, to make his justice remarkable. A Roman Lady left widow by the death of her husband, had lost a son born of this marriage, who was secretly stolen from her, and in servitude bred up in another Province. This child grown up a young man, received notice from a good hand, that he was of free extraction, and son of a Ladie, whose name was given him, her aboad, and all circumstances, which caused him to undertake a voyage to Rome with intention to make himself known unto her. He came directly to his mother, who was much perplexed with certain love-affairs, having betrothed her self to a man, who often promised her marriage, yet never accomplished it. This lover then absent, and detained by urgent affairs very far from Rome, the Ladie had the space of about thirtie days free, wherein she kept this young man in her house, acknowledging him, and particularly avowing him for her son, throughly convinced by evident tokens, so that then her charitie was so great towards him, that she ceased not to weep for joy, in the recovery of her lois.

Manuscriptum P. Sirmundi. Joannes Magnus, & Laurentius Venetus.

The thirtie days expired, the Lover returned, and seeing this guest newly come to her house, demandeth of the Lady what man he was, and from whence he came. She freely answered, he was her son. He, whether moved by jealousie, thinking this might be but a colour, or that preceding the marriage of the widow, he would not have a charge of children, plainly told her, if she sent not away this found child from her lodging, never should she have any share in his affection. The unhappy creature surprized with love, to serve his passion, renounceth her own entrals, and readily banisheth from her house this son, over whom she had so many tears. The young man seeing himself as between the hammer and the anvil, in so great a necessitie of his affairs, hasteneth to require justice of the King, who most willingly heard him, and commanded the Lady should be brought before him to be confronted by him. She stoutly denied all the pretensions of this young man, saying; He was an impostor and ungrateful, who not contenting himself to have received the charities of a poor creature in her house, needs would challenge the inheritance of children. The son on the other side wept bitterly, and gave assurance, she had acknowledged him for her own, very lively representing all the proofs which passion and interest put into his mouth.

The King sounded all passages to enter into the heart of the Lady, and asked her whether she were not resolved to marry again. She answered, if she met with a man suitable to her, she would do what God should inspire her. The King replied? Behold him here, since you have lodged this guest thirtie days in your house, and have acknowledged him so freely, what is the cause why you may not marry him? The Lady answered: He had not any means, which ever is necessary for houshold expence. And to what may your state truly amount, saith the King? The Lady replied. She was very well worth a thousand crowns, which was a great riches in that time. Well (saith Theodorick) I will give as much to this young man for his marriage, on this condition that you shall marry him. She much amazed, began to wax pale, blush, tremble, and to shew all the countenances of a perplexed woman, who sought to excuse her self, but faltered in her speech. The King yet to affright her more, swore deeply she should marry him presently, or tell lawfull causes of impediment. The poor woman condemned by the voice of nature which cried in her heart, and having horrour of the crime proposed unto her, cast her self at the feet of the King, with much profusion of tears, confessing her loves dissimulation, and mishap. Then this great Prince taking the word from her: Are not you a miserable woman (saith he) to renounce your own bloud for a villain who hath deceived you, get you to your house, forsake these fond affections, and live in the conditions of a good widow, taking unto you such support from your son as he by nature ought to afford you. I leave to relate a singular example, upon the same subject, which I drew from the Chronicles of Alexandria, and cited in the third book and one and twentieth Section of my first Tome.

The fourth Maxim, which Theodorick received from our Oracle, was to place deserving men in offices, and to ground his State upon rewards and punishments, which the ancient Democritus said, were the Divinities of Common-wealths.

The King laied this counsell up in his heart, and presently made Boetius Superintendent of Offices and dignities, to the end his judgement might be as the character of the excellent qualities of such as should have principal Commissions. There was no speech at all either of favour, flesh, bloud, or nation; all rewards were for men of judgement and virtue: when any one was designed for some office, long and serious inquiry was made of his condition, which being throughly known, the King gave approbation of him, by writing to the Senate, or forgot not to put into account all his services and laudable actions, to the end the sinceritie of his proceedings might be known, & that he might cast a double lustre upon him, who received so great a benefit from his hands.

We may behold the practise hereof in many letters, which are to be found upon this subject, and namely upon the advancement of Cassiodorus to the dignitie of a Patrician; where the King writing unto him letters full of respect, makes a narration of his life and functions, wherein he had very well served his Majesty, and then said unto him: Enjoy now the recompence of your travel, and doubly take the interests which you have contemned for the publick, for there are no riches more glorious, than to see your virtues crowned both by the testimonie of the Prince, and by the praises which proceed from the mouth of all the world. It is a great happiness to oblige a King to confess, that a subject hath that already by his merit, which he grants him by his liberallitie. Epist. 3. lib. 4.

This gave so great encouragement to the nobilitie, to dispose themselves to honour, by the degrees of honesty, that in few years the Court was replenished with persons qualified with parts of science, and conscience, which are the two sources of good affairs.

The fifth Maxim was, the good husbanding of treasures which are not onely the sinews, but the soul, bloud, and life of the people.

It must be confessed, that the States of the world, are subject to great maladies: one while there is a drowsiness in affairs, that is the lethargy: sometimes a humour peccant and maligne, composed of passions and errors which besiege the understanding, that is the epilepsie: sometimes obstacles, which hinder the light of good counsel, and they are cataracts, which grow upon the eys: sometimes obdurations against good advise, that is hardness in the ears: sometimes a malicious silence of truth, that is the squinancy: sometimes oppressions, that is shortness of breath: sometimes want of courage, and those are the evils of the heart: sometimes there is raised an exorbitant avarice, that is the bulimy or dog-hunger: sometimes coldness and remisness to unlock coffers for necessary uses, that is the gout in the hand: sometimes negligences opportunely to take occasions, and that is the gout in the feet: sometimes fiery ambitions and enraged avarice, and they are feavers: sometimes you may observe malignities and intestine wars, which may be called the stone, and nephretick pains, sometimes bloudy agonies termed dissenteries: sometimes great corruptions of manners, that is the cachochimy: sometimes sudden disturbances, they are Erysepelies: sometimes stenches of hidden crimes, and that is an infection of the noſe, which the Græcians call Lozena: ſometimes there are diſcovered ſpots of impietie, that is the Leproſie: ſometimes an impotency in all the members, that is the Palſie; ſometimes a faintneſs over all the vital parts, that is the Ptiſick.

Never ſhould he have done, who would keep an account of all the maladies, which are ever dangerous in their ſources, and mortal in their iſſues: but this Ptiſick which drieth up the body, and maketh of a living man a kind of ſpectre or Anatomy, is one of the leaſt accidents and this happeneth to a State through the ill manage of Treaſures, contrarie to the loyaltie due to the ſacred perſons of Kings. That is it, which maketh ſouldiers to mutinie, which offendeth the great, and giveth matter of indignation to the moſt reaſonable, and of murmur to all the world: whiles the one account in ſubſtance the gold and ſilver which they have purloined, and the other reckon in idæa that which is ſpent, entertaining their thoughts with the deſire of a thing afar off, as if one would warm himſelf with the memory of fire.

This is it which bringeth contempt of a Common-wealth abroad, weakneſs at home, and miſerie on all ſides: which maketh the people hungry, and a Prince neceſſitous in his own houſe. The effects of this diſeaſe are better known than the remedies thereof practiſed: for there are ordinarily in all States many Reformers, who have verily notable deſigns upon Treaſures; but there is the like uſe made of them, as of tooth-picks before dinner.

Money is of the ſect of inviſibles, no man knows what becomes of it in ſo many hands; thoſe who abuſe it have ſo many kinds of jugling-tricks, which dazel eyes, whileſt they fill their purſes. It is a goodly plant, as that wich is called the Affodil or Scepter-royal, which breeds bad little worms, that gnaw all the ſubſtance thereof, and hide themſelves under the leaves, till ſuch time that getting wings, they becom butterflies all ſpeckled over with flowers, and brave it over men in the air, whom they durſt not behold upon the earth.

Theophraſt. de plantis. Ζῶν πλῆρες κ) ἄθλιον ὑπόδικ.

The States of Great-ones is alſo an admirable tree, but it oftentimes covereth under it's fair verdure, colour, and beautie, men which gnaw like worms, and who frame themſelves wings all enameled with glorie at the charge of the publick, to take their flight over the heads of ſo many mortals, whom they look upon with a ſcornfull eye, as if they had no further memory of the earth which bare them.

A Prince cannot more oblige his State, than to have an eye open to all theſe diſorders, and to make his money diſtil like bloud through all the veins of the bodie, reſerving ever good Treaſures to render himſelf helpful to his ſubjects, terrible to his enemies, honourable to his allies, and neceſſary to all the world.

Theodorick became ſo well verſed in this Maxim, that he let not as it were a day paſs, wherein he caſt not his eyes upon the Treaſure of his Exchecquer, and that he took not the pains himſelf to ſum up his revenews and expences, to conform his undertakings to his coin. He was moſt exact to draw into his coffers all innocent gains, and honeſt emoluments as much as he could, preſerving them very charitably for the neceſſities of the Realm. We may ſee this in many of his letters, and eſpecially in that which he wrote to Saturnius and Verbuſius, where he recommendeth unto them to have a great care of that, which is the beſt part of his Treaſures; and that as he deſireth not to burden his people, ſo would he not have lawfull moneys to be loſt. He giveth a reaſon hereof which is very notable: I have reaſon to avoid povertie (ſaith he) becauſe it is the mother of exceſs, and that there is nothing more pernicious than to be poor in Empire. The inquiry which I make after my rights, is the profeſſion of my innocencie, & that as I would not avarice & extorſions ſhould reign in my Palace, ſo will I from thence baniſh neceſſity.

Caſſiod. l. 1. Ep. 19. Indigentiâ juſtè fugimus quæ ſuadet exceſſus, dum pernicioſa res eſt in imperante tenuitas.

The ſixth Maxim was that, which the ſeventie Sages gave among many other to King Ptolomy, when he asked of them the means how to govern well. It was their counſell to have, even in time of peace, warlike troups well entertained and guided, to add Majeſty to his State, and terrour to his enemies. That is it, which Auguſtus Cæſar did, to conſtitute his Empire, when he appointed certain revenues, which he would not have imployed on any other thing but the entertainment of ſouldiers. That is it, which the Common-wealth did before him, ever holding in neceſſary places ſouldiers well diſciplined. That is it, which by the report of Valerius Maximus gave Cities, Provinces, and Kingdoms to the people of Rome. And Theodorick, well acquitted himſelf upon this counſel when he ſaid: War was never better made, than in time of Peace. Ex ep. 24. l. 5. Res prælierum benè diſponitur, quoties in pace tractatur.

The ſeventh was well to fortifie the Frontiers, whereof he was very careſull, as he witneſſeth in an Epiſtle, which he wrote to the Goths and the Romans inhabiting at Tortona, giving them commandment to ſtrengthen this place, and not to expect the incurſions of the enemy at unawares. For (ſaith he) all ſudden things are inconſiderate, and it is too late to build up a fort, when one is already in danger. To that he added alſo the forces on the Sea, which are very neceſſary to unite the places of his Territorie, to diſſolve the deſigns of his enemies, and to make himſelf great and awfull; for the experience of the Athenian wars with the Spartans ſufficiently diſcovereth in the hiſtory of Thucydides, that they ever have moſt advantage who command the ſea-coaſt. One may ſee by the letters that King Theodorick wrote to his Lievtenant Abundantius, with what vehemency he ſought to make himſelf able in this point, giving out ſtrait Commiſſions to build and rigge out great ſtore of ſhips wherein he thrived ſo well, that he vaunted the Græcians and Africans, had nothing to condemn in him. Caſſiod. l. 1. ep. 17. Lib. 5. ep. 16.

The eighth recommended unto him, notwithſtanding his great forces, to entertain peace and good intelligence with his neighbours, to the end, that being leſs buſied in forraign wars, he might have full leiſure to manure his Kingdom with good government, which he did, as we may behold by his Epiſtles, entertaining thoſe Princes with teſtimonies of affection, congratulation in their proſperities, conſolations in their adverſities, embaſſages and preſents, which were more wittie than coſtly. His letter to our Clodovæus well ſheweth, that he highly valued above all the alliance of France, when he proteſteth the ſafetie of the Kingdom is his own proper glorie, and that he ſhareth in all the proſperities which happen to this great King. Epiſt. 41. l. 2

The ninth counſelled him to love letters, cheriſh learned men, who are the Trumpets of the glorie of Princes, and make them lead a pleaſing and happy life in the eſtimation of poſteritie: and conſequently to cheriſh arts, invite brave Maſters, maintain Merchants, diſcourſe even with labourers with much ſweetneſs, by the example of Auguſtus Cæſar, which he ſo exactly did, that he rendered himſelf very amiable to all the world, in ſuch manner humbling himſelf to the meaneſt, that he diſdained not to be among Peaſants to talk with them in their trades, and for their honour, till the earth with his own hands.

The tenth was to take away the riot of particulars, and ſhew himſelf magnificent in publick matters, as in buildings, theaters, neceſſities, and recreations of the people, ſtill undertaking ſomething great for the Majeſty of the Kingdom, and commoditie of the Common-wealth. Towards which he

he was transported with much fervour and reason, raising many goodly fabricks, and repairing the honour of places of consideration, even to the equalling of ancient Rome. For he saith in an Epistle which he wrote to one Agapetus, Governour of the Citie, that he would not subscribe in ornaments to the ancients, since he paralelleth them in the happiness of his Age. As in effect, whilest he observed these excellent maxims, his Kingdom was indeed a Realm of justice, peace, and plentie, beheld by all as the miracle of the world.

The fifth SECTION.

The honours of Boetius, and alteration of Theodorick.

Boetius was honoured with so great respect for the many excellent qualities resplendent in his person, that from the foundation of Rome scarcely might a man be found of the long robe mounted to such an eminency of honour, by the degree of civil prudence, learning, and virtue.

It is a very notable thing, that not onely the King made him three times Consul, but needs he would through abundance of his love, that his sons, who were yet very young, should be advanced to the Consulship. A matter not ordinarie, but titular and of favour, and very rarely given, but to those who were singularly to be gratified.

Himself confesseth, that if joy were to be derived from frail honours of the world, he had cause enough to rejoice on that day, when he saw his two sons carried in Pomp through the Citie, in a triumphant Chariot, accompanied with the whole Senate, and attended by an infinite concourse of people, who ceased not to congratulate the father and the children, as the of-spring of a race, born for the good of the Common-wealth.

The same day he made in full Senate an oration of thanks-giving to Theodorick, for the large liberalities extended towards his house, which was delivered with such a grace, that in conclusion they presented him a Crown, as to the King of eloquence. He likewise gave notable largesses to all the people, and appeared in the great Court of the Circus, sitting in the middest of his two Consuls in presence of the whole Citie, having his heart repleni shed with content, and tears of joy in his eys for the affections which the people witnessed.

To crown all those blessings of fortune, he had married a wife, held one of the most accomplished Ladies under heaven. For, which is very rare, she injoyed a great spirit, a singular modesty, and an excellent chastitie, of whom Boetius sufficiently to praise her, said in one word: She was the image of her father Symmachus, who had given her to him in a most chast and happie marriage.

Now this Symmachus, called the pearl and precious ornament of the whole world was a Senatour, who seemed to be composed of nothing but wisdom and virtue, for which cause he then lived in much reputation: and all this family of Boetius was in such sort esteemed, that Ennodius writeth it was a vein of purple, signifing thereby it contained therein all great dignities, no otherwise than as veins inclose the bloud. He notwithstanding addeth, those purples increased by the lustre of Boetius, who possessed them: and after when Rome became the prize of those who subdued it, it being no longer lawfull for Consuls to reap Palms in the fields of battels, he equalled the ancient triumphs by the greatness of his judgement.

Ennodius in epist. ad Boetium l. 8. epist. 1. Venę purpurarum. Purpuræ possessoris luce crescentes.

Gerebert, an Authour who wrote of those times, calleth this Boetius the father and light of his Countrie, who managing the reins of the Empire in the qualitie of a Consul, spared not to diffuse by the force of his abilitie in good letters, all the lustre they had, equalling them with the wits of Greece.

Tu Pater, & Patriæ lumen Severine Boeti,
Consulis officio, rerum dispone habenas,
Infundis lumen studijs, & cedere nescis
Græcorum ingenijs.

Gerebertus l. 2. Epigr. Pithæ.

Boetius, thou father, and Countreys-light,
Dispos'st Consuls office, common right,
Giv'st studies radiant lustre, and no whit,
In any thing submit'st to Grecian wit.

Verily, we may see by that which followeth in this historie, the little assurance may be had either in men or favours. If men be vessels who do nothing all their life time but play with the winds, favours are waves of glass, which fail not to shiver themselves against the rocks. We would think the moon much greater than all the stars, were it not that the shadow of the earth, which we make use of to measure it, causeth the contrarie to appear: and we might have some opinion, these great dignities of the world, had much eminencie above all that which is here below, were it not, that they dayly fall into shadows and fantasms of nothing, which well approve, we have much illusion in our eys, since these greatnesses have taken such estimation in our hearts.

Jealousie a bad daughter born of a good house, which is that of love and honour, divideth beds and Empires, and hath ever eys so bleared, that it cannot endure a ray of the virtue or prosperitie of another. And for that cause the lustre which proceeded from the house of Boetius, in such manner, as day progresseth fro the gates of the East, failed not at all to give suspicions to King Theodorick; who seeing himself a stranger, and ignorant among Romans, and men of so great counsel, being not able to derive any other recommendation to himself, but what the sword gave him, envied so many heavenly riches as were contributed to the happiness of his Empire.

The change, which then succeeded at Constantinople greatly fortified his distrusts: for it is written that Anastasius an Emperour, who had done nothing in the throne but create schisms, beholding the Laurels of Cæsar wholly withered on his head, had some distast both of life, which he had passionately loved, and of the scepter possessed with so much ambition. It is certain, that being one day in the Circus, as he espied a furious sedition whispered against him, he voluntarily laid down his Crown, and let the people know by his Heraulds he was willing to be rid of the Empire, which for some time appeased the most passionate: notwithstanding, being greatly hated, and foreseeing he could not make much longer aboad in the world, he began to reflect on his Successours, desiring to transfer to the Throne one of his three Nephews, whom he had bred up, having no male issue to succeed him. There was difficultie in the choice, and he having a soul very superstitious, put that to lot, which he could not resolve by reason: for he caused three beds to be prepared in the royal chamber, and made his Crown to be hanged within the Tester of one of these beds, called the Realm, being resolved to give it to him who by lot should place himself under it. This done, he sent for his Nephews, and after he had magnificently entertained them, commanded them to repose themselves, each one chusing one of the beds prepared for them. The eldest accommodated himself according to his fancie, and hit upon nothing: the second did the same. He then expected the youngest should go directly to the crowned bed, but he prayed the Emperour he might be permitted to lie with one of his brothers and by this means not any of the three took the way of the Empire, which was so easie to be had, that it was not above a pace distant. Anastasius, much amazed, well saw God would transfer the Diadem from his race; and it is also added, that he likewise knew by revelation, that it was Justine who should succeed, for he having determined to kill him, with Justinian, heard a voice which spake in his heart and said: He should take good heed to touch those two personages, because they should do, each one in their turn, good services to God.

Zacharias Rhetor, x M. S. Sirmundi.

and

Afterward as this Justine being ever near the person of the Emperour, one day by chance set his foot on the train of his robe, the Emperour looking back, Thou boldest me (said he) by the gown, and shalt follow me; but stay a while, your time is not yet come: which much amazed all there present, who thought him to speak like a man distracted, not conceiving what he would say.

In a few days this Anastasius, who so much feared thunder, that he fled into a Cave so soon as at any time he heard the least notice thereof, was slain by a thunder-stroke upon the very stairs of the place which he had chosen for a sanctuarie. Justine derived from base birth, and mounted through all the degrees of War to the dignitie of the Captain of the Guard, was chosen Emperour; of whom, he being a valiant man and well beloved, Theodorick began to cõceive a great jealousie, still fearing he might take out of his hands the Empire he had usurped.

The beginning of the storm was, that Justine an Emperour most Catholick, treated the Arians of Constantinople, who had been tolerated under Anastasius, with the severitie ordained by laws; despoiling them of Churches, which they had boldly usurped. They failed not to address their complaints, and offer up their grievances to the ears of Theodorick: who interpreting the disgrace of his sect to the contempt of his person, entered into violences more fit for a Barbarian than a King, who had been trained up to civilitie by such good counsels, for he threatened to turn all Rome into fire and bloud, if the Emperour Justine did him not right, and for this purpose he sent Pope John, commanding him to go speedily to Constantinople to cause the Churches to be rendered to the Arians, supposing his dignitie would procure him full power with the Emperour. The Pope answered, he had made very ill choice of him, for such an Embassage, that the rank he held in the Church permitted him not to be a provider of Churches for the Arians, and that if he had any bad design upon his person, he was ready to stretch out his neck for the defence of the Church, there being no need for him to pass the seas for this, and undertake the voyage.

This made him enter into much greater extravagancie, threatening the Citie with a deluge of bloud if it were not remedied: Behold the cause, why the Pope was intreated to go to Constantinople, and to find some way how to sweeten affairs, yet to let nothing pass to the prejudice of his conscience. He yielded to the tears of the people and undertook the voyage of Constantinople, accompanied with some of the principal Senatours, where the Emperour Justine received him with much submission and unspeakable magnificence.

Theodorick expecting the issue of this great Embassage, which was not so soon ended, entered further and further into a vast labyrinth of suspicions and jealousies, beginning to distrust Roman Senatours, and to monopolize all affairs with his Goths, which was the beginning of his ruine. He at that time did four things which infinitely grieved all good men.

The first was, he advanced two, who appeared like two comets over the heads of mortals: The one was called Congiastus, and the other Trigilla, both men of rapine and concussions, who by their evil deportment did much disgrace the authoritie of their Prince.

The second was, that he who heretofore used great moderation in matter of subsidies, bare himself therein most inordinately, by the perswasion of those two Goths, who were prodigiously covetous, and insatiable in their avarice.

The third was, that in a grert scarcitie of victuals, he caused all the corn to be taken out of the fields near Rome, enforcing every one by an expres Edict, to sell that little which he had upon a very low price for the Kings own granaries, and the entertainment of souldiers; which gave occasion of many tears, the poor entering into despair, if the force of this Edict should be of long continuance.

In the end, for a fourth violence, he fell upon the most eminent Senatours, dispoiling them of their goods, and threatening them banishment and death, under suspitions of treasons.

Boetius endeavoured to cure Theodorick by all the sweetest ways: but seeing his spirit was become very dark, and much altered in all that which might be said reasonable, not to loose honour and good conscience in the general ship-wrack he foresaw, he began to roar like a Lion against the corruptions of this mercenary Court.

He stoutly set upon these two powerful favourites, and resisted them in the greatest vigour of their credit, with such liberty and constancy, that it well from that time forward appeared this man had his soul in his hand, being ever ready to resign it for the defence of justice. Trigilla, who was the Superintendent of the whole government of the Empire and the instrument of King Theodorick, would fain seem an able man, and to give colour of wisdom and reason to actions disproportionable, namely in that Edict published concerning the great heaps of corn, amassed together in the magazine of the Prince, in the sharp wants and indigencies of the people. Boetius loudly blamed this manner of proceeding, and ceased not to declare the miseries of Provinces in words very effectual, demanding audience of the King, for the good of his State.

Theodorick, whether he had not as yet altogether renounced the reputation of a righteous Prince, or that he thought his great favourite Trigilla was grounded upon most pertinent reasons, and strong encounters of affairs, which made him stir up these novelties, would needs in his cabinet hear a conference between Boetius & Trigilla concerning the Decrees; where Boetius defended the cause of the poor, with such weight of reasons, prudence, and courage, that he hindered the battery of Trigilla, and prevailed so far with the Prince, that he procured him to revoke his Edicts: whereupon these two favourites with all the faction which followed them, finding themselves immeasurably offended, began more and more to cast into the soul of Theodorick, already much changed, infinite distrust against Boetius, and the whole Senate. And then Paulinus and Albinus, two personages the best qualified in Rome, who had run through all the most honourable charges of the Common-wealth, were very ill intreated by suggestions and suspicions, which these men had raised against them. Boetius, seeing the affairs reduced to such a pass, where dissimulation could not repair them, spake in the end to Theodorick, in full Senate with all the libertie which his conscience dictated unto him, saying:

SIR, I am not ignorant that we are in a time, wherein it is as it were much easier to flie, than to speak of the State of this Empire without offence to any, and that all discourse, which at this present may be framed, will ever be suspected by those, who have made even our thoughts criminal to your Majestie.

Yet

Yet must I needs say, it is a matter very hard to be silent in so great revolutions of affairs, since nature hath not created us like crocodiles, who are said to have eys to weep & not a tongue to complain. I perceive we loose as it were all that which we have of Romane in us, and that in this universal disaster, where all the world should strengthen their arms against violence, men are contented to do, as in a thunder, every one prays the thunder-bolt may not fall upon his own house, and very little regards the danger of his neighbour: So likewise we see many Senatours, whose dignitie ought to put into their mouthes good and forcible words, for the defence of justice, satisfying themselves to avoid the blow, and expecting safetie in common ruines.

As for my self I freely protest, that being born of bloud, which never learned to flatter any man, and seeing my self in a rank where my silence may prove injurious to the publick, since I cannot uphold libertie already too much leaning to its ruin, I will at least support the image of it, and in so general a servitude, speak something, wherein I will either discharge my conscience for the present, or comfort my ashes for the time to come.

Alas Sir, when I behold you sitting upon the Throne of glory, whereunto the hand of God seemeth to have raised you by miracle, fortified you by discretion, and blessed you with so many prosperities, I cannot chuse but remember with the most tender resentments of my heart, the calms of the first years, when you took into your hand the stern of this large Empire. Who ever saw divers mettals so happily commixed, as we then beheld different Nations united in one entire body, under your authoritie? What consent in affections? What correspondence in all orders? What vigour in laws? What obedience in subjects? What agreement in the Senate? What applause among the people? What policie in Cities? What good fortune in arms? What blessing in all the success of your affairs.

Seemed it not, that God had affixed to your standards and Edicts some secret virtue, which made the one triumph in war, and the other become prosperous in peace, with so much terrour and reputation, that even things opposite of their own nature, knit themselves firmly together for your benefit?

O Sir, what is become of that golden face of your government? Who hath metamorphosed it into this leaden visage? Perhaps you thought it was a part of the greatness of your Majesty to hold a Senate under, to whom all the good Emperours have so much ascribed, that they esteem them as necessary for their greatness, as leaves about the rose to set out his beautie.

Justin. Genev. hist. li. 6.

I could tell you Sir, how much these counsels are pernicious, were it not that the experience of the years of your reign hath taught you more, than all the malignitie of men can deface. If you will be pleased to call as yet to counsel your wit and understanding, which God hath replenished with so many fair and noble lights, believe me you shall find this people is as the hearb Basil, which rendereth a good savour, as it is said, when gently handled, and createth scorpions when rudely chafed. Hold us in the estimation and condition, wherein you hitherto have reteined us, and you shall see nothing more tractable than the Roman people: but if you proceed with those violences, by which some daily pervert your good nature, it is to be feared, least this severitie produce not rather poison, even for those who hope out of it to derive sweetness.

Our enemies cease not to exasperate you, upon want of respect due to your Majesty, and yet God knows we have so regarded royall authoritie, that seeing it in most unjust hands, where it lost its lustre, we suffered it not to loose the fruit of our obedience.

Allow Sir, the liberty, which ever hath been the most pretious inheritance of this Empire, you have placed men over our heads, who to become great and unwilling to seem any thing less than what they are, seek to smother in our miseries, the baseness of their own birth, and believe the means to justifie their own carriage, is to take away eies from those, who have them, and to render tongues mute, least they may learn a truth. Now adays to be born rich is to become a prey, and to arrive at government with some supereminences of wit, is to raise enemies; all great actions are suspected; and it seemeth that to find safety, we must seek it either in ignorance or idleness.

We have so learned to obey, that we would not hitherto so much as enter into consideration of the distribution you made of your favors, leaving them more free unto you than are in the sun his rays, and contenting us to honour the character of your Majesty as well on rocks, as marbles and silver. But now when we see the pretious interests of the Kingdom, in hands less pure than we wish, what els can we do in so publick a clamour, but here most humbly remonstrate, that which the subtile dissemble, the miserable suffer, the good deplore, and even the very stones relate.

Where is the time, Sir, when we heard those noble words to proceed from your mouth, That the flock may be sheared, not flayed; that a body overcharged sunk to the ground; that there was no tribute comparable to the precious commodities, derived from the love of subjects? And now all the Cities and Countries, bewail the rigorous concussions they feel, to satisfie with their sweat and bloud, the avarice of some particulars, who are notwithstanding, as greedy as fire, and more unsatiable than the abyss.

I exasperate not here our miseries, by an amplification of words: I have, Sir, made you to see, when you pleased to bear me in your cabinet, the tears of Provinces, which softened your heart to compassion, and opened your hands to liberalitie, so that if your good affections be not altered by some, you are capable enough to discharge heaven of all promises, which it hath made unto us by the happiness of your Empire.

Unseal those eies which you so oft have opened for the comfort of your poor subjects, & in what part soever you turn them, you shall behold nought but miseries. Is it not a strange thing, that slaves being sometimes sold to courteous Masters, sweeten the sharpness of their condition by some gentle usage, and that there should be none, but the people of Rome, who yearly buy out their bondage? none but the people of Rome, who were made uccountable for the goods pulled from them, and tributarie for the shipwrack of their povertie?

From thence the way is taken to the oppression of Magistrates, and some are perswaded, that throughly to mow the meadow, you must humble the heads of plants most eminent, Paulinus is despoiled, Albinus is gultie of treason, they be culpable enough since they are rich & powerful. It is said, there can be no safetie found, but in their disgrace. And who seeth not, that these proceedings tend to the ruine of that most noble body, which almost thirty years maintained your royal Crown?

Out alas, Sir, if we exclaim against witches who poison fountains, how can we be silent, seeing endeavour is used to invenom the soul of the Prince, who is the source of all counsels, to the end we may hereafter find poison, where we hoped for remedie?

Sir, onely behold and imitate your self; re-assume that spirit which made you reign in our hearts, as well as in our Provinces: distinguish flatterers from true friends; hearken to those, whose loyaltie you have known in the success of so many prosperities.

Remember your self, that you were made to reign over man, not as a man, but as the law: to bear your subjects in your bosom, and not trample them under foot; to teach by example and not constrain by force, to be a father of Citizens, and not a Master of slaves.

Remember your self, Kings are given by heaven for the use of people, and that they ought not to have so much regard to the extent of their power, as not to consider the measure of their obligations. Handle the matter so, that the greatness of your Majestie may appear in its good-goodneſs, and that this word which you heretofore had in your mouth, may ſtick eternally in your heart, when you ſaid: A good Prince ought not to fear any thing ſo much, as to be too much feared.

This Oration greatly enkindled minds, and King Theodorick was ſo much amazed at this libertie, that he ſeemed not wel ſetled in his countenance, he onely ſaid in few words, he would give all ſatisfaction to the Senate, when time had cleared this buſineſs, whereof he would inform himſelf, that it might be treated at the next Seſſion.

Trigilla, Congiaſtus, and Cyprianus the principal of the faction of the Gothes, ſeeing themſelves touched to the quick, reſolved the time was now come, wherein either they muſt be loſt, or Boetius undone; ſo that after this aſſembly, they ceaſed not to beſiege the ſoul of the King, who was become jealous, melancholy, and timorous, with a thouſand objects of diſtruſt upon the practices of Boetius, aſſuring him the conſpiracie was wholly contrived and plotted at Conſtantinople by Pope John and his Complices, at Rome by Boetius, Paulinus and Albinus, who had marvellous correſpondencies. Not content with this, they gained ſome mercenarie people, they practiſed with falſe witneſſes, they counterfeited letters, forged and ſealed in the name of Boetius, and ſaid all that which their paſſion ſuggeſted.

This is it which gave the moſt dangerous aſſault upon the mind of the Prince, for he having read their papers, and heard ſome depoſitions, which they gave him notice of, would have no further information to be reſolved, but ſpeedily aſſembling the Senate, entred with his papers in hand, ſhewing in his countenance the trouble of his thoughts, and ſpake in theſe terms:

This laſt Oration, which Boetius made in this place, was the Trumpet of a conſpiracie plotted againſt my State. I wonder not a whit that he made it his task to diſgrace our government with ſo great ornament of eloquence, to tranſport your minds into rebellion: but I marvel much how he would promiſe himſelf to draw to his partie, complices from a bodie ſo innocent as yours. All my officers diſpleaſe him, as an enemie of the good offices are done me; and all the favours which I allot to the merit of mine, are ſo many crimes in mine own perſon with this man, who draweth poiſon from all that which ſerveth others for nouriſhment. He, whom the Prince raiſeth, ſerves as an object for his envy, and it hath ever been an injurie to appoint him a companion in his honours. He deploreth the miſeries of the publick, as if he were father thereof; and it ſeemeth to him all is loſt, which juſtice putteth into any other hands than his own.

Had the Gepides and Bulgarians forraged over all Italy, he could not frame any other complaints, than he doth of the State of our Kingdom; where thanks be to God, there is nothing ſo grievous, but it may ſeem a ſilver Age, if we compare it to the Empire of thoſe who have gone before us. Beſides, our good ſubjects eſteem not themſelves ſo unhappie under me, but that they think my preſervation is the ſource of their felicities. But needs muſt he have pretext of pietie to colour his deſign and to take upon him a title of protectour of the people, to make himſelf uſurper of mine Empire. Verily would ambition be ſatisfied, I have performed for this man all that, which may be done to ſuch as are the moſt greedie of honour, raiſing him to all eminent charges, and given even to his children almoſt in their infancie, dignities, which have been reputed in this Common-wealth, as prodigies. But in doing this, I ſought bottom in an abyſs, where it was not to be found.

I have ſuffered all theſe extravagancies ſo long as I could poſſible, ever thinking to complain of him was to draw convulſions upon mine own proper entrails: But ſince forgetting all reſpect of dutie, he cannot be unmindfull of his own nature, which is to do evil to thoſe who wiſh him well, I demand of you in the qualitie of a King, that juſtice which you would afford to the meaneſt of my Kingdom.

I have not his eloquence to ampliſie Impoſtures, but I enjoy ſome ſtrength of underſtanding to judge of a truth. Behold here, moſt loyal ſubjects, thoſe who will depoſe the conſpiracie he hath plotted againſt my State. Behold here letters ſigned with his own hand, which were diſpatched to the Emperour Juſtine, to call him to my ruin. You may judge hereupon, and ordain what ſhall be reaſonable, it being not my intention to pretend here any other ſatisfaction, than what the laws afford me.

As ſoon as he had ſpoken this, he cauſed his witneſſes to come in, who were one Baſilicus, Opilion, Gaudentius, men of loſt conſcience and reputation. Theodorick notwithſtanding cauſed them to be openly heard, and without exception, againſt the innocent. Then he began to produce that goodly letter, addreſſed to the Emperour of the Eaſt, which was wholly counterfeited by the damnable impoſtures of one named Cyprian.

The poor Boetius found himſelf at the inſtant like the juſt Naboth in the midſt of theſe perverſe creatures, and what induſtrie ſoever he uſed for the declaration of his innocency, it was oppreſſed by a powerfull faction, which tranſported minds either through corruption or weakneſs, to the ruine of virtue.

The King preſſed the Senatours to deliver their opinion thereupon: they, who were deſirous not to appear ſuſpected, confidently caſt the ſtone againſt the accuſed, and thought his condemnation would be their freedom; others, who were enemies, bare themſelves in it with much animoſitie; there remained ſome few feeble ſouls who followed the courſe of violence: ſo that baniſhment was decreed againſt Boetius, according to the intention of Theodorick.

Verily, if there be any thing worthy of commiſeration in the world, it is to behold offenders ſit as Judges upon the bloud of an innocent, and to conſider that afflicting a man with all extremitie, they alſo deprive him of the pretious jewel of reputation, which maketh us live in the eſtimation of honeſt men, a pleaſing and ſpiritual life, as do many great-ones in the memorie of all ages.

The wiſe Boetius after he had waſted himſelf with love and travel for his Countrie, is taken out of the boſom thereof, as a man treacherous, and put into the hands of the Guard to lead him to Pavia, the place of his impriſonment.

He was not ſuffered to ſpeak with his father-in-law Symmachus, for all thoſe who were honoured with his friendſhip are ſequeſtred; ſcarcely had he the means to give the laſt adieu to his wife Ruſticiana, who ſeeing her husband ſuddenly fallen from ſo eminent a dignitie into ſuch diſaſter, could not contain from ſaying unto him with ſcalding tears:

Syr, is this then it, which your innocencie hath deſerved? If the King be reſolved to put you to death, why ſuffereth he ſtill a piece of your ſelf to live, which hath ever been ſo dear unto you? I have courage enough to follow you either in exile, impriſonment, or death. But Boetius replied again in few words, that he might not any further increaſe her grief: Madam, the hour is not yet come, trouble not your ſelf to ſee me ſuffer for juſtice. It is a title of honour which God hath reſerved for his children. The education which you have derived from your good father, and the inſtructions you have received from me, give me occaſion to hope you will bear this accident with a Chriſtian reſolution. My daughter, it is not fit that our tears, which fall from ſo much a higher place as we have been bred in greatneſs, may ſhew any dejection in the eſtimation of men. Support your ſelf a little under your burthen, and open your heart to the conſolations of heaven, ſince thoſe of earth are mingled with ſo much acerbities. Then turning to his children children all dissolved into tears: My children, saith he, God hereafter will become your father. Make provision of great virtues, which have ever been the inheritance of our house, for all other blessings are but dust and wind. This is the lesson which God giveth you in the change of my fortune. Comfort your good mother by the dutie of faithfull obedience, and live in hope: Perhaps you shall see me again, if it please God, sooner than you imagine.

These words were arrows that pierced these faithfull hearts, with most just resentments of nature, which could not quickly end, notwithstanding all the lenitives that might be applied.

The sixth SECTION.

The imprisonment of Boetius.

THe great changes of fortune, which suddenly happen, have this property in them, that they strike our souls as waves not foreseen, and give us the blow before we have leisure to understand our selves. The poor Boetius seeing himself between four walls, sequestered from the Citie, which had served as a theater of glory for all his house, taken away from the love of his own, bereft of his library, and all the most precious accommodations of life, shut up as a victim destined for a bloudy sacrifice, found himself in the beginning surprized with an over-whelming sadness, as he hath left expressed in writing. He bewailed with broken sighs his innocency unworthily handled; he traced in his thoughts the marks of his former fortune; he cast his eyes upon his forsaken family, which seemed to him in the Lions throat; he called into memory the unworthiness of his accusers who had been heard against him, the ingratitude of the Senate that had condemned him for being faithfull unto them, the cruelty with which this sentence was executed, the wrack of his means, the loss of his reputation, and all the black horrours which a man declared criminal of treason, figureth to himself.

Eheu! cur duris miseros à te, Et flentes oculos claudere sæva negas? Lib. 1. Metr. 1.

In this abyss of disturbances, he was displeased as it were with death, which layeth hold on so many young men that desire nothing but to live, and deigned not so much as to shut up his eyes, which he perpetually moistened with his tears. Hereupon we may see, that the most couragious spirits, in these accidents so strange and unexpected, ever pay some tribute to the natural passions of men. But likewise on the other side, we shall observe the power which a well rectified judgement hath over it self, when we behold it to dissipate all the troubles and agitations of the heart by the vivacity of reason, and use of precepts of wisdom, which he most exactly practised in this his captivity.

We have also the book of his Consolation, composed in this prison: which is verily in the judgement of learned men, one of the most excellent pieces of work that may be framed on this subject; where he introduceth Philosophie, who visiting and awakening him from this dead sleep of sadness.

What Boetius (saith she) are you be then, whom I have fed with my milk, whom I have cherished with so good nutriments, and bred up until you arrived to the strength of mans estate? Verily I have given you arms, which would strengthen you against all the strokes of fortune, were it not that you have forsaken them. Know you me no longer? From whence proceedeth this silence? Tell me, is it out of shame or stupidity? I had rather it were derived from a just bashfulness, but as far as I can perceive you are become wholly senseless. Will you say nothing to me? Ah poor man, he is not absolutely lost, but so near as I can guess, he hath a Lethargie, a common disease with those, who suffer themselves to be transported with illusions of the mind. He hath forgot himself, but he will recover, when he shall know me. Let us onely wipe his eyes surcharged with terrestrial humours, and covered with a thick cloud of the world.

This done, Boetius came to himself, and framed an admirable Dialogue with this Queen of spirits, to which I remit the Reader, contenting my self to observe here the principal arguments, which served him for his Consolation, to the end we may learn with him in our afflictions, to fix our resolution on the will of God, and suck honey from the rock, as the Scripture speaketh.

The first reason proposed to him by this Wisdom descended from Heaven, was to ask of him, what opinion he had of the Providence of God, and whether he thought the world moved by chance, or were governed by reason? God forbid (saith Boetius) that I ever come to this degree of folly, as to think that all here below is casually done. I know God ruleth in the world, as in an house built by his own hands, and that nothing happeneth in the affairs of men, but either by his command or permission. Thereupon Philosophie crieth out: Just God! it is verily marvellous, that a man who hath such an understanding of the Divine Providence can be sick of the disease, wherewith I see you surprized. My friend, you entered into the world, as into a list or circle, whereof this Providence hath made the circuit with his own hands. It is fit you patiently suffer all that which happeneth to you, within these limits, as an ordinance of God, to which you have submitted your self. It is he who governeth our lives, our conditions, our fortunes. If you be resolved to give law to the policie of the Omnipotent, from whom you ever ought to receive it, what else will you gain, but to make your self mutinous, and to render your condition more troublesom by your impatience?

Lib. 1. prof. 6. Maximus fomes salutis, vera de mundi gubernatione sententia.

Lib. 1. prof. 1. & alibi.

I pray you think with your self, if you were embarqued in a vessel, you must go according to the impulsion of winds, and not the motion of your affections. If you till and sow, you shall have fruitful and barren years, according to the diversitie of seasons; and you would have a fortune ever equal and perpetually stable? you would hold back by force of arms its chariot incessantly circumvolving? Are not you very simple not to know, that if she were not inconstant, she could no longer be fortune?

Go not about here to question with me upon the afflictions of good men, and the prosperities of evil. What injurie doth God to an innocent, if he allot him the share of all those great souls, whom he will not entertain in the pleasures of an idle life, but in the exercise of virtue? Know you not there are fishes that die in standing waters, and are delighted in the bubling of sluces? Great spirits go all that way, they no more loose themselves in tribulation, than the sun in his eclipse, which onely serveth to make him more resplendent.

And what advantage, think you, do the wicked derive from the benefits of this life? Is there any thing more miserable than to be transformed into a beast, by the enormitie of vices, and to adde impunitie to so many crimes? You say, they do whatsoever they list; and I say they are thereby so much the more miserable: for if it be an unhappiness to desire an evil, it is a double miserie to have the power to execute it.

Si miserum est voluisse prava, potuisse miserrimum est. Lib. 4. Prosa. 4.

If all offenders were punished according to their demerit, they should have some benefit which they have not, to wit, the punishment of their misdeeds, which being a work of justice cannot but be good; they should have some bridle to stay their exorbitancy, some apprehension of the judgements of God; which being stoln from them by long prosperities, what else remaineth for them but to pass to the extremitie of punishments, by the extremitie of crimes? For my part, if I should throughly punish a depraved man, I would ordain for him neither wheels, flames, nor tortures, but I would burst him with honours, gold, silver, and riches; and when he were full up to the throat, I would draw aside the curtain, to let him see virtue and Paradise, of which he had betrayed the one and lost the other, by the disaster of his carriage.

Lib. 3. Met. 8. Quid dignum stolidis mentibus imprecer? &c.

The second question which Philosophie asked him, was, if he knew well who himself was? And Boetius, answering, He was a man of honour, reviving the memory of the great riches and dignities he had enjoyed heretofore. Verily (saith she to him) I well see there is much forgetfulness of your condition, and niceness in your complaints. If God had put gold as well as blood into your veins, and given you leave to be born full stuffed with precious stones, or laden with honours and dignities from your mothers womb, you had some cause to deplore that the inheritances of your birth were taken from you: but who are you, or from whence come you? I could tell you how many years it is since you were born a little infant, all naked, creeping on the earth, and having a mouth open to cries and hunger, which had not so much as one little hair on the bodie to cover it; and now you take upon you the spirit of a Monarch, and think you have nothing, if you possess not all? Verily are you not one of the most miserable, if you do not know how to take contentment in that which is left you, and not still to tie your self to sorrows for that which you have lost? You have a father-in-law Symmachus, one of the most excellent men in the world, you have a wife, the pearl of her sex, you have children of great hope. How many things would you buy at the price of your life, if you had lost them? and yet you think you are miserable when you possess them, and when they are employed with all their endeavour for your deliverance.

Vide Bern. Lib. 2. de Consideratione cap. 89.

Your vessel doth yet lie at anchor, and is not altogether broken: I see comfort in something for the present, and hope for the future; and happen whatsoever will, I will save you by swimming. But needs must I freely confess, that I find a little niceness in this your act, when you deplore with so much bitterness and affliction the petty wants of your condition. Tell me, I pray you, is there any man in the world, who possesseth a felicitie so full and free, as not to dispute with his fortunes, to make his estate more happie? The condition of worldly goods, findeth every where thorns; prosperities never come all together, and although they arrived in heaps, they ever would have a slippery place.

Lib. 2. Prosa. 4.

One is accommodated with honest means, but is of base extraction, which maketh him to blush in good company. Another is very Noble, but is so poor in his estate, that it were much fitter for him to be unknown. Another is born of good rank, and hath no want of riches, but he bewaileth that part which he hath lost, consecrating himself to retirement with wilfull tears. Another hath met with a good marriage, but his barrenness maketh him amass riches for a stranger. Another hath children, to have cause of great miseries: and to speak in a word, you shall find very few, who well agree with their condition. Through all there are evils, which give happiness to those who are ignorant of them, and horrour to such as have tried them.

Adde also a reason, that these men, very fortunate, are extreamly sensible upon the touch, and as there needs not any thing but a pegge to stay a piece of artillerie upon the way, so the least accident hindereth the glory of their greatness. How many think you are there, who would teach Heaven with a finger, if they had but onely the surplusage of your fortune? This place, which you call your banishment, is the countrey of so many honest men as inhabit it, and if you reason well, you shall find, that there is as it were nothing miserable, if not made so by opinion.

Finally I ask you, whether ever you have had any thing in the world more precious than your self? If you answer truly, you will protest unto me, assuredly no: and yet notwithstanding, behold you, thanks be to God, if you will, to have so much and more for your self, than ever you had, and that neither prison nor fetters may prejudice the libertie of your spirit.

The third reason, which is very much at large deduced in this divine Work, is drawn from the vanitie of all temporal goods, where wisdom proveth by very good reasons, That if the sorrows we have for the world, might be measured at the rate of the things which contristate us, as there is nothing great in this vale of tears, so should there not be any thing capable of much disquiet. Mourn we for mettals, which are the nests of rust, and the tinder of concupiscence? for attires, which are the nourishment of mothes? for bodies, which are the food of worms? for houses, which are the bones of the earth, piled one upon another with cement and morter? for precious stones, which are the excrements of an enraged sea, borrowing their worth from our illusion? for honours, which are golden masks and weather-cocks of inconstancie?

What a folly is it to hold retirement for a punishment, which so many brave spirits have taken for a Paradise, and to think our selves sharply punished, when we no longer behold behind us great trains of servitours, who burden us with their crimes, and make us become answerable for their souls.

What an errour is it to desire to hold riches locked up, which never are what they ought to be, but when they are distributed? For they resemble a dung-hill, which stinketh when it is together heaped, and fatteneth the fields, when it is spread abroad. We move Heaven and earth to flie from povertie, and find it in our riches; for great fortunes are now adays so hungrie, and have so much ado to maintain themselves, that although the needie are ever the most poor, yet is there nothing more beggerly than the rich, who have a thousand dependances, and a thousand necessities, whereunto their felicitie is fastened, as with a chain.

What a charm is it to think then to be happie, when you mannage the affairs of Great-ones; where never is any thing done to please them, if you make not your self a slave to all their passions, where favours are granted of feathers, and disgraces inflicted of lead? Where your sleep, your life, and your faith is sold for a pleasing fantasm, which lasteth no longer than the dream of one night?

Deserveth not a man to be strucken down as an enemie of reason, when unloosened from this slaverie, he withereth, languisheth, and sighs for his fetters, ready prest a thousand times to kiss the hands of him, who again would enchain him.

Prosc. 1. 2. O gloria gloria, millibus hominum mortalium nihil aliud nisi aurium inflatio magna.

What a mockerie is it to affect greatness among men? as if a rat would make himself a lord among mice, and to feed himself with glorie, which is nothing but a swelling of the ear. Oh Boetius, Seneca desired under Nero, and Papinian under Antoninus, the solitude which thou now enjoyest; but whilst they endeavoured to break their bands, & leaned to a ruinous wall, the mass of their greatness transported and buried them. Behold thy self retired from affairs, into a chamber of Pavia: behold thy self in repose, and among books, the first entertainment of thy young days; why dost thou not now presently make a virtue of the happiness, which the providence of God offereth thee?

Dum ruiturus moles ipsa trahit.

For a third point, he considered the fruits that might be derived from tribulation, when it is well mannaged. Prosperitie (saith this wisdom unto him) is windie, open, slipperie, and inconsiderate. Adversitie quite otherwise, is sober, reserved, prudent, and circumspect; the one under apparences of felicities, bringeth unto us an infinitie of lies; the other, is ever grave and sincere; the one deceiveth us, the other instructeth us; the one blindeth us, the other enlighteneth us; the one polluteth us, the other purifieth us; the one charmeth us, and tieth up our understanding, the other enfranchizeth us; the one separateth us from our sovereign good, and maketh us fall into a thousand sorts of vanities, the other draweth us back, as with a hook, to the consideration of eternitie; the one createth for us many flatteries, the other discovereth unto us many true friends. Let us suffer a little, Boetius, and if this seem troublesom, think, that as thy prosperities have passed away, so shall thy adversities. The last day of thy life, which cannot be far off, will ever be the last of thy ill fortunes, if thou leave not it, it will forsake thee: it is an ordinance of God, that favours and disgraces cannot be of long continuance, and that for mortals there is no evil immortal.

to

Finally, for the last reason, the holy man, who had composed so learned books of the mysteries of our faith, forsaking all the comforts of humane things, drenched himself very far into the consideration of blessings in the other life, of eternity, and the excellency of God. He considered it, as an infinite sea of essence, bounty, beatitude, which encloseth in it self all being, all good, all veritie. He saw the whole Universe in this immensity of God, as a spunge would be in the midst of the ocean, an atom in the air and a little globe of glass, enchased in the first Heaven. He saw in his bosom all glory, all dignities, all riches, all treasures, all pleasures, all consolations, all delights, all joys, and all beatitudes; he walked at ease in those fourteen abysses of greatness, which are in God, to wit, infinitie, immensitie, immutabilitie, eternitie, omnipotencie, wisdom, perfection, sanctitie, benignitie, power, providence, mercie, justice, and the end whereunto all things tend.

This is inserted in my Journee.

From thence he beheld the Word Incarnate, the true King of the afflicted, and all the Saints laden with crosses and persecutions, thinking himself very happy to mingle his tears with the bloud of so many brave courages, who had gained Heaven with violence.

This consolation overflowing his heart, drowned all his acerbities, and infinitely sweetened the sharpness of his captivity.

Behold the fruits, which the wise Boetius gathered in his prison; well shewing, that virtue is an hostess tractable in every lodging, and who looseth no part of her liberty in chains. It onely appertaineth to huge mountains, to bear snow and verdure at one and the same time; and to great souls to retain a holy vigour in the strength of afflictions.

The seventh Section.

The death of Boetius.

IT is a loss, that the Authours which have written of this death, have cut off so short the last act of a life so eminent. There is not any thing, saith one, so curious in a statue, nor so hard to polish, as the nails; and nothing which more clearly maketh the perfection of a man accomplished in virtues to be seen, as a good death. I will here speak that, which I have drawn from the most probable authours, touching the death of Boetius.

It is certain he was very long in this prison, since he complaineth in the Preface of a book, which he composed during the time of his captivity, that his spirit was in declination, his body being worn with the torments he endured by the rigour of a King of the Goths. Death in the end came to unloose his fetters, by an act very barbarous, exercised by Theodorick on this admirable man.

He, seeing Pope John had done nothing in his favour at Constantinople, but in stead of causing the Temples of the Arians to be restored, had purified and changed them into Catholick Churches, he entered into a fury more exorbitant than ever, and kept this good Pope in prison at Ravenna, until he was wasted with diseases, yielding up his most blessed soul in fetters, to hasten to enjoy the liberty of the elect.

Cyprian and Basilius, accusers of Boetius, failed not to kindle the fire with all their power, to ruin him whom they already had wounded. There was sent unto him a Commissary, who was Governour of Pavia, to interrogate him upon matters, wherewith he had been charged. The King promising him by this instrument a reasonable usage, if he would confess all the process of this imaginary conspiracy. Boetius having heard what his commission imported, replieth:

Tell the King your Master, that my conscience and age have reduced me to those terms, wherein neither menaces nor allurements can work any thing upon me to the prejudice of reason. To require the proceeding of my conspiracie, is to demand a chymera, which hath never been nor ever shall. Is the distrust of his witnesses so great, that needs he must exact from my mouth the articles of my condemnation? Verily he hath as much cause to doubt my accusers, as I matter of glorie to be accused by mouthes so impure, that they would as it were justifie the greatest delinquents by their depositions. One Basilius chased from the Court, and charged with debt, hath been bought to sell my bloud, and having lost credit in all things, finds more than enough for my ruin. Opilion and Gaudentius condemned to banishment, for an infinite number of wicked promises, they being fled to Altars, the King redoubleth an Edict, by which he ordained, if they instantly went not out of Ravenna, they should be branded in the forehead with an hot iron. What may be added to such an infamie? Yet notwithstanding the same day they were received and heard again st me. Arrows are made of all wood to transfix me, and the most criminal are freed in my accusation. Some being not ashamed to employ against the life of a Senatour those, who would scarcely have been set to confront very slaves.

This makes me say my condemnation is premeditated, and my death already vowed, and that this search is made for petty formalities, to disguise an injustice.

King Theodorick playeth too much the Politician, for a man, who hath full liberty to do ill. What need is there to use so many tricks? Tell him boldly from me, that I submit to his condemnation. I was willing to save the Senate, though little gratefull for the sinceritie of my affections: I wished the repose of the Catholick Church: I have sought the liberty of the Roman people: Here is all that I can say. As I am not in condition to tell a lie; so am I not on terms to conceal a truth. Had I known the means to reduce the Empire into better order, he should never have understood it. Finally, if he be resolved to put me to death thereupon, let him hasten his blow. It is long since I have had death in desire, and life in patience.

The Commissary much amazed at this constancy, made his relation to the King in very sharp words, which put oyl afresh into the flame, to thrust affairs into extremities. The poor Rusticiana, wife of Boetius, knowing the point whereunto the safety of her husband was reduced, made use of all the attractives she could, to mitigate the fury of the Prince: and observing Amalazunta, the daughter of Theodorick, to be an honourable Ladie, and endowed with a singular bounty, she recommended her petitions and tears to her. This Ladie gave her access to the King, to whom she with her children presented her self in a most deplorable State, able to soften obdurate rocks.

Alas, Sir, said she, if you once more deign to behold from the throne of your glorie the dust of the earth, cast your eyes upon a poor afflicted creature, which is but the shadow of what she hath been. I no longer am Rusticiana, who saw palms and honours grow in her house, as flowers in medows: Disaster having taken him from me, by whom I subsisted, hath left me nothing but the image of my former fortune, the sorrows of the passed, the grief of the present, and horrour of the time to come.

I would swear upon Altars, that my husband hath never failed in the dutie which he oweth to your Majestie; but calumnie hath depainted his innocency unto you with a coal, to inflame you with choler against a man, who ever held your interests as dear unto him as his own. I know what he hath so many times said to me thereof, and how he hath bred his children, whom your Majestie now beholdeth at your feet. If we no longer shall take benefit of justice, Sir, I implore your mercie. Look on a woman, worthie of compassion, tossed in the storm, and who beholdeth in the haven the Olives of peace, which you always have desired to equal with your laurels. Suffer me, I may embrace them: The world already hath cause enough to dread your power; give us cause to love it proportionably to your bountie. Alas, Sir, on whom will you bestow it? Fire, which consumeth all, burneth not ashes, and behold us here covered with ashes before your eyes: what more desire you of us? A miserable creature is a sacred thing; the God of the afflicted taketh it into his protection, and will no more have it touched than his Altars. If my unhappiness have set me in that rank, and my sex made me a just object of your pitie, Sir, render that to me, which I in this world do hold most precious; and think, not we ever will retain any resentment of what is past, when we shall see our selves re-established in our former fortune. It is in you to command, and for us to obey your ordinances, and even to kiss the thunder-bolt that striketh us.

It is to much purpose to present musick to the ears of Tygers, it hath no other effect but to enrage them the more. The cruel Tyrant presently commanded the Ladie to withdraw; adding he would do her justice. And they ceasing not still to multiply suspitions with him upon this pretended conspiracy, as if Boetius had now been presently with sword in hand with the Emperour Justine at the gates of Rome or Ravenna, he fell into such fear, gall, and choller, that without any other formal proceeding of justice, he dispatched the afore-mentioned Commissary with a Tribune, to put him to death, whose life was so precious to the Roman Empire.

Boetius, who had a long time been prepared both by prayers and the Sacraments of the Church, for this last hour, knowing the cause wherefore they came, beheld them with a confident countenance, and said: Perform your Commission boldly: It is long since I knew, that death alone must open the gates of this prison for me. And having spoken this, he contained himself some while in a deep silence, recommending to God this last act of his life, and consigning to him his soul, which during this imprisonment he had so often whitened with his tears, and purified as in a precious limbeck of eternal charities, wherein all great souls are deified.

This done, he went forward with a settled pace to the place of execution, which the King would have very secret, not to excite the people; where seeing himself, Behold here (saith he) the Theater which I have long desired. I protest before the face of the living God, and his holy Saints, that I have ever had most sincere intentions for the good of the State, nor am I culpable of any of these crimes objected against me. If my innocencie be now oppresst, there shall come a better posteritie, which shall draw aside the curtain, and entertain the rays of truth.

O Rome, O Rome, would to God thou mightest be purified by my bloud, and I to be the last victim sacrificed for publick safetie! I will not now accuse him who condemned me, desiring God rather may open his eyes to see the justice of my cause, and the plots practised upon his own soul. Behold the recompence I gain, for becoming hoarie in his service; but God is the faithful witnesse of all my actions, and in his bosom is it now, where I lay down my life, my bodie, my soul, and all my interests.

There was but one poor gentle-man waiter, that accompanied him in this passage: who, as he poured out tears near unto him, Boetius earnestly beholding him, said: Where is your resolution, leave these tears for the miserable, and tell my father-in-law, my wife, and children, that I have done nothing here unworthie of their honour, and that they act nothing unworthie of me, by bewailing me with plaints, which would be little honourable for the condition of my death, but that they rather take this accident as a gift from Heaven. They well know I have ever told them, it is not here, where we should expect repose, but in the place, where I hope to prepare them a room. These words spoken, they proceeded to execution by the barbarous commandment given by Theodorick.

I have read in a very ancient manuscript, from whence I have drawn some particulars couched therein, that a cruel torture was inflicted on this holy man, long time streyning a coard about his forehead, in such sort, that his eyes started out of his head, and that in the end they knocked him down with a leaver: which I cannot think to be probable, seeing all other constantly affirm his head was cut off by the hand of a hangman: and Martianus, who most eloquently wrote his life, addeth, that by miracle he some space of time held his head in his own hands, like another S. Denys, until he gave up the ghost, before the Altar of a Chappel very near to the place of his execution.

His bodie was interred in the Church of Saint Augustine, to whom he had a particular devotion, and his name put among the Martyrs, as Baronius observeth, because he died partly for the defence of the Catholick Church against the Arians. The place of his imprisonment hath been preserved as a great monument of piety, his tomb honoured with verses, such as that time could afford, where among other things this title is given him:

BOETIUS IN COELO MAGNUS, ET OMNI PERSPECTUS MUNDO.

The King stayed not a whit after this to put Symmachus his father-in-law to death, and to confiscate all the goods both of the one and other, which was a very lamentable thing; yet notwithstanding the courragious Rusticiana bare the death of her father and husband with so great constancy, that she deserved to draw all succeeding Ages into admiration; for she spake most freely to the King, reproching him with his disloyalty, and honoured these two eminent souls as Saints, much offended with her self, if at any time nature won tears from her eyes, as judging them too base to be sacrificed to so flourishing a memory.

The vengeance of God slackened not long to fall upon the guiltie head of Theodorick: for few days after this act, as he continually lived in the representations of his crime, his imagination was so troubled, that being at the table, when they came to serve up the great head of a fish, he figured to himself it was the head of Symmachus, the last of all butchered, and although much endeavour was used to remove this fantasie from him, it was impossible to give remedy, but he rose from the table like a man affrighted, crying out murder, and felt instantly such a quaking over all his body, and besides such convulsions in all his members, that he must needs presently be cartied to his bed; where he was visited by his Phisitian, to whom he complained with much horrour, that he had shed bloud which would perpetually bleed against him. The feaver and frenzie carried him hence into the other world, where he had a marvellous account to make; of whom we know no more particulars: yet Saint Gregorie witnesseth

Procop. lib. 4.

Greg. l. 4. & 30 neſſeth that he learned from the mouth of a man worthy of credit, that the ſame day he died at Rome, certain honourable perſons being at Lipari, a little Iſland of Sicilie, in the Cell of an Hermit, who lived in the reputation of great ſanctitie, he ſaid unto them: Know ye, that King Theodorick is no more? They replying, Nay not ſo, we left him alive, and in health. Notwithſtanding (ſaith he) I can well aſſure you he died to day in Rome, and which is more, is judged, condemned, and thrown into the ſtore-houſes of ſubterranean fire, which we here call the Cauldron of Vulcan. And it was a ſtrange thing, that they being returned to Rome, underſtood the death of this wretched King, to have been at that very time, told by the Hermit; which was held for a moſt manifeſt judgement of God, and made all thoſe to tremble, who heard the relation thereof.

Olla Vulcani.

Athalaricus his grand-child by his daughter, although an infant, ſucceeded to his eſtates, under the regency of his mother Amalazunta, who reſtored all the goods had been confiſcated to the widow, that lived afterward, until Juſtinian got the Empire from the Goths, by the means of Belliſarius: at which time ſhe made all the images and ſtatues of Theodorick to be broken, cauſing alſo another proceſs to be framed againſt him after his death.

Alas, great God, who governeſt the ſtate of this Univerſe, and makeſt the pillars of Heaven to ſhake under thy foot-ſteps! what is man who will practiſe wiles in a matter of policie, contrary to thy eternal Maxims? How hath this wretch ended, looſing ſoul, Empire, and ſalvation, to purſue a phantaſm? He roared like thunder in the clouds, on the theater of humane things, and then paſt away, leaving nothing behind but ſtorms, dirt, and mortet: at which time thy good ſervant Boetius, walking in the ways which thou preſcribedſt him, is mounted to the glory of the elect, leaving here behind him the precious memory of his name to all poſterity.

THE LADIE.

TO LADIES.

LADIES,

I Should do an injury to ſanctity, even in the HOLY COURT, if having undertaken to ſpeak of piety of Great-ones in theſe Treatiſes, I ſhould paſs Ladies under ſilence, who in all times have contributed to the glory of Chriſtianity ſo much force beyond their ſex, as virtues above nature. God hath employed them in the great affairs of all Ages, ſince the Word, which from all eternity acknowledged but one Father in Heaven, hath been pleaſed to acknowledge in later times, one mother upon earth: and that he who is able to cloath the meadows with the enamel of flowers, and Heaven with the beauty of lights, took fleſh and bloud of a Virgin, to make himſelf a garment, and frame to himſelf a body. And as the chaſte womb of a woman ſerved him for a lodging at his firſt enterance into the world: ſo when he would iſſue out amongſt ſo many horrours, puniſhments, and images of death, when ſtones were rent aſunder for grief under his feet, and Heaven diſtended it ſelf with ſorrow over his head, women were also found near to the Cross, as witnesses of his last words, and survivers of his bloud.

Here, O Ladies, are eternal alliances, which you have contracted with devotion; and he who would bereave you the sweetness of its repose, should banish you from your own houses. So many men as stir up quarrels, seem now adays to have no other profession, but to kill and die upon credit. Those, who are conversant with books, waste themselves in the pleasing tortures of the mind. Others, who are involved in the turmoils of publick affairs, oftentimes gain nought else but smoak and noise. But when I behold you under the title of the Devout Sex, which is given you by the Church, I find your blessing is in the dew of Heaven, and that you resemble Bees, which are born in honey, or rather those birds of the fortunate Islands, nourished with perfumes.

Believe me, those of your sex who have not true piety, had they a world of greatness and beauties, and were it that all the riches of this world had rendered it self tributary to their intemperance, would be no more esteemed before God, than the flower of grass, or scum of earth. But such as take the way of holy and solid virtues, enter into a life wholly Angelical, which forgetting sex and natural imperfections, furnisheth it self with the most perfect idæaes of the Divinity.

Behold hereof a model, which I present unto you in this Treatise, where, after I have observed, rather by speculation than practice, some blemishes, which might varnish the lustre of so many celestial beauties, I reduce the piety of Ladies into such bright splendour of day-light, that it were to have no eyes, not to admire the merit thereof.

I have been willing to make this service suitable to my habit, and not unworthy of your considerations, thereunto invited by Ladies, who have happily allied virtue to the most eminent qualities of the Kingdom, and who might serve me for a model, were they in a much better Age than my self. If God, who hath inspired me with these contemplations, grant your performance, I shall have the Crown of my vows, and you, that of your perfections.

THE

THE LADIE.

The first SECTION.

That the HOLY COURT cannot subsist without the virtue of Ladies, and of their Piety in the advancement of Christianitie.

BEhold where I propose to shut up this Work of the HOLY COURT, which I have brought thus far with labour enough. And since God after those great Works of the Creation, reposed so soon as he had made woman, he thereby shews me an example to give some rest to my pen, when I shall have represented unto you the perfections of a Lady, such as I would wish her, to serve as an ornament for Christianity, and a model of virtue.

Yet Reader, I must needs tell you, I feared this haven, whereunto I saw my self arrive of necessity, as well for that I learned of the great Martyr S. Justin, that a singular discretion must be had to treat with women, and that he doth very much, who can love their virtues without danger: besides, being naturally disposed to brevity, I somewhat doubted lest they might insensibly communicate by my discourse some touches of those great delays, which they use in attiring themselves; and verily I see there are many things may be said both of the one side and other: But as it is an act somewhat uncivil to run inconsiderately into invectives against the sex, so it is an unworthy servitude of mind to be too obsequious to them, and render vices incorrigible, by a false presumption of virtues.

Justin. ad Zenam. Serenũ. Τὸ δὲ περὶ γυναικῶν μὴ σφόδρα μὴ ἐπὶ πολὺ πραγματεύεσθαι.

I am much bound to my profession, that it sequestereth me from these two rocks, where so many vessels suffer shipwrack. If I must blame you, I will do as he who slew the serpent, not touching the body of his son twined up in his folds; I will strike vice without slandering the sex, and if they must be praised, I look on them as the ideaes of Plato, which have nothing in them common with matter.

Alcon of Creet.

I begin to verifie my first proposition, and say, the good life of women is a piece so necessary for Christianity, that it cannot be cut off without introducing a notable disorder: and this I say, because there are many uncollected spirits in the world, who make it their glory to act all against the hair, to oppose the most sound opinions, to give the lie to nature, and do that in the world, which Momus did in fables. Sometimes they set themselves to censure the State, and find somewhat to say of military matters, treasures, laws, and offices: sometimes they frame Common-wealths of Plato in their emptie brains, and constitute new forms of government, which never will have being but in their chymæraes. When they have touched upon the Purple and Diadem, they busie themselves to controle God upon the master-pieces of nature, and among other things, that he hath done ill to create a woman.

Si mundus absque mulieribus esset, conversatio nostra non esset absque Diis.

Cato the Censor said in his time, That if the world were without women, the conversation of men would not be exempt from the company of Gods. And a Doctor of the Jews yielding a reason why the Eternal Word had so long time deferred its Incarnation, said nothing else, but that the world was then replenished with bad women, and that four thousand years were not able to furnish out one good one, to serve as an instrument suitable to the greatness of this Mysterie. Another having lived free from the bands of marriage, caused to be set on his tomb: Vixit sine impedimento, He lived without hinderance, which was a phrase very obscure to express what he would say: Notwithstanding it was found this hinderance, whereof he spake, was a woman. This may well happen through the vice and misery wherein the state of this present life hath confined us: but to speak generally, we must affirm, had it been the best way to frame the world without a woman, God had done it, never expecting the advise of these brave Cato's; and whosoever endeavoureth to condemn marriage, as a thing not approved by God, sheweth, that he is either out of his wits, or a publick enemy to mankind.

Brisson for.

S. Zeno homil. de continent. Aut hostis publicus, aut insanus.

The great S. Peter, in whose heart God locked up the Maxims of the best policie of the world, was of another opinion, when he judged the good and laudable conversation of women, rendered it self so necessary for Christianity, that it was a singular mean to gain those to God, who would not submit themselves to the Gospel. Whereupon he affordeth an incomparable honour to the virtue of holy women, disposing it in some sort into a much higher degree of force and utility, than the preaching of the word of God: and in effect it seemeth this glorious Apostle, by a spirit of prophesie, foresaw an admirable thing, which afterward appeared in the revolution of many Ages, which is, that God hath made such use of the piety of Ladies for the advancement of Christianity, that in all the most flourishing Kingdoms of Christendom, there are observed still some Queens or Princesses, who have the very first of all advanced the Standard of the Cross upon the ruins of Infidelity. Helena planted true Religion in the Roman Empire, Caesarea in Persia, Theodelinda in Italie, Clotilda in France, Indegundis in Spain, Margerite in England, Gyselli's in Hungarie, Dambruca in Poland, Olga in Russia, Ethelberga in Germanie, not speaking of an infinite number of others, who have happily maintained and encreased that, which was couragiously established.

1 Pet. 3. Ut qui non credunt Verbo, per conversationem mulierum sine verbo lucrifiant.

Reason also favoureth my proposition; for we must necessarily confess, there is nothing so powerfull to perswade what ever it be, as complacence and flattery; since it was the smoothest attractive, which the evil spirit made use of in the terrestrial Paradise to overthrow the first man, setting before him the alluring pleasures of an Eve, very newly issued out of the hands of God.

Now every one knows nature hath imparted to woman a very good portion of these innocent charms: and if many by these privileges are also powerfull in actions so wicked, why should not so many virtuous souls generously employed in the service of the great God, bear as much sway, since he accustometh to communicate a grace wholly new to the good qualities, that are aimed to his honour?

I conjure all Women and Ladies, who shall read this Treatise, to take from hence a generous spirit, and never permit vice and curiosity may derive tribute from such ornaments, as God hath conferred on them, it being unfit to stuff Babylon with the gold and marbles of Sion.

The second SECTION.

That women are capable of good lights and solid instruments.

SInce I see my self obliged by my design to make a brief model of principal perfections, which may be desired for the compliſhment of an excellent Ladie, and that this discourse cannot be throughly perfected without observing vicious qualities, which are blemishes opposite to the virtues we endeavour to establish; I will make use of the clew of some notable invention in so great a labyrinth of thoughts, the better to facilitate the way.

I remember to have heretofore read a very rare manuscript of Theodosius of Malta, a Greek Authour, touching the nuptials of Theophilus Emperour of Constantinople, and his wife Theodora, which will furnish us with a singular enterance into that, which we now seek for; so that we adde the embelishment of so many Oracles of wisdom to the foundations, which this Historian hath layed.

Anno 830. Zonoras saith, that she was onely step-mother, and relateth it somewhat otherwise, but let us follow our Authour.

He recounteth, that this Theophilus being on the point to dispose himself for marriage, the Empress his mother, named Euphrosina, who passionately desired the contentment of her son in an affair of so great importance, dispatched her Embassadours through all the Provinces of the Empire, to draw together the most accomplished maidens which might be found in the whole circuit of his Kingdom. And for that purpose she shut up within the walls of Constantinople, the rarest beauties of the whole world, assembling a great number of Virgins into a chamber of his Palace, called for curiositie, The Pearl. The day being come, wherein the Emperour was to make choice of her to whom he would give his heart, with the Crown of the Empire, the Empress his mother spake to him in these terms:

MY LORD AND SON, Needs must I confeſs, that since the day nature bound me so streightly to your person, next after God, I neither have love, fear, care, hope, nor contentment, but for you. The day yieldeth up all my thoughts to you, and the night, which seemeth made to arrest the agitations of our spirit, never razeth the rememberance of you from my heart: I acknowledge my self doubly obliged to procure with all my endeavours what ere concerneth your good, because I am your mother, and that I see you charged with an Empire, which is no small burden to them who have the discretion to understand what they undertake.

It seems to me since the death of the Emperour your father, my most honoured Lord, I have so many times newly been delivered of you, as I have seen thorny affairs in the mannage of your State. And at this time, when I behold you upon terms to take a wife, and that I know by experience to meet with one who is accomplished with all perfections necessary for your State, is no less rare than the acquisition of a large Empire, the care I have ever used in all concerns your glory and contentment, is therefore now more sensible with me, than at any other time heretofore.

It is true, O most dear Son, that the praise-worthy inclinations which I have observed in your Majestie, give me as much hope as may reasonably be conceived in the course of humane things: yet notwithstanding the accidents we see to happen so contrary to their proceedings, do also entertain my mind in some uncertaintie.

That you may take some resolution upon this matter, behold in the Pearl of Constantinople, I have made choice of the most exquisite maidens of your Empire, to the end your Majestie may elect her, whom you shall judge most worthie of your chaste affections. I beseech God, who is Authour of Marriage, to direct your spirit in this choice, and dispose it to that which shall be to his greater glorie, wherein you shall ever find your contentments.

When she had spoken this, she drew out of a box a golden apple, enameled with precious stones, which she had purposely caused to be made, that it might be presented to her, who should be chosen out for the bed of her son, and putting it into the Emperours hand:

Behold (saith he) the golden apple, which I leave to your discretion, to give it to the most absolute. You have the Commission of Paris in your hands, but you shall do well to dispose of it more discreetly than he.

The Emperour, after he had most affectionately given thanks to his mother for so many excellent proofs of her affection, asked of her by what note might one know a wife truly virtuous, and so accomplished as she wished.

Euphrosina replied: It is no sleight demand, O Emperour, nor can that so readily be resolved, yet by your good favour, I will roughly delineate this discourse with so much sincerity, as not to attribute any thing to my sex, to the prejudice of truth.

There are three sorts of men, who cannot speak well of us: whereof the first are certain scoffers, who to put themselves into an humour, and to give scope to their wits, have no discourse more familiar in their mouthes, than the condemnation of women: and God forbid, these should be any other than Poets or Philosophers; for they frame discourses of our nature, and extravagances to no purpose.

I revenge my self commonly upon these kind of men by silence: for it is to cast water on coals, to hear them without reply, and to punish their tattle by contempt.

Others are men wounded in sport, and who have not well digested some disgraces they have received from women, to whom either vice, folly, or malice hath engaged them more than was expedient for their quiet. These are, as if a dog hurt with a stone, should run up and down to bite all the stones he finds in his way, yea, those which are laid by work-men in the buildings of Churches and houses. They fall upon all women for having been deceived, as they say, by a woman, and cease not to scratch the wound, to renew the smart of it. But who sees not it is a meer passion, to blame the general for the deserts of particulars?

In the third rank, are certain melancholly furious creatures, or such as have something worse in them than furie, who have not so much proclaimed war against our sex, as denounced it against total nature, which covereth us with its arms in this point, and confirmeth us in our right by their silence.

Some of these, who are strong in passion, and discover their revenge with pretext of learning, would perswade us, that the meaneſt spirit of all the men in the world, is more eminent than that of the most capable woman.

Verily, I will not raise my sex above the merit thereof, thinking we shall ever be high enough, if we abide in the rank which God hath given us.

But whether we consider reason, or whether we regard experience, they very pertinently make void this chy-

meras

mera of conceit, which hath taken birth from self-love and folly, as from its two most suitable elements.

Tertul. l. de anima. Anima non habent sexum.

I would willingly demand of these discoursers, whether they hold souls to have a sex? Never will they avow this opinion, unless they mean to renounce faith and reason. And if our souls be indifferently treated by God, why do they thereupon go about to forge distinctions, which have not any subsistence, but in their depraved imaginations.

If some say this diversitie proceedeth from the bodies, who knoweth not, that the disposition of Organs, from which it is thought the goodness of wit proceedeth, is as advantagious in women as men? See we not even at this day in all sorts of conditions men sometimes so abject in wit and capacitie, that if one degree should be taken from them, it seems they would have but sufficient to become beasts? And have we not seen in all times women intelligent and capable, some whereof have made themselves appear as miracles in arts, and others shewed, that if they were ignorant, we could attribute it to no cause, but to the modestie of their condition.

I should be too copious if I now went about to enlarge my self upon the goodly Works of Sophia, Erinna, Sosipatris, Cleobulina, Theomistoclea, Telesilla, Zenobia, and Eudoxia. Those who condemn in us the want of wit, oftentimes wish we had less, and would settle a good part of their contentment in our stupiditie.

We hold for an undoubted truth, that God having created us with this equalitie of souls, we have as much right in knowledges necessarie for us in matter of grace, virtue, and glorie, as men can have. One thing I may well say, that the complexion of feminine bodies, may distil into our souls inconstancies, infirmities, and passions, which perhaps would take an irregular flight, were they not repressed by pietie and reason.

For my part, I think Simonides hath not very ill expressed the ten Orders, which he hath made of the humours of women, and this will much help you in the choice you are to make, if your Majestie will take so much pain as to be informed thereof.

In saying this, she caused her Virgins to draw near; and as heretofore those of Sparta shewed drunken men to their children, to make them to abhor drunkenness, so framed she a description of the bad natures of women, to procure a detestation thereof, and exalt the merit of the virtuous, by the counterpoize of their contrary.

The third SECTION.

The ten Orders of women, and the vitious qualities which Ladies ought especially to avoid.

BEhold Maidens (saith she) and advise in good time to lay hold on the tenth rank: for there are nine neither pleasing nor laudable.

Sus toto in volutabro. Pet. 2. 22.

In the first sphere are those, which are of the nature of a hog, creatures unworthy to be named, who soil the honour of their sex, by the disorder of their carriage: for leaving all that which is either honest or generous in our manners, they let themselves loose to all kind of infamous pleasures, of gluttony and lust, which ruineth them in conscience, fortune, and reputation. They are whoups, proud birds, which have nothing but crest, and naturally delight in ordure: they are bats, which cannot endure one little ray of light, but seek to hide themselves under the mantle of night: they are horse-leeches, which draw bloud from the veins of a house and state, where they exercise their power. They are Syrens of the earth, which cause ship-wracks without water. They are Lamiæ, who have hosteries of Cut-throats, that kill men under pretext of good usage. They are harpies, who surprize even from Altars, and in the end become envenomed dypsades, which enforce an enraged thirst upon those whom they have once bitten. He that speaks this vice of a woman, hath as it were nothing to say of all the evils in the world. And when impudence hath given them a brow of flint and steel to sin, the bankrupting, which is made upon honour, is attended by that, which is committed on virtues and Altars, and there is not any vice in the world, which will not seek to possess it self of the throne, from whence shamefastnes is banished. I beseech you I may speak no more of these scandals of nature, lest I may poison my tongue by the recital of their deportment.

Vide Petrum Damianum in Gomorrheanis.

In the second rank are those, who have the skin of the fox, and the snares of the hunter, to surprize the simple. I speak not at all of certain creatures, who use pleasing and innocent subtilities, as were those of Rebecca and Rachel, which rather relished of prudence than craft: but I discourse of some women, cunning, inconstant, ingenious, and practick. We see by experience, that creatures the less strong, have the more sleights, as if nature were willing to recompence the defect of one part, by the excess of another? So it often happeneth that we our selves being destitute of forces, which is more proper for men, have recourse to an infinite number of deceits: wherein we think to have some advantage, and by the cunning of our wits, which are nimble enough, and by the superabundance of leisure we enjoy in a sedentary life, and by the fervour of our passions, which being almost never in the mean, do stir up our understanding, to make it produce an infinity of designs. There are women able to give a lesson to the greatest Lawyers in matter of process; so well are they versed therein: they know all the terms of litigious pleadings better than ever did Labeon or Tribonius, and they so cunningly make use thereof, that they tyre the strongest patiences by the tricks and flexibilities which they invent. There are some, who have a sent so penetrating, that they smell from far all which is done in a Citie, and discover the most secret things to find in some sort their own interests. Others perpetually bear a snare on their tongues, such words have they of double meanings; they know how to measure their dalliances to their own profit; to counterfeit friendship where there is not any; to hide hatred under flattery; to put Rivals into passion and quarrels; to make them fight and play the Fencers at their pleasure, and afterwards to pull some feather from those that are beaten. We do not so much advance our affairs as we would wish by these tricks; for that maketh us odious, and taketh the credit from us, which we should rather derive from the goodness of our manners. And besides, as there is no policie which hath not in the end its countermyne, whilest passion holdeth us in breath to deceive others, oftentimes we suffer our selves to be surprized by a certain levity, of easily believing all those which flatter us. Fair maids believe me, as there is nothing more lovely than goodness, so is there not any thing more stable than an honest simplicity. We are not born to be Circes and Medæa's, not to open a shop of all subtilities; let us be contented that Poets have made a monster of a creature of our sex, which commonly spake in very ambiguous terms, and they named it Phinx; let us speak truths to make fables false, and beware of the art which they profess.

Eccles. 9. Laqueus venatorum.

In the third rank go along certain natures endowed with dog-like qualities, most insupportable, as are so many women troublesom, importunate, and slanderous, who do nothing perpetually but bay, bawl, or bite. To live with such a creature in a house, is to have a rotten roof, which letteth rain and tempests drop in winter upon the head of the hoste. There are men who become familiar with Lions, Bears and Dragons, but where shall you find one, who hath made tractable such like humours? The habitations of deserts are delights in comparison of such company. A film in the eye, the gout in the foot, the stone in the reins, the hissing sing of aspicks, thunder, lightening, rasors, hooks of iron, make less noise, and do less hurt, than these poisoned tongues, which penetrate even into the entrails.

Mulier stulta & clamosa, nihil omnino sciens. Eccles. 9. Tecta perstillantia in die frigoris. Prov. 27.

A husband which meeteth with so ill a chance, daily acteth that part in his house, which did heretofore Prometheus on the mountain of Caucasus, when a vultur rent him alive, and gnawed his heart, which was onely fruitfull for his punishment. The wife that meets with a bad husband should not much complain, but yet she findeth that being in subjection, she is not so far distant from the degree, wherein nature hath placed her: but on the contrary side, to see a man ill handled by the impudent exclamations of an imperious woman, is a kind of monster in nature, which moveth pitie in some, and astonishment in others. All husbands have not the resolution of the Philosopher Socrates, who held opinion we must endure women, as the dung of pigeons, which pay our patience with their fruitfulness. For verily being crowned with a bucket of water, by his Mistress Xantippe, after a great noise of bitter words, he replied, Such was the nature of the world, because after the thunder-clap followed rain. Our age is not so fruitfull in such insensibilities: but in like occasions the husband and wife coming to contend with words, a wind is raised at the door & and window, which bringeth a storm into the house.

Ulysses Aldobrandinus. In all times our tongues have been censured, as tempests opposite to publick repose: some have compared them to those bells of the forrest of Dodona, which made a prodigious jangling: others have said, there needeth not above three of them to make up a Fare; and others have added, It was ill done to say there were words, which came from our mouthes, but rather waves and froath of the sea. I cannot but think these Censors speak out of excess; but let us prove thē lyars by our discretion, and perswade our selves, that discourses of a woman which have been purified by silence and consideration, have a marvellous virtue.

Mulier verbales unde. Fulgentius.

Mulier fatua. Prov. 1. In the fourth order are women of the earth, who are of a nature gross, stupid, and dull, that live in the world as superfluous creatures, and know as it were neither good nor ill: the care of their house very little toucheth them; the least business is of power much to perplex their minds; their kindred and allies find little friendship with them, since they themselves have oftentimes the heart of an Ostrich towards their own children, whom they regard as if they were strangers. In the end, they have much ado to endure themselves, so unprofitable they are, and malignant towards civil life: which happeneth to them through depraved habits, and inordinate idleness, whereinto they have suffered themselves to slide from their tender years, or by some other corruptions of a melancholy spirit, which they foment to the prejudice of their repose.

These kind of natures are good neither in the countrey, citie, house-keeping nor in religion. For we find that in all things we must use endeavour, and that we came into the world, as into a galley, where, if one cannot manage either the stern or oar, he must at the least make a shew to stir his arms, and imitate the Philosopher Diogenes, who roled his tub up and down, wherein it was said he inhabited, to busie himself. For my part, I like well those people who banished all idle gods out of their walls, and retained such as enjoyned travel. For, to live and take pains, is but one and the same thing, and that, which the nourishment we take operateth for the preservation of life, labour doth the like for accommodation thereof.

Augustin. l. 6. de Civit. Dei. Philo de sacrif. Abel & Cain.

Non est ira super iram mulieris. Eccles. 15. In the fifth station you have women of the sea, who much deceive the world by their fair semblances: for they at first appear quiet and peaceable, as a sea in the greatest calm, having no want of grace or beauty, which promiseth much good to those who know them not; but one would not believe how they shift away upon the least wind of contradiction which is raised; how they are puffed up, and become unquiet with anger, love, avarice, jealousie, and other passions very active. Such an one seeth the flower of the thorn, who knoweth not the pricking thereof, and such an one beholdeth with admiration those excellent beauties, who cannot believe how many pricks and stings they cover under these imaginary sweetnesses. You shall therein ordinarily observe very great levity and impatience, which maketh them hourly to change their resolution, in such sort, that they think nothing so miserable, as to remain still in one and the same condition. I have seen young widows, who had washed the bodies of their husbands with their tears, wiped them away with their hairs, and as it were worn it by force of kisses, and who not content with these ardent affections, discharging the surplusage of their passion upon their own proper bodies, tore their hair, pulled their cheeks, & were rather covered with dust than apparel. They died every hour, saying, they could not live one sole moment without their best-beloved, and filled the air and earth with their complaints; which was the cause why such as came to the funerals, knew not whether they should bewail the dead, or the dying. Notwithstanding, presently after these goodly counterfeitings, they began again to reform their hair, and change the dust of the pavement into the powder of Cypress: to put painting upon their tears; to adorn with a carcanet of pearl the neck, which they seemed to destine to a halter; to seek for Oracles from their looking-glass, and to do all things, as if death and love conspired to make their feast in one and the same Inn. I have observed others, who being yet under the yoak, were the best servants in the world: but as soon as they saw themselves at liberty, there were no worse mistresses than they. There are noted to be in the heart of a woman the passions of a tyrant, and should they continually have wheels and gibbets at their command, the world would become a place of torture and execution. Never have I seen passions more hard to vanquish: for in the end the sea, which threateneth the world to make but one element, suffereth it self to be distinguished into ditches by little grains of sand, which stayed it with the commission they received thereupon from God: but when a woman letteth the reins of her passion go, there is not as it were neither law divine or humane, which can recal her spirit to reason. Fair maids, take ever from the modesty of your hearts, the laws which may be given you by justice.

S. Zeno Hom. de continent.

Custodi te à muliere mala. Prov. 6. In the sixth degree are the natures of the Ape, who have a certain malice spightfull and affected; and such spirits may be found of this kind who day and night dream on nothing but mischief. They are filled with false opinions, sinister judgements, disdains, smothered choller, discontents, acerbities, in such sort, that the ray of the prosperity of a neighbour reflecting on their eyes, makes them sigh and groan. And as those Apes which sculck in the shop of a Trades-man, mar his tools, disturb his works, scatter his labours, and turn all topsie-turvie: So these malicious creatures spie occasions to trouble a good affair, to dissolve a purpose well intended, to overthrow a counsel maturely diliberated, to cause a retardation on the most just desires, and frustrate the most harmless delights. How many times do we behold the sun to rise chearful and resplendent in a bright morning, and every one is abashed to see a mist arise, which in this serenity doth that which blemishes on a fair body? It is said, it sometimes proceedeth from a sorceress, which darkeneth that glorious eye of the day with her charms: And how often have you observed prosperities more radiant than the clearest sumners day, which have been cloyed with duskie vapours by the secret practises of a woman, who biteth the bridle in some nook of a chamber? Fair maids, malice is an ill trade: It ever drinketh down at least the moity of the poison which it mingled for others.

In

Mulierum genus avaritiam.

In the ſeventh Region there are ſome kind of owls, or wild-cats, certain creatures, enemies of day, of all converſation, all civility, and all decorum: who having received from God many honeſt enablements to adorn life, and to do good to perſons neceſſitous, ſo lock up their entrails, that you may ſooner extract honey and manna from flints, than get a good turn out of their hands. How is it poſſible they ſhould be courteous, to oblige their likes, ſince they are many times cruel to themſelves, defrauding themſelves of the neceſſities of life, which are as it were as common as elements, to ſatisfie a wicked paſſion of avarice that gnaweth them with a kind of fury? For they endure in abundance part of that, which the damned ſuffer in flames perpetually, and fearing leſt the earth may fail them, they bewail what is paſt, they complain of the preſent, they apprehend the future, they love life, onely to hold money in priſon; and fear not death, but for the expence muſt be made at their funerals.

Fountain of Garamant, Holmicus. S. Bonaventura in dicta.

Let us take heed we reſemble not thoſe fountains, which are ſo cold in the day, that they cannot be drunk, and ſo hot in the night, that none dare come near them. Let us do good both in life and death with the goods which God hath given us. If men be ungrateful, he will ſuffer us to reap reward even from his hands. A covetous ſoul, which in the proſperity of its affairs, and ſuperabundance of riches, heareth not the clamours of the needy, is as the hen, which is ſaid to be deaf in ſummer; is like a bottle full of ſilver which affordeth nothing till it be broken; is a mil-wheel which much laboureth, and gaineth nothing; a hog, which never doth good, but at his death. It hath always folly for guid, ſervitude for dowry, and miſery for recompence.

Inveni amarem morte mulierem. Eccleſ. 7.

In the eighth are thoſe, which are ſaid to be compoſed of a certain mixture of powders very different, which cauſeth them to be of humours light, giddy, fantaſtical, in ſuch manner, that they daily make an infinite number of metamorphoſes, and one knoweth not in what mould they muſt be caſt, to put them into a ſtate of conſiſtence. You may there obſerve a ſpirit, which is perpetually upon change, which ceaſeth not to jump from deſire to deſire, like a bird from branch to branch. A ſpirit, which will and will not, which ſaith and unſaith, doth and undoeth, and which continually hindereth it ſelf in its thoughts. All that which you think to be very firmly ſettled with ſuch kind of perſons, is tied with a ſliding knot, and there needeth but the turn of a hand to overthrow what is thought to be beſt eſtabliſhed. One thing they retain very conſtantly in ſuch an ebbe and flood of inconſtancies, which is obſtinately to fix themſelves upon their own opinions, and no more to give way to reaſon, than rocks to waves. It is verily one of the greateſt vices which may be in a woman, as being the ſeminary of all diſorders that grow in houſes. I have ever learned from Antiquity, that the nobleſt Spirits are thoſe, which give good counſels, and that ſuch as willingly hearken unto them, come neareſt & joyn with them in a laudable degree of goodneſs. But ſuch as neither can give good adviſe, nor receive it from others, are the very worſt natures of the world. Preſerve your ſelves, Maidens, from this imperfection, which is the blemiſh of a noble courage, the worm of concord, the poiſon of life, the inſeparable companion of folly. Make it not your trophey to be refractory againſt the adviſes and remonſtrances of thoſe, to whom nature, juſtice, and reaſon hath ſubjected us: otherwiſe you would travel much, and get nothing in recompence, but the perfection of a mule.

Mulier compta. Eccleſ. 9.

I ſet in the ninth place maids, who are of the nature of thoſe proud kind of creatures, as of peacocks, or little dogs, which are glutted with curioſities, whileſt ſo many poor people die for hunger in the ſtreets. This order is now adays much ſpread over the world, for it is filled with nice women, who ſeem to be born for nought elſe, but to make it appear how high the deſires of exorbitant nature may mount, when a great fortune ſupporteth them. Many little fisking ghoſſips are ſeen, who are made up like puppits, ſo curiouſly bred, that they ſeem to be fed with potable gold between cotten and ſilk. Thoſe are the divinities of fathers and mothers, who raiſe rain and fair weather in their houſes, at the onely aſpect of their countenances. The joy and ſadneſs of the whole family waiteth on the condition of their humours; they muſt no more be offended than thoſe ſtars, which are thought to ſend tempeſts upon ſuch as have not ſaluted them. What may one hope from a ſoul altogether drenched in theſe delicacies? Follies attend the increaſe of age, and multiply by infinit degrees. Reaſon is trampled under foot, and paſſion armed with a great power makes it ſelf to be carried on the ſhoulders of men. Deſires are without meaſure, wills without bridle, paſſion without moderation, and ſenſuality without reſiſtance; bravery, tattle, impertinent babble, toyiſhneſs, love, afford no paſſage to truth, and if there be any devotion, it is altogether ſilken; ſo coy and curious it is in the choice of perſons. Sacraments are good, if they be not tied to hands, where vanity ſeeketh its intereſts; yea, pride is planted upon the hair-cloth of penance; and if God would chaſtiſe ſuch creatures to their liking, he muſt tie up his rods with ſilk, or elſe they never would receive correction.

When they leave their parents to be delivered to husbands, they go to change power, and not nature. A husband is ever uncivil, according to their ſaying, if they have not permiſſion to do any thing. And as it is ſaid the moon never agreeth in qualities with the ſun, but when ſhe hath eclypſed him; ſo they find not any concord in marriage, but in the diminution of his authority, whom God hath given them to be their head. They carry along with their portion all the vices of their childhood, which oftentimes accompany them even to the grave. They have no eyes to ſee adverſity, no nor ears to hear it; the miſeries of the poor touch them ſo little, as if they were made of marble, and the care of their family ſhall never interrupt their pleaſures. What a life is it to behold a woman, who although ſhe riſe in a time when the ſun is near noontide, notwithſtanding, as if ſhe feared the vapours of the ſerain, ſhe is armed before ſhe come out of her bed, with a reſtorative from the kitchin, to keep her colour the more freſh. Ptolom. Almag. 2.

From that time ſhe cauſeth her ſelf to be attired, and clothed like an Idol, by three or four ſervants, who have more ado to preſerve her beauty, than ever had the Veſtals of Rome to maintain the ſacred fire. One preſenteth her with red, another with white, one holds a looking-glaſs, and another dares not tell her that the time of Maſs is already paſt, whileſt my Lady taketh her head-dreſſings: yet muſt the Canons of the Church be broken as eaſily as a glaſs, to obey the humours of a woman, and to celebrate then, when it is to be doubted whether the ſun begin not to bend already to his ſetting. Maſs is paſt over with making ſowr faces, and looking ſcornfull with a good grace, with ſome ſlight ceremonies of devotion, which go no further than the outward parts. There it is, where reſolutions are made of entertainments of time, to be choſen for the reſt of the day. Then follow the viſits of child-bed women, gaddings, and coachings, dancings and bankets, where the prattle is ſo loud, that a few women could ſuffice to make the noiſe of a mil. They much love to hear diſcourſe upon all kind of affairs. They that have not their ſpirits ſo ſubtile, entertain themſelves upon trifles and ſlight complements, which they have ſtudied for the ſpace of ten years. Others, who can ſhew they have read a great quantity of love-pamphlets, or ſuch like, would ſeem of ability, ſo far as to give law to Poets and writers, who have not this kind of reliſh, love not to pleaſe any thing ſo much, much, as their own sensuality; and in these loose companies take fire and wind on all sides, to the great prejudice of their reputation.

I leave it, my Daughters, to the repose of your recollected cogitations, to think what Epitaph may be bestowed upon gentlewomen that lead such a life, but that they have employed themselves in the customary actions of a beast, nay, which a beast daily performs better than they; with this disparitie, that they have been more inventive to season their sin.

Behold what honest women commonly most condemn in the carriage of the vitious and imperfect, which I have abbreviated in few words; being unwilling to enlarge any further upon the other imperfections, whereof I have no experience, having ordinarily so much entertainment with my books and employments, that I have no leisure to study on the manners of this sex.

The fourth Section.

The tenth Order of Women, full of Wisdom, and Virtue.

THe young Emperour took great pleasure to hear the Empress his mother speak so freely concerning the nature of women; and he prayed her to perform her promise touching the characters, which might serve him in the choice he meant to make; whereupon she replied:

"The last and most excellent Order of women is that, which heretofore was called the order of Bees; women truly divine, who seem to have been made upon Celestial globes by the hands of Angels, so sweet is their nature, their virtue so rare, and price so unvaluable. They are in houses as the sun in his Orb, (a) and he that would equal their worth, should he draw out all mettals and precious stones which the earth hideth in its veins, would rather find insufficiency in his purpose, than want of merit in his object.

(a) Sicut sol oriens in mundo, in altissimis Dei. Eccles. 26.

Bees (as said an (b) Ancient) having nothing mortal in them but death: they perform actions worthy of immortality. Bees are labourers from the day of their birth; and it seemeth these are framed for the practice of virtues from their cradle. Bees have their little wings, these meditation and action. Those have a sting, these a point of vigour, which is the instrument of all perfections. Those live under a King, and these consecrate themselves to the obedience of Laws both divine and humane. Those are great enemies of ordure, and these live in the delights of chastity. Those travel incessantly, and lose not a day unless heaven enforce it (c); these are perpetually in the exercise of good works, and loose no time but to give it unto God. Those never stay upon withered flowers; and these set not their hearts upon any fading things which are under the Moon. Those have their hives rubbed with bitter herbs, to defend them from venemous creatures; and these use mortification of flesh against the poison of pleasures. Those make themselves counterpoises with certain little stones to flie the better; and these make a counter-ballance with humility to soar the higher. Those make honey which serves for nourishment and medicine; these have ever charity in their hands to cure the wounds and acerbities of the life of the poor, succouring their want by their liberalities. Those make the Altars to shine by the help of wax, which they produce; these adorn and enrich all the Church with the travel of their hands or wealth of their Cabinets. What would you to be more noble, or divine? Why then are you amazed, if the Scripture (d) hath said, That houses and riches came from parents, but a wife and a virtuous wife from the hand of God?

(b) Nihil habet mortale, nisi quod moritur apis nullus nisi artifex nascitur. Quintil.

(c) Nullus cum per cælum licuit, otio periit dies. Plin. l. 1.

(d) Prov. 19. Domus, & divitiæ dantur à parentibus, à Domino autem propriè uxor prudens.

The fifth Section.

A brief Table of the excellent qualities of a Ladie; and first of true Devotion.

THe Gentle-women that stood round about the Empress, expressed much earnestness to know in few words the excellent qualities of a woman truly virtuous; and Euphrosina, not to frustrate their desire, proceeded in these terms:

"A Ladie well accomplished, is like a star with five rays, which are the five virtues, of Devotion, Modestie, Chastitie, Discretion, and Charitie (a). Devotion formeth the interiour, Modestie makes it appear in the exteriour with a requisite comelines, Chastitie perfecteth both the one and the other, Discretion applieth it to the direction of others, and Charitie crowneth all her actions.

(a) These are the qualities which the Scripture giveth her in divers places.

(b) A woman without Devotion, were she composed as a Pandora, and had she all the beauties which the heart can desire, and the imaginations feign; is a Bee without a sting, which will make neither honey nor wax; is a savage beast that nature hath lodged in a painted house; is a case covered with precious stones, to preserve a dung-hill; is a Michol, who appeared outwardly with a Crown, and lived inwardly a slave to her passions; is a piece of flesh already half rotten, having not so much as one grain of salt in it. Corruption will creep into her life, disorder into her manners, infamie into her reputation, and despair into her salvation. Devotion is a virtue hereditary to our sex; it is the first portion which God hath granted us; it is the title which the Church hath given us; it is the most eminent mark of our Nobility. If we loose this ornament, I cannot see why we should pretend to live, having renounced the honour of Christianity.

(b) The first title of a woman, which S. Paul observeth in the Epistle to Titus c. 2. when he calleth her by a Greek word ἱερεπεῖς, as one would say, suitable to holy things.

But to tell you my opinion, Devotion being no other thing but a prompt and vigorous affection, which disposeth us to all that which concerneth the service of God, it seemeth to me, that many among us have great illusions in this point, and oftentimes court a fantasie, thinking to entertain a truth.

There are of those, who by over-much embracing Altars have overthrown them, (c) and broken the Idol of Dagon, to set their own judgement up in the place thereof.

(c) Altaria dum venerantur, everterunt. S. Zeno hom. de patientia.

I have seen very many, who have a slight devotion of apish tricks, which onely consisteth in a certain light and childish imitation of countenances and gestures, having not any solidity in the interiour. For my part, I imagine when I think upon such apparences of piety without effect, that if apes had a little studied our countenances, they would much exceed us in this point: For they are great and mischievous imitatours of all they see; witness those, who washed their eyes in a bason full of glew, having observed a huntsman, who washed his with fair water; and he who being desirous to bathe a little infant in imitation of its nurse, hastened to plunge it in a boyling cauldron. How many do we daily see in the seemings of affected piety, who so well act all countenances, as if with such merchandize Paradise were to be purchased? And in the mean space they are altogether devoid of true virtues; so that he who could penetrate into their hearts, should find they were like to those pearls, which in stead of a solid body, have nothing but the husk.

Strabo lib. 1. Ælian. de animal. l. 7.

Some take devotion as a slight pastime; others as a light complement; others bend that way for complacence to the humours of another; others for glory: and although they have consciences as rude as those of the Countrey, they would willingly draw Seraphins out of Heaven to govern them, to the end that although they cannot have devotion, they may at the least leaſt gain the reputation to ſeek after the perfectest: others are thereto tranſported for ſome ſlender cloak of liberty, and certain accommodations of their own proper intereſt.

I do not ſay, but that there are a great number who have intentions moſt pure, and proceed very piouſly, but we muſt affirm, that the defects whereof we ſpeak, may craftily ſlide into the infirmity of our ſex.

For, what may we ſay of a creature to whom ten years of devotion, twelve hundred communions, and a thouſand exhortations have not yet taken off one hair of vanity? What may we think of her, who eateth the immortal Lamb twice or thrice a week, and daily on all occaſions becometh a Lioneſs in her houſe? What may we judge of her, who ſo many times layeth the holy Euchariſt on her tongue, as a ſeal of the Spouſe, not being able to bridle or reſtrain it ſo far, as to forbear ſo many indiſcreet and evil words? what may one preſume of her, who makes a ſcruple to drink cool in ſommer, and to behold a flower with delight, yet feeleth no remorſe of conſcience, to have ſpoken more ſlanders in one dinner, than ſhe hath eaten morſels? Verily we betray devotion, which is of it ſelf fair and glorious, when we uſe it in ſuch ſort, and we give matter to exorbitant ſouls how to juſtifie their ſins by our deportments, to which they ever have but too much inclination, and, think that in depainting us with a coal, they make themſelves as white as ſnow. There are others, who deſire devotions extatike and raviſhing, diſguiſed in ſtrange words, in faſhions never heard of, in ceremonies not accuſtomed. All that which is juſt, prudent, and moderate, taſteth too much of common; other paths muſt be found to Paradiſe; new habits muſt be cut out for God under the mould of their fancy, to make him known. I am not ignorant, that there are in Religious Orders ſouls purified from the dregs of the world, which have apprehenſions of God moſt elate; nor would I for any thing condemn ſuch bleſſings. But when in ordinary life they ſpeak to me of faſhions ſo extraordinary, I ever go along with a leaden pace, ſo much do I feare, leſt for a ſtrong piety, I find a body of ſmoke. I add alſo others, who make to themſelves a devotion hydeous, penſive, & melancholy, which amazeth thoſe who behold it with the onely ſight thereof; they voluntarily reſigning themſelves to, as it were, perpetual tortures of the mind. This virtue hath but too much ſlander in the world; we have nothing elſe to do, but to hide its beauty, and to give it a maſk of terrour, to affright thoſe, who have buſineſs enough to free themſelves from their ſenſuality. I eſteem the devotion moſt proper for our ſex, is that which hath leaſt of affectation, & moſt of effect. Every one will be able to direct the prayers ſhe ought to make, Confeſſions, Communions, according to her own capacity, profeſſion, and leiſure; uſing therein the counſel of ſome that govern her conſcience, but let her aſſure her ſelf, ſhe ſhall never taſt devotion at the fountain head, but in the practiſe of virtues, and the conſtancie of good reſolutions.

It is the virtue, which S. Peter the Apoſtle required of our ſex, when he adviſed us to hold the inward man in the incorruptibility of a ſpirit peaceable and modeſt. This is ſeen in the carriage, geſtures, and countenances; but eſpecially in ſpeech, and habits. We cannot believe how wiſe we are in ſimplicity, and how powerfull in mildneſs. In incorruptibilitate quieti & modeſti ſpiritus. 1 Pet. 3, 4.

It is the ſtrongeſt armour we have from nature. When we mannage a ſpirit, and govern an affair by theſe ſweet and peaceable waies, we aſtoniſh the moſt confident, we diſarm the ſtouteſt, and triumph over conquerours, We have nothing to do but to hold our peace, and our ſilence ſpeaketh by us. But when diveſting us of this ſpirit of ſweetneſs, modeſty, and docibility, we put on a faſhion haughty, ſcornfull, & turbulent, we are onely able in loud noiſes, which render us contemptible to thoſe who are more powerfull than we, troubleſome to our equals, intolerable to our inferiours, and hateſull to all the world. With this mild temper of ſpirit, Heſter changed King Aha ſuerus into a lamb; with the ſame, Abigail, was much ſtronger than the arms of David; and Jeſabel with her natural cruelty having ſlain Innocents, ruined Cities, diſturbed States, was thrown out of a high window on the pavement, to be trampled all bloudy under the feet of horſes.

But as concerning Modeſty, which regardeth the comlineſs of body & attire, it is a ſtrange thing, how many complaints are made againſt us upon this point. We have already ſerved for the ſpace of ſo many Ages as a common place to Preachers, matter of cenſure, for Edicts, a fable for Cities, and laughter to our ſelves. In the mean time this love of bravery is ſo throughly engrafted in our ſpirits, that we will not deſpoil us of it, but with our skin. It is an original ſin, which all women carry with them from their mothers womb, for which there is no Baptiſm to be found, & he that ſhould go about to waſh us from this ſtain, we would have an action againſt him. Yea, were this onely uſual among great Ladies, for whom earth, rivers, and ſeas, ſeem to produce wherewith to ſatisfie their curioſity, it would appear leſs ſtrange. but all women are born with this paſſion, & they ſo heartily hug it, that there will be almoſt no diſtinction made in orders, ſince there is ſo much confuſion in habits.

Citizens wives will become Queens, & if we hereafter would be taken for Queens, we muſt become Citizens wives. Perhaps thoſe who cenſure us in this point, require too much of us, and ſome are therein tranſported with ſo much zeal, that if we would believe them, we ſhould make all the Maries of Egypt to be at Court. Thoſe who intend to treat with us in this manner, by falling upon our hair and attires, touch not our hearts; for could any one truely perſwade us to virtue, we ſhould cover our ſelves with a ſack, ſo that it might advance the glory of God, and the profit of our neighbour: yet do I think we have ſome right to comlineſs, and propriety in our garments, ever abiding within the limits of the moſt regular, in ſuch ſort, that the wiſe may not blame our ſuperfluities, nor thoſe who are more favourable accuſe our defects.

But to ſpeak ſincerely, there is a kind of frenzy in our proceeding. He who ſhould ſee the ſtuffs taken up ſomtimes at the Mercers to cloth a little body, whereof the worms will quickly make a dung-hill, would ſay they had undertaken to cover ſome huge Whale: and he who ſhould reckon up all the furnitures of a Ladie, as they lie on a table having never ſeen any woman, would think it were a Mercery to furniſh a little Citie: we reſemble thoſe birds, which have no body, and are as it were nought elſe but feathers; we uſe therein ſo many faſhions, diſguizes, and invention, that we tire our ſpirits; ſo much ſtudie and affection, that many of us make ſo much

The ſixth SECTION.

Modeſtie.

AFter the interiour is directed by the motions of piety, followeth the virtue of Modeſtie, which proclaimeth us exteriourly. It is the needle of the dyal, which ſheweth how our ſouls circumvolveth times, and the hours of the day: it, which witneſſeth the power we have over our paſſions; it, which formeth us after the model of great ſouls; it which cauſeth us to appear in converſation, in a manner not onely regular, but ſweet, honeſt, and examplar.

busines about a ruff, as if we had a Common-wealth of Athens to manage.

And that which is most horrible, is, these vanities are drawn from the bloud of the poor; and in the same proportion as they are extracted, they so impoverish, as I fear posterity may have more cause to curse our dissolutions, than cherish them. Nay, worse is done, when they so vehemently affect to begin the adultery of their bodies by that of the face, that it is insensibly eaten into with painting and poyson, as if they would derive beauty from corruption. Then certain fashions of apparel are found out, which seem to be made rather to sell bodies, than to cover them. I do not know what may be reserved for the eyes of a chast husband, when through all markets the secret parts of his wives body are exposed as open, as if they were ready to be delivered over to the best bidders. I cannot tell what husbands can be pleased with the publication of this nakedness, if not certain Platonists, who would approve the law this Philosopher made, as it is said, of community of beds, than the doctrine of idæaes, which would be viands too empty to satiate the hunger of concupiscence. Verily, if we yet retain a vien of the perfect Christianity which swaied in the golden age, we ought to stifle by a generous consent, all these abuses, and make of the spoils of superfluity a Sacrifice of mercy, giving in part for the relief of the poor, that, which hitherto we have dedicated to the fantasies of our spirits. Since we are born with some supereminencies of body, and are the goodliest creatures of the world, why should we go about to beg glory from poisons of the earth, from worms, and spoils of the dead? If opinion have put us unto it, it is now long since withered by the confusion of so many hands, who incessantly gathered it. The glory of the greatest Ladies shall not hereafter survive, but in great modesty.

The seventh SECTION.

Chastitie.

It is the qualitie S. Paul calleth sanctificatione. 1 Tim. 2. Saluabitur per filiorum generationem, si permanserit in fide, & dilectione, & sanctificatione, cum sobrietate.

THis is the shortest way we have to the preservation of Chastity, an incomparable virtue, and the richest jewel of our sex. It ought to be as natural to us, as flight to birds, swimming to fishes, beauty in flowers, and rays in the sun. You need not ask, what may become of a maid or wife, who is prodigal of a good, which should be as firmly united to her body, as her hearts: She is capable of all sorts of crimes, and were there question to open all the gates of hell, incontinency alone would put the keys into her hands. There is no beast in the world that is not better than a prostitute, who by the dishonour of her bed hath charged her soul with sins, her body with intemperance, her renown with reproaches, and her memory with execration. We ought so to instruct our daughters in the virtue of purity, that they may not know the least shadow of sins which are committed in the world. I approve not those little Dynaes, who will see and smell out so many customes of Countries, and entertainments; for they too soon learn that, which they too late will forget, and take so much fire in at the ears and eyes, that water enough will not be found to extinguish it. I do not wish a maid, though very young, should be delighted in the company of children which are not of her own sex. I likewise fear those of her sex, who are too curious, their company is sometimes so much the more dangerous than that of men, as we least take heed of a domestick enemy. That Chastity is ever the most stable, which knoweth not so much as what voluptuousnes may pretend unto. I will think crows might become nightingales, when any one should make me believe, that a creature of our sex, which is delighted to hear or utter scoffs, & speeches of double sense, which cover ordure under golden words, either is chast, or can any long time continue as she is.

Hierom. ad Lætam. Securitas est continentiæ nescire quod quæras.

Let us guard the eyes, mouth, and ears of those young maidens, as Temples dedicated to Honour, and let us do nothing in their presence, which they cannot imitate without sin: let us teach them not to addict themselves, either to pleasures of the mouth, or sleight desires, to take and freely possess any petty favours. A creature which much coveteth to have that which her condition cannot afford, hath many enemies in her heart, which will deliver her body over to dishonour, and her soul to confusion. Let us cut off as much as we may so many wanton songs, idle books, infamous pictures, gossipings, dancings, and banquets: never is a beast taken but with some bait, nor chastity lost, but that such attractives serve as fore-runners.

There are not so many lost spirits to be found among women well bred, who in sin pretended nothing but sin: but the love of divers Ladies proceedeth rather from vanities of the mind, than weakness of the body. They desire to be in some esteem and admiration of those, who can neither esteem nor admire them, but in the pretensions of their own interests: they take delight to be commended for their beauties, which never any man so profusely applaudeth, as not to hope to be paid for his praises. They are subject to much credulity, whether it be through some easiness of nature too weak, or by overmuch presumption and self-love, in such sort, that they quickly esteem themselves fair, and worthy to be beloved by those who feign affection, not seeing that fishes are taken with nets, and women with the credulity of their light belief. They undertake designs to make servants, who are not of the order of Arch-angels, to serve them as Raphael did Tobie, not pretending power over their hearts and honours. They are infinitly delighted to see a man prostrate at their feet, especially when he hath some qualities, which put him into the estimation of the world. It is a glory among the quainteſt to have gained slaves, who love their chains, and who will no longer live nor die but for them. This is the cause they counterfeit themselves to be little Idols, and take many sacrifices of smoak; and although they at that time have not any intention to offend God, notwithstanding they suffer themselves to dissolve among so many offers of services, complement, and protestations; and in the end feel it is a very hard matter to defend ones self from an enemy, who onely assaulteth us with gold and incense. Drops of rain are composed of nothing but water, and do by their continual fall penetrate stones: so, much sweetness of words, submissions, and observances redoubled one upon another, are able to make a rock rent in sunder: how can they but transport a woman, who issuing from a bone, faileth not to retain all the softness of flesh.

Love sometimes hath wings to fall upon its prey with a full souce, and sometimes it goeth along with a crooked pace. That which it cannot obtain by a prompt heat, it expecteth from a constant importunity. From thence ensue private conversation, and disorders, which make tales in cities, stage-plaies, & bloudy tragedies, which being begun behind a curtain, are many times ended at the gallows. I do not find a better remedy to stop the beginnings of lust, than to behold the end thereof. A Lady who solicited in matter of dishonour, in the first baits shall draw the curtain, and behold a huge gulf of scandals, injuries, rages, and despairs, will as willingly descend into Hell alive, as consent to this bruitish passion. She will seasonably proceed to remedies, and unfold her heart in the secret of Confession, will discover the deceipt of it, and by this means avoid an infinity of disasters. Thrice, yea four-fold happy is she, who will take these words as an Oracle, and enchace them in her heart to remember them eternally.

The

The eight SECTION.

Discretion in the mannage of affairs.

A title which the Wiseman expresseth by the word, Sensata, Eccles. 7. And S. Paul useth the word ὑφηνίς, Tit. 2. much recōmending to women, the care of houshold affairs.

WHen we have begun to polish our selves by these virtues, Discretion will regularly apply us to conversation and affairs, every one according to her qualities.

A woman is a poor thing, which hath no imployment nor discretion; as there are many to be found, who having lived to the age of ninety years have not learned any thing, but to dress and undress themselves. Why should we have a reasonable soul, were it not to enrich it with knowledges, which are necessary to us, both for our selves, & the government of those which fall into our hands? As we profess not to be wise, so we have not made a vow of stupidity. We should love as our eye-sight the reading of good books, which teach us how to become better, for they are wise companions, and honest entertainments, from whence we never behold jealousies nor scandals to arise. It is not a very barren delight to behold women, who as soon as they have made a silly complement, have nothing else to say, unless they talk of their ruffs, or some such kind of trifles? At the least, I wish those, who never have been willing to learn to speak, would one day practise to hold their peace: But they deafen the world with their prattle, and daily deliver an Iliad of speeches, wherein there is not so much as one good word. Tell me not these maids so knowing are more subject to caution: I would not have them, I say unto you, all learned, as the Sybils and Muses, but who will envy them an honest science of things, which serve for the direction of manners? There is none but spiders, and such little creatures, that turn flowers into poison. We ought not to fear that a maid, to whom good foundations of humility and devotion are given, will abuse this celestial manna, which is found in sage Writers.

I have learned from one full of wisdom and experience, that for one young virgin instructed in learning, which hath failed in her honour, twenty other have been found of the ignorant, who have so much the more grosly erred, as they had the less knowledge of their fault. I intend not by this counsel proposed, which is to perfect them by reading, that therefore we give liberty to the curiosity of reading of all sorts of books, and namely those which treat of loves, though in a very gentile manner; for they have a little sting in them, soft as silk, which insensibly enters into the heart; and when they describe this passion unto you with so many exquisite terms and honest inventions, they create so beautifull loves, that in seeking to imitate them, we produce such as are deformed. If we must become learned, we ought to do it in that manner as the Saints, Tecla, Catharina, Eudoxia, Marcella, Paula, Fabiola, Eustochium, who with the spoils of Egypt, furnished the Cross and Altars of our Saviour: Nor would I advise a virgin to go and hide her self in a granary or cave, to devour books: It is fit she season her reading with works proper to her profession. Let us never suffer her to be idle, but so soon as age rendereth her capable, let us give her some little direction and exercise in the house. For why should we be ashamed to work with the needle, since Augustus Cæsar, the founder of Empires, reputed such kind of imploiments not unworthy of his daughters; and that the Romans many years preserved, as a relick, the distaff of Queen Tanaquilla, much more charily than the lance or sword of Romulus, thinking it was more necessary to give women examples of industry, than furnish men with ideaes of war? One would not believe, how much the earnestness some have upon a good piece of work, diverteth all other passions, which may embroil the spirit; but whosoever will make trial, shall find that innocencie is never better lodged than at the sign of labour. I leave you to think, when a maid hath endeavoured to learn from her tender years, matters fit for housewivery, even to the kitchin, what a goodly light is in that house, whether it proceed from a father, or from a husband, for the direction of the family, the government of men, and maid-servants, the example of youth, and the comfort of the family. She maketh her self necessary in the best affairs, there is much repose in her prudence, her health is accounted important, her life precious, her death deplorable, and her memory replenished with honour. The wisest of men Solomon, hath given no other marks to know a virtuous woman, than the Oeconomy she holdeth in the government of her family. She hath considered (saith he) the paths of her house, and hath not eaten her bread in idleness; she hath taken pains in linnen and wollen. She is become as a ship laden with victuals and riches. She riseth before day to provide fitting food for her familie. She hath made purchase of farms, and entertained traffick. She hath put her hand to work, then opened it to the necessity of the poor. All her servants are in good order; her husband, and children cannot sufficientlie praise her for her great wisdom. She is a lamp which will never be extinguished in the darkness of night. Behold somewhat near the terms which he useth to reckon up the perfections of a wife, ending with wisdom, and fear of God, which is the first and last ornament. Prov. 31.

The ninth SECTION

Conjugal Love.

IN the end; as love is a generous passion which by its good government crowneth all virtues, I would advise a married Ladie, for the accomplishment of her perfection, to bear a most cordial charity towards her husband. This is no hard matter when there is good fortune and correspondence in marriages: for complacence ever maketh wings for love, and it is held a happiness to love that, which pleaseth our passion. But it is a most pitifull thing, when parents blinded with avarice, and charmed with the sweetness of pretended interests, renew the example of cruel Mezentius, who tyed the living to the dead, and endeavoured to match a poor young maid, who surviving in favours & blessings from heaven, with a husband putrified in vices, ordures, and diseases of body. Then is a time when much virtue is to be shown, in putting on a resolution to love a monster, from their most tender years to their tomb. What should we do therein? The law of nature gives us free permission to desire good husbands, but the laws of marriage exhort us to bear the as much as we may, howsoever they prove. If we love for our selves, this is impossible; but if for God, we therein shall find duty and facility. A woman cannot seek out a shorter way to the perfection of her sex, than by wedding the humours of her husband, so that they be not opposite to the commandments of God: she who well obeyeth, commandeth well; and when we once have surprised the heart of a man, there is not any thing resisteth our wills.

It is the Epithete which S. Paul giveth to virtuous women, calling them φιλάνδρους, Tit. 2.

Union is a marvellous cement, which so straightly knitteth obedience and power together, that it is a very hard matter to distinguish him who obeyeth, from him that commandeth. We have in all ages excelled in this conjugal piety, & there are hereof so many rare examples to be found, that pens are troubled to express, as well as ears to believe them. Tender & delicate young maidens have been seē, who inconsiderately married to husbands, worn out with maladies, perceiving frō the first night of her nuptials, unguents, ulcers, ulcers, and evil savours; and finding a counterfeit health in bodies, more fit for a tomb than a marriage bed, yet have not abandoned them, but loved, honoured, and served them, watching sometimes fourtie days, and fourtie nights about their beds, never disarraying themselves. Some one man hath been found among others, whose indisposition drawing along with it seven years together the stench of wounds that were incurable, the horrible infirmitie of members which appeared wholly disfigured, did weaken all the forces of those who were willing to assist him, overthrew the patience of the most faithfull, wasted the charitie of the most zealous, yea even such as do all for money abhorred to come near him. And then to see a young maiden of sixteen years of age, weak of complexion, handsom of bodie and endowed with a beautie which the most flourishing husbands would have coveted, to tie her self to this dead body, to stir it, touch it, cleanse it, to give it broths, to blow the powder of herbs into the nostrils of it, which distilled an humour insupportable to all the world, to cut his beard, and hair, when no man would undertake this adventure; is it not a miracle of our sex worthy of the admiration of men, the applause of histories and love of all posteritie?

Vives relateth this in the second book of a Christian Woman, of one named Clare.

See Lipsius in his Politicks.

What shall I say of one Eponina, who having espoused a husband much clogged with troublesom affairs & crimes, yea even of treason, was 9 years shut up with him in the vault of a sepulchre; and afterwards seeing him to be discovered, and condemned to death by the Emperour Vespatian, would needs accompany him to execution, & die with him, saying she alreadie was prepared for a tomb, and that she could better tolerate it dead than alive? What should I speak of a Persian Queen, named Cabadis, who seeing her husband detained in prison, came to visit him, not suffering her self to be known; and giving him her garments of a wife, to put on those of a husband, afforded him opportunitie to escape, paying afterward with her noble bloud the errour of her pietie?

Are not these prowesses worthy to be written in letters of gold and azure, to be exposed to the view of all Ages? A thousand-fold happy they, whose concord hath bound love up with chains of adamant, separation never finding place in the knot of marriage, which God hath been pleased to tie with his own hands. Let us for this cause preserve us from jealousie, which useth to grow from the most beautifull loves, as those worms, which are said to issue from the fairest flowers. It is a most unhappy passion, formed by fantasie, attired by suspitions, darkened by discontents, fed with bad humours by curiositie, entertained with imposture by slander, which gnaweth asunder all that which there is of virtue in chast affections, troubleth the repose of beds, embroyleth the affairs of households, reateth alliances, produceth monsters, soweth fury and rage, and having tormented all the world, devoureth it self. If our husbands fall into this miserie, let us pitie them as franticks, and take away from them all manner of occasions which may stir up their imaginations, and if the like maladie surprize us, let us not resemble those women, who have travelled in the dead time of night through huge forrests full of horrour, that they might hasten to watch their husbands, accompanied onely with their passions, whereof some fell between the teeth of wild beasts, which to them were more pleasing than the executioner they retained in their own proper entrails.

We ostentimes in this point more bewail our own interests, than the offence done to God; and it is no strange thing, that she who loveth ill should be deprived of what she affecteth. When there is sin in it, let us deplore it, let us endeavour to remedie it by prayers, by discretion, by patience, by all the most holy industries we may use therein. We shall find our selves strong in silence and hope; and not in ceaseless complaints, which have no other effect, but to fret wounds, and renew disasters.

The tenth Section.

The care of children.

TO hide nothing from you, women, who are called to the Sacrament of Marriage, ought to be very perfect; because they have as it were in their mannage the most precious interest of posteritie, they being chosen out to bring forth and educate Children, which are to be members of the body of State.

It hath often been questioned from whence proceeded the good and evil nature of men; and I find that many have attributed it to the divers aspects of Planets, as by a fatal necessity: But to say truly, this Astrologie of fools, and webs of spiders, are as it were but one thing, both being fit to catch flies, and not deceive understanding men. I hold opinion, good mothers make the good nature of children; and it hath ever been observed, that great personages who have flourished in some eminencie of virtues, have taken from thence as it were generally the first impressions of sanctitie.

If chast daughters chance to be born of incontinent mothers, it is almost as rare as to see nettles bear gilliflowers. Let us preserve our bodies as temples, to bring forth more virtues than flesh for the publik, and when God affordeth us issue, let it be one of our chiefest cares to train it up in his service. My heart bleedeth when I consider how now adaies many children of quality are bred, which are stifled with servile indulgences under the shadow of dandling them. God sends them as creatures, with which he intendeth to support the world govern Common-wealths, people heaven, and adorn even the conversation of Angels: but to see how they are used, it seemeth that pieces of flesh are ingendered, which are onely to be licked as bears, to give them true perfections. They are loaden with fat and the kitchin, they are entertained in the full fruition of all the desires of their hearts; they are observed like little Kings, who are not as yet many times above five years of age and already exercise a Monarchy in the houses of their parents. Jesus Christ banished Idolatrie from the world with so much sweat and bloud, and it is again daily renewed, when children are set up as certain little Idols, to whom all hearts, respects, hopes, fears, and homages are sacrificed. I beseech you, let us not cause them to learn that which we should make them forget; let us not accustom them to mimick affectation of words, to pomp of habits, to liberty, to pleasures. Let us attire them for the service of God, and exercises suitable to their sex and condition; and above all, let us take heed they be not poysoned by the ear, in the frequent conversation of such bad company, who seem to be born for nought else, but to infect purity.

The eleventh Section.

The conclusion of the discourse.

THe Emperess held ears and hearts suspended with this her discourse, when seeing the hour approch, wherein choice should be made of a wife for the Emperour her son: Behold the time (saith she) my Lord and son, when your Majestie must consign the golden Apple into the hands of her, whom you shall judge to have the best portion of those excellent qualities, which I have recited. And saying that, she caused a goodly room to be opened, whereupon one side side were seen pictures of Ladies, who flourished in the more elder Ages in sanctitie, in spirit, in courage, and in all virtues mentioned by us, which composed a triumphant Court. There was Sarah, Rachel, Lea, Deborah, Abigail, Susanna, Esther, Judith, Mariamne, S. Agnes, S. Cecilie, S. Helena, S. Monica, S. Felicitas, the ten Sybils, Zenobia, Amalazunta, Placidia, Pulcheria, Eudoxia, Theodora, Marcella, Paula, Eustochium, Victorina, Clotilda, Radegundis, and very many other, not comprizing those who have flourished within these eight hundred years: which much amazed me, and made me say, that such as affirmed women of honour were so rare to be found, would perhaps have some trouble to find leaves on trees, and water in the river. All these pourtraits appeared with lights of glory in a most pleasing manner, having enchasements all enriched with pretious stones. Behold, saith Euphrosina, O virgins, how precious is the memorie of holy Ladies. Then turning her self to the other side, she shewed with her finger the figures of such as had forsaken honour and virtue, which were pale, pensive, cloudie, and encompassed with flames, as if they came out of hell. There was Semiramis, Phedra, Thisbe, Phillis, Hellen of Greece, Clitemnestra, Cleopatra, Agrippina, Julia, Messalina, Calirrhoe, Thais, Phryne, Rhodope, Flora; and in perspective so great a quantitie, that it seemed to equal the sands of the sea, not accounting those therein, who afterward had a share in their miserie.

The Emperour having observed them, entered into the room called the Pearl, where he saw so many pearls selected from all the provinces of his Empire. There was nothing to be seen but stars, lightening, and rays, so much these beauties on every side mingling their lights afforded lustre, which gave him much difficultie how to resolve. There was among others one named Iceta, a maid of much knowledge, to whom the Emperour Theophilus spake a Greek verse, to which she replied with an admirable promptness; notwithstanding he relished not this spirit, finding it too curious for his humour: but after information taken from his eyes, his eats, and the mouthes of those who bred these creatures, he gave the golden apple to one named Theodora, a Paphlagonian by Nation, whom I notwithstanding cannot think to come near her, whom I here represent for a model.

CLOTILDA.

The first SECTION.

Her Birth and Education.

Ex Greg. Turonensi, Ammonio, Hincmaro, Philippo Bergomensi, Baronio, &c.

THE number of Ladies eminent in sanctitie is so great, that it rebateth the point of wit to think thereon, and the virtues are so resplendent, that in the commixtion of their lights they dazle all eyes, in such manner, that it is a hard matter to speak of it, unless we put some limits upon the discourses of so many singular subjects, who set none on their merits. And that is the cause, why out of a great number of Princesses, some of those whose names I have produced, I here undertake one, raised upon the most perfect idea's; which is the first Christian Queen of France, I mean the most glorious Clotilda, wife of our great Clodoveus, who verily is much bound to Heaven to have been chosen out for the advancement of the affairs of Christianitie in this flourishing Monarchy, with prowesses and successes incomparable; so likewise are we tied to her in an immortal obligation, to have cast the first seeds of piety into the Court of our Kings, that it might with the more authoritie, enter into the souls of all their subjects.

The good Princess like to a pearl which cometh from the salt sea, beheld her self involved almost from her birth in great acerbities and horrible confusions, from whence she arose with so much lustre, as she made of adversities the steps to the temple of glory. She was daughter of Chilperick, who contending for the scepter against Gombaut his elder brother, King of Burgundy, with more temeritie than reason, sunk down to the ground, and was forsaken by the people, whom he had excited against this his brother, who verily was a bad King. But God who giveth Sovereigns leave to reign, favouring a just cause even in the person of an evill man, gave victorie to the elder. He most truly made use of his fortunes for having surprized his younger brother at the siege of a City, he caused him to loose his head on a scaffold; and not content with this murther, extended his vengeance against the wife of the deceased by an act most unworthy. For causing a stone to be tied to her neck, she was thrown into the river; and it was a great chance he had not inflicted the like upon two other virgins, the lamentable remainders of this unfortunate marriage. But beholding them as yet so young and innocent, he thought their life could not be prejudicial to his estate, and their death might be ignominious to his reputation. Behold the reason why he contented himself to shut the one of them up in a Monastery, and retained the other, which was our Clotilda, with himself, that she might be bred in his Court.

The holy maid entereth into the Palace of her Uncle, as a sheep into a Lions den, having no reason to repose much assurance in a man, who still had the bloud of her father and mother in his hands. Notwithstanding, great is the power of virtue, when it is enchaced in beautie. For this cruel Basilisk, who had an eye of bloud and poyson, no sooner considered the praise-worthy parts of this Princess, but that feeling himself dazeled with her aspect, and his heart softened with the innocency of this poor orphan, he instantly took compassion upon her, who never inclined to it before.

He began to behold her with a pleasing countenance, to endear her, to wish and promise her much good. But the good creature, who could not think after so strange an affliction she was any more to pretend to greatness, and pleasures of the world, threw her self between the arms of the Cross, that there she might find those of God: and though in publick she stifeled the resentments of her sorrow with a discreet patience, not resisting the storm, nor striking her head against the rocks; yet in the secrecy of her retirement she daily dissolved her self into tears, and found no comfort but in the wounds of the worlds Saviour.

"My God (said she to him) I adore your holy "providence, which drencheth me with gall and "wormwood, in an age wherein maidens of my "qualitie accustom not to walk but on roses; perhaps "you know my pride hath need of such a counter-"poise, and you in all equitie have done that which "your wisdom thought good. Behold I have my eyes "still all moistened with the bloud of my father, and "the bodie of my poor mother, which being covered "with so many waves, cannot have over it one silly "tear from the eyes of her daughter, which fail not "every night to pour forth streaming rivers. My "God, Your name be blessed eternally: I require "nought else of you, but the participation of your "sufferings. It is no reason I here should live with-"out some light hurt, seeing you wounded on all sides "for my example. Some have been pleased to wish "me I should receive and take contentments in the "hope of a better fortune; where would they have "me gather those pleasures? I am yet upon the weep-"ing shores of the river of Babylon. I fix all my con-"solations and songs at the feet of your Cross; promi-"sing to desire nothing more in the world, but the "performance of your holy will.

There is I know not what kind of charm in holy sadness, which cannot be sufficiently expressed, but such it is, that a soul contristated for God, when it is fallen into abysses, wherein all the world reputes it lost, findeth in the bottom of its heart lights and sweetnesses so great, that there is not any comfort in the world to be compared with them.

Clotilda was already come to these terms: and if for obedience she had not learned to leave God for God, she had been softened with those tears by suffering her self voluntarily to slide into a lazy sorrow: but considering that whilest she was in the house of this uncle, an Arian heretick, she was bound by God to instruct with her example all those who were to be spectatours of her actions, she set her hand courageously to the work, and shewed her self so able of judgement in her carriage, and so regular in all her deportments, that her life became a picture of virtue, which spake to all the world. Although she were derived from the bloud of Kings, she shewed to have no other nobility, but that which springs from worthy Actions. As her face was free from adulterate beauty, so her soul was exempt from those affected authorities and disdains which ordinarily grow with great fortunes. Her aspects were simple and dove-like, her words discreet, her actions sober, her gestures measured, her carriage honest, her access affable, her conversation full of sweetness and profit. She was a virgin in mind and body, living in marvellous purity of affections, and amities, which she fomented by the virtue of humility, which the Ancients esteemed to be as the wall of the garden of charity: God oftentimes suffering impurity of body to chastise the rebellion of the soul. She was so humble of heart, that she accounted her self as the meanest servant of the house, not scorning at all to apply her self to inferiour offices; which she notwithstanding performed with so much majesty, that even in spinning with a distaff she seemed a Queen.

She was marvellously wise in her counsels, prompt and agil in execution, moderate in all good successes, constant in bad, ever equal to her self. She spake little, never slandered, envied none, did good to all the world, not pretending her own interests, expecting from God alone the character of her merit, and the recompence of her charities. She had no worldly thing in her person, and as little regarded her attyres, as the dust of the earth. She knew almost but one street in the City where she dwelt, which was the same that lead to the Church. Sports and feasts were punishments to her, and she was seldom found in the company of men, unless it were some beggers, whose misery she assisted, Her whole heart went towards God, her feet to the Church, her hands to alms, her eys to reading books of devotion, her arms to exercises and works of her sex; all her body to sacrifices and victims of her soul.

Observe, you young maids, who read these pages, of what wood God useth to frame Saints, and that never any happeneth to produce the miracles which Clotilda did in the conversion of a Kingdom, not acting wonders of virtue in the interiour of the soul.

The

The King her uncle was ſo raviſhed with theſe pretious parts, that the exceſs of his admiration turned into a furious jealouſy; for beholding this ſpirit more maſculine than he could have wiſhed, and fearing leaſt ſhe might be poſſeſſed by ſome other beſides himſelf, he had no purpoſe to marry her, but kept her ſo ſtraightly, that one would have ſaid to have ſeen him, he was the dragon in fables, that ever ſtood centinel near the golden apple.

But, oh ſilly humane prudence, which ſtill rowing againſt the current of the providence of God, findeſt as many precipices in paſſion as thou openeſt ſnares for innoceny! This man notwithſtanding all his endeavours, which went the contrary way, bred up in his houſe a maid, whom God had already deſtined to chaſtiſe his cruelty, and make, he unwitting thereof, his Scepter tributary to a valorous husband, who was to marry Clotilda, and joyn the Kingdom of virtues to the force of his arms.

The ſecond SECTION.

Clodovæus requireth Clotilda in marriage.

Clodovæus King of France, a man born to make it appear what valour may produce when it is ſupported by piety, dayly advanced his conqueſts among the Gauls, yet ſtill in ſo many victories remained a ſlave to Idolatry. God was willing to win him to himſelf by the ways of chaſt love, and by the means of a wife, which ſhould ſanctifie his perſon and houſe.

The fame of the beauty and virtues of Clotilda, which ſpread through neighbour Kingdoms with ſo ſweet an odour, failed not to approach him at that time, when he was upon terms to take a wife in lawful marriage. Love, which many times ſurprizeth as well by the ear, as the eye, ſo enkindled him at the report made by his Embaſſadours of the perfections of this divine maid, that he no longer retained either heart or thought, but for her. He affected what he never ſaw, with a love mixed with reverence, felt a more noble flame than he was wont, which ſcorched him with a generous paſſion, and excited him to require this Princeſs, as the type of his felicities. The difficulties propoſed upon the effecting of this marriage, augmented deſire in him. For he was of a vigorous ſpirit, who meaſured all by the greatneſs of his own courage, and reſolved to break through obſtacles, to crown his purpoſes. He addreſſed himſelf to his great favourite Arelianus, and having opened unto him the project of this marriage, would needs inſtantly diſpatch him upon a ſolemn Embaſſage to conſer with the maid, and treat with the King her uncle. This man who underſtood the ſuſpicions and apprehenſions of Gombaut, made it appear unto him, that the conqueſt of the golden fleece, and the marriage of Clotilda were almoſt one and the ſame thing; and that no acceſs could be had to this maid, without firſt ſpeaking to this bull, who threw flames and fire through his throat. Clodovæus conjureth him to uſe all poſſible induſtries to ſatisfie his paſſion, aſſuring him he could not oblige him in any matter, whereof he would be more ſenſible. Aurelianus obeyeth, and taking a ring from the Kings finger, with certain other Jewels to preſent the Lady, haſtened towards Burgundy.

I cannot here conceal, that which Baronius, the Father of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory was unwilling to omit, ſeeing it is witneſſed by good Authours, and hath nothing incredible therein, but onely with ſuch, who think it is a note of wiſdom to ſeem very incredulous.

We know by what hath been ſpoken before, that Clotilda ſeldom appeared in publick, if it were not at Church, and caſt her eyes on very few, but the poor. God made uſe of this diſpoſition for her good: for Aurelianus having learned this Lady dayly converſed willingly with needy perſons, and that it was neceſſary to ſeem of this quality to ſpeak unto her without ſuſpicion, took the habit of a beggar, and as the ſervant of Abraham, ſent by the firſt Father of believers, treated the loves of Iſaac in requiring water of Rebecca, who was to be his future ſpouſe; ſo this man managing the commiſſion of marriage, for the prime King of the faithful, reſolved to beg alms of Clotilda, to find means of acceſs to her; and for this cauſe he ſtood at the gate of a Church among a great rabble of beggers, expecting till Maſs were done, that he might ſee the Princeſs come forth. She failed not to perform acts of charity to all the poor according to her cuſtom, and perceiving this man who ſeemed of a generous aſpect in theſe miſerable rags, felt her heart ſeized with extraordinary piety, beholding one of ſo good carriage reduced to ſuch miſery; and without any further enquiry ſhe gave him a piece of gold. Aurelianus ſeeing this royal hand ſo charitably ſtretched out to ſuccour a counterfeit want, whether he were tranſported with joy, or whether he were deſirous to make himſelf obſerved by ſome act, he lifted up the ſleeves of the Princeſs, which according to the faſhion of robes than uſually worn, covered all even to her hands, and having bared her right hand, kiſſed it with much reverence. Clotilda bluſhed heartily thereat yet paſſed on further not ſhewing any reſentment, nor blaming the begger as ſome Authours adde. Well ſaith ſhe in ſecret to an old Lady, who was her confident friend, Have you obſerved what this begger did? The other replied: It was a very eaſie matter to note it, ſince this act had painted her forehead with a moſt lively ſcarlet: But yet (ſaid Clotilda to her) what think you of it? The Lady anſwered ſmiling, What can I els think, but that your rare perfections joyned to your liberality have tranſported him? For my part, I ſuppoſe (ſaid the Princeſs) he hath ſome other deſign, and if you think good we will cauſe him to come to the Palace to beg alms, and thereupon take occaſion to be informed of his perſon.

Aurelianus failed not to entertain this commandement, which was the ſcope of his deſire, and accordingly to paſs to the place aſſigned him, where Clotilda beholding him ſoundly chid him for his boldneſs, in lifting up the ſleeve of her garment and kiſſing her hand. He who was a moſt queint Courtier, found out his evaſion, and ſaid: The cuſtom of his countrey permitted to kiſs the lips of Ladies at ſalutation: but the happineſs of his condition having abaſed him ſo low, he could not aſpire to the face: Behold the cauſe why he contented himſelf with the hand, it being a thing very reaſonable to kiſs a hand, which is the ſource of ſo many charities, ſince the doors of Churches from whence we expect good, are kiſſed. Clotilda was much pleaſed with this reply, and well ſaw this man belyed his habit by his diſcourſe and garb. She therefore importuned to tell who he was, and from whence it proceeded that he was reduced to ſuch miſery as to beg his bread. Madam (ſaith Aurelianus) ſince your Greatneſs preſſeth me thus far, you ſhall know I am born of a good place, and that it, which hath brought me to this ſtate, is nothing els but the love of a Lady, whom I court, not for my ſelf, but for one of the greateſt Princes under Heaven. The maid was very curious to know who this Prince was, as alſo the Lady ſought unto with ſo much pains. Aurelianus ſeeing it was now time to ſpeak to the purpoſe, ſaid: The Lady is three steps from me, for indeed it is your self. At which she began to blush again, and to shew some disturbance of mind: but (quoth he) Madam, trouble not your self, since I am in a place where I with confidence may speak unto you, your Excellency shall know I am sent by Clodovæus King of France, my Master, who is the best Prince, and the most valiant Monarch in the whole world. The fame of your most precious and eminent qualities coming to his ear, he desireth to marry you, and hath dispatched me to give you notice thereof, and require your consent. I could have entered into the Court with some very solemn Embassage; but the difficulties the King your uncle enforceth upon you, made me resolve to take this attyre, to speak to you with the more freedom. You may well assure your self, this marriage shall make you the prime Queen of the West, and the most happy in the world; and to approve the authority of my commission, behold the ring of the King my Master, which I present unto you.

There is not any woman so holy, who is not capable of much delight upon praises afforded her, and who doth not willingly open her eyes to greatness. Clotilda was not so insensible, as not to be touched to the quick with such an Embassage, howsoever she shewed in this surprisal, she had within her a heart very faithful to God; for most freely refusing the ring, and interrupting the Embassadour: Speak no more Syr (said she) I know your Prince is a Pagan, and I a Christian: God forbid that I ever marry an Infidel, were he the Monarch of the world. Madam, replieth the Gentleman, frame to your self no difficulties upon the difference of Religions, my Prince is not so tied to his Sect, as not to forsake it for your love. But what means will there be said (Clotilda) to gain my uncle? I do not think he hath any purpose to marry me. The Embassadour answereth: If you give me your consent, we will find opportunity to bear you from hence. Not so (replyed the prudent maid) it is a course I will never admit. Ah, why Madam? saith Aurelianus: should you do it, who would condemn your discretion? Is it a sin in your Religion to flie from the den of a furious wretch, to resign your self into the hands of a King? We know how he used your father and mother, and how he also treateth you at this time.

At this word the Lady poured forth some tears, and said: Do by Embassadours all that possibly you can, and assure the King your Master, that I hold my self much honoured by the choise he maketh of me, and that he cannot be so soon for God, as I for him, at least in heart and body, when the King my uncle shall give me leave. Upon these conditions I take your ring, which I very charily will keep. All this passed very happily in a Court of the Palace, where she ordinarily spake to the poor; interrogating them of their necessities; and none perceived there was any other business but the care of the poor, her confident friend onely excepted, who had a share in the secrets of Clotilda.

The third Section.

The Embassage to the King of Burgundy for the marriage of Clotilda.

Aurelianus touched Heaven with his finger, that he had so successefully thrived in his commission; and forgot not parcel-meal to relate to the King his Master all the particulars of his voyage, entertaining him above all with a curious discourse made upon the admirable beauty and singular prudence of Clotilda. Clodovæus burnt with impatience, and would presently have taken the King of Burgundy by the beard to make him let go his hold: but wisdom adviseth him he must observe therein requisite formalities, and that it was fit to send his Embassadours to Gombaut to require of him his neece in marriage; which he speedily did, appointing thereunto his faithful Aurelianus, to whom he allotted a flourishing company of Nobility; which caused such apprehensions to arise in the mind of the Burgundian, that he slept not upon it either night or day. From whence proceedeth it, said he to himself, that Clodovæus knoweth my neece, since I have hitherto kept her so close, that she hath seen nothing, but the wals of the Church, and my Palace? Is there some eel under a rock? Would he have my estate? This French man is too harsh: I would neither have him for a son in law nor a neighbour. Besides, this maid, who hath seemed hitherto as a lamb in my house, being at my dispose, when she behold her self Queen of France, and have swords at her command, who can tell whether she will not shew me her teeth, and revenge on me the bloud of her father and mother? I must rather keep her immured within ten iron gates, that she may not escape my power. Behold a great act of State, which I must cunningly play.

This man environed with such thoughts receaved the Embassadours of France very sleightly, and having promised with all speed to give them answer, he was wary enough not to discover all the thoughts he had thereupon: but taking the most pleasing pretext, answered, that he honoured the King Clodovæus, as one of the most valiant Princes of that Age, and should ever account the service done him, as one of the greatest favours he could receive from Heaven: but as for this alliance which he sought, it was a matter he could not thinke on. First, because his neece had never raised her ambition so high, as to pretend marriage with so great a King, having nothing in her person so eminent as might deserve such a husband: and although there were some equality on this side, yet was there on the other part an essential impediment, which was diversity of Religions, it being a thing unheard of for a Christian maid to marry a Pagan, nor could he permit it without betraying the salvation of his nlece, and disgracing himself through the whole world. Aurelianus, who well knew where it itched with him, replyed in few words, That for the qualities of his neece he should not trouble himself, that the woman best beloved was ever best conditioned, that it was sufficient she pleased the King his Majesty, who was not ignorant of her perfections: and for the matter of Religion, which was the most considerable, he hoped the King would put on a resolution to become a Christian. The Burgundian replied, this affair was of such importance that he would not confide in successes upon hopes, which are always uncertain, but that he must see an expres promise from the King of France; and thereupon dismisseth the Embassadour, thinking he had sufficiently hindered the busines. But the brave Aurelianus speedily dispatched a Currier to Clodovæus, to shew unto him where the obstacle lay, and to get a promise from him to become a Christian.

The King, who was so transported with affection, that he was on tearms to refuse nothing, hastily gave the promise required of him: which being afterward presented to Gombaut by the Embassadour, it made him sweat apace; not knowing further what invention to make use off to avoid this fatal blow: notwithstanding he answered, that this marriage was of so great consequence, that it could not be decreed, but in an Assembly of his States, thinking by this trick he might dissolve the design of Clodovæus, or draw the affairs out at length with such delayes, that he should trouble all the world. But this was it which transfixed him, so far humane prudence dence is cunning to ruin it-ſelf by its proper inventions. For the moſt active French Nobility ſojourning in Burgundy in the expectation of the States, ſowed in the ſpirits of the Magiſtrates and people the great good would enſue to their Nation by this alliance, when they ſhould come to be all united together, as brothers: but if they once refuſed the requeſt of a great Prince, ſo repleniſhed with honour and courteſie, they muſt neceſſarily proceed to arms, which could not but be fatal to their Kingdom. The Burgundians, hungry after repoſe, very well taſted theſe reaſons; and the prudent Clotilda ſpared not ſilently to ſtrike her ſtroak, inſenſibly gaining the chief of the Councel to follow her inclinations. Aurelianus, who had a very ſharp and clear-ſighted ſpirit, much preſſed the States, nor could Gombaut make ſo many knots, but that he ſtil diſſolved them.

In the end he muſt come to the point. The States aſſembled, and the King came thither with a ſtudyed ſpeech, wherein he had heaped together with very great ſubtility all the reaſons which made him apprehend this alliance with the French: but God, who maketh great alterations in Kingdoms, as billows in the ſea, ſo diſpoſed the hearts of the Burgundians, that all allegations oppoſed againſt the deſign of this marriage, ſeemed but dreams and Chimæraes. One of the greateſt States-men riſing up, made a long ſpeech, and declared to the King, That the repoſe of his Kingdom, at which he aimed in all his diſcourſe, conſiſted in this alliance: That marriages had in all times been rather the knots of peace, than incentives of war: that the comfort which might grow from ſuch an action, would deſtroy all the acerbities and diviſions of factious ſpirits: that the greateſt troubles of Kingdoms had been often pacified by good alliances: that the French were become ſo powerful it was not fit to deny them any thing: that the requeſt of Clodovæus was ſo fair, it could not be rejected without a notable act of incivility: That there was not any beaſt more cruel in the world, than love changed into hatred, and that it was to be feared leaſt intreaties of a lover might end in the fury of a conquerour: That the offer he made to become a Chriſtian would for ever be glorious to their Nation, for furthering ſuch a piety: That Clotilda had naturally affection for her Countrey, and wit enough to gain her husband, and wholly tranſport him to the love of her Nation: That the people were tyred with ſo many wars, which would infallibly grow much more bloudy than ever, if they ſlighted the faithful love of ſo great a Monarch.

This man connected ſo many reaſons one upon another, that he prevailed, and almoſt all came to this concluſion, that they muſt with all ſpeed ſend the Princeſs to the King of France, who required her. The miſerable Gombaut finding himſelf ruined on all ſides, ſaid he would uſe no obſtacle; but did think it fit to obſerve the deportments of his niece; for ſhe had vowed her ſelf to God, and to enter into Religion. The Embaſſadour underſtanding this laſt evaſion, extreamly laughed from the botom of his heart, and ſaid, if the Princeſs were that way diſpoſed, the King his Maſter would not be ſo earneſt in her purſuit, as to cauſe her to break her vow. But that it was fit ſhe ſhould be heard, which was done: and ſhe being asked thereof, anſwered, that her devotion had never hitherto tranſported her ſo far, as to make any vow of virginity: and although ſhe were infinitely pleaſed with the ſweet retirement ſhe enjoyed in the Court of her uncle, notwithſtanding if it were his good pleaſure to marry her to the King of France on this condition that he became a Chriſtian, ſhe would not be ſo indiſcreet as to hinder it: Upon this anſwer of the Princeſs the Deputies of both Nations there preſent gave a loud applauſe, and cried out the marriage was concluded. The King himſelf diſſembling his paſſion forced a ſmile, and well ſaw it was high time to forgo what he could hold no longer. He diſpoſed of her train very poorly, as a man naturally covetous, ſaying, His neece was too fair for him to give her ſo many rich attyres: That the roſe was ſufficiently beautified with its leaves, and the ſun with his rays; and that all humane arts arrived not to the perfections of nature. Aurelianus did not with much earneſtneſs inſiſt hereupon, ſo much he feared leaſt the diſpoſition of this man might change, and he invent ſome new tricks to hinder their departure. But he reſolved inſtantly to carry this Princeſs away. The uncle ſeeing her upon her journey, began much to flatter her, which he had never done before, ſaying:

Go too neece, I well perceive, that notwithſtanding your devotions, you are of the humour of other women, and affect glory. You are weary to abide with an uncle, you will have a husband, and needs muſt he be a King. Proceed. I ſhall not be againſt it, let every one ſettle their affections where they may expect their felicity. Good daughter, you ſee how much I endeavour to content you, and how it being in my power to hinder this marriage, which I thought to be little advantagious to my Realm, yet have I been willing to cauſe it to be confirmed in a general aſſembly of my States, to render your deſires the more aſſured. This affection, which I at this preſent witneſs, ſufficiently declareth, that I for a long ſpace have entertained moſt ſincere and hearty affections for the good of your houſe. For that which paſſed concerning your father and mother, troubled no man ſo much as my ſelf, God is my record thereof. But, dear daughter, there was a neceſſity in it. I muſt obey the adviſe of my Councel; ſuch are the priviledges of Empires: I could not otherwiſe ſave the repoſe of my people, and ſecure the lives of my ſubjects. Whenſoever I ſhall fall into the like crime, I wiſh to be uſed in the ſame manner. Behold the true cauſe, moſt dear daughter, if there yet remain in you any reſentment concerning this death, I ſuppoſe you are wiſe enough to do that herein, which the law of God ordaineth, which is to forget what is paſt, and not to be ungrateful for the preſent. If I have hitherto detained you in my Palace very retiredly, it hath been to pleaſe your humour, which I ſaw had ſincere inclinations to devotion; and to breed you as a child of honour, which is the portion you are to carry preſently with you to your husband. My wel-beloved daughter, endeavour to love your Countrey, and to hold good correſpondence with us. You ſubmitted to my humours whilſt you lived with me, you now muſt undergo thoſe of a husband, and in complying with them ſhall be moſt potent. Forget not the fear of God, which ever hath been a faithful companion to you from your moſt tender years; and let us often hear good news from you.

In ſaying this he kiſſed her, and the virgin moſt humbly thanking him for ſo many remonſtrances of affection, with promiſe to honour him all the days of her life, began to weep: which a Burgundian Gentleman perceiving, who was of her train, ſaid, that ſo long as he lived he would never confide in the tears of woman: For were there a creature in the world which might make bone-fires of joy in her heart, it was his Miſtreſs, who on this day was delivered from the Lions throat, to become the wife of a great King, and Queen of a vaſt Empire.

The

The fourth SECTION.

The arrival of Clotilda into France, and the life which she led in the time of her wedlock.

NEver ship laden with gold so gladly arrived at the Haven, after so many tedious tempests, and a thousand disasters among Pirates at sea, as Clotilda seemed content to behold her self to tread on the ground, where she was to command, after so long a servitude suffered in a Palace, which had all her life time as it were served her for a prison.

Clodoveus expected her as soissons, with so great impatience of love, that he would have willingly hastened the course of the sun, to measure it by his affections. When he saw this most beautifull Princess, he found she surpassed all the idæaes he conceived of her, and that her presence far prevailed above her fame. He then imbraced her most lovingly, nor could be satisfied with beholding her. For God, who was pleased to make use of this maid for the conversion of a great King, had (as it is said) varnished over the Table of this mortal beauty, and imprinted with his finger, I do not know what kind of graces and attractives, which Clodoveus never had felt before. She as an humble Abigail cast her self at the feet of a husband, calling him her Lord and King, and protesting she entered into his Palace to live there as his most humble hand-maid. The Court stood wholy rapt with admiration to behold the worthy qualities of this Princess, and took part in the contentment of their King. The people ran by heaps on all sides to see her, and so many poor Catholicks, as were then in France, looked on her as the dawning of the day, which came to charm their cares, wipe away their tears, break their fetters, & guild the times with the luster of her Majesty. There was nothing to be seen every where, but jousts, tournaments, sports, feasts, largesses to crown the solemnitie of these great nuptials. Notwithstanding, the good Queen suffered not her self to be transported with the current of her prosperities; but that in the midst of pomps she held her eyes firmly fixed upon the many benefits she had received from God, and sought out in mind the waies she should take to testifie her gratitude, and pour her self as incense upon coals towards the divine Majesty. She had one thorn in her heart, which then entered very far therein. It was, that she saw the King spake not at all of the promise he had made to become a Christian, and that she having attempted to put him on this discourse, he subtilly declined it. She knew not in what manner to speak to him of it, nor where she might make enterance into his heart.

In the end she resolved to say unto him: Sir, I see your Majestie exerciseth at this time your liberalities towards all the world, and I would gladly partake therein, and receive a favour.

The King thinkiug she would beg a gift for a Favourite, or some other person: Ask (saith he) confidently; for you must not be denied. Thereupon she replied: If your Majestie bear so sincere an affection to me, as you make shew, I most humbly intreat, that on the first night of my nuptials, I enter not into the bed of a Pagan.

Clodoveus answered: Madam, I understand what you would say, It shall be done, but it is not yet time; suffer the fruit leisurably to ripen, and then either you shall gather it, or it will fall of it self. Alas, would you now speak to me of Baptism, and all your ceremonies? Your attractives are not so faint, as to permit me to entertain any other thoughts, than of you: all my devotion should be but of love, and my pietie should have nothing but shews; but this is not it, you desire of me. Give me time to look about me, and I will advise on the means, which I will use for the accomplishment of my promise. As for the rest, you ought not to have any scruple to lye with a Pagan husband; for your law saith, as I understand, that the unbelieving husband is sanctified by a believing wife.

The Queen doubted whether that she should intreat him to defer the nuptials at the least for some time; and deny him all conjugal company till the accomplishment of his promise; but she considered that her conscience was not interessed therein, and the law of God commanded her not to separate her self from her Pagan husband: that if she used so much cunning, it would cause of two things one, which were either to exasperate and put him off for ever from Christianity, or make him to undertake a dissembled piety, which would still be said to have been besieged with importunities and allurements, and consequently, would never be constant. She resolved to render him all the duties of marriage, and to gain him rather by the example of a good life, and her humble prayers presented on Altars, than by any other way.

Clodoveus very well liked her humour in this proceeding, and well saw she was wise; which gave him occasion to honour her much the more. He was about the age of thirty years, when he married Clotilda, and as a Pagan bred up in the liberty of arms, he had not spared to use many love-dalliances; but the affection she bare to this good Queen was so great, that it razed out of his heart all other love, as the ray of the sun scattereth the shadows and phantasms of the night. The holy Lady perceiving the spirit of her husband already moved in hers, and that there was no need of power, but example, so composed her manners in her marriage, that she made her self a perfect model of perfections, requisite for this estate.

Royal Crowns loose their lustre on heads without brains, and brows without Majesty. But this Lady made it presently appear, that although her birth had not made her worthy of a Crown, nor her good fortune had afforded it, her merit alone had been of power to make her wear the best diadem in the world. She practised in the Court of a Pagan King, a strong & vigorous devotion, which was not puffed up with outward shews and vapours, but wholy replenished with wisdom. For she had a fear of God so chast, that she apprehended the least shadows of sin as death; a love so tender, that her heart was as a flaming lamp, which perpetually burned before the Sanctuary of the living God. Her faith had a bosom as large, as that of Eternity; her hope was a bow in Heaven, all furnished with emeralds, which never lost its force, and her piety an eternal source of blessings.

She had made a little Oratory, as Judith, in the royal Palace, where she attended as much as time would permit to prayers and mortifications of flesh: abiding therein as in a fortunate Island, which made the sweetness of her immortal perfumes to mount up to heaven. Yet did she mannage all her actions with singular discretion, that she might not seem too austere in the eyes of her Court, for fear weak souls might be diverted from Christianity, by observing in her carriage perfections transcendent above ordinary capacities. But all that which most passed in a common life, was done by her, and her maids, with much purity, fervour, majesty, and constancy. It was an Angelical spectacle to see her present at Mass, and dispose her self to receive the blessed Sacrament, which she very often frequented, to draw grace, and strength from its source. She honoured Priests, as Messengers descended from Heaven, as well to discharge her conscience, as to hold her Religion in much estimation among among Pagans. The zeal of the houſes of God, which are Churches, enflamed her with ſo much fervour, that ſhe had no delights more precious, than either to cauſe new to be railed, or to adorn thoſe which had been erected, ſo far as to make them receive radiance from the works of her royal hands. Her charity towards the poor was a ſea, which never dryed up, and her heart ſo large, that all the hearts of the miſerable breathed in hers. She compoſed and decked herſelf dayly before the eyes of God, putting on all virtues, as it were by nature, and rich attire of Ladyes, for neceſſity. But the King her husband ſhe honoured, as if ſhe had ſeen the Saviour of the world walking upon the earth: and not staying alone on the body, ſhe penetrated even to the center of this infidel ſoul, which ſhe beheld with eyes of unſpeakable compaſſion. She moſt particularly endeavoured to obſerve all his humours, and follow the motions of his heart, as certain flowers wait on the ſun. All that which Clodoveus affected, took preſently an honourable place in the ſoul of Clotilda, if he delighted in arms, in dogs, in horſes, ſhe for his ſake prayſed arms, dogs, and horſes, regarding even the objects of the honeſt pleaſures of her husband, as her beſt entertainments. Her converſation was full of charms and attractives, which ever carryed profit along with them: Sometimes ſhe ſweetened the warlick humours of her husband with harmony of reaſon, ſometimes ſhe comforted him upon occaſion of troubles, which might happen in the world: ſometime ſhe withheld very ſoberly, and with prudent modeſty his ſpirit, which took too much liberty; ſometime ſhe repeated unto him certain precepts of wiſdom, and practices of the lives of Saints, and worthy perſonages, that he might love our Religion; ſometime ſhe pleaſed him with an eloquent tongue, and an entertainment ſo delicate, that nothing might be ſaid more accompliſhed. She was magnificent and liberal towards her houſehold ſervants, moſt exactly taking notice of the faithful ſervices they yielded to her husband, and kept her houſe ſo well united within the bands of concord and charity, that it ſeemed as it were a little Temple of peace. Slander, uncleaneſs, idleneſs, impudence, were from thence eternally baniſhed: virtues, induſtry, and arts, found there a manſion, and the miſeries of the world a ſafe Sanctuary: For ſhe embraced all pious affairs of the Realm, and governed them with ſo much equality of ſpirit, that ſhe reſembled Angels, who move the Heavens, not uſing in themſelves the leaſt agitation. May we not very well ſay, this divine woman was ſelected out by God to a ſet golden face on an entire Monarchy, by the rays of her piety?

The fifth SECTION.

The prudence which the Queen uſed in the converſion of her husband.

THE holy Queen brought forth a King and a great Monarch to Jeſus Chriſt, bearing perpetually his Court, and the whole Kingdom in the entrails of her charity. She had her Centinels day and night before the Altars, who ceaſed not to implore the aſſiſtance for Heaven of the ſalvation of her husband, and ſhe her ſelf often in deep ſilence of darkneſs cauſed her weeping eye to ſpeak to God, and adreſſed many vows to all the elect for the converſion of this unbelieving ſoul. She very well conſidered, that that which oftentimes ſlackeneth theſe wavering ſpirits in their endeavour to find the way of eternal life, is certain intereſts of fleſh, and bloud, certain impediments of temporal affairs, ſome inordinate paſſion, which tortureth and tyrannizeth over the mind. Behold the cauſe why ſhe took great care to ſweeten the diſpoſitions of her husband, calm his paſſions, and through a certain moral goodneſs facilitate unto him the way of the myſteries of our faith. This being done, ſhe took her opportunity with the more effect, and found the King dayly diſpoſed better and better for theſe impreſſions.

He alreadie had the arrow very deep in his heart, and began to ask queſtions, propoſing conditions, which ſhewed he would one day render himſelf. He ſaid to Clotilda: Madam, I ſhould not be ſo far alienated from your Religion, were it not that I ſaw therein matters very ſtrange, which you would have me believe by power and authority, not giving any other reaſon thereof. You would have me believe, that three are but one in your Trinity, that I adore a Crucified man, and that I crucifie my ſelf in an enforced and ceremonious life, wherein I was never bred. My deareſt, had I your good inclinations, all would be eaſie to me: but you know, that all my life time I have been trayned up in arms. If I ſhould to morrow receive your Baptiſm, which blotteth out all ſins (according to your maxims) I were no ſooner waſhed, but I ſhould fear to plunge my ſelf again into an infinity of occaſions, which might dayly preſent themſelves to my underſtanding. Then would you threaten me with the judgement-day, and Hell, with terrours, able to overwhelm my mind. Conſider whether it would not be more to the purpoſe, to let me perſevere in my Sect, therein performing all the good I may: Can you think, that for all this I ſhould be excluded from the mercy of God, who will ſave all men?

The wiſe Clotilda replyed thereunto: Sir, I beſeech your Majeſty not to flatter your ſelf with this ſpecious title of mercy, for there will be none in the other world for thoſe, who have performed it in this without profit. Now is the time, that God ſpareth not to ſtretch out his arms for your obedience; if you deſpiſe him, you will looſe him without recovery. One can never do too much for eternall life; and whatſoever we ſuffer, Paradiſe may ſtill be purchaſed at a good penny-worth. Alas, Sir, why do you find ſo many difficulties in our Religion? Think you God doth wrong in deſiring to make you believe things which you cannot conceive by humane reaſon? It is he, who hath made the ſoul of man, and who accommodateth all the wheels thereof, nor is there any one of them which moveth not at his pleaſure. What marvel is it, if man offer the homage of his underſtanding to God? If weakneſs ſubmit to ſtrength, littleneſs to greatneſs, the finite to the infinite, that which is nothing, to him who is an abyſs of eſſence, goodneſs, wiſedom, and light?

If you make a promiſe to any of your ſervants, although it be unreaſonable, and almoſt incredible, yet would you have him to believe it without reply, and that he take no other ground for this belief, but the greatneſs and infallible word of your Majeſty. One man exacteth faith of another, though both of them are but earth and duſt: and you think the Sovereign Creatour of Heaven and earth is unjuſt, to make us believe that, which our bruitiſh ſenſes cannot comprehend: Is this the ſubmiſſion and obedience we ow Eternal Truth? Why ſhould not I believe, that three are but one, that is to ſay, three perſons, one onely God, ſince I dayly find my memory, underſtanding, and will, make but one ſoul? Wherefore ſhould we ſcorn to adore a Crucified man? The Croſs is ſo far from weakening my belief, that there is not any thing which more confirmeth it. For if the Saviour of the world had come, as your Majeſty, to the conqueſt of the univerſe with legions, horſes, treaſures, and arms, he ſhould in my opinion retain that eſteem, which great Captains hold: but when I conſider that by the puniſhment of the Croſs, he hath reduced the whole world under his laws, and planted the inſtrument of his exceſſive dolours even on the top of Capitols, and the heads of Monarchs, I affirm, that all is of God in such an affair, since there is nothing in it of man. Alas, Sir, if you have a faithful servant, who would suffer himself to be tormented and crucified, to make you Master of a rebellious Fort, would not you find more glory in his loyalty, than ignominy in his torments? And think you if the Eternal Wisdom having taken a humane body, and voluntarily exposed it to extream rigour to wash our offences in his bloud, and subdue the pride and curiosities of the earth to the power of Heaven, it hath done ought therein reprehensible? Have we not much more cause to adore the infinite plenty of his charities, than to dispute upon honours, which onely consist in the opinion of the world? I beseech your Majesty, figure not to your self our Religion, as an irksome and austere Law: when you have submitted to the yoak, God will afford you so much grace, that all these difficulties which you apprehend, will no more burden you, than feathers do birds. And although it should happen you after Baptism fall into some sin, which God by his grace will divert, the bloud of Jesus Christ is a fountain, which perpetually distilleth in the Sacraments of the Church to wash away all our iniquities. Sir, I fear least you too long defer to resign your self to the many advertisements which you have received from Heaven: If you weigh the favours that God hath done to your Majesty, having set a Crown on your head at the age of fifteen years, having preserved you against so many factions, defended you from so many perils, adorned you with so much glory, honoured you with so many prosperours successes, you shall find, he hath reason to require at this time from you, what he demandeth of you by my mouth. What know you, whether he have chosen out your person to make you a pattern to all other Kings, and constitute you such in France, as Constantine hath been in the Roman Empire, which will render you glorious in the memory of men, and happy in Heaven to all eternity? Verily, Sir, if you yield not your self up to my words, you ought to submit to the bloud of so many worthy Martyrs, who have already professed this faith in your Kingdom: you ought to submit to so many great Confessours, as knowing as Oracles, of as good life as Angels, who denounce truth unto you. You ought to submit to miracles, that are every day visibly done at the Sepulcher of great S. Martin, which is an incomparable treasure in your Kingdom.

heads

Sweet-heart (answereth the King) say no more, you are too learned for me, and I fear least you should perswade me to that, which I have no desire to believe; and although you had convinced my soul to dispose it to this belief, think you it would be lawful for me so soon to make profession of your faith? You see I am King of an infinite people, and have ever at my commands a great Nobility, who acknowledge no other Gods but those of the Country. Do you believe that all spirits are so easy to be curbed, and that when I shall go about to take a strange God, will it not make them murmur, and perhaps forge pretexts to embroil something in my Kingdom? For Religion and the State are two pieces, which mutually touch one another very near; one cannot almost stir the one without the other: the surest way is not to fall upon it, and to let the world pass along as our predecessours found it.

Clotilda well saw this apprehension was one of the maineſt obstacles of his salvation, and she already had given good remedy thereunto, practising the dispositions of all the greatest of the Court. Behold the cause why she most stoutly replyed thereunto:

Sir, it is to apprehend fantasies, to form to your self such imaginations? You are a Prince too absolute, and too well beloved to fear these commotions, but rather much otherwise, I assure you upon mine honour, your people are already much disposed to receive our Religion; and your Nobility, which hath sufficiently understood the vanity to Idols, expecteth nought else but your example to embrace Christianity: Nay, if need were to penetrate rocks, and cut through mountains to gain success for such an enterprize, your travells would therein be very well employed, nor is it fit you fear to loose earth to purchase Heaven. But all the facility is in your own hands, the grape, which you said was not yet ripe almost five years since, is now mature and it is necessary you gather it.

These words oftentimes presented upon occasions, had quickly a marvellous power over the mind of Clodoveus, and the iron began in good earnest to wax soft in the fire. For he honoured Churches, and used Ecclesiasticks with a quite other respect than he accustomed, whereof he gave a most evident testimony in the business which passed with S. Remigius.

The History saith, the souldiers of Clodoveus forraging the Countrey in their liberty of arms, had pillaged in the Church of Rhemes a goody and large vessel of silver to pour water into; at which the good Bishop being somewhat troubled, for the reverence he bare to all that which appertained to his Ministery, he sent his Commissaries to the King to make Complaint thereof, which was not lost. For Clodoveus commanded them to come to Soisson, where division should be made of the booty had been taken from all parts, which was done; and they coming to unfardle all these pilferies, the King, being there present in person, found the vessels, which he presently commanded to be restored to the Commissaries of the Church: but a souldier becoming obstinate thereupon, and much displeased that so goodly a piece should escape his hand, gave a blow with a halbard upon it to cleave it asunder; which Clodoveus for that time dissembled, fearing to proceed to a reasonable chastisement with any passion: but afterward seeing this fellow much out of order, How? saith he, is there none but you that grow mutinous, and yet are the worst armed of all the troups? And saying so, he took the halbard out of his hand, and threw it to the ground; the other stooping to take it up again, felt a furious blow from the hand of the King, which bereaved him of life, in punishment of his temerity.

The Queen understanding this news, held it a good pretage of his conversion, and that which much more confirmed her in this hope was, that being delivered of a goodly son, she obtained leave of the King it might be Christened; which she speedily did: but the infant stayed not long after his baptism, to forsake an earthly Crown, to take in Heaven a diadem of eternall glory.

Yet Clodoveus found some slackness in his good purposes, and chid the Queen, as being too vehement to dispose all the world to her own Religion, saying, this Baptism might very well have procured hurt to the health of the child; but she replyed, that life and death were in the hands of God; that this child was not so much to be lamented for having so suddenly changed from the life of a fly, to that of Angels, but that the Saviour of the world, who holdeth in his hand the keys of fruitfulness could bless their royal bed with a fair issue, when he thought good; and that we should not be amazed at the death of so frail a creature, nor attribute the cause thereof to Baptism, which operateth nothing but good. She knew so well how to excuse her act, that being the second time delivered of a male child, Baptism was as well conferred on this as the former; after which it deceased; whereat the King offended more than ever, blamed her very sharply, saying, that he from this time forward well saw these waters of Baptism were fatall to the death of his children, and that she should take heed how at any time to open her mouth to obtain of him such like liberty.

She endowed with a constant heart, and having taken very deep roots in faith, made an answer worthy of her piety, saying to her husband: Ah, how Sir? What if God hath thought me unworthy ever again to have any issue by my child-beds, were it not reason I adore his holy Providence; and kiss the rods of his justice? I humbly beseech your Majestie not to cast upon the baptism of Christians that, which you should rather attribute to my sins.

his

The King all enraged with choller, was so edified with this word, that from this time forward he retained it in memory with much admiration, not being able to wonder enough at the great courage and modesty of his wife.

The sixth SECTION.

The Conversion of Clodovæus.

IT is to sail without stars, and to labour without the Sun (saith Origen) to think of coming to God without a particular grace of God. After so many humane speeches redoubled one upon another, the Holy Ghost, worker of all Conversions, spake with a voice of thunder to the heart of Clodovæus in the middest of battels, and caused him to settle upon this resolution, which he had pondered the space of many years.

The occasion was, that the Suevi, a people of Germanie, passed the Rhein with great forces, commanded by many Kings, who were personally in the army, and came to rush on the Gauls, with intention to destroy the beginnings of the French Monarchy. Clodovæus, having received newes of this preparation, speedily opposeth them with good troups: for he likewise had drawn together to his aid the Ribarols, people near bordering on the Rhein, who were allied to the French, and had first of all given notice of the enterprize of the Suevi, who in a near degree threatened them.

The encounter of the two armies was at Tolbiac near Cullen, which verily was one of the most desperate, that is found in Histories. The King undertook the conduct of the Cavalry, and had given to Prince Sigebert his kinsman, the Infantery. All of them were extreamly inflamed to shew themselves valiant in this conflict. Clodovæus, who proceeded to lay the foundations of a great Monarchy, wherein he would have no companion, thought he must either triumph or be lost. His allies, who were interessed very far in this war, failed him not in any kind. The Almans on the other side had an extream desire to extend their conquests, and thought their fortune depended on the success of this battel. There was nothing but fire, tempests, deaths, & slaughters, so great was the resistance on either side. In the end, Sigebert valiantly fighting, was wounded with an arrow, and born all bloudy out of the battel by his son. The Infantery, through the absence of their Colonel, was defeated and put to rout. All the burden of the battel fell upon the Cavalrie, which did marvellous exploits, fighting before the eyes of their King: but in the end, the shock of enemies was so impetuous, that it brake through, and scattered them. Clodovæus bare himself like a Lion covered with bloud and dust, among the ranks of those affrighted men, cried out with a loud and shrill voice, to rally their troups, he in the mean time fighting in his own person, and withal performing the duty both of a great Captain, and valiant souldier. But notwithstanding all his endeavours, terrour had so seized on these flying men, that the affair grew desperate.

And as remedies are sought from Heaven when those of the earth are of no effect, Aurelianus the great favourite of the King approching near to his Master, perswadeth him to make a vow unto God, to fulfil the promise he had made to the Queen his wife, which was, to be baptized, if he returned victorious from this battel: which he did, calling aloud upon the God of his wife, and promising an absolute conversion to the Catholick faith.

The word was no sooner spoken, but that his troups rallied themselves up, made head against their enemies, pursued them, ran through, and routed them with so great a massacre, that the fields were all covered with dead bodies. The discomfiture so terrified them on the other side of the Rhein, that the Almans which survived, fearing least the King puffed up with his victories, might pass the river, dispatched a speedy Embassadour unto him, to yield themselves tributaries to his Majesty.

Clotilda hearing the news of this battel, and of the holy resolution of her husband, was transported with so great joy, that she went out to meet him as far as Champaigne, accompanied with the great Archbishop S. Remigius, a man whom God was pleased to make use of to crown this great work of the salvation of Clodovæus. For besides his admirable sanctity, acknowledged throughout all France, he had the reputation to be one of the most able and eloquent men of his time; witness Sidonius Apollinaris, who speaketh of his eloquence with admiration, saying, He thought there was not a man living upon the face of the earth, whom S. Remigius surpasseth not, without any elaborate study at all, through the experience he had acquired of well speaking. His conceptions were inimitable, his language so sweet and polite, that it resembled a piece of ice very smooth, wherein nothing might be seen unequal. His sentences were full of weight, his arguments of force, and his words glided along like a river, and ever bare in them some flashes of lightening at the end of his periods. Sidon. Apollinar. ep. 7. c. 9 Flumen in verbis, lumen in clausulis.

So soon as the King, who was still replenished with sweet ideaes of his victory, saw the Queen his wife, It is now Madame (saith he) that you have gained: Clodovæus triumpheth over the Almans, and you triumph over Clodovæus. The dead is done, my Baptism must no longer be deferred. The Queen infinitely comforted with this word, answereth: Sir, To the great God of Hosts is due the glorie of these two triumphs; and your Majestie doth most wisely to render him with the first opportunitie what you have vowed. That man giveth doubly, who affordeth readily. Behold one of the greatest Prelats of your Kingdom, whom I have brought along to serve your Majestie in an affair of such importance.

Thereupon Saint Remigius was presented, whom the King most honourably entertained, and signified he much desired to be rectified by his good instructions: whereat the holy man exceedingly rejoycing for the good which he hoped to derive from thence, made him on the day assigned a Sermon of the knowledge of God, and of the glory of Christianity, against the vanity of Idols, so ravishing, that it transported the King, and all his Court, who ceased not afterward to confine himself to the lips of Saint Remigius, as to a stream of living waters. It is true that S. Vedastus, who was afterward Bishop of Arras, had already begun to catechize Clodovæus: but as these holy men pretended nothing but the interests of God, not having regard to any thing which touched their own persons, he most willingly gave way to the dignity of an Arch-bishop, and to the great ability of a man accounted as an Oracle, contenting himself to assist S. Remigius, and to contribute in this action all which his ministery and service might afford. Anno Christi 499. Clodovei 15.

This King going to Rhemes disposed himself religiously to receive Baptism under the direction of this Prelate, daily hearkening with singular attention unto the instructions of faith, and informing himself with much judgement in all that, which was necessary for his salvation. It is written among other things, that when S. Remigius came to explicate the mystery of the passion unto him, he was much moved thereat: so that transported with a generous Chronicon manuscriptum.

impatience, he put his hand to his ſword, and ſpake aloud in anger, That had he with his French been preſent in the place where this act was committed againſt his Maſter, he would have revenged it, with the utmoſt ability of his forces. The holy Prelate ſweetened his warlike humours, and made him capable of every myſtery, uſing therein much endeavour and great perſpicuity of diſcourſe. After theſe inſtructions, they proceeded to Confeſſion, and ordinary penances, wherein the King ſhewed ſo much devotion, that laying aſide the purple robe and Crown, he covered himſelf with aſhes, imploring the mercy of God in his moſt fervent prayers.

When the day of Baptiſm came, which was the Eve of Eaſter, Saint Remigius cauſed the Church of Rhemes to be excellently adorned, as the cuſtom of thoſe times would permit, commanding it to be hanged with the richeſt pieces of tapeſtry he could find, to be perfumed with ſweet odours, and lightened with a great quantity of wax lights, compoſed of certain perfumes, which rendered a delicate ſplendour, in ſuch manner, that Saint Gregorie of Tours ſaith, this place reſembled a little terreſtrial Paradiſe.

Some while before the Baptiſm, the King and Queen ſitting with S. Remigius, in the Oratory of S. Peter, attended by few perſons of note, behold there came on a ſudden a moſt reſplendent light, which appeared unto the eyes of all the world, with rays ſo ſparkling, that ſcarcely it might be endured; and at the ſame inſtant was heard from Heaven a voice, which ſaid, Peace be with you, fear nothing, perſevere in my love. This was the time when the new Conſtantine ſet forward towards holy Baptiſm; where being arrived in the preſence of all the world, S. Remigius ſpake to him theſe words: Mitis depone colla Sicamber; Adora quod incendiſti, incende quod adorâſti. Bow thy neck (O French man) under the yoke of God; Adore that which you have burned, and burn what you adored.

Omnipotentem Deum in Trinitate confeſſus. Gregor. Turon.

Thereupon pronouncing his profeſſion of faith, and eſpecially that which concerned the myſtery of the holy Trinitie, he was baptized, In the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt.

The hand of God, that is not ſhortened, and which being the Work-maſter of nature, operateth when it pleaſeth him above nature, uſeth to honour with ſome great miracles, the foundations of Religion in certain places, where it is planted. Here he was pleaſed to conſecrate the Kings of France, and the whole Realm to his Majeſty, to derive from hence an infinite number of ſervices: and as thoſe great Kings are the firſt of the Church, and the moſt perfect images of the Divinitie among all Monarchs, eſpecially when they declare themſelves imitatours of the piety of Clodovæus, ſo God was willing to renew at their conſecration, the wonders he did at the Baptiſm of his Son, to the end the workmanſhip might have conformity with its model: for he cauſed a dove viſibly to appear, which bare in her beak the holy Viol, filled with the unction wherewith Clodovæus and his ſucceſſours were afterward anointed.

In baptiſmate ejus Angelus ampullam ſacri Chriſmatis detulit. Vide Morum. de ſacris unctionibus l. 2. c. 7. Clemens quartus, alias Guido, ſcripſit in Jus civile.

It is a thing ſo authentical, that it is rather to be reverenced than diſputed; the memory thereof is ſtill preſerved in the Epitaph, ſet over the aſhes of Clodovæus in the Church of S. Genevefue of Paris, which ſaith, this dove was an Angel; in S. Thomas in the ſecond book of the inſtitution of Princes, in Clement the fourth in his queſtions and ſo many other Authours, that it were to do a thing already done, to diſtend my ſelf any further upon this ſubject.

Ita Savarus in Tractatu de ſanctitate Regis Ludovici 9.

Others have added, That the flower-de-luces were brought at the ſame time by the help of an Angel, to be ſet in the arms and Scutcheons of the Kings of France: but that is not well proved. I ſhould rather believe, that the lilies were the Symbole of the Gauls, as the balm of Judea, long time before Clodovæus: For there are yet certain medals found ſtamped in the time of the Emperour Adrian, who was little above one hundred years after our Saviour Chriſt, whereon the figure of a Gaul was to be ſeen, formed as an honourable Ladie, which ſeemed to hold in her hand a flower-de-luce, offering it to the Emperour, and yielding thanks for its preſervation by this title, engraven on the ſame coyn, RESTITUTORI GALLIÆ. I cannot likewiſe underſtand, who is that Cilurus cited by Monſieur Capet, in his pleadings of Rights and Liberties, that maketh mention of a rod ſprinkled with flower-deluces, which then appeared in Heaven, to witneſs the Kings of France ſhould be the true defendours of the Catholick Church.

We have no want of true miracles, nor need we go about to entertain ill grounded fantaſies: they who deſire to eſtabliſh falſe things, gain nought elſe upon the credulity of humane ſpirits, but to make truth to be doubted.

That which I find in this Baptiſm moſt probable, is, that Clodovæus was baptized with his children, his ſiſters, and more than three thouſand Cavaliers, Captains, ſouldiers, and other Courtiers, not numbering women, and little children; and which is more, the King made an Edict ſo favourable for Chriſtian Religion, that being publiſhed, it converted to the faith almoſt all the reſt of the French Nation, in ſuch ſort, that every where there was nothing to be ſeen, but burning of Idols, and erecting of Altars.

The admirable Clotilda, who had ſo long time ſighed after this moſt happy day, being wholly abſorpt in reverence and thankſgiving rendered to God, beheld her ſelf crowned with ſo many thouſands of children: and if thoſe women of the old Teſtament for a ſlender carnal race, ſung Canticles of triumph, what might this Ladie both ſay and do, who, after her coming into France, ſaw the face of a Monarchy abſolutely changed, the Kingdom of God eſtabliſhed, and ſo many ſouls arranged under the banner of our Saviour, who was pleaſed ſo powerfully to make uſe herein of her prayers and induſtrie?

The ſeventh SECTION.

What Clodovæus did by the perſwaſion of Clotilda after his Baptiſm.

THe holy woman daily building upon her foundations, ceaſed not to diſpoſe her huſband to all the holy and glorious actions, which ſhe could think on, that he might in ſome ſort anſwer the favours he had received from the Divine Majeſty. She cauſed him to bend his affections to the embelliſhing and enriching of Churches; which he did, beginning with that of Rhemes, with ſo much magnificence, that S. Remigius, who was of a noble and generous courage, had much ado with himſelf to take all which the King was willing to give: humbly beſeeching his Majeſty he would apply his liberalities to other places that had more need thereof.

Thereupon he diſpoſed himſelf to build the Church of the Apoſtles S. Peter and S. Paul, whom he honoured as the Fathers of Chriſtianity. It is now dedicated to S. Genovefue of Paris; which the King and Queen afterward choſe out for the place of their ſepulchers.

One cannot too much glorifie this holy place, which hath been as the cradle of the piety of Clodovæus; and it is a moſt manifeſt bleſſing from Heaven, that it fell into the hands of that ſage and religious Prelate, the Lord Cardinal of Rochefaucault, who by his zeal (a moſt powerfull alchymie) daily changeth

the

the bricks and morter into marbles and gold: and not content with dead ſtones, hath aſſembled the living in ſo many good Religious men, there eternally to praiſe the greatneſs of God; and of this heavenly Virgin, Patroneſs of the place. He could not better ſerve our great King, than by ſo precioully honouring the aſhes of the firſt moſt Chriſtian Prince, and of his holy ſpouſe Clotilda, to tie their protection to his ſtandards.

In the third place, the bleſſed woman very deeply impreſſed in the ſoul of her husband, the devotion of S. Martin, in ſuch ſort, that in all his moſt thorny affairs he had a ſingular recourſe to this great Apoſtle of France, making there many vows, and ſometimes praying proſtrate at his tomb, with the fervour of an incredible piety.

From whence alſo proceeded, that not ſatisfying himſelf with giving large donatives to his Church, he treated the whole Dioceſs with marvellous reverence; forbidding his troups when they marched upon any exploit, to take ought elſe in thoſe precincts, but ſalt and herbs. Which was ſo ſtreightly obſerved, that he cauſed a ſouldier to paſs through the pikes, who had taken hay from a Countrey-man, ſaying it was herbs.

Moreover, to imitate in all eminency the piety of great Conſtantine, he procured a national Councel to be held at Orleans: where he witneſſed much reſpect to the Prelates aſſembled in that place to decide Eccleſiaſtical affairs, writing unto them a notable letter, by which he confirmed the rights and immunities of the Church, according to the form of ancient Canons.

Baron. tom. 5. anno 514.

In the end Pope Hormiſdas, coming to ſucceed Symmachus in the holy See, Clodoveus was the very firſt diſpatched Embaſſadours unto him, with a very beautifull Crown, ſurnamed the Realm.

It hath been a cuſtom very ordinary in all times, to offer Jewels and Crowns to Altars, in grateſull acknowledgement towards the Divine Majeſty. So Conſtantine tendered his Diadem to the Saviour of the world, which is yet at this time to be ſeen hanging over the Altar of Saint Sophia. So did Mauritius, ſo Henrie the Emperour at Clunie, who made offer to the Church of a World, all over diverſified with moſt exquiſite precious ſtones.

Flodoardus Philippus Bergomenſis. Savaro. p. 15. de pietate Regis Ludovici.

This is the cauſe, why the King ſent this preſent, as the Hiſtory expreſly mentioneth, to be hanged up before the chief Altar of Saint Peter at Rome, in token of the offer he made to God of his perſon and eſtate, as the eldeſt Son of the Church. And he that would well conſider the foundation of the Hiſtory, ſhall find this Diadem, called the Kingdom or Realm, was a kind of crown come from Conſtantinople: For it is ſaid, that the Emperour Anaſtaſius, who ſought ſupport from the favour of the King of France, againſt the Goths that ſwayed in Italie, underſtanding the great feats of arms done by our Clodoveus, ſent a ſolemn Embaſſage unto him, to congratulate, and offer him the title of an honourable Conſul, the purple robe, and the Crown, which the Grecians of this time called Βασιλια.

Clodoveus very gladly entertained this Embaſſage, and ſhewed himſelf attired with thoſe ornaments in the Church of S. Martin, where he made a largeſs of gold and ſilver: then acknowledging all theſe proſperities came to him from God after he was baptized, he conſecrated this rich jewel, which had been preſented to him by the Emperour, in the chief Church of Chriſtendom, to ſerve as an eternal monument of his Religion. Behold how this illuſtrious Monarch began at that time to manifeſt the marks of his zeal, and to cement together the good intelligence which France afterwards had with the Paſtor and ſpiritual Father of the whole world.

I am bound to touch this as I paſs along with all ſincerity, being naturally an enemy of theſe queſtions which are many times moved with too much fervour and inconſideration, in the point of conteſtations of the juriſdiction of Sovereign authorities. We are learned enough, when we know that Jeſus Chriſt, who had the ſource of power in himſelf, diſtributed it to Popes and Kings: confirming the one for ſpiritual government, the other for temporal. It is his pleaſure we honour the character of his authority, both in the one and other, and not to argue upon queſtions. God hath ſet them over our heads to admire their luſtres, and not to controul their power.

Amongſt the follies of Nero, it is reported, that one day beholding a ſpace of land, which ſeparated two ſeas, and held them in excellent order, he had a deſire to cut it, that theſe two ſeas might encounter, and himſelf ſee what countenance they would carry, when they communized together. Take you good heed (ſaith the Oracle unto him) leſt otherwiſe they will overflow to drown you. Leave matters as God hath appointed, and confound not the limits of nature. It is true, Eccleſiaſtical and civil power are two great ſeas, God hath limited and divided them by the interpoſition of ſpiritual and temporal adminiſtration: Both exerciſe their functions, and live in fair peace. God preſerve us from thoſe miſeries, which may diſmantle the wall, and cauſe them to intermingle together, ſo, that we may behold the world in a deluge of calamities.

To what purpoſe is all this? The Sun doeth not the work of the rain, nor the rain of the Sun. Conſtantine ſaid the Biſhops were Biſhops in their Churches in that which concerneth Religion, and God had appointed him for the government of his Empire in matters temporal. Let us reſt in theſe limits. Give we to Cæſar, that which belongeth to Cæſar: to God what appertaineth to God. We have better learned to live than diſpute: and our Anceſtours have preſerved a Monarchy ſo flouriſhing, the ſpace of twelve hundred years, not with diſputations and unprofitable wranglings, but with the arms of wiſdom, obedience, and courage.

Communis Epiſcopus eorum quæ extra eccleſiam.

We have always rendered to the Pope the honour he deſerveth, as to the Sovereign Paſtor of the Univerſal Church, which is under Heaven. We have confeſſed, and do acknowledge the King true and abſolute Monarch in the government of temporal things, ſingularly honouring him, and with moſt cordial affections loving him, as an animated pourtraicture of the greatneſs of the Divine Majeſty. God thereupon maketh us to proſper and taſt by experience, that there is no ſcience more noble than obedience, nor any felicity, but the accompliſhment of the will of the ſovereign Maſter. On the contrary, it is obſerved in the Hiſtory of ſo many Ages, that the wounds from Heaven have on all ſides fallen upon thoſe, who have ſought to caſt the apple of diſcord into the houſe of God: The wind blown from their mouthes returned on their heads, ſince it is fit iniquity ſhould firſt kill it ſelf with its own poiſon.

1 Pet. 2. Subditi eſtote omni humanæ creaturæ propter Deum ſive Regi quaſi præcellenti, ſive ducibus tamquam ab eo miſſis.

The eighth SECTION.

The good ſucceſs which God gave to Clodoveus after he became a Chriſtian.

CLodoveus was no ſooner become a Chriſtian, but that it ſeemed God had tied to his arms ſome ſecret virtue, which made him triumph over his enemies, and crown all his enterprizes with moſt glorious ſucceſſes.

The firſt war he undertook after his Baptiſm, was againſt Gombaut King of Burgundie, of whom we have very amply ſpoken heretofore. I much wonder at certain Authours, who measuring the affections of Saints, with the weaknesses of their own spirits, and esteeming it a sweet glory to be revenged upon enemies, from whom some notable injuries are received, have said, that Clotilda excited her husband to the ruin of her uncle, to derive an account from him of the death of her father and mother. This is too inferiour a conceit of a Lady, who was atrived to so high a degree of perfection: nay, it was so much otherwise, that she should enkindle the fire of this war, that Gombaut being in the full possession of Clodoveus to bereave him of life, she withheld the fatal blow, & afterwards seeing he by his ill deportment had lost his Kingdom, she did all that possibly she might to preserve a part thereof for Sigismund son of Gombaut her cousin-germane.

Paul. Emil. That which first of all ruined this unhappy King of Burgundie, was his heresie, which drew upon him the vengeance of God: for it being often preached unto him, and he convinced by reasons, offering himself in private to become a Catholick, yet still retained Arianism in publick. Behold the cause, why he having divided his heart, God divided his Kingdom.

The second cause of his ruin was his nature, cruel and covetous, which rendered him uncivil, and an enemy of all order. He sent his Neece as it were in anger to Clodoveus, giving her not any thing in marriage, but many complements: Whereupon the King making sundry remonstrances, and afterwards complaints, he neglecting both the one and the other, and answering the Embassadours sent to treat with him very perversely, he resolved to make war upon him.

Adde hereunto, that having already put two of his brothers to death, he tyrannized over the third, who to get shelter from the tempest, had recourse to the King of France, who was no whit displeased to take this occasion to possess himself of the Kingdom of Burgundie, which he saw to be very fit for him. Gombaut having learned that Clodoveus armed in good earnest against him, would needs flatter his brother, whom he had before much exasperated, to win him to his party: but he playing the fox against a fox, having given him fair promises, turned his back towards him, and yielded to the French with all his troups.

The Burgundian affrighted, fled, and cast himself upon the Rhosne, until such time that he was shut up in Avignon, where Clodoveus desperately pursued him, pressed him, and thrust him upon extremities: so that the least word of Queen Clotilda, had been sufficient to take away his life. But the King contained himself both for the respect he bare to his wife, whom he well knew not to be delighted with the bloud of her allies, and for the discretion which Arredius a Counsellour of Gombaut used toward him. The vanquished King yielded to all the conditions proposed by the Conquerour, so far as to become tributary to France.

Afterwards the troups of Clodoveus being retired, this man full of gall and bitterness against Godegisilus his brother, who had levied arms against him, besieged him in Vienna, contrary to all promises made to Clodoveus, and having surprized him, slew him in the Church with his own hand: which was an act so barbarous, and onely worthy of a man abandoned of all sense of Religion. This cruelty was the cause that Clodoveus returning back again, entered into Burgundie, and possessed himself thereof, to punish the exorbitances of a man, who was as outragious to offend those who might hurt him, as unable to resist the justice of arms raised against him.

There remained nothing for him in this shipwrack, but an ignominious and miserable life, which God oftentimes inflicteth for punishment of brother-slayers, as he did to Cain; which he finally ended in Arianism. The holy Clotilda (as I said before) taking pitie of the issue of this wicked father, employed all her endeavours to preserve for Sigismund the title of King, and some competent remainders of a fortune, horribly dis-membered by the evil mannage of this Prince, blinded with errour and impiety.

From thence, Clodoveus transferred his arms into Aquitaine, where he had business enough to deal with Alaricus King of the Visigoths. But as I undertook not in this Treatise to enlarge upon the wars of Clodoveus, nor on his singular valour, but as it may be considered to correspond with the piety he received from Clotilda, I remit the Reader to the History of France: contenting my self to observe two or three passages of the Divine Providence over King Clodoveus in this war. The first was, that having resolved to turn his arms against this Goth, who drew into his Territories all the enemies of France, and who was an Arian heretick, most inhumanely used the Catholicks, which were in his power; he endeavouring to decline this blow, used many wiles to surprize his adversary, and murther him if he could, under colour of emparlance and amity. Clodoveus notwithstanding, shielded by the powerfull hand of God, was delivered from his practises, and although the other was supported by King Theodorick, who was his father-in-law, his countrey-man, and leagued with other Kings, our brave Monarch replenished with the confidence he had in the cause of God, as one who intended to cut off the root of the Arian heresie, which budded forth in France, couragiously marched in the face of the enemy, and with so much speed prevented him, that he rather seemed to have the conduct of an army of eagles than souldiers. See Monsieur du Plein.

A second testimony of the faithful love of Heaven, appeared in wonders, which served for a presage of the near approching victory. The one was, that the King, according to his customary piety, having appointed some men of purpose to offer up his vows at the feet of Saint Martin, they entering into the Church to perform their devotions, heard by good chance the Quire of Choristers, who sung out aloud this verficle of the seventeenth Psalm: Prætinxisti me Domine virtute ad bellum: supplantasti insurgentes in me subtus me. Lord, thou hast engirted me with force and valour for the war: Thou hast cast under me all those, who were raised against me: which being related to the King, he thereupon conceived good success, and setting forward on his way, as he entered into Poictiou, there was seen to issue out of the Church of S. Hilarie of Poictiers, a great brand of fire, like unto that flaming pillar which heretofore led the chosen people through so many dreadfull wildernesses; in such sort, that it seemed this great S. Hilarie, who had heretofore been a light both for the East and West against hereticks, enlightened still on the top of the place, where he had been reverenced, a burning Pharos, to illuminate the conquests of a Prince, who hastened to do that with the keen sword, which he had formerly acted with the sharp dint of the tongue. In the end, coming upon the brink of a river swoln up, where he knew not how to find a foord, which much stopped the course of his enterprize, behold a Hinde rouzed with the noise of the Army, took the river in sight of the French, in a place where it was passable, and shewed them the way, who prosperously followed. The King encouraged by so many prodigies, encountereth with Alaricus, and gave him battel very roughly, fortune holding the victory in ballance about six or seven hours, until the French, animated by the good example of their King, renewed their forces with loud out-cries, and brake with all violence through the files of the Goths. Clodoveus, who had had the flame of a generous vigour, burning perpetually in his heart, much desired to meet with King Alaricus, when perceiving him in the middest of the conflict, he set forward to encounter him. The other already contemned by his own Gothes, for having heretofore refused the combat, and seeing his Army in disorder, became valiant in his despair, and put on a resolution, either to vanquish his enemy, or to wash away the staines of his dishonour with his bloud. He withdrew himself from the main of his Cavalrie, and marcheth on towards Clodovæus. The souldiers stood still on both parts at this great duel of two Kings. They came to handy strokes in the head of two Armies, and charged one another bravely, being a very long time bloudily bent to battel: but in the end Alaricus felt the thunder, which proceeding from the victorious hand of his adversary, threw him down half dead in the list of combat. Clodovæus quickly alighted from his horse, to rid him of life; and being about to mend some defect in his cuiras, he was treacherously assaulted by two Goths: but he, having dispatched his adversary, defended himself from both these, and mounted up again on his horse, whom he made to curvet in a martial manner, demeaning himself so bravely in all, that he seemed to be as it were a flash of lightening, sent from the hand of God, rather than a man.

This defeat ruined the hopes of the Goths, and cut off all the designs of heresie, which subsisted not but by their favour. From thence Clodovæus marched all covered over with laurels into the Countreys of his conquests, with so much good success, that being before the Citie of Angoulesme, which made shew of resistance, the walls miraculously fell down, as did heretofore those of Jericho, he having, by the advise of Apronius his Chaplain, caused some holy reliques to be lifted up, whereunto he dedicated a singular devotion.

What need we here make mention of the adventures which he had with the Kings Chararic and Ragnachairus, whom he defeated as it were without blows? This man went every where as confidently, as one who seemed to have a Guard of celestial Virtues by his side: his hands were fatal to purge the earth from many infidel Princes, that infected it with heresie, tyrannies, and sacriledges. Who can but wonder, that in so short a time he extended his Empire from Rheine to Seine, from the river of Loyre to Rosne, and from the Pyrenei to the Ocean? Who can but admire, that he was so feared by all the Monarchs of his Age, as the Grecians, who have written after that time under the title of King, intended for the more excellency, to speak onely of the King of France? Who will not highly esteem his great authority, in that he first of all stampt golden coyn, which the Emperours had always forborn through extream jealousie, causing the marks of his faith to be impressed on this money? And who can sufficiently marvel, that having at his death left four sons to succeed him, he hath besides been followed by seven and fifty Kings, who constantly rendering themselves imitatours of his belief, have likewise shared with him in his felicity?

Suida. Φῆμι τὸν Κλωδοβαῖον ἀρχηγὸν.

I demand of you whether one must not become blind, deaf, and dumb, not to see, understand, nor declare, that all the happiness and prosperity of France is inseparably tied to the piety of our Ancestours, since the hand of God, thundering and lightening at the same time upon so great a number of Diadems of heretical Kings, as of Gombaut, Godemar, Chilperic, Godegisilus, Alaricus, and in the end on Theodorick himself, led Clodovæus by the hand through so many smoking ruins, so many swords, and such flames, to establish him with all his posterity in a Throne, whereunto the great Saint Remegius hath promised an eternity of years, so long as it should remain cemented with the same faith and religion, which first of all consecrated the Lilies to the service of the Divine Majesty?

The holy Clotilda, amongst all these conquests of her husband, lifted her innocent hands up to Heaven, to apply the forces of the Saviour of the world to his Royal banners. In the end, having drawn him to Paris, after so many bloudy wars, and sweetened the extravagancies of his nature, a little too violent, propending to excesses of cruelty, she caused him to tast in his repose, devotion and justice, in such sort, that having closed up his eyes in the exercises of piety, she enterred him with a most honourable reputation. There is yet to be found an old Calendar of the Church of S. Genovefue, which maketh mention of the day of his death, on the seven and twentieth of November.

V. Kal. Dec. Depositio magni Regis Clodovei. Du Pleix.

The ninth SECTION.

The life of Clotilda in her widow-hood: her afflictions and glorious death.

Clotilda vehemently desired to bring forth male children, for the establishment of her State, and though this affection seemed to be most just, notwithstanding God, who purgeth all the elect in the furnace of afflictions, found a rough Purgatory for this good soul, in the enjoying her desires. She had sons, as she wished, whom she endeavoured with all her power to breed in the fear of God, whilest she might bow them: but these children, who tasted too much of the warlike humours of the father, and had not enough of the piety of the mother, being arrived to an age wherein it was not possible any longer to restrain them, they fell into many terrible extravagancies, which transfixed the heart of the mother with a thousand swords of sorrow.

It happened that Sigismund, the cousin-germain of Clotilda, for whom she had procured the Kingdom of Burgundie, after the death of his wife, by whom he had a son named Sigeritus, suffered himself to be surprized with the love of a Ladie waiting in Court, whom he afterward married, to the great heart-burning of the son, who could not endure to see her clothed with the spoils of his mother.

This step-dame being drawn from servitude and wantonnes, to enter into the bed of a King, beholding her self crossed in her loves by this Heir of the house, conceived so much gall and rage against him, that she prepared a most fatal calumnie for his ruin, accusing him to have a plot upon the life of his father. Sigismund, who was of an easie nature, stirred up with love and ambition, quickly believed this shameless creature: and after he had called this poor young man to dinner, under colour of affection, he commanded him in his sleep to be strangled by the hands of his servants. But the miserable man, delivered out of the gulf of his passion, and seeing himself defiled with an act so black and wicked, publickly confessed his sin, and for it performed a most austere penance: but God, who ordinarily blotteth out the crime, not forgiving the pains and satisfactions due to his justice, deprived him of Scepter and life, by the hands of his allies, raising up a sharp revenge, to give to such like an eternal horrour of his iniquitie.

The children of Clodovæus, who had already shared the Kingdom of their father, were not yet satisfied, but desired to advance the limits of their division, as far as the point of their launce might extend. Behold the cause why Clodomer, who was the eldest of the legitimate, seeing the Kingdom of Burgundie in this danger, entereth thereinto with great forces, and found little resistance; Sigismond being formerly convinced by his crime. Having possessed himself of the places most important, he took the miserable King, and led him away prisoner to Orleans; to dispose of him according to his pleasure. But Godimer, the brother of Sigismund, who had retired to the mountains, while the French made all this notable havock, returned with a great power, and having slain the French Garrisons, made himself Master of the Kingdom. Clodomer understanding this defeat, became so furious, that he caused the head of his prisoner to be cut off, with his wife and children by his second marriage, commanding, through extremitie of cruelty, to throw the body into a ditch, which was executed. Nor content with this, he re-entereth into Burgundie boyling with choller, with intention to recover all to his obedience: but he found himself assaulted by the Burgundians in a battel, who slew him; and knowing him by his long hair, they cut off his head, and fixed it on the point of a launce, to serve for a sad spectacle to the French.

This accident afflicted the heart of the mother, who bewailed her son with inconsolable tears, as well because he was the first, whom she had bred with all tender affection, as for that she seeing him dead in the pursuit of so many bloudy acts, was full of anxiety in the matter of salvation of his soul. The poor Queen fortified her self, as much as she might, against the violences of sorrow, and armed her self against other accidents which she foresaw might grow from the evil dispositions of her children.

Clodomer left three sons very young, whom the holy woman bred up in her house, and near her person, into whom the most excellent Maxims of all wisdom and piety were distilled. These little children very well bred, and gently trained by the very good precepts of their grand-mother, promised something excellent in time to come, and served as a most sweet lenitive to this disconsolate turtle, to sweeten the acerbities she had conceived upon the death of their father: when behold a horrible frenzie crept into the souls of Childebert and Clotharius her two sons, which is read in all our histories, the brows whereof do blush to leave a blemish of execration on the wicked exorbitancy of ambition.

It were much fitter for the great men of the earth to have gnawing vultures, and sharp rasors in their entrails, than to nourish such a passion; which being onely puffed up with a smoke, violateth all it hath therein of right or humanity, to fatten it self with bloud, and never as it were openeth its eyes, but in the flames of the damned.

Childebert and Clotharius, sons of the great Clodoveus and the holy Clotilda, despoyling themselves of all respect, sweetness, and humanity, conceived a mortal jealousie against their little Nephews, imagining their mother would breed them up to their prejudice; and so not taking counsel of ought but their own bruitish passion, they resolved to be rid of them. The poor children were perpetually under the wing of their good grand-mother Clotilda, who could never suffer them out of her sight; such fear had she of ill habits, which are easily made to slide into the hearts of children by the corruption of evil companie. These infamous Uncles besought their mother to let their little Nephews come to visit them, to have thereby some harmless recreation, promising to restore them again speedily into her hands. The holy woman, who could not imagine the execrable malice, which was hatched in the hearts of these unnatural sons, consented these little ones should go, fearing lest the denial she might make, would further exasperate the suspition of the suppliants. Yet did she even then quake for fear, and bidding them farewel, kissed them with redoubled embracements, raptures, and affections, not being able to contain her passion, nor the presage of her unhappiness.

The little innocents went to the slaughter with a smiling countenance, as children who have walks of recreation, and play in their heads.

When they had them in their full power, they dispatched a messenger to their mother, to bear unto her most unwelcome news. For he was commanded to shew her a poynard and a cyzars, requiring her, she would make choice, which of these she should judge fittest for her grand-children, either to pass them by the dint of sword, or forcibly to shave them and make them Monks.

Clotilda, extreamly astonished at this impudence, answered, As well dead, as Monks: which some very inconsiderately have interpreted, thinking this answer proceeded from an ambition she had, that her grand-children might reign: but the admirable Princess would say, that we ought not to apply any to the service of God, but voluntaries, and that she had rather see her children well dead, than to behold them in a religious profession by constraint and force. This wretched messenger made to the humour of his Masters, in stead of sweetening the matter, made a very harsh relation of his message, which precipated the evil already beginning to fall into extremity.

Clotharius possessed with a diabolical spirit, took Thibault the eldest of these children, and striking him down to the ground, thrust his sword quite through his body. The little Guntharus, who was the second, besprinkled with the bloud of his brother, whom he saw distended on the pavement, grasped the knees of his uncle Childebert, with lamentable out-cries, saying: O Uncle, save my life, wherein have I offended you? He so quaked in all the parts of his body, and so transfixed him with his sighs, that the other, though he purposed this mischief, was seized with much compassion, and prayed his brother to pass no further. But Clotharius enraged, and more ravenous than a Tyger of Armenia, What? (saith he) you have been of the Councel, and yet now hinder me in the execution: I will run you both through with my sword. Childebert amazed, threw the poor victim from his knees, and delivered him to the executioner, who in that very place cut his throat.

As they were upon these contestations, the third son of Clodomer, named Clodoaldus, was taken away by a friend of the father, and secretly bred up in Ecclesiastical condition, wherein he arrived to so perfect a sanctity, that forsaking the shadow of Diadems and Scepters, which deceiveth the credulity of the most passionate by its illusions, he hath merited Altars on earth, and a Crown of glory in Heaven. For this is that S. Cloud which we reverence, near unto Paris.

What imagination is sufficiently powerfull to figure to its self the ardent dolours, which seized on the spirit of poor Clotilda when she heard all that passed by the practise of her unnatural sons? What might this soul think so free and purified from the contagions of the earth, which apprehended the shadow of the least sins, when she beheld her house polluted with so horrible sacriledges? Yet still she guided the helm of reason in so tempestuous a storm of passions, and in so dead a night of misery, she adored a ray of the Providence of God, which she considered in the depth of her sorrows: she her self no whit affrighted, took up the mangled bodies of these innocent creatures, and gathered together the scattered members as well as she could, saying: Poor Children, I bewail not your death, although it cannot be too much bemoaned. You are dead like little Abels, like little Innocents, forsaking the earth, profaned with the crimes of your Uncles, to hasten to possess a place in Heaven; you have out-run me, to live hereafter in the bosom of your grand-father. But I sorrow for these Cains, and these Herods, who so treacherously have murdered you, you, and who, wheresoever they are, I assure my self do carrie pincers and executioners in their hearts. They ought at least to bear respect to the ashes of their father: They ought to have compassion on the tenderness of your bodies: They ought somewhat to regard my age, and the care I have had to breed them, since the death of the King: And had they concluded upon this massacre when they took you from my house, they should have executed you in my arms; I at the least had closed up your dying eyes with my fingers, I had wiped away the blood from your faces, I had encouraged you to death, I had received your last sighs in my bosom. Alas, my prettie creatures! little did I think the kisses I gave you at your departure, were to be the last I should afford in your life. Pure and innocent souls, departed from these bodies in an age, wherein you were ignorant of sins, which never approched your knowledges, much less defiled your bodies! Behold from those Palaces of stars and light your afflicted mother, whom God hath as yet left on earth to give burial to your bodies.

Speaking this, she caused them to be carried away, that she might bestow them in the tomb of their grand-father, where being her self personally arrived, nature evicted a huge tide of tears from her constancy, and caused her to say:

My most honoured Lord and husband, who so cordially loved me in this life, will you not open unto me your sacred tomb to entertain me near you? Behold here your grand-children, which I bring unto you, little blossoms cut off in the tenderness of their age, by the hands of their uncles, your children and mine. Most dear husband, I account you thrice happie, to have been transported into the other world before you saw these lamentable tragedies. Were there nought but their respect towards you, it ought to have restrained them. But my sins alone have deserved this desolate old age, to which God hath reserved me to make trial of the most sensible dolours which might ever fall into my imagination. I will endure them as long as it shall please the Divine Providence, who will draw this satisfaction from my sins, and I with sorrow will waste my bodie, that hath almost nothing left but the bark, to place it in short time with yours.

The holy woman daily poured her self out in tears near to this sepulchre, remaining there day and night, as if she had been some shadow of the dead: but in the end to divert her self from this imagination, which was too full of affliction, and that she might the more freely enjoy God, she resolved wholly to leave the Court, and to pass the rest of her days in the Citie of Tours, near to the sepulcher of S. Martin.

There it was where she began to lead a life wholly celestial, as one who seemed to have nothing to do with the bodies and conversation of the living.

It is true, that great prosperities do not easily corrupt souls, which have taken a good temper in the fear of God; yet notwithstanding they wound, and in some sort change them. A little Bee sometimes goeth so long upon her honey, that by much walking there, she entangleth her wings: So a soul, yea one of those which are the most devout, being continually soothed by a long sequel of good successes of the affairs of the world, taketh some small flight out of it self, and seeketh recreation in a smiling and delicate air, which affordeth it nothing but objects of delight: but so soon as adversitie hath given its blow, it re-entereth into it self; it foldeth it self within it self; it tasteth it self, it knoweth it self; it findeth God in the bottom of its heart, afflicted and perplexed with the revolutions of the world, it raiseth it self above the ways of the Moon, and the tracks of the Sun, to that goodly Temple of Eternitie, where spirits live despoiled from these masses of flesh and bones, which we drag along with us in this mortal life.

This is the way which the wife Clotilda took so soon as she was alienated from the Court, and disentangled from affairs, which she never had used but for obligation of conscience; she entered into a sweet retirement, where it seemed unto her that nature had not displayed the mountains and valleys, the forrests and rivers, but to make her a theater of the works of God. She relished this retreat, as Manna from Paradise, and tasted this deep silence with incredible delight, after so many confused clamours of the embroylments of Court. It seemed unto her that she then spake to God face to face; and that she saw all the pride of the earth much lower than her feet. Her soul was whitened with her tears, was purified in her desires, and vapoured out all into God, as it were, through the limbeck of her ardent charity.

The holy Ladie, who had heretofore loved to behold her self shine in the majesty of sumptuous attire, to render her self the more acceptable to her husband, more illustrious in the eyes of her people, was clothed so modestly, that her History telleth, she was seen to be covered with course cloth. She, who heretofore was altogether sparkling with precious stones, appeared now in the liverie of penance. She, who had endeavoured temperately to entertain a mortal beautie for the contentment of her dear husband, was wholly wasted with mortifications of the flesh. She, who after so many victories of one of the most valianteſt husbands that ever was, had been led along triumphant in the chariot of glory, conversed now with widows and orphans, going as it were perpetually on foot, were it not that the weakness of her body dispensed with her therein, by the counsel of those who undertook the care of her health. She, who had seen all the services of a great Monarchy at her feet, was then continually prostrate at the feet of the poor; whom she served as the living Images of God. She, who had taken some care to mannage revenues, as the sinews of State, despoiled her self as it were from things most necessary for life, to succour the necessities of the people. She, who had delighted to build goodly Palaces, had not any affection, but for Monasteries and Churches, which she caused to be erected every where, with so much liberality as her means would permit. This divine woman was as the moon in eclipse, which appeareth wholly dark on the side towards the earth, but faileth not to be most radiant on that part wherewith she looketh towards Heaven. So those who beheld this Princess with carnal eyes in such a state, said she was eclipsed; but God, who in this retirement darted on her rays of glory, through the cloud of the body, caused her to see with eyes of Angels, as a soul wholly invested with the Sun of justice.

As she was in the sweetness of this repose, news came unto her very hastily, that she must return to Court, to appease the discord between her children, who were ready to encounter one another, and to embroil the Kingdom in the desperate desolations of Civil war.

The good woman did not as those, who hold retirement from the vanities of the world as a punishment, nor ever are with themselves, unless necessity make them take the way, which they cannot elect by reason. So soon as she understood these importunities, which called her back to the affairs of the world, she hastened to prostrate her self at the sepulcher of S. Martin, shedding forth bitter tears, and saying: "My God, you know my heart, and that it is neither for fear of pain, nor want of courage, that I retired from the Court of my children, but that seeing their deportments and affairs in such a condition, that I could not think my self any ways able to profit them by my counsels, I made choice of the means which I thought most likely to help them, which are prayers. And behold me here now humbled at the tomb of one of your great servants, to "beg of you by his merits and ashes, to pacifie the "differences of these unfortunate children, and to "behold with the eye of your accustomed mercies "this poor people and Kingdom of France, to which "you have consigned and given so many pledges of "your faithfull love. My God, if you think my pre-"sence may serve to sweeten the sharpness of these spi-"rits, I will neither have consideration of my age "nor health; but shall sacrifice my self in this voy-"age for the publick: but if I may be of no other use, "but to stand as an unprofitable burden, as I with "much reason perswade my self, I conjure you for "your own goodness sake, to receive my humble "prayers, and accommodate their affairs; and ever to "preserve unto me the honour which I have to serve "you in this retirement.

A most miraculous thing: it is observed that at the same time when the holy woman prayed at the tomb, the Arms of the brothers now ready to encounter to pour forth a deluge of bloud, suddenly stopped; and these two Kings not knowing by what spirit they were moved, mutually sent to each other an Embassage of peace, which was concluded in the place, to the admiration and contentment of the whole world. Thus much confirmed Clotilda in her holy resolution, wherein she lived to great decrepitness of age. And in the end, having had revelation of the day of her death, she sent for her two sons, Childebert and Clotharius, whereof this, who was the most harsh, was in some sort become humble, having undergone certain penances appointed him by Pope Agapetus, to expiate many exorbitances which he had committed; for such is the most common opinion. These two Kings being come, the mother spake to them in these terms:

I was as it were resolved to pass out of the world without seeing you, not for the hatred of your persons, which cannot fall into a soul such as mine, but for the horrour of your deportments, that cannot be justified but by repentance. God knows, I having beheld you so many times to abandon the respect you ow to my age, and the authoritie which nature gave me over your breeding, never have endeavoured to put off the heart of a mother towards you, which I yet retain upon the brink of my tomb. I begged you of God before your birth, with desires which then seemed unto me reasonable, but which perhaps were too vehement, and if ever mother were passionate in the love of her children, I most sensibly felt those stings, yielding my soul as a prey to all cares, and my bodie to travels, to breed and bring you up with pains, which are not so ordinarie with Queen-mothers.

I expected from your nature some correspondence to my charitable affections, when you should arrive to the age of discretion. I imagined after the death of your father, my most honoured Lord, that my age which began to decline, should find some comfort in your pietie. But you have done that which I will pass under silence: For it seemed to me your spirits have as much horrour of it as mine, which yet bleedeth at it, nor do I know when time will stench the bloud of a wound so hydeous.

Out alas, my children! you perswaded your selves it was a goodly matter to unpeople the world, to enlarge your power, and to violate nature, to establish your thrones with the bloud of your allies; which is a most execrable frenzie. For I protest at this hour, wherein I go to render an account of mine actions before the living God, that I should rather wish to have brought you into the world to be the vassals of peasants, than to see the Scepter in your hands, if it served you to no other use, but to authorize your crimes. Blind as you are, who behold not that the diamonds of a Royal Crown, sweat with horrour upon a head poisoned with ambition. When you shall arrive to that period wherein I am now, what will it help you to have worn purple, if having defiled it with your ordures, you must make an exchange with a habit of flames, which shall no more wear out than eternitie?

Return, my children, to the fair way you have forsaken: you might have seen by what paths the Providence of God led the King your father, to the throne of his Monarchie: you might have also observed the disasters of Kings our near allies, for that they wandered from true pietie. That little shadow which you yet retain of holy Religion, hath suspended the hand of God, and withheld the fatal blow, which he would otherwise have let fall upon your state. If you persist in evil, you will provoke his justice by the contempt of his mercie. Above all, be united with a band of constant peace: for by dividing your hearts, you disunite your Kingdoms; and desiring to build up your fortunes by your dissentions, you will make desolate your houses. Do justice to your poor people, who lived under the reign of your father with so much tranquilitie, and which your divisions have now covered all over with acerbities. Is it not time to forget what is past, and to begin to live then, when you must begin to die? My children, I give you the last farewel, and pray you to remember my poor soul, and to lodge my bodie in the sepulcher of the King your father, as I have ever desired.

The Saint speaking this, saw that these children, who had before been so obdurate, were wholly dissolved into tears, and kneeling about her bed, kissed her hands, having their speech so interrupted with sobs, they could not answer one word. Thereupon she drew the curtain over all worldly affairs, to be onely entertained with God. And her maladie daily encreasing, she pronounced aloud the profession of the Catholick faith, wherein she died; then required the Sacraments of the Eucharist and extream Unction, which were administred unto her, and by her received with infinite devotion. From thence forward she for some time onely lived on extasies of her soul, turning that little breath which remained on her lips, to the praises of God: and in the end, rendered up her happy Ghost, the third day of June, on the first hour of the night, pronouncing in the instant of death these words: Ad te Domine levavi animam meam: Deus meus in te confido non erubescam.

The History telleth, that the chamber where she died at the instant, when her soul departed out of her body, appeared very lightsom, and that her sacred members yielded forth a most sweet savour, which left to all there present a great estimation of her sanctity. Her body was enterred, as she desired, at the feet of S. Genovefue: for she was so humble, that she accounted her self most happy, to submit her diadem to the ashes of a poor shepherdess. Her memory hath been so honourable throughout all France, that she is yet reverenced under the name of S. Clothe, which is the vulgar word.

O woman, truly worthy to bear a Crown of stars! gold, silver, and precious stones are too base for you. If statues should be erected suitable to your desert, Diamonds, Emeraulds, and Topases, which have been employed on the pourtraicts of the Queens of Ægypt, would be of too mean a value in respect of your praises.

Oh Queens, oh Princesses, nay, oh Ladies, and Gentle-women, why do not you at the least in your houses, that which she performed in an ample Kingdom? What a glory? What an Empire? and what a triumph, to issue from the house of a King of Burgundie, as an innocent lamb, a poor orphan, married for despight, and to enter into a Court full of idolatries, which seemed then a forrest of ravenous beasts, yet knew so well how to charm them with invincible spells of her piety, as to convert a King warlike, haughty, a Pagan, and in converting him to change the whole face of a great Monarchy?

All that which we retain of Religion, piety, and haphappineſs under God, we ow to this holy Queen. O France, Frante, my dear Countrey! how art thou bound to her memory, to her name, to her virtue, and how much oughteſt thou to preſerve the precious treaſure of faith, which ſhe hath ſo happily recommended unto thee by her example!

I ſpeak not at all now of the particular favours thou haſt received from Heaven: I ſay nothing of thy flower-de-luces, of thy holy Viol, of thy Standard, of thy cure of the Kings Evil, and other ſuch like. I onely mention that which thou mayeſt boaſt before the face of all Nations, nor ever ſhalt thou looſe the glory which S. Gregorie the Great, an incomparable man, who flouriſhed above a thouſand years ſince, gave thee in his books, when he called thee, the lamp of the whole world, and ſaith, thy Monarchs as much ſurpaſſed all other ſovereign Princes, as Kings tranſcend the people.

Greg. ep. 6. l. 5. quæ eſt 106.

I pronounce that, which thou mayeſt publiſh as a priviledge very extraordinary, that Conſtantine the Great made heretofore a decree, which was afterward engraven upon the Altar of S. Sophia, in the prime Church of Conſtantinople, by which he expreſly forbade all his poſterity, to make any alliances or marriages with forreigners whereſoever under Heaven, except the French Nation: as if this Religious Monarch had foreſeen that they were the Kings of France who ſhould ſecond him in the zeal he bare to the ſupport of the Church. See and conſider the favours God hath done thee herein. Behold thy neighbours, behold the powers and ſovereignties of the earth, behold the Empires and Kingdoms: where is it, that one alone may be found from the memory of men, which hath received Catholick Religion with more favour, which hath defended it with more courage, which hath preſerved it with more conſtancy? Behold the Roman Empire, and thou ſhalt ſee preſently after Conſtantine, his ſons to be Hereticks, and his ſon-in-law an Apoſtata. Behold Italie, and thou ſhalt ſee it ſheltered under the protection of thy Kings. Behold Spain, and thou ſhalt ſee it over-run with Goths, Vandals, and Sarazens, and the Scepter in the hands of Arian Kings. Behold England, and thou ſhalt ſee, that it did not ſeriouſly receive the faith, till ſix hundred years were fully expired, after the publication of the Goſpel. Poland accounteth but ſix hundred and two and fifty years ſince it was Chriſtian: Muſcovia ſix hundred and two and twenty. Thou (O France) alone art it, to whom Jeſus Chriſt being in the agony of his dolorous paſſion, when he recommended his mother to S. John, and his ſoul to his father, deſigned, and miraculouſly deputed a Paſtour, to wit, the glorious S. Denys, who received the firſt rays of the knowledge of God in this eclipſe, which happened at the death of our Saviour, to diffuſe his divine lights afterward with his bloud upon the mountains, where thy Virgins do as yet lead a life wholly Angelical.

Baron. tom. 10. anno Chriſti. 960. Conſtant. Octavi. 49.

O France, wherefore haſt thou enlightened all the parts of the world with thy conqueſts? Wherefore thy Kings having communicated themſelves with ſo much ſweetneſs and facility, have they augmented their Majeſty by familiarity with the people, which uſually diſſolveth it? Why have they appeared as Amathiſts, which ſhine ſo much the more, as they are often worn? Why haſt thou been a Seminary of all great ſpirits? Why haſt thou in all times held predominance in learning and ſciences, like unto the Altar of the Sun, from whence light is borrowed to illuminate all other lamps? Why doſt thou aſtoniſh all hiſtories with the continuance of thy Monarchy, to which there is none to be found comparable in the world? Why hath God ſo many times enriched thee by thy loſſes, enobled thee by thy diſaſters, raiſed thee by thy ruins and precipices, ——Fecitq; cadendo, Ne caderes?

Is it not for having preſerved this precious jewel of Clotilda, this faith, this Religion, which he hath conſigned to thy Kings, and to thy people? Oh blind, if thou knoweſt it not! Oh inſenſible, if thou neglecteſt it! Oh unfortunate, if thou looſeſt it! Go yet, and ſee the aſhes of this good Princeſs, which are in thy capital Citie, aſhes worthy to be kiſſed of Queens, honoured by Kings, and reverenced by all people.

So long as there ſhall be Sacrifices and Altars, Angels and men, the name of holy Clotilda ſhall live, and ſpread it ſelf with a ſweet odour through all the Provinces of Chriſtendom; and my pen, which taketh its flight much further than my deſign intended, ſhall be the meſſenger of her greatneſs, with ſo much the more fidelity, as it hath confidence in her protection.

I will alſo, to crown this work, repreſent unto you a Lady, iſſued of her bloud, a grand-child of one of her ſons, who hath done in Spain, that which this in France; converting her husband to the faith, and by conſequence gained the Nation.

The tenth SECTION.

INDEGONDIS,

Iſſued from the bloud and houſe of Clotilda, tranſporteth the Catholick faith into Spain.

ABout the year five hundred four-ſcore and three, Levigildus an Arian Prince, reigned in Spain, who ſeeing the houſe of France held ſupereminency amongſt all the Kingdoms of the world, ſought the alliance thereof; and obtained for wife to his eldeſt ſon, called Hermingildus, the daughter of Sigebert, grand-child of Clotilda, named in Hiſtory Indegondis.

She was one of the moſt accompliſhed Princeſſes of that Age, in whom beauty, grace, and virtue, made together an admirable harmony, to purchaſe her the hearts of all the world. Every one lamented that this bright day-break, which began to enlighten France with its rays, went at her riſing into a Countrey, where the Sun ſetteth, and that ſo many ſingular perfections were ſeparated from that Kingdom which had given them birth. The good virgin, who had no other object, but the obedience ſhe ought to render thoſe to whom nature had ſubjected her, went well pleaſed, beſides was ſomething ſatisfied with the title of a Queen, which ſhe might juſtly one day expect. But little knew ſhe the combats and difficulties that waited on her in the ſame place, where ſhe hoped to gather nothing elſe but flowers.

I do not think hell can ever produce a miſchief like unto hereſie: which wholly perverting good affairs, inſtantly haſteneth to drench all the contentments of this innocent ſoul in a deluge of tears. Alas, a million of tortures well deſerve to be employed upon the criminal ſouls of thoſe, who were the firſt authours of this monſter. For it in all Ages hath diſturbed States of Princes, ruined ſo much generous Nobility, and ſowed diviſion among the moſt ſettled amities.

The wiſe of that time much apprehended the ſending of this young maid into Spain, to marry her to an heretical Prince, to place her in a Court wholly infected with hereſie, where no other objects ſhould be preſented unto her, but errour and vice. Behold (ſaid they) a goodly veſſel well rigged, well furniſhed, well guided, which hath ſails of linnen, cordage of purple, and oars of ſilver; but they go about to expoſe it to a rough tempeſt. Behold an excellent meadow all enamelled with moſt delicious beauties of nature; but they endeavour to oppoſe it to cruel Northern blasts. Behold a chrystal well polished, smooth, and delicate; but they seek to hazard it to the strokes of the hammer. Behold a statue all resplendent with gold, and precious stones, but they trample it under foot. What will a child be able to do amongst so much malice? An age so tender, amongst so many heads grown hoary in sin? A great simplicity amongst so many snares? A maid which hath no recommendation but chastity and obedience, amongst so many wicked commands? Do we think that a father-in-law, a husband, a mother-in-law, will have no power over her spirit? That pleasures will not allure her? That the dignity of a Kingdom will not move her? That the lustre of a Diadem will not dazle her eyes, and force prevail upon her? If that should be given her which she deserveth, it were fit to afford her all but the power to ruin her self.

eruel

Others said very temperately, that we must not believe, that by gaining a Kingdom she should loose religion: that she was of bloud so illustrious, it received no blemish; that she would rather die than dishonour her birth; that she would endure all the torments of Martyrs rather than betray her faith. And that if needs she must make ship-wrack of all her fortunes, that the last plank she would embrace, should be a good conscience: that she should be assisted by a good Councel, that would never forsake her: that there were as yet in Spain very many Catholicks, whose tears she would wipe away, and sweeten their acerbities: That her husband, a young Prince, was not so obdurate, but that she might hope one day to joyn him to the Catholick faith: Women are infinitely powerful, when they once have gained the heart of a man. In the end, that she must reflect on the example of her grand-mother, who had converted her husband, with all his Court; and if then cold and timorous considerations had been used upon this marriage, France might still have been Pagan. If the mother overcame an Idolater, the daughter may well prevail on an Arian.

Yet they, which spake thus, judged not the conversion of hereticks to be much more difficult than that of Pagans, as well for the intolerable pride which ordinarily possesseth their spirits, as for a certain malediction, which seemeth to be tied to those who voluntarily withdraw themselves from the light, and shake off the yoke of lawfull powers.

Yet notwithstanding considerations of State transported her, and Indegondis would take her fortune, promising her self so much assistance of God, that not onely she should stand firm in the piety of her Ancestours, but that if it were possible, she would save her husband: supposing to her self he was neither of marble nor iron, not to be mollified with the attractives of her sex.

The couragious maid was waited on into Spain, by a flourishing conduct of French Nobility, where she was received with very great applauses, for the reputation which the name of France had acquired in the opinion of all people.

The King Levigildus her father-in-law, was married upon second Nuptials to an Arian wife, named Goizintha, who was as deformed of body as mind: notwithstanding, she had charmed the heart of this old man, by I know not what kind of sleights, that she held predominance upon affairs, and bent as it were all his wills at her pleasure.

She shewed in the beginning an extraordinary affection to this marriage, and went in person to the Princess, giving her such fair entertainment, that it seemed she went about to over-whelm her with courtesies.

Yet was it to behold night and Aurora in one and the same Chariot, to see these two Princesses together. For Goizintha, besides other deformities of her person, was become blind of one eye: and Indegondu laying aside so many excellent parts, which she had from nature, appeared on that day in her attires like unto those Goddesses which the Poets and Painters form, according to the most advantagious idæaes of their spirits.

Hermingildus her husband beholding her so accomplished, easily felt the glances shot from her eyes, were rays from her, but arrows for his heart, from whence he could receive nought but honourable wounds. Never any man bound himself to a creature of the world with a love so forcible, so honest, and so innocent, as did this Prince to this admirable virgin. From the first arrival, and first glance of the eye, he felt his soul transported with a sweet violence, and it seemed unto him this stranger came to negotiate with him a love, much different from that of flesh and bloud.

It is a position, which hath been sufficiently argued by ancient Sages, touching the encounter of amities, which are so diversly applied to objects; sometimes by ordinary ways, as by a manifest reflection of beauty and goodness; sometimes also by passages altogether extraordinary, in such sort, that it is very hard to divine from whence the knot groweth, which tieth two persons who never have seen one another, so suddenly, that it is done in an instant, and so inseparably, that it lasteth even to the tomb. Some have said it proceedeth from secret influences of the same stars, which predominate at their births; a matter, which they verily have much ado to make good. Others have thought it is a work of fortune, and that loves were shuffled together like cards, to marry sometimes a Queen to a Groom. Others have referred it to complexions of the body, and to resemblance, which useth to be the mother of affections, a thing very probable. Others to the qualities of humours, which is daily sufficiently found.

But besides this, there is a certain secret touch, as in the adamant, not to us throughly known, which readily striketh its blow, and speaketh in a dumb language in the bottom of hearts. For my part, I should think that in this love which Hermingildus bare to Indegondis, there should be some very particular passage of the Providence of God, who was pleased constantly to bind his heart to her, whom he intended to make use of for his conversion.

The eleventh SECTION.

The persecutions of Indegondis.

NEver Nuptials were more full of content, nor amities more faithfull, nor beginning more prosperous, than were these: But there is ever in humane things some mischief, which sticketh on the most smiling felicities, and never giveth wine but with a mixture of dregs.

I know not what kind of fantasie possessed this wicked step-mother Goizintha, but she became jealous of the chast contentments of her son-in-law, altogether as it were besotted of this admirable Princess, whom he could not endure out of his sight. She observed their conversation, their discourses, their pleasures, and ever put her self athwart their designs, becoming as troublesom, as if she had been one of those malign spirits which use to possess men.

Indegondis, although she passionately loved her husband, durst not refuse the flattering entertainment of this step-mother, nor shew that she distasted the company of her sex, to seek after a man: but the Prince extreamly repined hereat, and could not dissemble the jealousie of his step-mother, saying,

She

She ought to be contented with the credit she had in affairs, not to prie so narrowly into his marriage, and by her importunities take from him his dearest spouse. The other let him understand, this frequent conversation & amity offered her, tended to no other end, but to convert her to her Religion, thereby to render her the more obsequious to his will. And verily she well witnessed this design was deeply engraven in her heart: For she neither spared endeavour nor subtile practice to seduce this innocent Princess, first waging war against her in the shape of a Dragon, afterward of a Lion.

She told her with much cunning, that God might as well be served in one Religion as in another: That we ought to accommodate our selves to the place, where Fortune hath ranked us: That it was the chiefest policie of a Kingdom, to satisfie the will and inclinations of the King: That she was not come into Spain to give Law, but example of obedience: That her husband never could faithfully love her, whilest she entertained any other sense, other laws, and other Sacraments, than himself: That never could she be a Queen of people, if she embraced not the faith of the people over whom she was to command: That it was a folly to fear the reproches of France, where the wisest would ever think she had done discreetly, to submit to the times: That if the same faults are pardonable in those, who in erring, authorize themselves with a multitude of great complices, no man could argue her justly of a verity, which she had entertained with a whole Kingdom.

The wicked woman ceased not to afflict the innocent ears of this young Princess with such like words; but she who had not herein a pliant and yielding spirit, protested, that if she persisted to maintain these discourses, it would enforce her to forsake her company, and that it was not needfull to use so many subtilities; for sooner should her heart be torn out of her belly, than her Religion from her soul. In saying this, she went out of her chamber, shewing unto her an eye sweetly discontented, with a soul well resolved: with which the other offended, notwithstanding dissembled her anger, so much she feared to disturb her; but quickly afterward endeavouring to make this breach up again, she tendered her a thousand protestations of affection, and ceased not to tyre her out with flatteries, whereat the poor Indegondis was much perplexed, and could not any longer handle the matter so as not to express her disdain.

Notwithstanding Goizintha, who lost not hope to seduce her, attempted once again to get her to be baptized after the Arian manner, alledging a thousand reasons; whereunto the Princess answered very wisely: That she was (thanks be to God) well christened in the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and that if the water of the Baptism of the Arians had been cast on her head, although she loved her hair as well as any woman of her sort, she would cut it off, and tear away the skin, which had been defiled with such an execration.

The step-mother hearing these words, shifted away, and said all foaming with choller, That since she would not be baptized after the Arian manner, she would prepare another kind of Baptism for her, which would wash her from the head to the foot: And thereupon enraged, she put her self upon a practice wholly barbarous, which is related by S. Gregorie the Great, and many others; to wit, that after she had dregged this poor Princess by the hair, and tormented her even to the effusion of some bloud, she caused her to be taken by two or three of her waiting women, commanding them to strip her stark naked, then to bind her with cords by the arms, and in this posture plunge her in a pool, in a very cold season of the year.

It was a pitiful spectacle to behold the daughter of a king thus cruelly used in the same place where she entered with so many triumphs. The impious Goizintha stood upon the brink of the pool, as she, who bare sway in this torture, & commanded her wicked servants to drench her in the water, not all at once, but by little and little, that she might endure the longer Martyrdom. At every moment the mischievous Queen cried out: Say you are an Arian, and you are safe. The holy maid, who had not so much apprehension of death, as of her nakedness, answered aloud: I am a Catholick, A Catholick I will die: Take away my life in this confession; neither fire nor water shall ever have so much force upon me, as to make me unsay it. She was a long time in this torment with a constancy, which amazed this bloudy soul, that so tortured her. In the end, she again took her garments, going out of the water, as from an Amphitheater of her glorious battel.

The twelfth Section.

The retreat of Hermingildus, and his Conversion.

Hermingildus who knew nothing of what had passed, beholding her somewhat pale, and weakened with such harsh usage, asked her if she felt any pain of body, or affliction of mind, to discolour her so much more than ordinary; but the wise Princess replied, It was nothing, and that there was not any thing so important, as to be worthy of his knowledge.

He, who well perceived that she by her discretion dissembled some great affront, enquired very curiously of those who might inform him, and somewhat too soon discovered the cruel disgrace, which his mother-in-law Goizintha had put upon his wife. This transfixed him with a dolour so sensible, and so enkindled him with fire and choller in his heart, that if the feat of God, and the sweetness of his wife had not served for a counterpoize to his passion, he had torn this wicked Queen in pieces. But the good Indegondis prostrating her self at his feet, besought him by all that which was most noble in him, not to precipitate the matter into such extremities, and prevailed so well with her natural eloquence, that he was contented to remove presently from the Court, and retire to Sevil, which his father had given him for his lively-hood.

Then was the time, when those chast loves, which had been crossed by the disturbances of Goizintha, all obstacles being overcome, enlarged themselves as a river, which having broken his banks, poureth it self with a victorious current in the wideness of his channel. Hermingildus could not sufficiently satisfie himself to behold so many virtues in so great a beauty: the modesty, which she had witnessed in this last disgrace, gave him apprehensions of her piety above all may be said.

Those, who seek nothing in marriage but sensual pleasure, which is more thin than smoke, and much lighter than the wind, cannot imagine how much these fair amities, which are the daughters of virtues, nourish holy delights. These are celestial fires, which are ever in the bosom of God, as in their sphere: It is he, who begetteth them, and breedeth them, they being not constrained to descend upon earth, to beg a caytiff nourishment from perishable creatures, which promise so many wonders, and produce nought but wind.

These two great souls beheld one another with the eyes of the dove, and were mutually enflamed with affections so honest and innocent, that Angels would would not be ashamed to entertain the like fires, since they are those of charity, which is the eternal furnace of all souls the most purified.

Indegondis perceiving she had already great power in the affection of her husband, and that there was no longer any step-mother to dissolve her designs, sollicited him seriously for his Conversion, and said:

"Sir, I must confess unto you, the honour I have "received from your alliance seemeth not accom- "plished, whilest I behold between us a wall of divi- "sion, which separateth us in belief and Sacraments. "Since our amities are come to that point, as to en- "joy all in common, and that they unite things most "different, why should we divide God, who is most "simple of nature? Why should we make two Re- "ligions and two Altars, since we now live in such "manner, that we have but one table, one heart, and "one bed?

"Verily, Sir, if I saw the least ray of truth in the "Sect you profess, and some hope of salvation, I "would submit thereunto, the more to oblige me to "your person, which I love above all the things in "the world. But it is most undoubted, that you are "ill rectified, that you pursue a fantasie in stead of a "verity, and that dying in this state, you loose a soul "so noble, which I would purchase with expence of "my bloud. I boast not to be learned, as you Arians, "who have so many goodly allegations of Scripture, "that you make the ignorant believe God is all that "which to your selves you imagine.

"Sir, I for my part think the chief wisdom in mat- "ter of religion, is, not to be so wise as you are, and "to have a little more submission of spirit; for faith is "the inheritance of the humble, and never doth the "day of God shine in a soul, which hath too much "light of man. You well see this heresie of the Ari- "ans is a revolted Band, which hath forsaken the "high way, to wander cross the fields: you are not "ignorant, that this Arius was a wicked Priest, who "raised an heresie for despight, that he was not made "Bishop; and was rejected, and solemnly condemn- "ed in a Councel of three hundred and eighteen "Bishops. These men were wise enough for you and "me; I fix my self upon their resolutions, I follow "the generality of the Church, I adhere to the bo- "dy of the tree, and you tie your selves to a rotten "branch. I have no argument more strong, than the "succession of lawfull Pastours, than the conformi- "ty of the Universal Church, than the succession of "all Ages, than the wisdom, sanctity, and piety, which "I see resplendent on our side.

"Besides, I come from a Countrey where we have "seen all the Arian Kings our neighbours round a- "bout, to have had most unhappy ends: when in the "mean time my great grand-father, King Clodovæus, "for having sincerely embraced Catholick Religion, "received so many blessings from Heaven, that he "seemed to have good hap and victories under his "pay. I am not the daughter of a Prophet, nor do I "vaunt to have the spirit of prophesie; but I dare "well foretel, the Kingdom of Spain, shall not be of "long continuance, unless it vomit out this pesti- "lence of Arianism, which lies about the heart of "it: I would to God, with expence of my life, I "might establish my Religion, then should I account "my self the most contented Queen of the world.

Hermingildus knew not what to answer to the strength of truth and love, two the most powerfull things in the world; onely he said it was a business which well deserved to be pondered, and that these changes in persons of his quality are subject to much censure, if they have not great reason for caution. The good Princess to give him full leisure to advise thereupon, handled the matter so by her industrie, that he conferred with S. Leander, who was a strong pillar of the Catholick faith in Spain. The sage Prelate so well mannaged the spirit of this Prince, that with assistance of God, and the good offices of Indegondis, who moved Heaven and earth for this conversion, he drew him from errour. This brave courage so soon as he saw the ray of truth, needs would acknowledge and freely confess it, taking the Chrism of Catholicks with pomp and solemnity, even to the giving a largess of golden coyns, which he purposely caused to be stamped a little too suddenly, making his own image to be engraven thereon, with a motto, which said, Hæreticum hominem devita: that is to say, we must avoid an Heretick; alluding to his father Levigildus.

Disputation, which concerneth the estate of Princes is a tickliish piece; where the most part of those who speak of it, use their own interest for text, and their passion for Commentary. Silence and peace, which are the two mansions of a good conscience, are of much more worth, than all the questions which enkindle divisions. I think the best doctrine is that, which best knoweth how to cement up concord among Miters, Diadems, and Crowns, entertain the obedience of people towards their Sovereigns, and if there be verities, which are the daughters of the abyss, and silence (as those Ancients said) to leave them in the house of their father and mother, where, though they nought avail, they shall ever be better lodged than in publick.

It is not vice, but the times, which divideth Saints, and every one thinketh an affair probable, which he hath taken upon the byass of his own understanding. S. Leander approved the separation of Hermingildus in Spain: S. Gregorie of Towers blamed it in France. I enter not into all the considerations of them both, but I think this Prince took ways too violent in his beginnings, levying arms against his father, which were not according to the counsel of his wife; and I will have no other Authour, but himself, since he condemned his own design, so soon as he began to become holy.

The thirteenth Section.

The reciprocal Letters of the father and the son, upon their separation.

Hermingildus, extreamly incensed at the affront which he received in the person most dear unto him in the world, and who wanted not a Nobility round about him, that enkindled the fire of choller, burst forth in the beginning with violence. The father, an old suspitious man, felt himself much displeased with this alteration, and the step-mother ceased not to throw flames through her throat, and crie al-arm as loud as she could, to transport affairs instantly, unto the utmost point of severity.

Levigildus notwithstanding, before he would proceed to extremities, sought to do something by letters, which are found couched in the History: wherein this Prince flattereth his son with fair words to surprize him. Behold here the copy of them:

Son, I would willingly say that unto you present, which I cannot sufficiently express in my Letters. If you have as much confidence in me, as I yet have love towards you, I verily think were you with me, and alienated from the evil counsels of those who abuse the facilitie of your excellent nature, I might do much upon your spirit, both as a father, and as a King; so that at the least if you fear my Scepter, you would love my charitie, which still openeth its arms to your obedience. I have bred you up from your tender infancie, to make you heir of my Crown; and since you arrived to full age, I have conferred ferred so many benefits on you, that they have surmounted your hopes, and as it were drained my liberalities. I have put a Scepter into your hand, to serve your father with the more authoritie, and not to deliver it over to mine enemy. I have caused you to be stiled a King, to become a support to my Crown, and not a Lord over mine Empire. I have given you all, to repose my old age upon the hope of your dutie, and not to afflict me.

And yet notwithstanding, after I have done all this, beyond custom, beyond your age, and above your merit, you pay me with impietie and ingratitude. Expect yet a little, and the law of nature will give you that which you seek by ambition. Alledge not Religion unto me to justifie your arms, it hath been a crime in you to take a Religion contrary to my commands; and an impietie in your Religion, to separate your self from my obedience. I counsel you as a friend, and command you as a father, to render your self as soon as possibly you may at my Court, and set your self in the way of duties; otherwise I fear you may implore mercie, when there will be no other Kingdom found for you, but that of justice.

Hermingildus deliberated upon the answer he was to make to these Letters: but his Councel too fervent, shewed him, it was now no time to retire back; that he had to do with a man imperious and turbulent, a mother-in-law irreconciliable, who had no other aim but to ruin him: and that if he took not arms to defend his own life, he would be chased away like a beast, and should not find safety even in deserts. Behold the cause why he wrote back in this manner:

Sir, I give thanks to my Religion, which hath already afforded me patience enough to bear the sharpness of your words, and which is more, resolution also not to be shaken with the severitie of your menaces. I have ever freely protested, that I am tied unto you with immortal obligations, and am besides ready prest to acknowledge them, even to my last breath, were it not that some now endeavour with you, to render all my duties unjust, and my thoughts criminal. Your Majestie should quickly see me by your sides, if she, who will not behold me at your feet, but in the quality of a Delinquent, had not pre-occupated your heart and ears, to stop up the one to charitie, the other to justice.

What assurance can I have of my life in a place, where she for whom I live, hath been dragged by the hair, and trampled under foot? The wound sticketh so sensibly upon me, that time can neither find a lenitive, nor reason a remedie.

As for the change of Religion made by me, I go along with the main current of wisdom, and sanctitie of the whole world, and where I find my salvation most assured, I cannot live with more authoritie, nor die with more hope; and if you condemn me for it, your Majestie shall know, that a father requireth obedience out of the limits of nature, when he exacteth it beyond conscience. Sir, I beseech you to adde to so many benefits by you afforded me, the liberty of an honest repose, lest our arms may be as shamefull for the Conquerour, as miserable to the vanquished.

Levigildus was more exasperated upon these Letters, and the wicked Step-mother ceased not to rub the sore as much as she might. All designs tended to war: the father upon the one side maketh great levies of souldiers; the son fortifieth Sevil and Cordova, and draweth to his party some Forces of the Empire, having sent an honourable Embassy to the Emperour of Constantinople, which was at that time Tyberius, to intreat great succours. Acts of hostility were practised both by the one and other part, and in the end Hermingildus is besieged in Sevil, where he made his abode the space of two or three years after his departure from the Court. King Levigildus, who was an old fox, endeavoured then to entertain the Catholicks with much sweetness, to divert them from his sons side, and gaineth by force of money many mercenaries, who well discovered they had no other faith, but that which their fortune would give them.

The fourteenth SECTION.

The Treaty of peace between Levigildus and his son, by the mediation of Indegondis.

THe war was yet like to continue very long, had it not been that the Princess, weary to behold these calamities that took beginning from an affront which she had endeavoured to dissemble with so much prudence, besought her husband with great tenderness of tears, to reconcile himself to his father. He touched at that instant with a quite other spirit than he had hitherto felt, prostrated himself before the Altar, and protested before God, that he abandoned all the justice of his cause for the onely considerations of piety, and would rather die than prosecute those dissentions any further, to the prejudice of charity. He went out wholly changed upon this her motion, and coming to his wife, said unto her: Madame, behold me resolved to seek out the King my father, since you so desire it. But I must needs tell you, that having forgotten my self in this resolution, I cannot neglect you. The unworthie usage which you have received at Court, requireth you return not thither but in triumph. Never will I admit that you undergo hazard, by exposing you to the mercie of a woman, which perhaps hath none either for you or me. You know the affairs of France are at this time in so great confusion, that you cannot hope there for any retrait to assuage your griefs. We have here a Prince, the Emperour Tyberius, who is our allie, in whose protection I advise you to put your self, to pass into Africa, and from thence to Constantinople, if it happen that I be otherwise entreated, than your hopes import.

At these words the poor Indegondis felt her self seized with a great trembling, and wept bitterly, not being able to answer one word. The Prince, seeing he had proceeded too far in afflicting her so faithfull heart, sweetened his discourse, and said: Dear heart, why do you trouble your self at my departure? I hope the affairs will run in a way so prosperous, that in two or three days, we shall see one another at Court; but that which I have spoken, is said, taking all accidents at the worst, to provide the better for your safetie.

They had during their abode here, a little son, which yet hung at the breast: the father taking it in his arms, said: Madame, Behold a most precious pledge of our marriage, which I recommend unto you. Let God dispose of it as shall best please him, but you must breed it up as a King. The mother beholding the infant, redoubled her sighs, and the poor Hermingildus not knowing what would follow, felt himself surprized with a heavy and stupid dolour, which made him break off his discourse: yet notwithstanding he failed not to treat with the Emperours Lieutenant, to put all that which was most dear unto him into safeguard. But when the fatal day of separation came, these two hearts so united, felt such violent convulsions of grief, as if they then had foreseen the events which afterward succeeded, and that this farewel should be their last.

Indegondis at her parting, cried out: Sir, whatsoever happen, loose not the treasure of your faith. My good Mistress, replied the Prince, assure your self you have gained a disciple, who shall never dishonour you: be you merry, I will expect you at Court.

Alas, what is our life, and the affairs of man! That which is past is nothing, the present a fantasie, and the future an abyss, where even those who stand on the brink, see not any thing. These two great souls, which it seemed were worthy to live an Age to manure their faithfull loves, and possess Empires as perpetual inheritances of their merits, go about to be divided for ever with a separation, which would be judged hydeous and pitifull, were it not that she hath brought forth a Kingdom to Religion. Some time after that Indegondis was retired, Levigildus understanding his son disposed himself to some composition, conceived much joy thereat: for he feared lest he might be enforced to give battel, wherein he had perhaps found what a man may do, thrust into despair. So soon as he saw some overture of peace, he dispatched his son Recaredus, who was in the Army with him, to gain his elder brother, well knowing they were both of humours very consonant.

When the younger entred into Hermingildus camp, and had espied him, he stopped suddenly, and cried out: Oh my brother, before I embrace, I desire to know whether I come to a friend or an enemie. But the good brother, without making him any other answer, set forward, and most lovingly embraced him in the sight of the whole Army. The other sighing, "Ah brother (saith he) most dear brother, whither have the counsels of "those transported you, who desire the ruin of our "house? Behold your self here environed with armies "and Legions, and behold on the other part my fa"ther, who besiegeth you with all his army. Misera"ble that I am! What shall I do but make between "you both, a wall of my body to hinder your designs? "Ah, how brother? are you upon the point to give "my father battel? Oh how unhappy would the Sun "be which shineth over our heads, if this day, before "the setting, he should see his face defiled with the "stains of our bloud! Brother, it is our Countrey a"gainst which you arm, that stretcheth out to your "obedience the same hands it lifted up to Altars for "your safety. Brother, it is your father and mine a"gainst whom you march: what honour can you get "to tear out of his body by violence a soul, which he is "ready to render up to nature, & to throw it out yet "alive into the flaming ruins of his Kingdom? Have "you no other objects to give testimony of your valor? "I beseech you, both by the Religion you have em"braced, and the bloud common to us both, stay your "arms, or if you persist in your purpose, kill me rather "at your feet, and take me as a victim to purge both "the armies. Behold the King, who lovingly expe"cteth you, and who reckoneth up the moments of "my Embassage; I bring you the word of full assu"rance upon my life and honour. You must come "instantly, if you dare believe me, for you cannot pro"crastinate nor retard this affair, but you must slack"en your own happiness.

These words were powerfull enough to transport a man, who was already resolved. Hermingildus having assured him of the good affection he had ever born both to the King his father, and himself, went to the Court. Recaredus flieth with the desire he had to inform his father of the success of his Commission, and being arrived, he bare the news of the coming of his brother, wherewith he was infinitely pleased. The Prince followed quickly after, and prostrated himself at the feet of the King his father, saying:

"Sir, And my most dear father, behold here your "poor Hermingildus, who will perpetually be yours, "what ever happen. Those, who have armed your "clemency to the ruin of your bloud, have chased me "from your Court and Palace, but not been able to "separate me from your love. I have lived hitherto "like a poor exile, and as it were a dead man among "the living. If my enemies be not satisfied with my "miseries, behold Sir, I stretch my hands wholly dis"armed to the power, which nature hath given you "over me, ready to live or die at your feet.

The King, whether he dissembled his passion, or whether he truly were touched with such a spectacle of piety, embraced him with much tenderness, saying: "Ah my son, evil fame hath depainted you much "other than you are. I assure you this confidence "which you have witnessed unto me, hath now set "you free from all suspition. You are very welcome, "most dear son, where have you left the Princess your "wife? The Prince replied, She should speedily be at "Court. Goizintha faileth not to be there present, and to shew to her son-in-law all possible courtesies; which so confirmed the mind of Hermingildus, that he instantly discharged himself from all distrust, and prepared to send suddenly for Indegondis to come to the Court. A friend notwithstanding whispered him in the ear, that it was not necessary for him to hasten so much, and that he must ever fear a still sea, an old man amorous, and a step-mother too courteous.

The fifteenth SECTION.

Hermingildus wickedly betrayed.

THis speech was but too true; for the pernicious Goizintha foreseeing, if Hermingildus were once again fully possessed of the heart of his father, whereof there was some probability, he would not fail to revenge himself on her for the affront done to his wife, and if it were not with diligence prevented, he might discover her sleights, and disturb all her faction: She therefore called a fatal Councel, wherein she resolved to overthrow this poor Prince. She gained unto her infamous men, who poured into the ears of King Levigildus what soever they thought good; she suborneth witnesses, she causeth letters to be produced, and frameth a gross calumny, giving her husband to understand, that this reconciliation of his son was but a matter of disguise, the better to arrive at the scope of his intentions; that he hath sworn the ruin of his father, and that his spirit is become so arrogant, he cannot endure him as a companion in the Empire; that it is a thing undoubted that all the Romans desire to lift him to the throne: That he hath practised alliance with the Emperour of Constantinople, whereof expres letters might be produced: and to shew this is a business already concluded, he hath delegated his wife, a cunning and turbulent spirit, into Africa, to pass from thence to Constantinople, and to bring with her all the forces of the Empire, to fall upon Spain; that there was no other remedy, but with all speed to prevent his design, and to make him feel the power of despised clemency.

She spake so much both of truth and falshood, and her Commissioners were so well practised to forge many suspitions, and represent a thousand accidents in affairs, which seemed to confirm this conspiracy, that in the end Levigildus entered into a frenzy more gross than had possessed him before; and having declared his son guilty of treason, he caused him to be suddenly taken, and shut up in a strait prison. It was a pitifull thing to behold this Prince, a man wholly innocent, seized on in the middest of all the pleasing triumphs of the Court, which they had prepared to honour his arrival, betrayed even at that time, when he least thought thereon, and used with so much cruelty. A matter very natural to heresie, where, after they had clothed him with sackcloth, he was so loaden with chains, that he became crooked, not being able at all to lift up his head.

He then well knew his hour was come, so that renouncing all the pleasures of this life, he began couragiously to prepare himself for death. The King, accompanied with some Commissioners, whom he had given in charge to draw his proces, would needs see him, and beholding him, suffered himself instantly to be transported with great disturbances of choller, calling him ungratefull, parricide, and wicked wretch. The Prince mildly answered: Sir, could I foretel, I should know what I had done, and wherefore I am accused; but since I have no such spirit, I will die in silence. The father replied, his ill conscience suggested thereof enough unto him, and that he knew but too much what designs he had upon the State and the life of his father; that he would have him speak freely, and that if he could justifie himself in these points, he would gladly hear him.

choller,

Hermingildus at that time made the Apologie, which I have else where expressed in Latin, approching as near as I might to his own intentions and phrase, and am here ready to render it in our language, that I may not frustrate my Reader of it.

Sir, said the Prince, the proof of my innocencie is as easie, as the defence thereof is difficult. I reposed, next after God, all my confidence in your Majestie, to choak the flame of cruel envie wherewith you see me assailed, and as it were still smoking. I attended to implore your name, to challenge your power, and to have you for witness of my fidelitie, unworthily treated by slander; and now I have you for an ardent accuser, and a most severe Judge, nay, which is more, an incensed father. You have caused me to be taken as it were from the table of a feast, by you prepared for congratulation of my return; you have made me to be despoiled of purple; to be bound, and fettered like a galley-slave. I fear lest the justification of my actions, may not be the condemnation of yours; and that in seeking to defend mine own innocencie, I be not enforced to accuse the errour of my father, which is to me one of the greatest punishments I can suffer. Notwithstanding, since you command I should speak, not that, in the condition whereunto affairs are arrived, I may hope of any thing either by my discourse or silence, but hap what may, I will pour into your ears the last voice of my bloud. For did my accusers demand no other thing than my life, I would willingly give it them without reply: but seeing they go about to fasten infamie on mine ashes, I beseech your Majestie, to hear the few words I have to say.

The businesse here is not a new crime, it is a very long time since the Queen your wife, and our step-mother Goizintha, began to weave this web against my brother and me, to deprive your scepter of its lawfull heirs, and give your Crown as a prey to her ambition. Would to God I might now call out of the other world, the blessed soul of my dead mother, to be present at this judgement: She would speak, and I might be silent; she would remember your Majestie, how being in the agonies of that fatal hour which took from us this great Queen, she embraced my brother and me, beseeching you by your chast loves, and inviolable faith of marriage, to be unto us both father and mother. We were then of an age, wherein we could not as yet either feel or bemoan our losses. Notwithstanding, seeing you bowed over the bodie, which yielded up the ghost, with weeping eyes, we gave our infant-tears to her memorie, as a just tribute of Nature: but you taking your little orphans into your bosom, forbade them to mourn, which you could hardly do, and wiping away their tears, promised you hereafter would become to us a father for protection, and a mother for indulgence. I then grew up under your eyes, spinning out the course of my innocent years, and am come to an age capable to bear some share in your hopes. Had you any thing at that time in the world more dear unto you, than your Hermingildus? Dignities were for him, for him Empires, wars were made by him, and peace concluded in his name. Hermingildus was the object of your thoughts, the entertainment of your discourse, the contentment of your heart.

Your Majestie then resolved to marrie me, although very young, you found out for me a wife, daughter of a King, sister of a King, neece of a King, but such an one as by her virtues surpassed all titles of Kingdoms. Ah poor maid, who would have said then, that thou wast reserved to be the subject of so lamentable a Tragedie! I was reputed the most happie man of the world, since for me were born so many singular virtues and perfections, admired by all men. I must confess I loved this Princess, not so much by the ways of an ordinarie love, as a certain admiration of her virtues. For I have received the faith by her pietie, her example, and her doctrine; holding in her soul the rank of a husband, a disciple, and as it were of her own son.

Thereupon Goizintha began to possess your heart, and to gain supereminence in your affairs; so changing your will by her ordinarie practises, that she hath turned all your ancient favours into disdain, your confidence into suspition, your resolution into disturbance, and your mild temper into command. This woman hath so persecuted me, that in your Court I neither enjoyed watchings, rest, recreation, nor affairs without danger. But I have willingly passed under silence all that, which touched mine own person, until she fell upon an action so barbarous, which were sufficient to justifie the Scythians and Tartars. I have no words to speak it, having so much sorrow to feel it: Enough is said, when there hath been seen a daughter of so many Kings, trampled under the foot of a woman (whose birth I will not reproch, because indeed I well know it not) a Princess most innocent, beaten even to bloud by a mother-in-law; a Ladie replenished with honour, disarayed of her garments by unworthie servants, and plunged by little and little into a pool in a cold season, to consummate a Martyrdom, such as the ancient Tyrants never invented more cruel for women, contenting themselves to impose oftentimes onely nakedness for a punishment.

Had I revenged my self of such inhumanitie with sword and fire, no man could have thought my proceeding unjust, nor my thoughts unreasonable: notwithstanding, I have still endeavoured to cure my self by the remedie most ordinarie with me, which was patience. I in silence retired unto a Citie which your Majestie gave me for lively-hood; resolved there peaceably to pass my days with my wife, whilest we beheld the face of this Court so adverse to our hopes.

But your Goizintha, as if we had committed a great sin, in not enduring her to thrust a sword through our throats, hath sounded an alarm in your Palace, and afterward in all the Province, declaring me an enemie to the countrey, an usurper of the Crown of my father, a Parricide, a creature excommunicate, and adding thereunto words much more injurious against me and my wife.

For my part, Sir, I wish you had rather hearkened to our innocencie, than served her passion; all then had succeeded better. But after strange Levies were made, you came thundering upon Sevil, to besiege me with a huge Armie, so that you seemed to stir all the elements against me. I confess it, I then followed the instinct which God giveth creatures, even the most bruitish, to defend their own family and fortune. I took arms, not to offend you, but to safeguard my self and my wife, against the furies of a step-mother, who makes use of all arrows for our ruin.

Yet seeing my armies reduced to that point, that I had no means to escape without giving battel, which must necessarily be fatal to both parts, I renounced for your sake the laws of nature, and am come to render my self up to your discretion. I call to witness the Altars, holy fire, and the Angel-guardians, which have seen me prostrated before them, of the sinceritie of my intentions, and of the tears I have shed for you, having not leisure then to bemoan my self.

Afterward your Majestie sent my brother unto me, to give me assurance of your love; you called me forth, I am come, I have suppliantly intreated, you have received me. I prostrated my self at your feet, you have raised me with so many favours, and so many tokens of good will, that I could require no more for my safetie. Lask, who hath changed your affection, who hath tarnished our joys, and withered the olives of peace, but she, who being not able to ruin me with weapon in hand, seeks to have my bloud by form of justice.

Behold my accusation and crime; behold all that which hath made me to be clothed with sackcloth, and chained with fetters ordained for Galley-slaves.

The father, who was of an ardent spirit, interrupteth him hereupon, and demandeth, where his wife was? whether he had not sent her into Africk, to pass from thence to Constantinople? The Prince answered, He had onely projected this in his mind, not for any other purpose, but to advise upon the safetie of her person, not knowing as then how matters would stand, and that accidents had taught him, he was wise enough in his counsels, but less happie than he imagined.

The King insisteth, and interrogateth, whether he had not treated alliance with the Emperour Tiberius? He thereunto replied, that he had never practised any other correspondence, but to draw from him some Troups, for the defence of his life: and that so soon as he saw some overture of peace, he had dismissed them, resolving to make no further use of them. He then was pressed upon divers questions, to which he made most pertinent answers, shewing very evidently to the miserable father, the colours and pretexts which they made use of to ruin him, unless passion should cast a film over his eyes.

In the end, seeing he could not convince his son to have practised any thing, since the accord was made between them both, he made a strong sally, and willed him freely to answer one word, upon which he would ground the whole proceeding, to wit, Whether he were not a Roman Catholick? That is it, Sir, saith the Prince, which I avow, which I publish, which I protest. For verily it is a crime, which maketh the Judges become pale, and the offenders laugh. The accusation whereof, is a vow all great souls should profess, and the pain is a felicitie which Martyrs have bought with their bloud. I wish to die a hundred times, if it might be done, for the glorie of that goodly title; so far is it too little, with one mouth to confess the praises of God. Command if you please, that my bodie be hewed and cut in pieces for the profession of the Catholick faith, and then I shall have as many mouthes as wounds, to praise my Saviour, and all those wounds shall be as gates of bloud, to give passage to my soul to the place, where it is expected by so good companie.

The father said thereupon, he was become a fool; and that no man hated life, but he who had ill employed it. The son replied, The misuse had been in heresie, of which he repented him. And at that instant, the Guard received commandment to re-convey him to prison, where he was so comforted with the visitations of God, that finding with much difficulty means to send a Letter to his dear Indegondis, he wrote to her in this manner:

The sixteenth Section.

The Letter of Hermingildus to his dear wife Indegondis, and his generous resolution.

My holy Mistress, from whom I have received the faith and true knowledge of God, I write these lines unto you, clothed with sackcloth, and loaden with fetters in the bottom of a dark dungeon, for the defence of that Religion which you have taught me. If I did not know by experience the invincible force of your heart, and the resolution you practise in affairs which concern the service of God, I had concealed my estate from you, that I might not contristrate objects sensible to nature.

But (most dear wife) you have a forehead too noble to blush at the disgrace of the Crucifix, and a courage too well fortified, to refuse taking part in the liverie of the Saviour of the world. I protest upon mine honour I could never perswade my self, there might be contentment to suffer that which I tolerate, when your innocent mouth preached unto me the reward of suffering, wherewith your bodie had heretofore been gloriously covered. But since my imprisonment, I have felt consolations of God so tastfull, that I cannot think it possible to relish in the world any other antipasts of Paradise. You are not ignorant, that my life and conversation, which hath been so long time plunged in errour and vanitie, deserved not these benefits: but your most pure hands, which you so often have lifted up before Altars for my salvation, have obtained that for me, which much transcended my merit and all my hopes.

The King my father hath been pleased to hear me, and I have pleaded my cause in fetters, with so great assistance from the Heavenly goodnes, that I justified my self in all charges objected against me; and have put the matter into such a condition, that I am no further accused as a thief and homicide, but as a Catholick.

I speedily expect my sentence, and do not think I am put into the state wherein I am to save my life; but I undoubtedly believe this will be the last Letter you shall receive from my hand. I earnestly beseech your loyal heart, that as in this action which shall close up my days, I intend to do nothing unworthie of you, so on your part, act nothing unworthie of me; betraying the happines of my death with tears, which would be little honourable to the condition whereunto God hath called me. I put into the hands of the Divine Providence, both you and your little Hermingildus, the onely pledge of our holy loves.

Be courageous, my dearest love, and after my death take the way of Constantinople; to render your self at the Palace of the Emperour Tiberius, who is a good Prince, and most Catholick. I recommend unto you my poor soul: as for the bodie, let that become of it, which shall please my father. If the alteration of times and affairs bring you back into Spain, there to hold the rank you deserve, my ashes will likewise rejoyce at the odour of your virtues. I hope my death shall not be unprofitable, and that God will make use of it for the good of the Kingdom. You know how many times I have heard you say, that you would have bought the salvation thereof with your bloud; you have already in it employed one part, it is my turn to perform the rest upon a scaffold: For in what place soever you are, I promise my self to be most particularly assisted by your holy prayers.

The good Princes received this Letter, with the news of his death, as we will presently tell you: but in this space of time, Recaredus, the younger brother of Hermingildus, extreamly afflicted, that having been a mediatour of this counterfeit peace, he saw it end in so deplorable a Tragedie, hasteneth to cast himself at the feet of his father; beseeching him with infinite abundance of tears and lamentations, either to give him the stroke of death with his own hand, or save the life of his brother. The father replied: He was a furious fellow, and a traitour to his fortune, and that he ought to suffer justice to be done, which would give him a Crown. That his brother well discovered himself an enemie to his father and the State, since he would not for his sake renounce onely so much as a fantasie Religion; that he was onely questioned upon this point, and that if he could perswade him to reason, he was readie to save his life, Recaredus prepared himself strongly to gain him, and asketh leave to go to the Prison, which was allowed him.

The young Prince seeing his brother covered with sackcloth, and bowed under fetters, was so amazed at this spectacle, that he stood a long time mute as a statue; but in the end, breaking silence with a deep sigh: Ah brother (saith he) it is I, who have have betrayed you; it is I, who have covered you with this fatal sackcloth, I, who have bound and fettered you with these cruel chains, made for ignominious slaves, not for your innocencie. Brother, behold my poynard which I present you, revenge your self upon my guiltie head. I have been culpable enough, in that I have produced from a good intention so bad effects.

Hermingildus beholding him with a peacefull eye, answered: Brother, why do you afflict your self? Full well do I know your innocencie. What innocencie? replied the other, if unadvisedly I be the cause of your death by my disasterous Embassage? But good brother, since you are reduced to this extremitie, I beseech you forgo the name of Catholick: or, if that seem unworthie of your constancie, dissemble for some time, and content the King my father and yours, who requireth from you no other satisfaction.

The good Prince answered: Ah Brother! What have you said, you lately perswaded me to an act of pietie, at the peril of my life, think not now to induce me to an impietie, although it should concern all the lives and Kingdoms of the world. Behold here the time for you to reign, and for me to die. I willingly die for the honour I owe to my Religion, for which I gladly would suffer death a thousand times, if it were possible. I neither accuse you nor my father, whom I more compassionate than my self, and counsel you to render him all the duties of pietie, in the decrepitness of age whereinto he is entered.

As for our step-mother, I pray you rather to endure her nature, than revenge my death. It is the work of God to take knowledge of injuries, and for us to bear them. When my soul shall leave this miserable bodie, it shall ceaselesly pray for you; and I hope, most dear brother, you in the end will renounce this poor libertie, which entertaineth you in the sect of the Arians: and if dying men use to divine, I foretel, that being converted to the faith, you shall lay foundations of Catholick Religion in all this Kingdom, which I am about to moisten with my blood.

Recaredus used all the intreaties he could devise, never being able to shake the constancy of his brother: which much offended King Levigildus, and transported him into resolutions very bloudy. Notwithstanding, those who might yet speak unto him with some liberty, counselled him to precipitate nothing in an affair of so great consequence; saying, there was no apparence that Hermingildus had undertaken any plot against the life and State of his father, since he came so freely to present himself upon his bare word; that those who find themselves guilty, use not to come to burn themselves, as butter-flies at the candle. That his countenance at this interview, was too sweet, his speech too proper, his deportments too candide, to cover so black a mischief: and as for change of Sect, it was no wonder, if the King having given him a Catholick wife, he had taken that Religion with its love; that it was a complement of a lover, which age would bend, experience sweeten, and prudence in the end deface: that he had at that time more need of a Doctour than an executioner, since the apprehensions of God were distilled in the heart, by the help of tongues, not the dint of swords.

The seventeenth Section.

The death of Hermingildus.

THe faction of Goizintha, transported beyond all considerations, ceased not to sound in the ears of the King, that Hermingildus was not an offender, whose power was to be neglected: That his crime was not such as might promise him impunity; that the laws of the Countrey had never tolerated such practises; that he had violated right both divine and humane, becoming a fugitive from his Countrey, an Apostata in his religion, a rebel to the power of his father: in such sort, that to render his wound incurable, he had changed all lenitives into poison. That he had levied arms against his Sovereign, without regard of his age, his name, the majesty of the Kingdom, and the voice of nature, and that there was nothing but the despair of his affairs, which had taken them out of his hands. That he held correspondence with the enemies of the State, to whom he was become an assistant and a companion: and now to make himself as impudent to defend a crime, as bold to execute it, had cast all the fault of his conspiracies upon the Queen, his mother-in-law, and the marriage of his father; shewing himself so insolent in his misery, that there was nothing to be expected but tyranny from his prosperity: that it was to be extreamly arrogant, even to stupidity, to seek to retain a chymæra of piety, contrary to the will of his father: and that never would he be so constant in his superstition, if he had not leagued all the interests of his fortune with the Catholicks, enemies of the Kingdom: That if order were not taken therein, they should be hereafter deprived of the power to deliberate on it, when they had given him all the means to execute it.

The credulity of the unfortunate father was so strongly assaulted by these discourses, that he resolved to go beyond himself: so that on a night, which was Easter Eve, he dispatched a messenger to the prison, with an executioner, to let him know, he was speedily to make his resolution, to choose either life and scepter, by returning to the Religion of the Arians, or death by persisting in the Catholick: That he had a sword and a Crown before his eyes, the one for glory, the other for punishment, the choice of either was referred to himself.

Hermingildus made answer, he had already sufficiently manifested his determination upon this Article; that he would rather die a thousand deaths, than ever separate himself from the Religion which he had embraced with all reason and full consideration. The Commissary replied: The King your Father hath given me in charge, that in case of refusal, I should proceed to execution of the sentence decreed against you. What? saith Hermingildus. He hath condemned you by express sentence, (saith the other) to have your head cut off in this same prison, where you are. Whereupon the holy man fell on his knees to the earth, and said:

My God, my Lord, I yield you immortal thanks, that having given me by the means of my father, a frail, brittle, and miserable life, common unto me with flies and ants; you now afford me on this day by these sentences, a life noble, happie, glorious to all eternitie.

Then rising up again, he requested the Commissary he would by his good favour, suffer a Catholick Priest to come to him, to hear his Confession, and dispose him to death. He answered, It was expresly forbidden by the King his father: but if he would admit an Arian Bishop, he should have one at his pleasure. No (saith he) for I have detested, yea, and do still abhor Arianism, even to the death: and since my father denieth me a favour which ordinarily is granted to the guiltie, I will die, having no other witness but mine own conscience.

Which having said, he kneeled down again, and made his confession to God, praying very long for his father, his step-mother, all his enemies, and pronouncing also at his death, the name of his dear Indegondis, to whom he professed himself bound with incomparable obligations. Then afterward having recommended his soul to God, under the protection of the most holy Virgin, his good Angel, and all the Saints, he stretched out his neck to the executioner, which was cut off with one blow of an ax.

So many ſtars as at that inſtant ſhined in Heaven in the dead ſilence of the night, were ſo many eyes open over the bloudy ſacrifice of this moſt innocent Prince, from whom a wretched father took away, by the hand of a hang-man, the life which he gave him. Had his condition been capable of tears, even Tygers themſelves would have deplored him, ſeeing ſo much piety, ſuch faith, ſo much goodneſs, ſuch worth eclipſed, in a bloud ſo precious, in an Age ſo flouriſhing, in a fortune ſo repleniſhed with hope.

The news of his death haſtened to find out Indegondis, who was yet in Africa, where ſhe alſo received the laſt Letter, which her husband wrote to her out of priſon.

The ſervants that were about her perſon, began to make hydeous lamentations, as if they themſelves had been condemned to death. But the couragious Indegondis kiſſing the letter of her dear husband, then opening it with ſingular reverence, and reading the laſt words, which he as it were had ſteeped in his bloud; ſhe cried out:

Alas! Generous, and faithfull heart! you have done all that, which a good man might: you have manfully fought, you are happily arrived at the Crown. Nothing can be deſired in you, but the imitation of your conſtancy.

Servants, Why do you weep? This is the very day, wherein I am a Queen, and when I eſteem my ſelf the moſt triumphant woman in the world, having my husband a Martyr in Heaven. Give me roſes and flower-de-luces, that I may crown his Image, and honour at the leaſt with theſe teſtimonies a ſoul, which hath left unto us ſuch ſweet odours of virtue.

She had with her, her little Hermingildus, almoſt dead with the wearisomneſs of travel on the way, which indeed had been ſomewhat eaſie for the tenderneſs of his age. The mother beholding him, Go my ſon (ſaith ſhe) follow your good father: God hath given you a favour in your cradle, that he doth not to all children, which is to be baniſhed for the faith, and to take part in the Martyrdom of him who begot you. Go little innocent, and rejoyce with others before the Altar of the Lamb: your mother ſhall not long ſtay behind you.

Others ſay, he was ſent priſoner to the Emperour Mauritius, but without ground.

The child died ſhortly after, and the good Princeſs, having for a long time combatted in a brave manner againſt the apprehenſions of nature, poured forth on a ſudden thick ſobs, and a main tyde of tears, which diſtilled from her eyes againſt her will, whereupon ſhe mildly ſaid:

Alas! my tears, what fitneſs can you find to bemoan a Martyr? My God, it is done: the father and the ſon are alreadie at reſt, there remaineth nothing but to take the mother. Behold two parts of the world, Europe and Africk, which I have filled with my miſeries. If you will that I yet paſs into Aſia, your will be done. But if I no longer be ought, but an unprofitable burden to the earth, what do I here? I have ſpun out all the web which you gave me; I have ended all the hopes of the world; why ſtay you, O my God, to receive my ſoul, which I bear on my lips? She was heard: For in few days, being all waſted with love, travel, and deſires, after an exemplar death, ſhe found her tomb in Africk.

What ſhall I ſay here, and what ſhall I do, to ſhut up this diſcourſe? We have all certain natural ſoftneſſes in the bottom of our ſouls, and ſome humane apprehenſions, which alter the force of our judgement. My pen cannot almoſt paſs over this hiſtory, and not commix the waters of mine eyes with mine ink; and perhaps alſo (you my Reader) cannot peruſe it without compaſſion. It ſeemeth unto you theſe chaſte loves of Hermingildus and Indegondis are too unhappy; that ſuch virtues are cruelly handled, that ſuch noble courages have met with a fortune ſiniſter, hydeous, and perſecutive, even to the tomb. You would gladly ſee theſe brave ſpirits, after ſo many tempeſts, ſuch thunder-claps and whirle-winds, arrive at a Port of ſome large temporal felicity. You would behold them with Crowns on their heads, with Scepters in their hands, with Provinces flouriſhing in revenues, with proſperities perpetually ſmiling in their houſe, with loves free from diſturbance, deſires void of denials, affairs without trouble, greatneſs without change, pleaſures without acerbities, and a long poſterity fully laden with honours. It grieves you, that this poor Prince hath paſſed away as a pearl, parched up with lightening in its growth, or as an eagle ſtrangled in the ſhell. You bewail this Princeſs, that being born in France, ſhe died in Africk, ſeparated by the sword from a husband who loved her ſo tenderly, deprived of a ſon, who gave ſo many good hopes, abandoned by all her allies; but ſome poor waiting-women that buried her with ſorrow ſo full of pitie, that it was of power to move the monſters of Africk to commiſeration. Ah ignorant that we are of the works of God, perpetually fixed to the earth, and deprived of thoſe ſparkles of fire and light, which burn under the moſt generous breaſts! Let us a little draw aſide the curtain, and ſee through ſo many clouds one ſole ray of the Sanctuary. What injury hath the Divine Providence done to Prince Hermingildus, if for a Crown, which is the weather-cock of winds, if for a Scepter, which is the reed of the times, if for a life, which is the harbinger of death, it afford him virtues, delights, and glories, which out-ſtrip the flight of our thoughts, which drie up our mouthes, which out-run our deſires, which ſurmount all our imaginations? What injury, if it make a Saint of him, whoſe name is couched in Martyrologes, whoſe memory liveth in writing, whoſe praiſe flouriſheth in mouthes, whoſe words are nought but honour, and works but bleſſings; whileſt his ſtep-mother Goizintha dies like a dog, and is buried in the opprobrie of her name? What injury, if it have ſo handled the matter, that his father, touched with a lively repentance, hath juſtified him as an innocent, deplored him as a ſon, invoked as a Martyr? If it hath ſanctified his fetters, conſecrated the tower of his priſon, raiſed up his aſhes above all the Crowns of the Kings of Spain? If it hath given him Altars on earth, and a Diadem of beatitudes in Heaven? Is it to have deſpiſed his virtue, neglected his ſufferings, diſobliged his conſtancy, and fruſtrated his travels? What would you have God to have made the virtuous Indegondis? A Queen, delicate, ambitious, covetuous, haughty, which had not ſpit but in gold, walked but on roſes, flown over the heads of men, and putrified in delights? How many ſuch like are there, who have defiled their names with reproach, wearied the earth with their importunities, aſtoniſhed poſterity with their deportments, and peopled hell with their crimes? But this Ladie having been purified with the burning coals of tribulation, iſſued from the hands of God as a veſſel of glory, to make her luſtre reſplendent in the ſight of all Ages.

Ah Ladies, who read this piece, and who many times flatter your ſelves with the title of virtue, in ſome petty tracks of devotion, which have nothing but outward ſemblance, what example of piety ſee you here? What mirrour? what perfection? My eyes dazle in beholding her actions, and my pen fails in writing her praiſes.

What a courage? that a young maid not above fifteen or ſixteen years of age, entereth into a Kingdom with intention to conquer it for God, much otherwiſe than the Cæſars, who ſo many times have devoured it by ambition? What a prudence to tolerate the converſation of a ſtep-mother, whileſt ſhe medled not with her Religion? What liberty of ſpirit, and what ſtrength of words to defend her faith, ſo ſoon as ſhe ſaw her ſelf aſſailed in this virtue, which was more dear unto her than the apple of her eye?

What

What patience to endure to be dragged along upon the pavement by the hair? to be beaten even to bloud? to be thrown into the river? to be used like the dust of the earth for the honour of Jesus Christ, not challenging any one, not complaining, not seeming offended, nay, not telling her husband (into whose bosom she poured forth her most secret thoughts) the affront she had received, for fear to break peace with a creature, who deserved the hatred of all the world? What wisdom, what grace, what eloquence used she in the conversion of her husband? What love for his soul, what zeal for his salvation, what care for his direction? What authority, to stop with a word the armies of the father and son instantly ready to encounter? What resignation of her own will in this separation from her husband? And what a heart of diamond against a thousand strokes of dolours, to take thankfully a death so bloudy, so tragical, so pitifull? To see her self at an instant bereaved of a son and a husband, and of all things in the world, offering up unto God in all her afflictions, the obedience of her heart, prayers of her lips, and victims of all the parts of her body? What triumph, when after her death, her brother-in-law, who had participated of her good instructions, in remembrance of her and her husband, was absolutely converted to the Catholick faith, and changing the whole face of the Kingdom, repealed the banished, restored the Bishops to their Sees, Religion into force, Laws into authority, and the whole Province into peace? What miracle, to see sage Indegondis on the top of all her tropheys, whereof she tendereth homage to God in the glory of Saints? How ought we here to render to her the offerings of our most humble services?

Behold here the limits which I proposed to my self, so to give an end at last to these Histories, having thought it more fit and suitable to my employments to abbreviate my self in these four Models, than unboundedly enlarge them; yet it hath been somewhat difficult with me to make a resolution to put forth this second Volume, among so many duties of our ordinary functions, being thereunto sollicited by entreaties, which held as it were the place of commands.

And I may well say, I were stupid and ungrateful, if I should not confess to have been much excited to prosecute this labour by the honourable invitations, which my Lord Bishop of Belley hath used towards me in his Works, I cannot set too high a price upon his recommendation in such a subject: For he is verily one of the most able and flourishing wits, that ever handled a pen. To see the number of his books, one might say, he began to write so soon as to live, and to consider their worth, it is a wonder, how so many graces and beauties, which other attain not but with much labour, encreased with him as in a soil natural for eloquence. If there be any slight discourses, who amuse themselves to argue upon some words of his writings, it is not a matter unusual, seeing we are now in an Age, where there are some who revive the example of those corrupted Grecians, that preferred a sauce made by the Cook Mithecus, before the divine Works of Phidias.

If this piece have given you any contentment, take the pains to read it over again sometimes at your leisure, tasting the Maxims therein with an utilitie worthy of its subject. For believe me, the precipitation now adays used in slightly running over all sorts of books, causeth a certain indigestion in the mind, wherewith it is rather choaked than nourished. Reading is never good, if the understanding take not occasion thereby, to negotiate by meditation and industrie, that which concerneth the health and ornament thereof.

1 TIM. 1.

To the King of Ages Immortal and Invisible, to GOD alone be honour and glorie given, for ever and evermore.

THE HOLY COURT.

MAXIMS OF CHRISTIANITIE, AGAINST THE PROPHANE COVRT, Divided into three Parts;

WHEREOF

The { I. / II. / III. } Treateth of the { Divinitie. / Government of this life. / State of the other World. }

THE THIRD TOME.

Written in French by NICHOLAS CAUSSIN of the S. of JESUS; and tranſlated into Engliſh by Sr. T. H.

LONDON,
Printed by William Bentley, and are to be ſold by JOHN WILLIAMS, at the Crown in St. Pauls Church-yard. 1650.

TO THE
RIGHT HONOURABLE

LADIE FRANCES,

Counteſs of PORTLAND, and Baroneſs WESTON.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

THE excellent endowments of your ſoul, acknowledged even by envie, and admired by truth, together with your known propenſion to the reading of pious Books, invites me to this Dedication, as proper for your ſweet retirements, and conſonant to my intentions, which onely aim in ſome meaſure to expreſs my humbleſt reſpects to your Honour. The matters herein handled, are Inſtructions, apt to inform the mind by way of Maxims, learned diſcourſes made familiar to leſs able underſtandings, and choiſe Hiſtories exemplifying both, that ſo all ſorts of Readers, though of different capacitie, diſproportionable judgement, may find ſomewhat to entertain their curioſitie. My ſcope (Excellent LADIE) in this Tranſlation, is through your Honours hand, and under ſo noble a Patronage, to convey the third Part of the HOLY COURT into Engliſh light, which (as the firſt breathed air under the benign aſpect of her ſacred Majeſtie) may alſo hope in this latter piece with like happineſs to be crowned with your Honors chearful acceptation. The height of my ambition is by this poor way to ſerve you, ſince more ample demonſtrations are wanting to my weak abilities; as likewiſe not to doubt your noble diſpoſition will be ſatisfied with ſuch my humble acknowledgements. The advancement of virtue, and depreſſion of vice is my Authour's ſcope throughout the whole Work, which he elegantly purſues, and victoriouſly atchieveth. Triumphs of that kind beſt become his grave and ſerious pen, whileſt my task is faithfully in our language to imitate his living figures, though in dead and diſcoloured forms, and confidently to tell your Honour, that I will ever be

The moſt Obſequious Servant of Your Commands,

T. H.

TO

MONSIEUR MONSIEUR,

THE PRINCE.

SIR,

THE excellency of the ſubject I handle in theſe diſcourſes, makes me reflect on that of your Greatneſs, to offer you a Work, which being conceived by your authority, muſt needs ſeek for birth under your favour. It is the third Part of a Court abſolutely holy, which not unlike the Citie S. John ſaw in his profound comtemplations, cannot aſcend from our manners to Heaven, unleſs it deſcend from Heaven into our manners. I likewiſe endeavour to faſhion it in Books, by the model of things celeſtial, to imprint it on lives; and I now undertake the defence of truth, which conſtituting your ſalvation, and compoſing your happineſs, well deſerve to be the moſt ſerious employments of your mind.

It is true (Sir) all Maxims of State, that depend not on the Maxims of God, are effects of carnal prudence, which end in fleſh; and all fortunes that reſt not on him, who with three fingers ſupporteth the globe of the earth, rather purſue the way of precipices, than the path of exaltation. The wiſdom of the world loves nothing ſo much, as that whereof it is moſt ignorant: it runs after honour, not knowing what honour is; ever hungry and ſtill needy, nor having any other aim, but to make it ſelf a Miſtreſs over giddie ſpirits, to become the ſlave of all paſſions. Which maketh me ſay, there are none but the blind, who ſeek after it, the miſerable who find it, the ſottiſh who ſerve it, and the forlorn who tie themſelves to its principles. But the wiſdom of Heaven, which I in theſe Maxims preſent you, is ſo tranſcendently ſublime above all humane inventions, as the light of ſtars ſurpaſſeth the petty ſparklings and flitting fires of the earth: It is that which leiſurely marcheth by holy paths, to the ſources of day-light, and as being preſent before the throne of God, beholdeth glory and felicitie unfolded in his hands. It is the element of great ſouls, ſuch as yours; and when they once are throughly ſettled therein, they find taſtfulneſs which turneth into nutriment, and nutriment which paſſeth to immortalitie. Your prudence may read in your own experience, what I expreſs in my Treatiſes, nor need you go any further than your own life, to meet with the proofs of theſe excellent verities.

You know (Sir) how the Divine Providence in the firſt flower of your age, drew you from ill ways, and ſnatched you out of the hands of infidelity, as a Conſtantine from the palace of Diocletian, to ſerve as a Buckler for the Church, whereof impietie would have made you a perſecutour. This Providence knew ſo well how to ſeparate bloud from manners, that it cauſed you to demoliſh what your Anceſtours had raiſed, and preſerving their dignity without touching their errours, to make of the unhappineſs of their judgement, the beginning of your felicity. From thence you ſee with what ſucceſs the hand of God hath conducted you to the height of this moſt eminent glory, wherein France at this preſent beholds you, as a Prince accompliſhed in the experience of affairs, and times, the Father of good counſels, the undertaker of great actions, endowed with a ſpirit which ſeems an eternal fire, and to be parallel'd by nothing, but the goodneſs of your own heart.

You live peaceable, as in the right ſphere of true greatneſs, where you perpetually reflect on two Poles, God and the King: You ſeek for the one in the other, and you walk to the God of life, by the moſt lively of his Images. His Arms are beheld to proſper in your hands, as well as his Edicts in your mouth. You have born thunder, and Olives throughout France under your protection, awfull at one time, and amiable at another, but ever proſperous in both. Yea, fully to crown your happineſs, the Divine goodneſs hath afforded you a houſe flouriſhing in riches and honours, which comprehendeth in its latitude, two Princes of the bloud to ſerve as pillars for the State. It gave you a wife, who hath made of her fruitfulneſs, the trophey of her virtues, and entered by love into an eclipſe, to become the Mother of lights, and bring forth children to bear the hope of Flower-de-luces. The eldeſt Son, whom your Excellency hath committed as a ſacred pledge to our Colledge at Bourges, would trouble us to tell you from whence he hath taken ſuch, and ſo many ſplendours, and ſparkling flames of wit, which dazle the eyes of thoſe who have the honour to be near him, were not you his Father. He is a Pearl, who maketh it appear by the equality of his Orient, that if Nature have equalled his birth to the greateſt on earth, he will equal his virtues to his extraction.

SIR,

SIR, I speak this ingeniously, that you may both behold in your own Person, what I treat in my books, as also understand that true piety soweth the seeds of the most solid greatness. But besides, the relation this Design seems to have to the pleasure of God over you, I find much obligation to offer it you as a slender testimony of a singular gratitude in our Superiours and our whole Societie, which would willingly suffer their affections to pass through my pen, if it had as much eloquence as the main body tenders respect and zeal to your service. You have been pleased to make it known by your good purposes, to love it by election, defend it by justice, honour it with your opinion, encrease it with your liberalities, and if your benefits be ornaments unto it, your judgement serve for Apologies.

I received a notable portion in your favours, whilest you resided in Bourges, where your Excellency called me to deliver the Word of God, and to confess your virtues in my discourses, as I must acknowledge my discourses to proceed from your virtues. It was by your conversation I perceived, that as there is nothing too high for your understanding, so there is not any thing too low for your bounty. God hath bestowed on you the gift which the Scripture attributeth to the Patriarch Joseph, to oblige hearts with sweetness; not unlike the Engines of Archimedes, which made water mount in descending: so yours, causeth not your humility to descend, but to make it re-ascend to the source of the prime sublimity. Which done, not presuming any thing in regard of your Excellency, but daring all through your courtesie, I present these MAXIMS of the Holy Court, of which many will make their reading, others their precepts: but you will (I hope) frame your virtues of them on earth, to make them your Crowns in Heaven. So wisheth

SIR, Your most humble and most obsequious servant in our Lord,

N. CAUSSIN. S. J.

The Design and Order of the BOOK.

I Find (Courteous Reader, my Works do insensibly encrease under the favour of thy good opinion, as plants sprout under the aspect of the most benign stars. I had confined my self to that which concerneth the Historie of Courts, and still rest in the same resolution: But saw a piece verie necessarie in these times, wanting in my work, which was the Treatise of MAXIMS, and majestie of our Religion.

I almost durst not undertake it, (so much the subject seemed to require judgement, preparation, and abilitie:) But God having inspired me with a strong conceit, I might be favoured by those to whom he hath given full power over me, submitted the slendernes of my wit, to the power of their wills, perswading my self a silly nothing, may become a matter important in their hands.

You know, how having a purpose to frame a Christian Institution in the HOLY COURT for men of qualitie, I began with their obligation to Pietie; and consequently shewed the Obstacles must be vanquished to arrive thither. Then I gave precepts of the principal virtues most concern them, which were waited on with the Histories of Courts, abbreviated into four Models.

In this (that the good Court may triumph) I represent a combat of two Courts, the Holy, and Counterfeit; the Religious, and Prophane; wherein I unfold the victories of the chief Maxims of Christianitie, divided into three Parts, whereof the one treateth of the Divinitie, the other of the Government of this present life, and the third, of the State of the other world.

You may behold how divine the subject is, and that the other Books were onely to prepare you to these great lights, the rays whereof I diffused. I must needs tell you, that being surpassed by so many excellent men, who have worthily handled a pen, I have in this seriously sought to go beyond my self.

I have contracted large subjects into little Tracts, which hath been no small labour; there being not a Maxim whereof I could not have compiled an ample Volume: But imagining conceptions are like hairs, which more easily may be filletted up than dissheveled, I have endeavoured to give you more substance in this Book, than words and amplifications. And seeing all the subjects are very serious, I have sweetened them with excellent Examples, to afford fit nourishment both to Eagles and Doves.

All which I now offer you in this, is more than my promise, thinking it better to give without promise, than to promise and not give. Your affection sets an edge upon my industrie, and if labour waste the bodie for your avail, and reserve works of the wit for posteritie, it shall be as a Cedar, which causing the death of the living, seems to give life to the dead.

This Tome being replenished with important considerations, cannot be for him who cursorily reads it with those delicious loytrings, which sleightly furnish out the titles of Books, and thence derive nothing, but wind. Give me (Gentle Reader) the contentment that God may be glorified in your manners by reading this, as I here seek to honour him in his works.

MA-

MAXIMS
OF THE
HOLY COURT, AGAINST THE
PROPHANE COVRT.
First Part touching the DIVINITIE.

The first MAXIM.
Of Religion.

PROPHANE COURT.

That matters of faith being invisible and uncertain, we must tie our selves to the world, which is visible and certain.

I. THere is nothing so reasonable in nature, as to desire good, nothing so eminent, as to know much; nothing so absolute, as to have the power of all: but there is not any thing so profitable, as to proceed to true wisdom by a mysterious ignorance, and to be in in created light by blindness. The soul becometh another world, by the means of knowledge; or rather as God createth a world in essence, that, frameth another in Idæa: But if truth and love do not co-operate therein, man tormenteth himself in his knowledges, and createth evils without end, from which he cannot free himself, no not by issuing out of life.

The Prophane Court (say you) leads you into a visible world, but it is to behold miseries in it: To a world certain, but it is to teach you that happiness being therein uncertain, loss is undoubted. All we have in the world is base, caityf, and difficult, without knowledge of the true God. It is but a labourson turmoyl of affairs, an amazement of transitory pleasures, an illusion of deceitfull blessings, which trouble us, and starve us in stead of satisfying our desires, or nourishing our hopes: But the knowledge of God is the root of immortalitie.

The happines to be born a Christian.

Scire justitiam, & virtutem tuam radix est immortalitatis. Sap. c. 15. 3.

I then require of you (O Reader) that in the beginning of this discourse you adore the wisdom of God over you, who hath selected you out of the Mass of so many Infidels, to inrole you in the number of his children, and hath drawn you from the confusions of so great darkness, to call you into the light of Christianity. Behold so many people covered under the veil of shadie night, born in errour, to live in bruitishness, and die in despair of eternal salvation, and you are enlightened by the rays of God, illuminated by his wisdom, guided by his direction, covered with his protection, nourished with his bloud, animated with his life, & are made participant of his felicity.

HOLY COURT.

That matters of faith being most certain and very excellent, we should fix the whole order of our life unto it.

If you be desirous in some measure to observe the excellency of your Faith and Religion, consider, the perfection of any thing is known by three principal notes; Essence, Operation, and Repose. All which, you have visible in the wisdom of Heaven you profess. His Essence is of an infallible verity; his Operations miraculous, and his Repose an unchangeable happiness. For what assurance more solid, than to have a God Incarnate for Authour, who is come to cast the seeds of a golden Age, and adopt a new world in the bloud of an eternal Testament? Who can better teach us the secrets of God, than God himself? I cannot account him (said Varro) a skilfull Master, who learns nothing of himself: And he hath understood all in the bosom of his Eternal Father, and from his own wisdom, which is no other than his Essence. He was promised from the beginning of the world, preached through all Ages, given as a pledge to the memory of all mankind, so long before his coming was appointed, his time, birth, life, and death. He came at his prefixed time, all environed with prodigies and miracles, all composed of virtues, making greatness to proceed out of the lowlines of his humble and painfull life, as lightening flashes break through the obscurity of night.

Three tokens of the perfection of a thing. S. Thomas 1. p. q. 6.

Solidity of our religion.

Varro apud Vincen. tom. 2. Illum quidem eruditorem elige, quem magis mireris in suis: nihil magnificum docebit qui à se nihil didicerit.

2. What foundations think you hath he laid of your faith? Men believe men upon a little piece of paper, yea, very often upon the breath of a silly word. And Jesus would not be believed, but by writing his Law with the rays of an infinite number of Prophesies, which were verified in his Person, with the bloud of more than ten millions of Martyrs, who suffered for his doctrine; with miracles so visible and irreprochable, that they changed even executioners into Confessours, and Tyrants into Martyrs.

The foundations of faith

To speak plainly, he might have tied you unto him, and not made use of so many things: For what is more essential for the foundation of a belief, than the revelation of the first Verity, which might have been known to us by fewer proofs? But behold his goodness, and how he dealeth with our infirmities, as to be willing to strike us so sensibly with reflection of the greatness of our faith, to win us to his direction. The Jews ran after a simple figure, and tied themselves to weak elements. The Gentiles are filled with childish toys, and dotages, which made the most learned amongst them to mock at their religion, and say, That should their gods have appeared alive, in such manner, as they painted them, they would be accounted Monsters. In the heart of Mahumetans, a tyrannous law is planted with sword and empalements; No man is permitted to dispute upon it, (so many ridiculous and shamefull things there are in it) which makes a soul recoyl in the very beginning, that hath never so little humanity. But Christian Religion hath appeared in the bosom of glory, ever holy, ever victorious, ever opposed by the wicked, and still triumphant over impiety. It is enriched by its losses, glorified by its persecutions, established by its totterings, and honoured by its wounds. God for it hath opened all the most learned lips, directed all the best pens, and for it bound himself with as many witnesses, as there are letters in the Scripture. Have not we then cause to proclaim with Tertullian: O how happie are we, to say, God engageth his own faith by oath to confirm ours! And are not we worthie of all unhappiness, if we any whit distrust this Eternal Veritie?

Senec. l. de superstitione apud S. August. l. 6. de Civitate Dei.

O beates nos quorum causa Deus jurat! O miserrimos, si nec juranti Deo credimus! Tertul. c. 4. de pœn.

3. You perhaps will say, all it teacheth is very high, and that to be faithfull, one must (as it were) cease to be reasonable. But tell not me faith is opposite to reason: It is above, not against it; it commandeth our sense to obey God; it laboureth to raise, not demolish; or if it demolish, it is but by ruining rebellion, to establish obedience. What is more reasonable, than to subject your reason to God, and to suffer your self sweetly to pass along in the current of this puissant Authority, which hath drawn so many Ages after it, destroyed so many errours, gained so many battels, and won so many Crowns? Faith is a great gift, although it be the gift of the humble. It is the first life of humane understanding, the Jasper stone which serves for foundation of the Citie of God, the virginitie of the soul, the source which watereth all the felicities of mankind. Why are you amazed, when God would have you believe that which is above your understanding, and surpasseth your knowledge? It is a most happie ignorance (said S. Hilarie) which rather deserveth reward than pardon, when one trusteth to the word of God, in that he cannot comprehend. You see how policie is guided by human faith, without which all the world were nought but disorder, and life a perpetual confusion: And yet you think it a strange matter, that God in his great policie exacteth a faith absolutely Divine, to serve as an enterance into your felicity. If you take away humane faith, and stick fast in the resolution not to believe any thing but what you see, you will become a monster, fit to be excluded from humane society; you will disturb the beds of the most chast wedlocks; you will accuse the modesty of the sincerest women; you will make the children to be doubted, not onely by the fathers, but the mothers also, who are so often enforced to believe mid-wives and nurses; you will almost make doubt whether you have a liver, a heart, a spleen, or any lungs, nor will believe you have any thing, but that which you cannot behold without death. These are considerations which Saint Augustine and Theodoret pursued in the Treatise they wrote of Faith, by which they shew the necessity of humane belief, to pass on further to the Divine. Then what occasion have you to make your sense rebel against God, who becomes a surety for what he promiseth us; since we every moment, must give credit to the fidelitie of most abject persons in the actions of civil life? Who seeth not that to take faith from Religion, is to tear the Altar out of the Temple, the apple from the eye, and the heart out of humane body.

That to be faithfull, is to be conformable to reason.

Guillelm. Parif. de moribus, & Guillel n. Lugdun. de fide. Prima vita mentis humanæ, &c.

S. Hilarius 8. de Trinit. Habet non tam veniam, quam præmium ignorare quod credas.

Necessity of faith.

Si quod nescitur credendum non est, quomodo servient parentibus liberi quos parentes suos esse non credent?

S. August. l. de utilitate credendi. Sine hoc nec ipsa exigi potest vita communis. Cypr. in symbol. Apostol.

Do you not consider likewise, that it was an invention worthy the Eternal Wisdom, to draw us to him by three degrees, which are as three Heavens observeable in nature, and above nature? The first is that of science, the second of faith, the third of glory. Science appertaineth not to the whole world: All are permitted to live well, but few to speak well. Some have not will for it, others means. Some have no inclination, others can never make application. Needs must then three parts of mankind be deprived of the knowledge of things most divine, and persevere in ignorance, according to the unhappiness of accidents, without the help of faith which repleniseth us with the knowledge of God. Besides, we find sciences are extreamly sophisticate, as well through the weakness of our understanding, as the corruption of our manners. Academies are framed as palaces of veritie; yet it is never so ill handled, as in places where shew is made to adore it. Under the shadow of defence it is rent asunder, and as the ancient Telethias, it is strangled in making much of it. What inconvenience then do we find, if God, to remedy this misery, hath given us faith, which contenteth the whole world by its universality, as it assureth all well composed minds by its certainty. If the perfection of our nature had been limited within natural actions, divine faith had not needed to conduct us: But since God hath called us to a felicity above nature, were it not fit we were directed thereto by a supernatural knowledge?

Great Providence of God in the establishment of faith.

Lactantius.

S. Thom. 2. 2. q. 2. art. 3.

4. Consequently look on the Operation of Religion, the second note of its excellency: you shall see the fountain of Mordechæus, which in the beginning creepeth on with little noise through the meadows, and in an instant turneth into a great river, and this river into light, and this light into a sun; but a sun which affordeth lustre, and water to all the world.

The powerfull operations of our Religion. Esther. 10.

The powers of the world which glitter with so much pomp, have this almost ever proper to them, to be either unprofitable, or malign. What did those great Philosophers, who framed worlds in their ideas? What did the Plato's, Aristotoles, and Zeno's? Could they ever perswade any one silly hamlet to live under those goodly Common-wealths they instituted on paper? What did the Alexanders, Cæsars, and Pompeys, with all their forces, but tend to the destruction of mankind? It is a strange thing that the last of them caused a Temple to be built to Minerva, over the gate whereof he commanded to be engraven, that he had taken, routed, and slain two millions, one hundred four-score and three thousand men; pillaged, or sunk eight hundred forty six ships, made desolate one thousand five hundred thirty eight Cities, and towns. Behold how the great-ones of the earth make themselves remarkable, as dreadfull Comets, by the ruin of the whole world. But Jesus in establishing his Religion, would not be powerfull but to do good, since, He is the Adamant (saith Salvianus) who hath drawn this mightie mass of Iron of all Ages with the hands of his love, and lively affections towards mankind.

Plin. l. 7. c. 26. Cruel vanity of Pompey.

Salvian. de providentia l. 4. Chalybem affectu quasi spirante suspendens amoris sui manibus.

How can the tree be better known, than by the fruits? And upon what may one more reasonably ground the judgement made of Religion, than upon the works thereof?

What have all other Religions taught, but to cut the throats of children, to embrue Altars of Idols with bloud; but to create ordures, and abominations, to cover secret mischiefs with the veyl of hypocrisie, to authorize fables, and canonize vice? But Christian Religion is that alone which brought piety into the world, where it was before unknown. It is that which hath crushed murderous and adulterous gods, under the ruins of their Temples, which demoliſhed profane altars, ſuppreſſed ſacrifices of humane bloud, deſtroyed Amphitheaters, where they gloried to tear men in pieces, which confounded witch-crafts, tamed pride, quailed covetouſneſs, ſtopped the inundations of luxury, repreſſed extravagancies of ambition, choaked enraged deſires of avarice, and turned a land of Tigers, Leopards, and fiery Serpents, into a Paradiſe of delights. It is that which drew from Heaven all the virtues, whereof ſome had before been unheard of, others contemned, the reſt perſecuted. It is that which taught humility, chaſtity, virginity, modeſty, temperance, juſtice, and fortitude: That, which diſcovered true prudence, which opened the ſources of contemplation, which furniſhed out the Hoaſt of religious Orders, which brake ſo many chains of the world, trampled under foot ſo many Idols of gold and ſilver, ſeated poverty in the throne of glory, erected ſtatues of innocency, eſtabliſhed purity even in thoughts. Is it not that which ſo many Martyrs, Confeſſours, Doctours, Virgins have done, whoſe triumphs we daily honour? Is it not upon theſe, that Jeſus having vanquiſhed ſo many monſters, imprinted the rays of his ſanctity, which is preſerved, and maintained, even in the corruption of Ages, in the perſons of ſo many as God hath reſerved to himſelf? Muſt we not confeſs, that a life led according to the doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt, is a manifeſt conviction of all errours, and a little miracle in the world?

under

5. From thence when we conſider by what means our Saviour hath wrought this eſtabliſhment, which are found ſo contrary to all humane ways, and how he acteth in ſuffering, how he draws to him in rejecting, how he is exalted by his abaſings, glorified by his ignominie, enriched by poverty; how he doth raiſe by deſtroying, how he lives by his death, and is eternized by dying: This is it which tranſporteth humane underſtanding into admiration of the greatneſs of our Religion.

The repoſe which our faith promiſeth.

6. Finally, if you alſo caſt your eye on this laſt perfection of Repoſe, you ſhall well underſtand, how Alexander, after he had conquered the Perſians, being deſirous to paſs into the Indies, thoſe who thought they were at the worlds end, diſſwaded him, and ſaid, It was time for Alexander to reſt, where the ſun and the world ended. But our Religion goes much further than the ſun, and this inferiour condition of the world. It hath the total univerſe for object of its travel, and the Kingdom of Heaven for its repoſe. All other Sects propoſed pleaſures to themſelves for object of their pretenſions, which might make them deſire the body of a horſe, or a hog, to enjoy it with the more advantage. But God, lifting us up to himſelf above the tracks of the ſun and time, promiſeth the ſame delights which he hath for himſelf in the viſion, poſſeſſion, and fruition of that divine face, which makes all the Happy. (a) We know this houſe of morter and clay failing, wherewith we are covered, God hath prepared an eternal building for us in Heaven, not made by the hand of man, as the Apoſtle aſſureth us, and as we ſhall deduce towards the end of theſe Treatiſes. Thither it is our faith paceth roundly on, beholding with a purified eye, the lights of Heaven, a God inviſible as if he were already viſible. Unto this life it is we prepare our ſouls, and begin on earth to make the firſt eſſays of Beatitude.

Tempus eſt Alexandrum cum orbe & ſole deſinere. Senec. Suaſor.

(a) Scimus, quoniam ſi terreſtris domus noſtræ habitationis hujus diſſolvitur, quòd ædificationem à Deo habemus, domum non manufactam æternam in cœlis. 2 Cor. 5. Inviſibilem tanquam videns ſuſtinuit. Heb. 11. 27.

7. I then demand of you (O Noble men) whether all this well conſidered, you ought not to abhor theſe petty undertakers, who ſeem to come into the world, not to receive Rules of Faith in it, but to preſcribe them. They who cannot reform a ſilly flie in the works of Nature, will make themſelves Monarchs in the belief of our faith, and trick up anew this great work of Religion, which derives its accompliſhment from God. They believe what pleaſeth themſelves, to diſpleaſe the prime Verity, and create a new ſymbol in the chymæraes of their wits, to introduce an impiety into Chriſtianity. Needs muſt they have a fling at the Bible, as if it were the book of a man; labour about the fountain-heads of the four rivers of terreſtrial Paradiſe, the ſpeaking ſerpent, Noah's Ark, the Tower of Babel, the red Sea, the jaw-bone and foxes of Samſon, as it the Omnipotency of God were not a pledge ſufficient enough, againſt all theſe weakneſſes and curioſities of wit: which, ſaith Tertullian, are doctrines of devils, grown up to pleaſe the itch of incredulous ears. We muſt believe one Article, and leave another; believe the Trinity, and doubt of the Sacrament, Invocation of Saints, Purgatory, Images, and Ceremonies of the Church, as if it were not evident, that whoſoever divideth faith, hath none at all. It is not much to the purpoſe to diſpute of Religion, after the ſweat of Confeſſours, bloud of Martyrs, and ſo many millions of miracles. Never would belief be ſo ſick, were it not preceded by the death of virtue, all will be unhappy for them, who looſe piety, the root of happineſs. But what repoſe hath a Catholick, who may dying ſay: I truſt to God for a gift, which cannot proceed but from God. I die in the faith of Conſtantine, Theodoſius, Clodovæus, S. Lewis, and ſo many millions of Saints. I go where all the wiſeſt and moſt entire part of mankind doth go. I follow the authoritie of eighteen General Councels, wherein all Ages aſſembled together the wiſeſt men of the world. I die in the belief of the Church, which is profeſſed throughout all the habitable world. The living and the dead, The ſtones and marbles of the Tombs of mine Anceſtours ſpeak for me: The ſtars will fall from the Heavens before my faith can be ſhaken.

Tert. de præſcript. Doctrinæ dæmoniorum prurientibus auribus natæ.

The notable aſſurance of a Catholick.

And therefore (O Catholicks) ſtrike at Heaven gate by continual prayer, ask of the Father of lights a lively Faith, a moſt ſincere zeal towards your Religion; ſuffer not your judgement to change in the maſſie compoſition of body, plunge it not in ſenſuality, poliſh it for the great fruition of God, entertain it with conſideration of his beauty, nouriſh it with antipaſts of his glory. It onely appertaineth to ſenſual ſouls, black, and diſtruſtfull, to ſuffer themſelves to fall into puſillanimities and faintneſs, which leſſen the eſteem we ſhould have of our vocation towards Chriſtianity. It onely appertaineth to carnal ſpirits, and who want faith in the houſe of faith, to ſet the riches and affairs of the world above Religion. But you (O Great-men) learn hereafter to value your ſelves, not by theſe frail and periſhable bleſſings, which environ you by that skin which covers you, by thoſe falſe ornaments of life which diſguiſe you, by all thoſe beauties, which never are nearer ruin, than when they moſt ſparkle with luſtre. Learn to behold all humane things from the top of the Palace of Eternity, and you ſhall ſee them like rotten pieces, which poſſeſs a nothing of times infinitie. Why do we here entertain our ſelves with earthly conſiderations, as fire, which abſented from its ſphere, is fed with fat and coals. Let us open our boſoms to theſe fair hopes wherewith the Religion we profeſs, ſweetly repleniſheth our hearts. We no longer are pilgrims and vagabonds, nor ſtrangers of the Teſtaments: but Citizens of Saints, and the domeſticks of God: built on the foundation of Apoſtles and Prophets, on the fundamental ſtone, which is Jeſus Chriſt.

That zeal ought to be had towards Religion.

Hoc eſt fidem in domo fidei non habere. Cyprian. de mortalitate.

Ephes. 2. 19.

Let us enter into this goodly train of Ages, into this admirable fellowſhip of Patriarchs, Martyrs, and Virgins. Let us haſten to the ſources of light, and never end but in infinitie.

Errours of the times. S. Hilarius l. 8. de Trinit. Fidem potius ipſi conſtituunt quàm accipiunt.

The first EXAMPLE upon the first MAXIM.

Of the esteem one ought to make of his Faith and Religion.

The PERSIAN CONSTANCY.

Drawn out of Theodoret, Cassiodorus, & Epiphanes. Theod. l. 5. c. 38. Epiph. Scolasticus. Cassiod. histor. tripart. l. 10. c. 32. Baro. tom. 5. anno 420. & alii.

IF the estimation of things eternal, do not as yet sufficiently penetrate your heart, reflect on that, which so many valiant Champions have done, to preserve a blessing, which you presently possess by grace, and which you often dis-esteem through ingratitude. I will produce one example amongst a thousand, able to invite the imitation of the most virtuous, and admiration of all the world. In the time when Theodosius the younger swayed the Eastern Empire, the Persians, who had been much gained by the industry of the Emperour Arcadius his father, and afterward entertained by his infinite sweetness and courtesie, lived in good correspondence of amity with the Christians; so that many of our Religion adventured themselves in their Territory; some to make a fortune in the Court, others for pleasure, many for commerce, and the rest there to establish true piety.

Matters of Religion proceeded then very prosperously, and the most eminent men of the Kingdom shut up their eyes against the Sun, which this Nation adored, to open them to the bright Aurora of Christianity. But as there are some who never enjoy any thing, so there are others who never have enough. Some Christians not contented with their progressions, which were well worthy of praise, thought they lost all, out of the desire they had to leave nothing undone. Which is the cause, I much approve those Ancients, who placed the images of wisdom over the gates of great houses, with this inscription: Experience is my mother. So the wisest and most experienced thought, nothing was to be precipated, & that mean advancements accompanied with safety, were more to be valued than great splendours which drew precipices, and ruins after them. On the contrary, young and fiery spirits thrust all upon extremitie, supposing their power extended to the measure of their passion. Nothing is more dangerous in any affair, than when indiscreet fervour takes the mask of zeal, or that a fever of Reason passeth for a virtue. All his thoughts are deified, his foot-steps sanctified, and although nothing be done for God, it is said, all is for him.

Indiscreet zeal.

Helinandus apud Vincent. Usus me genuit.

Bishop Audas, a man endowed with great and singular virtues, but extreamly ardent, and unable to adapt his zeal to the occasion of times, needs would countenance the humour of the blind multitude, and went out in the midst of the day to destroy a Pyræum, which was a Temple wherein the Persians kept fire to adore it. Men quickly enflamed in matters of Religion, fail not to raise a great sedition, which came to the notice of King Ildegerdes. Audas is sent for, to give an account of this act: He defendeth himself with much courage, and little succes for the Christians benefit: for the King turning his proper justification into crime, condemns him upon pain of death to re-edifie the Temple he had demolished; which he refusing to do, was presently sacrificed to the fury of Pagans. Theodoret blames him that he unseasonably ruined the Temple, and convinceth him by the example of S. Paul, who seeing in Athens many Altars dedicated to false God, contented himself with refuting the error, without making use of the hammer to destroy it, as well fore-seeing the time was not yet come: yet withal commanded this man, who rather chose death, than to become an Authour of impiety in the re-establishment of this Temple.

Audas destroyeth a Pyræum. Commotions for matters of Religion. Others Baranaves, or Goronaves. Judgement of Theodoret upon this action.

Terrible persecution.

The rage of Idolaters by the Magi (professed enemies of our Religion) was not wholly extinct in the bloud of Audas, but stirred up a violent persecution, which almost proceeded to the undermyning the foundations of Christian religion in Persia. Men were every where seen to be flayed and roasted, pierced with bodkins and arrows, thereby becoming spectacles of terrour and pitie, to all those who beheld them. Some were exposed to wasps in the boyling ardours of the Sun: Others thrown into caves, and places filled with infection, to be devoured by rats, and slowly gnawn by ugly vermine: Their members fell in pieces, and their life daily distilled drop after drop, their faith unshaken, which the sword of persecution sought for even in their entrails. Their members were not tormented, for they had none but wounds, for they were all over covered with them: and as torments redoubled one upon another, gave no end to their sufferings, so God found the means to finish their pain, and life by the eternity of their crowns.

The King seeing so dreadfull tortures rather served to publish the glory of the Combattants, than ruin their virtue, resolved upon other cruelties, which being apparently less violent, were in effect much more pernicious.

There were among the Christians, two Lords of prime quality, the one whereof was called Hormisdas, the other Suenes, who being the two eyes of the Court, and Standard-bearers of Christianity, the endeavour of the Gentils was most violent against them to force them to abjure Religion. Hormisdas is first summoned to return to the Persian superstition, and being sent for to the Palace, the King who much esteemed him, both for his great nobility (for he was of the bloud Royal) as also for the services his father had done to the Crown in the quality of the Governour of a Province, unwilling to loose him, he made tryal of all sorts of allurements, to gain him to his opinion.

Hormisdas, & the strength of his will.

But the brave Champion stood firm in his belief, telling the King with many excellent reasons, that destroying the faith of his true God in Persia, he would bury the loyalty due to his Majesty in the ruins thereof: which was the cause that Ildegerdes, in stead of yielding the homage he owed to reason and truth, became furiously chollerick, so that degrading him of honour, and confiscating all his goods, yea, leaving him nought at all, but a poor pair of linnen breeches, he sent him out to keep the camels of the Army; adding to this great inhumanity the most barbarous scorn could be invented against a gentleman, endowed with such excellēt parts. But this couragious heart, which had studied the glory of the Cross in the deep abyss of the ignominie of Jesus, drave camels before the eyes of an Army, wherein he had commanded with such alacrity, as others govern Empires, and thought his nakedness more glorious, than the purple of Monarchs.

The King one day beholding him out of a chamber window among the camels, roasted under the scorching Sun, and all covered over with dust, felt his heart mollified by the effect of his own cruelty, and calling him into his palace, after he had laid before him the worth of his extraction, and the noble employments wherewith he meant to honour him, he clothed him with rich apparel, and conjured him by all the ways of friendship, to return to the throne of honour, by forsaking his Religion. But Hormisdas displeased with such discourse, took the robes were cast over his shoulders, and tore them in pieces in the Kings presence, saying: Sir, keep your gifts and impieties, and know Hormisdas will never do any thing unworthy his courage: which was the cause Ildegerdes thrust him naked out of the Court, and sent him back again to his camels, where he ware out a long & painful martyrdom.

The same storm fell at that time upon Suenes, one of the wealthiest and most powerful in the kingdom, and who had a thousand servants in his family. Officers were sent to seize on his whole estate possessed by him, not to maintain riot, but cherish piety; so that in a short time, he saw himself reduced to beggery. But he weighing how Almighty God, who clotheth Heaven with beauties of light, and in the spring-time maketh a garment for the earth, bordred and adorned with so many millions of flowers, had for us put on nakedness; scorned all these violences, and said aloud: They were not near taking away the treasure of faith he bare in his heart, who attempted it on this silly moveable of fortune.

Suenes persecuted.

were

The King, purposely to afflict him the more, took all his children from him, to thrust them into servitude and fetters, if they would follow their fathers example: where with somewhat softened, seeing they snatched from between his arms those, who in the imbecility of age, had more need of his example, than wealth, he kissing them, said: Children, Keep constantly the faith of your poor father, and leave greatness and worldly fortunes to others. You shall ever be wealthie enough, if you persist loyal to God. Faith will wipe away your tears, will enrich your povertie, glorifie your chains, and immortalize the honour of your death. This persecution is a cloud that passeth, but we shall quickly behold a bright day, which neither admitteth end, nor darkness. This constancy which should make all the world wonder, exasperated the infidels, so, that daily seeking out all the ways how to torment, and burn him with a soft fire, they advised to give the confiscation of all his goods to one of his servants; who had been the most treacherous, and cruel against his Master. He had nothing left but a wife, who possessed in his heart the place of those chast correspondencies, which the law of God afforded him, and she in the beginning making a shew of willingness inseparably to follow the fortune of her husband, much comforted this generous soul, who thought nothing was his, but what he gained to Jesus Christ.

But behold a strong battery to take from him the remainders of his consolation. The King caused this woman to be vehemently solicited, to make a divorce from her husband, and to marry his servant, to whom he already had given possession of his great estate. This at the first a little startled the soul of this Lady, she yet having some humanity in her, but saw her self encompassed with many kinred and worldly friends, who suggested according to the maxims of impiety: That it was a folly to forsake a blessing so present, to run after a fantasie of felicitie. That the command of Kings must be obeyed, who are visible gods on earth. That a husband despoiled of all his means, retaineth nothing of man, but bodie, not can any longer be a husband. That she married him to live, and to give life to others by love, not to cut her own throat, and her childrens, through wickedness. That a man who renounceth honour, can no more pretend to nature. To conclude, that it is wealth, which maketh men, and that it was no dishonour to marrie a servant, who is the favourite of a mightie King. We came not into the world to be masters of fortune, but to yield to its Empire. What content can there be to walk up and down Towns and Cities like a bogger, following a husband, the object of the worlds laughter, and reserve all is left of his miserable bodie to swords and flames?

An excellent instruction for children.

Stranger persecution of a man.

Violent temptation of a woman.

She yieldeth.

So much were her ears beaten with such like discourses; that through a most unspeakable cowardice she forsook her religion and husband, to marry this servant, who seemed noble enough, since he had the golden fleece. The King seeing she had yielded, added for full accomplishment of inhumanity, that Suenes should remain in his own house, as a slave to his wife and servant. Behold here the extremity of all worldly miseries. Yield thy self up (said one) poor Suenes: seest thou not that of so many palaces, and such treasures, there is not left for thee so much as a house covered with stubble; of so many children, none to call thee father? Is it not time to forsake thy faith, since she who slept by thy sides, hath left thee? Wert thou amongst the chains of Lestrigons, and Tartars, thou might breath a more wholesom air: But to behold thy self a slave to thy servant in thine own house, and to have perpetually before thee the infidelity of a disloyal wife for object, how is it possible, but to overthrow the most stable constancie in the world?

Admirable constancie.

But Suenes assembling together all the forces of his heart, said: O faithless and perfidious discourses! All is taken from me, but they cannot take away Jesus Christ. I follow him in libertie and bondage, in prosperitie and adversitie, in life and death: whilest one small threed of life remains in my heart, one silly spark of breath upon my lips, I will combat against the gates of hell, and all the laws of impietie. O the power of the spirit of God! O divorce from flesh and bloud! O spectacle worthy to be beheld by angels over the gates of heaven with admiration! A man to die in so many indignities, such punishments, such deaths, without dying, without complaint, growing wan, or speaking any one word unworthy the lips of a Christian! What is it to be a puissant, but to brave all the powers of earth, and hell? What is it to be rich, but to place all your treasures in the heart of God?

II. MAXIM.

Of the Essence of GOD.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That it is fit to obey Nature; all other Divinitie being most unknown.

A Cynick Philosopher heretofore sought for a man with a candle at noon-day: and now adays the wicked seek God in a clear and full light, and when they have found him, become blind by their own lights, in that they see not him, who is not to be known, but in the quality of a Judge punishing their offences. Out alas! what is man without God?

Tertul. adverss. Marcion. lib. cap. 1. Excellent description of Tertullian.

Tertullian speaking of the countrey about the Euxine sea, saith, It is a Region separated from the commerce of men, as well by the providence of Nature, as the reproach of its brutishness. It is peopled by most savage Nations, which inhabit, if we may say so, a wandering cart, that serves them for house; a habitation, which though perpetually in motion, is less inconstant than their manners. Their abode is uncertain, their life wholly savage, their luxury promiscuous, and indifferent for all sorts of objects. They make no scruple to serve in the flesh of their parents in a feast with beeff and mutton, and think the death of such cursed, who die when they no longer are fit to be eaten. Sex softeneth not women in this countrey; for they sear off their dugs being young, and make a distaff serve for a launce, being otherwise so fervent in battel, that they had much rather fight, than marry. The Climate and elements, are as rigid, as their manners.

THE HOLY COURT.

That nothing is so known as God, although not acknowledged through our ingratitude.

ners. The day is never bright, the sun never smileth, nor is the skie any thing but a continued cloud. The whole year is a winter, and the wind ever North. Ice robs them of rivers; and if they have liquor, the fire affords it. The mountains are still covered with ice and snow. All is cold in this countrey, but vice, which ever burneth. Yet I must tell you, (saith he) there is not any thing amongst these wonders more prodigious, than wicked Marcion. For where shall we find a monster more odious, or a man in nature more senseless than him, who did not acknowledge the Divinitie, and will have the causes, and sublime reasons given him of the Essence of God, which never were, nor shall be: for then there would be somewhat above God.

Humano arbitratu divinitas pensitatur: nisi homini Deus placuerit Deus non erit. Tertul. Apol. c. 5.

The Emperour Tiberius having conceived some good opinion of Divinitie in the Person of our Saviour, was willing to rank him in the number of other gods, but it was not executed, because it must pass by decree of the Senate: and God, who is all that which he is by nature, regarded not the judgement of men to authorize his Divinitie. You were as good deny God (saith Arnobius) as to make the truth of his Essence depend upon the weakness of humane reason.

Nec quicquam referri Deum neges, an affirmes. Arnob. l. 1.

1. I ask of you whether there be any thing in the world more present with us, and more familiarly known than our self, our substance, our life, our being? It seemeth (say you) it is the most certain of our knowledges. Now if I shew, the science we have of God is far stronger, more undoubted, and invincible, than the knowledge we have of our self, I necessarily convince the ignorance of the Divinitie is stupid, ungratefull, and punishable with all the rigours of eternal justice.

God is better known to us than our selves.

I pray tell me, what so certain knowledge can you have of your self? Have you it by the knowledge of History, which is a reasonable knowledge; by revelation, which is extraordinary; by prophesie, which is mysterious; by faith, which is infallible? I do not see you alledge any of these for confirmation of your own being. You have no proofs (say you) more certain, than your senses, which you know notwithstanding to be bruitish, deceivers, and deceived in so many objects. You hear your self speak, you smell your self, you touch your self; and for that you affirm you are, although you have not any knowledge of the better part of your body, by the most noble sense within you, but by the help of a mirrour. Nay, you know so little of your self, that scarcely have you observed the number of your teeth: and being far from the particular distinction of the interiour parts of your body, should you enter into the great labyrinths of the faculties of your soul, you would quickly find out your own ignorance.

Compare now the science you have of your self, with the great proofs which lead you to the knowledge of the Divinity. First, we are born to know God, as the excellent Divine Alexander Alensis discourseth: because, if the sovereign Goodness be necessarily desired by our reasonable appetite, we must affirm the supream truth is no less capable to be known by our understanding: and as we are naturally inclined to the search of this sovereign Good, which may take up al the agitatiõs of our thoughts, so we feel our soul almost without any other reflection, stir'd up with a generous desire to be united to the first cause. We behold it through so many creatures as through lattices, and it seems to speak to us in as many objects, as we see works of his Goodness. It maketh us restless, it scorcheth us with an honest flame, which teacheth us there is a God, and that we are created for him; nor is there any other creature in all visible nature, which laboureth in such inquisition, but man: This ardent inclination to this knowledge, is not a slight facility of science, and we see constant study is ordinarily recompenced with the fruition of its object.

Alex. Alens. quæst. 2. de cognitione Dei.

A singular consideration of Alen.

2. I likewise hold, God of his part is very well to be known, having all the conditions which may make a thing known, as Essence, immutability, simplicity, brightness, and presence. If you there look for Being, which is a necessary object of the understanding, as colour of sight: God, saith S. Gregorie of Nazianzen, is a creating Essence, an Essence comprehending all things. If immutability, Origen teacheth, the Divinity sitteth on the top of beatitude, ever constant, never changeable: If brightness, God is all light, as the Scripture manifesteth in so many places: If simplicity, Faustus Bishop of Rhegium sheweth, God is all what he hath: If continual presence, Porphyrie confesseth, he is every where, because he is not in any part, as bodies are. The Poet Orpheus in his mysterious poesie, calleth him Phanes, as one would say, light, sun and visible, to teach us, all the world is enfolded within his radiance. I will not hereupon inferre, that one may have in this world an absolute and perfect knowledge of God, as of a thing finite: but I say, that amongst so many lights, it is not admitted that any man should be ignorant there is a God, Creatour of all things.

God most easie to be known.

Nazianz. l. mbico. 2. ὡς ἀπὸ σπινθῆρος καὶ σφοδροῦ καὶ ὑπερφυοῦς φωτὸς ὄντος.

Origenes homil. in numer. 23.

Faustus de gratil. l. 2. c. 7. Deus est qui habet. Deus ubique est qui nullibi est.

3. What Epicurean can dis-involve himself from Trismegistus his reason, who teacheth, that were there not an Essence necessary and independent, all we see, all we touch, all we feel in the world, would have no being; but this is meer illusion. Wherefore? Because the things which may be, and not be indifferently, like so many plants, or transitory animals, one while are, and another while are not. And we may truly say, there hath been a certain time, wherein they neither had being, nor name in the world. Now, as nothing can actuate, and produce it self, must we not confess, that had there not been from all eternity a first Agent, which gave motion to so many causes, enchained one to another, whereof they are produced, wherein we presently behold this great world, all had been a nothing. For of two we must grant one, either that the world is created, or not created. If impiety transport a man so far, as to say it is not created, but hath been from all eternity, he would ever be convinced by his own confession, that there were such a Being as we seek for, eternal, necessary, independent, which is nothing else, but God: He would be reduced to this point, that he no longer could deny the Divinity, but was onely ignorant what this Divinity is, and in stead of giving this title to a most pure Spirit, as we do, he would attribute it to a body, as to heaven, water, earth, where he would instantly find himself ashamed of his folly, to take for the Divinity, a thing which hath no understanding, and consequently is far less than himself. In stead of a true God, he would make a million of deities, to become as many snares of his errour, and witnesses of his bruitishness. But if the world be created, (which it is not lawful to doubt) of three things we must affirm one, Either that it produced it self, or that one piece made another, or that there was one cause external, supream, not to be reckoned among the rest, which made all the parts of the universe. To say a thing made it self, is to affirm it was before its being, and to assever a proposition ridiculous to all humane understanding. But if to evade this manifest contradiction, one will maintain one piece made another, still must he come to a last piece, which was produced by it self, and so fall again into the same difficulty. Behold the reason why we must stick upon a general cause, out of the main mass of all causes, and which affording essence, sense, and intelligence to so many creatures according to the condition, and qualities of every one, remaineth eternal, and immoveable. Now he who says this, affirmeth there is a God.

Reason of Mercury Trismegistus.

Διὸ εἰ μὴ ἦν ἀεὶ ἄναρχον καὶ ἀΐδιον, οὐκ ἂν ἦν ὅλως.

Διὸ ἀγένητον καὶ ἀΐδιον.

Author libri de triplici habitaculo apud Aug. tom. 3. Nihil sibi ipsum creat. Quid enim potentiæ, qui omnino non esset, sibi ipsum faceret. Deus innatus, infectus, sine initio, sine fine, in æternitate constitutus. Tert. l. 2. adverf. Marcion. c. 3.

4. But if some impious creature will not withstanding perplex the evidence of this proposition, imitating Sorcerers, who cast mists upon the brightest morning, and say one thing produced another from father to son, but that this still mounteth upward in infinitum, and Instance upon the infinite number of the wicked.

and so think to make us loose our judgement and reason, in the labyrinth of infinities; First, it is answered according to the doctrine of Philosophers: There is nothing in the world actually infinite; and although an infinity of generations of men, beasts, and other creatures were admitted, still must you confess this infinite mass of men, was produced from a cause independent. For that which agreeth to each part of a species, and which is properly by it affected, agreeth likewise to the main of the whole species, as, if it be proper to every man living to understand, and reason, it must be inferred, the whole species is intellectual, and rational: But in this infinite mass of men supposed, there cannot any one be assigned, who was not produced; we therefore must conclude, that all the mass is produced, not by it self (a matter we already have refuted) but from another cause independent of this supposed mass: and this cause is God, which we prove.

Force of reason.

5. Secondly (as lying is ingenious to ruin its own labours) they who suppose this infinity of generations and efficient causes, destroy all sorts of generations, when they think to establish them. For as a quantity cannot be divided into proportionable, and correspondent parts to the infinit, so there are no causes essentially subordinate one to another, which go into this infinity: There must necessarily be in such subordinations a first, which is a cause of a middle, and a middle the cause of a latter. Necessarily all these created essences, and which were but in potentia, presuppose essentially an actual essence, always subsisting, which is a support to all the rest, as the earth hath all the pieces of a building raised one upon another. It must be to bring you into the world, that your father acted after your grand-father, your grand-father after your great grand-father by a continuation, distinct and measured, as in a chain from the first link to the last. For were there not a first, a middle, a last, there could not be either order, or subordination; and were there no subordination, there could be no action. If infinite number of wheels must move to make a clock strike, it would never sound, because the swindge being to be given to all the other from a first wheel, this first wheel would never be found, because in infinity there is no first. And although it were found, it could not communicate its activity to the last; otherwise it must pass in a determinate time, an infinite space, which can never be measured. If you depend from father to son, from an infinity of men, to be produced, (as you say) you could not be a man, for you must have passed from infinite Ages, before you could come to the father, who begat you. And if one could pass over infinite Ages, see you not the infinite would be finite? So much you forget all truth, and reason in the chymæras of your wit. And then what absurdity were it to grant to a Nature so poor, and limited, as is that of all corruptible things a consequence of infinite causes.

Theophil. Raynaudus.

Ita Ruvius, & Cajet. 1. part. q. 2. art. 3. Vasq. 1. part D. 20. nu. 11.

Cicero 2. de natur. Deor. Quod necesse sit præsentem aliquam esse Naturam, quæ nihil sit melius. Scot. in 1. dist. 2. q. 2. Si actus purus est possibilis, ergo existit, aliqui non est actus purus qui pugnat formalissime cum quavis potentialite. (a) Arist. 8. Phys. & 12. Metaphys.

6. But let us withdraw from these thorns, and not urge at this time the reason which heretofore convinced Epicurus, and guided him, (bruitish though he were) to the knowledge of the Divinity, when he figured to himself, that necessarily there was in the universe an excellent Nature exalted above all the rest, and the best of all, and that this was God. Nor likewise let us alledge what was touched by Scotus, who saith, A pure Act being possible, and there being no incompatibility between essence, and purity of essence, it of necessity must be, because it formally excludeth all power, not yet actuated. Let us also pass over that of (a) Aristotle, taken from the necessity of a first Mover, which Auerroes judgeth very effectual.

7. I demand of thee (O bruitish man) who so often blemishest thy knowledges by the impurity of thy life, can one say a man is hidden, who were shewed by a thousand lights, discovered by a thousand voices, a thousand trumpets; represented by a thousand pictures? Nay all creatures (who will carefully consider them) are lights, voices, images, which shine before the pavillion of the Divinity, which proclaim, which figure, which engrave it on our hearts, with an eternal character. The lessons of the Divinity are common to all the world (said Prosper:) we learn them in the leaves of elements, and in the volumes of time: we cannot but remember them, if we forget not our selves. We admire in Philostratus (b) an Athenian Herod, who appointed twenty four pages for his son, every one of which bare the title of a Greek letter, that he might learn his Alphabet by calling his servants. But, O ingratefull man! God gave thee a million of creatures, which contribute to thy service, to teach thee his Name, who for his greatness cannot be unknown, and for his goodness ought not to be neglected. I speak not now of all the wonders of the world, whereof use is made to prove the Divinity, because they are sufficiently seen, and that it is the ordinary place, whereon they dilate, who handle this subject. It is impossible, said Cleomede, that a man who will attentively consider five things, appearing in the fabrick of the universe; to wit, the connexture of so many, and so different parts, the order of productions, the relation one creature hath to another, their ends, and use, should not admire, and know this great All is made by a Nature sovereign, predominant, and Monarchal, which produced all things of unity, and caused them to re-enter into themselves by the same unity. So many rays in a sun, so many drops of water in a river, so many rivers in a sea, so many branches and leaves on a root, so many sinews from the brain, so many veins from a liver, so many arteries from a heart, so many parts of a creature, so many motions of one principal, conspire together to make us understand this First of Unities. Two strings cannot accord upon a lute without the wit of a man, and so many things high and low, visible, invisible, weighty, light, great, little, hot, cold, living, not living, moveable, immoveable, sensible, insensible, can they agree without the spirit of God? The lines of Mathematicians drawn upon the sand of the sea-shore, make a man say who is in a desart Island, that men have passed by; because neither Bears nor Lions trace such like figures: and cannot these vast heavens, with all the enamel of their stars, nor the earth with all the rivers, and seas which moisten it, make us say, Necessarily God went this way? If from the great school of the world, and the general voice of nature thou dost pass to sciences, they all bear on their brows the marks of the Divinity. The Mathematician shews thee the point, which maketh all lines. The Arithmetician, the unity, which causeth all numbers; to tell thee, there is a Creatour, who is the center, and beginning of all creatures: Geometrie presenteth thee the compass with one stable foot in the center, the other moving, to shew thee the firmness of the essence not created, and instability of all things created: Astrologie proposeth unto thee its motions so regular, and measured; Musick its harmonies; Philosophie its reasonings; eloquence its discourses; mechanick, its works and admirable industries, to let thee understand the effects of this increated essence, which travelleth throughout all nature without loosing any part of its eternal repose. The knowledge of a God is given to the soul, as a dower or inheritance of its birth: God shall never be hidden, never shall fail; shall ever be understood, ever hearkened unto, perpetually seen. Herod and Nero knew him, being unable to free themselves from this science: The Polybemuses did believe him in the obscurity of their caves, even when they were devouring the flesh of men: conscience told them news of him, nor hath any man hitherto grown to so much fury, as not at some time to acknowledge his dependence in the affrightement of a mind troubled with the image of its crimes.

(b) Philost. in vita Herodis Attici. Cleomede l. 4. de mundo. Hoc autem omne invenisse summæ sapientiæ est, effecisse, virtutis invisæ. Galen. l. 3. de usu partium c. 10. All contributes to the knowledge of God.

Humanis quidem disciplinis quasdam etiamnum latebras prædentur, ut in paginis elementorum ac voluminibus temporum communi, & publica divinæ institutionis doctrina legatur. Prosp. l. 2. de voca. Gentium. c. 4.

Tertul. adver Marcion. l. 1. c. 10. Animæ à primordio scientia Dei dos est: nunquam Deus latebit, nunquam Deus desinet, semper intelligetur, semper audietur, semper videbitur.

Lights of God invincible.

Nothing will appear to be so well known as God, who makes all things to be understood: whilest in the mean time the ingratitude of me hath reduced him to this point in the world, that he is most forgotten by al.

Ingratitude of man towards God.

8. It is the greatest of evils to be unwilling to know him, of whom you cannot be ignorant. Our ignorance is convinced by his lights, and our ingratitude overwhelmed by his goodness: And yet man asks if God govern all, why this, wherefore that, why evil, why wicked, and wherefore so many miseries in the lives of mortals? He will know the causes of the will of God, which have no causes, but is the chief of all causes; and (doubly stupid as he is) he complaineth of evils which sprang from himself, and accuseth God of nothing, but because his mercy hath not at all times thunder in hand to chastise his crimes. He is enforced to confess a sovereign Being, to which he oweth all he is, & confessing serves him so negligently, that it were almost better to have no God, than to believe in one, and make him the object of his neglect.

Who will open again unto us the lips of Isaiah, to say once more, Hearken, O you heavens, which circumvolve over our heads replenished with stars and lights: Hearken, O earth, which hast so often trembled with horrour of the crimes of so many mortals? To say truly (saith the Creatour) had I no other title of recommendation towards man, but my self, my sceptr, Empire, and dignity; honour and gratitude would ever be due to me: But hear what I have done: I have nourished children with incomparable sweetness: I have bred them, and born them in the bosom of my providence, with unspeakable tenderness, yet was contemned by those, on whose foreheads I imprinted the rays of my glory. Forgetfulness alone is insupportable to love: But what shall we say of contempt? what of injury? There hath not been any excellency, or perfection in me which was not invaded and checked, O man, by thy vices. Thou hast resisted the Immensity of my Essence by thy avarice, and boundless ambition: my Infinity by thy inordinate concupiscences, which tend to be infinite; my Immutability by thy inconstancy; my Eternity by thy love of transitory things; my Power by thy imbecility and remisness; my Wisdom by thy ignorance; my Perfection by thy wants; my Sanctity by thy vices; my Liberality by thy ingratitude; my Jurisdiction by thy tyranny; my Providence by thy stupidity; my Mercy by thy obstinacy; and my Justice by thy iniquity.

I no longer complain of Moors and Arabians, who persecuted me; I complain of being wounded in my own house by my unnatural children. If needs I must endure the contradiction of all the world, verily, O Christian, thy hand ought to be the last lifted up against me. The ox, bruitish as he is, acknowledgeth his Master; the Ass loves his crib, who oweth him: what say I? savage beasts, who have almost perpetually slaughter, and bloud under their paws, are reclaimed by benefits, and thou becomest obdurate by my liberality. What is there more mischievous, more intolerable, than to see a servant rebel against a Master in his own house, when he lives of his granary, and shakes under his correction? It is not so great a matter to adore with a most submiss reverence, whom thou canst not comprehend, to moisten the earth with thy tears, and appease Heaven with thy penance, and say: (a) Wo the time I knew thee not! Wo the blindness that made me neglect thee! Wo the deafness which shut up mine ears against thy sacred words! Blind and deaf, I desperately threw my self amongst so many objects of creatures of the world, and beauties which onely served to deform me. Thou wert with me, I not with thee, and all, which cannot be without thee, separated me from thee. It is too late to begin to know thee, and too late to begin to love thee; but this will be never to have an end but in him, who concludeth all things.

Tertul. adverf. Marcion. l. 1. c. 23. Quid injustius, & improbius, quàm ut servus adversùs caput Domini sui suborsetur? & quidem quid iniquius est, in ipsâ adhuc domo Domini de ipsius adhuc borreis vivens, sub ipsius adhuc plagis tremens.

(a) S. Augustin. fol. 31.

The second EXAMPLE upon the second MAXIM.

The Power of the DIVINITIE over Infidels.

Drawn from the Scripture, from S. Hierom upon Daniel, and Josephus, &c.

ANTIOCHUS the THEOMACQUE, Or Enemie of GOD.

IT were a very hard matter to find out a soul more prostituted to impiety, than that of Antiochus, surnamed the Theomacque; and a heart more possessed with the fear of a Deity, than Eleazars. For which cause, the encounter of times, and battels having so well opposed them, we will propose them in this History. This Antiochus, who rendered himself so notorious in holy Scripture, through the exorbitancie of his wickedness, seemed to have derived impiety from his birth; for the Antiochuses, his Ancestours, caused themselves heretofore, to be surnamed the Saviours, and Gods of the earth.

Antiochus a politick man, who had no other God, but ambition.

He was of a spirit, fierce, close, and crafty, intelligent, bold, audacious, who shewed from his younger years to have no other Gods but scepters, no other Paradise, than fruition of Empires. His father Antiochus the Great, had given him this lesson: For he was an active Prince, but more judicious than his son, who never ceased to disturb his neighbour, and covertly attempt the Kingdom of Ægypt by arms, and subtilities, until such time that the Romans clipped the wings of his ambition, as well to stay the progression of his over-much power, become formidable to the Empire, as to punish him for the dangerous correspondences he held with Hannibal. He was enforced by reason of some agreements and transactions of peace to send his son to Rome in hostage, and that was this Antiochus we mention.

He was delivered for an hostage to the Romans.

This young Prince, who already had in his imagination designs of Empire, mannaged this occasion, and deriving his happiness out of the necessity of his fathers affairs, learned therein all the extent of supream powers on earth, and began to reflect on the Romans, as gods of the whole world. On the other side Scipio, and all the other great Captains, were forward to let the people behold this off-spring of the Asian Kings, as a Lion enchained, and finding him vain enough they spared not slight complements, and court smokes: but ever held in their own hands the highest point of authority, and drew profit out of all affairs.

Prudence of the Romans.

During his abode in Rome, his father Antiochus the Great, overwhelmed under the burden of his ambition, found the catastrophe of his pretensions in a tomb, and his eldest son Seleveus succeeded him, who had a short life, and an unhappy reign. At which time young Antiochus felt in himself a vehement itch of rule, more powerfully than any of his Predecessours had done, for soon understanding his brothers death (who left him the kingdom of Asia, and knowing his sister Cleopatra, married to the King of Ægypt, was a widow, and the mother of onely one child, of whom he hoped to be easily rid, he ardently thirsted to joyn the two Empires, and unite them under his power. Now the Kingdom of Syria appertaining to this young Orphan, the son of his sister, he in the beginning entered thereinto with great modesty, in the quality of a Tutour, and Regent, and not a King, aforehand disposing the peoples minds by Attalus and Eumenes, who did him good service in this pretension. This wolf clothed in a lambs-skin, thought to enter by the same ways into the Kingdom of Ægypt, and wrote thus to his sister, That it seemed the Gods had thrown him among thorns at the time when Kings of his age walked not but on violets, and roses. That being absent out of the Kingdom, he had received sad news of the death death of his thrice-honoured father, and immediately of the death of his well-beloved brother; whose days he wished might have been lengthened with his own years: But that nothing afflicted him so much as to see her a widow, burdned with an infant, whose hands were not so early fit to manage a scepter. Behold therfore the cause why he now undertook the government of the Kingdom of Syria, which was the possession of his Ancestours, and whereunto she had right by the title of dower. But otherwise, though he were heavily surcharged with two Kingdoms, he was no whit discouraged to share with her also in the cares of Ægypt, since, besides charitie towards his own, the continual practice of affairs he had at Rome, in the most knowing school of the world, it had acquired him some dexteritie and experience in the sway of Kingdoms. That he would make her reign in the affluence and pleasures of a flourishing Court, and prostrate the whole world at her feet. That she should onely be troubled to see their submission, as the Gods behold earth from heaven, and that he would be as faithfull a Regent, as he had ever been a loving brother.

Ambition of Antiochus.

His craft.

Cleopatra had been married to Ptolomeus Epiphanes, and cast as a bait by the father, to catch the Kingdom of Ægypt, under hope conceived, that having studied in his school, she would beguil her husband, and bring Nilus to Euphrates: But she opening her eyes, found her flesh was much nearer than the smock, and ever upheld both her husband and son, against her fathers plots. She understood the heart of her brother to be desperately subtile, and ambitious, and seeing she could not possess Syria, where he had strongly fortified himself, she easily admitted this his imaginary title of Regency, which she could no longer withhold: But for so much as concerned Ægypt, she made answer, That she very humbly thanked him for the compassion he had of her widow-hood, and that the Gods who afford the deepest roots to trees the most subject to winds, would furnish her with sufficient courage to suffer so boisterous shocks. As concerning the Kingdom of Syria, his providence had prevented the good opinion she conceived of him, being alreadie resolved to put the Regencie into his hands. But as for Ægypt, there was no necessitie he should rob himself in the freshnese of his youth, of the pleasures so fairly acquired for him, to undergo so many burdensom charges in a forreign Countrey, wherein he would not be honoured, as were the Ptolemees. That her people were somewhat jealous, nor would confide in external power, which might much discontent him in the sinceritie he pretended in the mannage of her affairs. That she was assisted by a wise Councel, with whose aid she hoped to maintain her people in perfect peace, and raise her son to the height of the happinesse of his extraction, and that it should ever be a singular comfort for her to be assured of the good affection he bare towards her estate, and to correspond with him in an unfained intelligence.

Prudence of Cleopatra against the wiles of her brother.

Antiochus, who found not his expectation in his sisters letters, laid down the sheep-skin, to put on the Lions, and began to make open war, by invading the Kingdom of Ægypt, which was the cause Cleopatra instantly cast her self into the protection of the Romans, although she nothing doubted, but that her brother had thence sought support, and credit: But she on the other side knew they favoured justice, and willingly undertook the causes of widows and orphans. And verily the Senate of Rome, either through the integritie of their manners, or to ballance scepters which swayed under them, and make none too great to the prejudice of their power, inclined to the widows part, and commanded Antiochus to retire out of Ægypt. He who knew how to court men, went about to gain Papilius Lenas, deputed by the Senate to determine this affair, requiring some delay to withdraw his forces leisurely, of purpose to spend time for the renewing his plots.

Equity of the Senate of Rome to support widows.

A notable act of an Embassadour.

But the other, a man resolute, and not to be paid with words, making use of a riding-rod which he had in his hand, drew a circle about Antiochus, and encloled him within it, saying: There is but one word to be used; Before you come out from thence you must necessarily resolve, either on peace with your sister, or wars against the Senate and people of Rome. He seeing himself so strongly charged, gave way to their demands, and wrote to the Senate, That he esteemed the Peace which came from their motion, more glorious than all his victories, and heard their Embassadours, as if the Gods had spoken out of heaven to him: Therein imitating the most supple Courtiers, who in stead of shewing their discontent against power, give thanks for a beating. Howsoever, becoming enraged with rancour, to see so rich a prey escaped out of his hands, he discharged all his choller upon the Jews, as those who make their servants suffer for the losses they had in game. He had a spleen against this religious Nation, both through the motive of his own impiety, and reason of State, suspecting them more to encline to King Ptolemee's faction. Behold why he entered into Jerusalem like an enraged Lion with huge troups, in the beginning pillaging the Citie and Temple, sparing neither the prophane, nor sacred, swallowed excessive riches, and plunged the fiery flames of his anger in the bloud and tears of four-score thousand people; some killed, divers sold, and many fettered, unable to satisfie his cruelty.

Masked complement.

Horrible persecution of the Hebrews.

Anno Antiochi. 7.

For presently after came out those wicked and bloudy Edicts, which made God a party, with a violent hatred, and let loose the rains of impiety, even to the desire of utter defacing the marks of Religion. The streets of Sion mourned, Priests were banished or massacred, the Altars demollished, Temples polluted with ordures, and uncleanness, by abominable monsters who renewed sacrifices to Belphegor, and Bacchus in the Sanctuary, heretofore impenetrable to mortal eyes. The abomination of desolation foretold by the Prophet Daniel, which was a statue of olympick Jupiter, was seen to be raised in the holy place, in sight of all the world. The books of the law were sought out through all the houses, and committed to flames, the festivals changed into Bacchanals, all exercise of piety interdicted with whips, wheels, fires, so far that two poor mothers being found administering Circumcision to two little infants, were drawn through the Citie, having their lamentable offspring hanged about their necks, and in that posture thrown into a ditch. The whole Citie was nought else but a spectacle of gibbets and slaughters, the Pagans by some false brothers, conspiring with much fervour to put the Kings Edicts in execution. Then was the time Eleazars combat with the seven young Machabees appeared, which is excellently described in the Scripture in Josephus, and the Fathers of the Church, that it were a thing superfluous to endeavour enlargement upon it, with a more ample discourse. I onely say, that if God permitted upon one side to be seen the unbridled soul of a man, professed an enemy of all piety; on the other, an admirable spectacle was beheld of fear and reverence, rendered to his Name by the faithfull.

Anno ejus. 9.

Combat of Eleazar.

What a prodigie to see an aged man four-score and ten years old, of one of the prime families of his Nation, learned in the Law, of an Angelical aspect to go smiling to punishment? And he cracking even their hearts with compassion, who sate as Magistrates upon his execution, some perswaded him onely but to make a shew to eat hogs flesh for the Kings satisfaction. But he reflecting on the true point of honour, The hoarinesse (saith he) of this venerable hair wherewith my head is covered, having waxed old in the exercises of Religion, sufficiently teacheth me my dutie. It is not fit for Eleazar to counterfeit impietie, but profess virtue. God forbid, I should forget the law of my God, dishonour the school and doctrine in which I was bred, or become a scandal to these young men, to whom God is now pleased to make a Theater of my Constancie: The honour of my passed

paſſed life (hall enter into the aſhes of my Tomb, and my ſoul ſhall flie out of this bodie truly innocent, and not bear infidelitie into the boſom of my Anceſtours. Then they tormenting him under the laſhes of whips and fervour of flames, he added: My All-knowing God, thou art not ignorant, that it being in my power to free my ſelf from death; not to fail in thy fear, I faint in my life. I make thee the depoſitorie of my ſoul, which iſſueth out of theſe torn members, chooſing rather to die tortured on all ſides, than to live one filly moment unfaithfull.

The mother of the Machabees.

After Eleazar went the glorious mother of the Machabees along, having the ſpirit of a man in a feminine body. She entered firſt of all into the combat, although ſhe were the laſt that arrived to the crown, bringing ſeven ſons with her to death, as to the true ſource of immortality. This bleſſed creature ſtood between two flames, the one of natural love, the other of charity towards God: Both combatted, but there was but one prevailed, that ſhe might tranſcend all things under God.

As ſhe lived in ſeven ſouls, ſo ſhe was ſacrificed in ſeven bodies: She ſaw the tongue torn out from one, the toes and fingers of feet and hands cut off from another, the skin pulled away all bloudy from the head of this; that, thrown into a boyling cauldron; finally, ſhe beheld them all equal in puniſhment, as ſhe parallel'd them in love. Some while ſhe delivered one to the executioners, another while ſhe received the bloud upon her garments, preſently the mangled members in her arms; ſhe fought in all and for all, having no other fear, but of their deliverance. But ſhe infinitely fearfull for the youngeſt of her ſons, ſhewed him Heaven, then her breaſts, the one to have bred him, the other to glorifie him. When ſhe ſaw him dead, then was the time ſhe thought him born, and then with moſt courage ſhe waited on his execution.

Auguſt. ſerm. 109. c. 6.

O incomparable mother! (ſaith S. Auguſtine) who knew what it was to poſſeſs children, ſince ſhe feared not to looſe them. Mother of Martyrs, and eight times a Martyr, who equalled her triumphs to her childrens, and her glory to eternitie.

Puniſhment of the wicked Antiochus.

In the end, Antiochus after all this butchery retiring, the living God, who purſued the tracks of this impious man, and who in his eyes bare the lightenings of his juſtice, raiſed Mattathias and his children; who with a ſilly handfull of men reſtored ſanctification to the Temple, and liberty to the Citizens; having in four encounters defeated four Royal Armies.

This wretched creature, and who had no religion in him, though in apparence he made ſhew of that of the Grecians, went to Elymas to invade a Temple of Diana, where great treaſures were kept: but was there ſo ill intreated, that he more haſtily returned than came thither, laden with confuſion, and in ſhort time heard the diſcomfiture of his Armies, and victory of the Jews, whereupon he entered into ſo deſperate fury, that he reſolved to retire haſtily again to Jeruſalem, and to make of the whole Citie but one tomb.

Joſeph Ben Gorion.

But the hand of God had already deſigned his: for it happened being in his coach, his horſes frighted extraordinarily upon the meeting and roar of an Elephant, gave him ſo boyſterous a ſtroke, that thrown on the ground, he received a mortal wound, the fire and venom whereof crept ſo far into his hurts, that he ſeemed to burn alive like the damned, feeling inexplicable dolours throughout all his body, which became a neſt of vermin, and having his ſoul turmoyled with Specters and Furies that gave him no repoſe. At which time the miſerable Atheiſt coming to himſelf after a drunkenneſs of ſo many years, ſpake theſe words, JUSTUM EST SUBDITUM ESSE DEO, ET MORTALEM NON PARIA DEO SENTIRE; profeſſing there was a Great God, to whom we muſt ſubmit, and never with him conteſt; when being in the bed of death, he acknowledged impiety had been the original of al his evils, and that ſhould God reſtore him to his health, he would fill Jeruſalem with gifts and wonders, even to the becoming a Jew, and ever proclaim the glory of the Creatour. But the gates of mercy were already ſhut up againſt this diſloyal man, who had no true repentance: his hour was come which made him die, all waſted with putrefaction inſupportable to his Army, who could not endure the ſtench, troubleſom to himſelf, and execrable to the memory of all mankind.

The Prophets and holy Fathers mention him as a damned ſoul, and the figure of Antichriſt: to teach the wicked out of the deportment of this man, that there is not any one withdraws from God, but flies from his mercy, and falls into the hands of his juſtice, which purſueth Libertines beyond the gates of hell.

III. MAXIM.

Of the Excellencie of the DIVINITIE.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That Great men are Gods on earth, whoſe favours we ſhould adore.

Divers opinions of the Divinity.

THere is not any thing hath more perplexed the minds of men ſince the beginning of the world, than the diverſe opinions of the Deitie; ſince the wiſeſt, when they had ſpent all their abilities upon this queſtion, found nothing more certain than uncertainty. One would wonder why the knowledge of the true God being ſo important for man, hath been ſo many Ages obſcured and covered in a great abyſs of darkneſs, even from thoſe, who thought themſelves the moſt clear-ſighted in the knowledge of total Nature. But who ſees not it is an evident puniſhment for ſin, and a moſt juſt effect of Gods vengeance, who hath permitted truth to be hidden from man, becauſe man would conceal himſelf from truth, even in the ſhadow of death, and

THE HOLY COURT.

That all greatneſs is wretched before the Majeſty of God, who alone is to be adored.

nothing? They vaniſhed in their thoughts (ſaid the Apoſtle) and their ſenſeleſs hearts were obſcured.

Evanuerunt in cogitationibus ſuis, & obſcuratum eſt inſipiens cor eorum. Rom. 1.

But that which herein is very conſiderable, is, that God hath ever handled wicked men, like the damned: for the unhappy ſouls condemned to hell, have an idæa of the beatitude they have loſt, which ſerves for an executioner: And infidels after ſhipwrack of faith, and truth, which they abandoned, fail not ſtill to retain an opinion of the excellency of the Divinity, not knowing what it is, nor why they ſhould ſtick to it. It was that wherein Plinie eſteemed men more miſerable, than beaſts: For creatures not made for the knowledge and fruition of a God, are troubled at nothing, nor make any queſtion thereupon, contenting themſelves peaceably to enjoy innocent favours of God in this life handleth the wicked, as the damned.

Na-

Nature: but the curiosity man hath had through all Ages, to be informed of the state of the Sovereign cause, is a strong conviction of his infidelity. He findeth himself obliged to seek into the knowledge of God, which, as saith Tertullian, is the first vesture of the soul: but this knowledge flieth him so long as he renounceth faith, innocency, and reason, the prime pieces of the intellectual life.

Diversity of Gods. Plin. l. 2. c. 7.

From thence grew the great diversity of gods, heaped one upon another by the Gentiles. For poor humane nature overwhelmed partly by the greatness of this sovereign Essence, partly also clouded by its own ignorance, misery, and sin, being unable to understand a God, most Onely, and Simple with one sole touch of the soul, hath made an impertinent dissection of it, dividing it into as many parts, as there are errours on the Altars of Gentiles: whilest every one sought to adore that, which most flattered his imagination, or sensuality. They who were more spiritual, have deified virtues, as Chastity, Concord, Intelligence, Hope, Honour, Clemency, and Faith. Other more absurd, have tied themselves to the worship of creatures, as the Ægyptians: Some, who question less were sottish, have framed gods in humane shape; some old, others young, and many perpetually infants: They have made them male, and female, black, white, winged, and deformed. They made some to rise out of a wind, others from the sea, and divers from rocks. They who were more fearfull, and superstitious adored the feaver, and tempests, not for esteem of their worth, but through horrour of their malignity. They ware their gods shut up in rings, and many times submitted to monsters, denying themselves repose, and repast, to satisfie their superstition. It is the misery which S. Augustine deplored in his Citie of God, after Plinie the Historian, and other Authours, who handled this subject.

God of flatterers.

But such as amidst this great obscurity of Sects, thought themselves more gentile, and refined in conversation, taking other ways, and leaving old superstitions, began to canonize Emperours, Princes, and the Great-ones of the earth, saying, There were no Divinities more visible, and propitious than these; seeing they daily became the distributours of glory, and worldly fortunes. The Athenians, who vaunted to have the most subtile wits of the earth, quickly suffered themselves to fall into such like flatteries, whereof we have a very notable passage in Seneca, who telleth us, that Mark Anthonie being a Prince extreamly dissolute, was instantly called god Bacchus by his flatterers, and soon came to such shameless impudence, as to suffer this title to be engraven upon his statues. Behold the cause, why entering into the Citie of Athens, all the men of quality marching before him, and desirous to be acceptable with him, both through humour and affection of favour, they failed not to introduce him with the title of Bacchus: nay, willing to over-value him above other people, they added the hearty offer of their Minerva in marriage, the Guardian-Goddess of their Citie, who had refused all the gods.

Remarkeable punishment of flattery. Senec. Suasor. 1.

This Prince was not amazed at their complement; for he presently replied, Their motion was gratefull: But seeing Minerva was a great goddess, he must suitably accommodate her to her dignity, and therefore ordained they should find out six hundred thousand crowns to give her in marriage. An Athenian thereupon replied, Jupiter her father took the goddess Semele, without demand of any portion: But this was to little purpose, their flattery cost them so great a sum, that needs must they afterwards exact it with the peoples clamour, many of them affixing pasquils upon Anthonies statue, to deface false applauses by a just reproch. If all flatterers were punished in such measure, the number would be very small: But since they find rewards, where others received nothing but punishment, it is no wonder the Ages are wholly drenched into servile complacence. Never were Christian men seen to be more disposed to slavery. The great eye of Divine Providence is taken away, and all sense of Religion, to adhere to men of gold and silver: They cease not to deifie them: and we may truly say, the favour of the rich and great-ones of this Age, is now adays become a false Divinity, which receiveth Incense, and Victims, almost from all hands. Notwithstanding he is cursed by the Prophet, who putteth his trust in man to the exclusion of God, and who thinking to fortifie himself throughly in the course of humane affairs, makes to himself an arm of flesh, and hay, to raise fortunes, which will vanish like phantasms.

For this cause I here purpose to present unto you some passages of Gods greatness, to oppose them against the abjectness and infirmity of the mightiest on earth; that so we may learn from this discourse to be replenished with a worthy estimation of the Divinitie, and a knowledge of the nothing of the richest magnificences on earth.

The greatness of God compared to the low condition of men.

ALL the praise of great things endeth in one ample word; & by how much the more an essence is simple, by so much the fewer words shall we need to explicate it. Of whom must we learn to speak of God, but of God himself? And what do we learn from him, but that he is what he is? That is to say little, and that is to say, all. For, as S. Bernard hath excellently observed, call God good; call him great, call him blessed; call him wise; call him all you can, you find him included in this word. When God said, I am what I am, he said, He is all he is. Adde hereunto a century of attributes, you shall not go far from the essence: If you speak them, you adde nothing unto it: if you mention them not, you not at all lessen it.

God is who he is.

S. Bernard. l. 5. de consid. Si bonum, si magnum, si beatum, si sapientem, vel quicquid aliud tale de Deo dixeris, in hoc verbo instauratur, quod est, Est. Nempe hoc est ei esse, quod omnia esse. Si centum talia addas, non recessisti ab esse; Si ea dixeris, nihil addidisti ad esse: si nihil dixeris, nihil de eo minuisti.

S. Denys gives a particular reason thereof, when he saith, that (a) essence is the first and last pledge of Nature, the most intimate, most necessary, most independent, most simple, and most perfect of all things in the world. Behold the cause, why the Celestial Father could say nothing better to the purpose of himself, than (b) I am what I am.

(a) Greatnes of essence.

(b) Ego sum qui sum.

Let us here then speak of the excellency of Gods Essence comprised under these words: and oppose against it the frailty, and nullity of our essence, that penetrated with the greatness of the Omnipotent, we may be drenched in the abyss of low humility.

Eternity of nothing first humiliation of man.

2. Our first abjectness, and which is of power to humble those who think themselves the most able in the world, is, that we have been an eternity in nothing. For if you mount, still ascending upward to the source of time, when you shall have reckoned millions of Ages, you shall find nothing but labyrinths, and abysses of this great eternity without end, and when you shall present to your thoughts all that time, which hath preceded, be it real or imaginary, you will be ashamed to see so many millions of years, wherein you had not so much as the essence of a rush, of a butter-flie, or a silly gnat. That Rodomont who threateneth to hew down mountains, and thunder-strike mortals, and thinks all the ample house of Nature was created onely for him, who swalloweth the world by avarice, and wastes it as fast by riot, thirty or forty years ago was not able to contend for excellency with a catter-piller. (c) What weakness, what confusion of humane essence! But thine (O great God) hath no beginning: It hath seen all times unfolded from thy breast: It hath assigned them measure; and hath taken none from others for it self, but its Eternity. The beginning of the lives and reigns of all Cæsars is reckoned, but of Gods years no man hath a register. He is neither young, nor old, ancient nor new: Content your self with saying, He is Eternal.

(c) Hesterni quippe sumus, & ignoramus, quoniam sicut umbra dies nostri sunt super terram. Job 8. 9. Tertul. adver. Marc. l. 1. c. 3. Una & germana divinitas nec de novitate, nec de vetustate, sed de sua veritate censetur. Non habet tempus æternitas: omne enim tempus est. Deus, si vetus est non erit, si est novus non fuit.

3. The Humiliation of death.

3. The second point of our infirmity is, that after we have had being for a few years, we shall be (to speak according to the phrase of the world) an eternity in a tomb, as bodies confiscated by death, abandoned to worms, despoiled even to the bones, become dust, and consumed to be reduced into the mass of elements from whence we came. I affirm the soul is immortal; which many times serveth to immortalize its punishments. I affirm the body riseth again, although both being separated so long one from another, no more make up a man. The Axiom of S. Bernard must be made good, Every man is reduced to be no longer a man. So many persons go daily in and out of the world, as small drops of water into the seas. The ocean is no whit altered, either by their enterance in, or passage out. Seneca was astonished, how one could say there were Comets which presaged the death of great men. It is not credible (saith he) the universe should interest it self in the loss of particulars, yea, were it of Monarchs. We all bud forth like the leaf of a tree, and die as the leaf; neither our life, nor death any thing importeth this great All.

Bernard. c. 3. de animâ. In non hominem vertitur omnis homo. Estne quicquam in terris tam magnum, quod perire mundus sciat? Senec. l. 4. natur. qq. c. 1.

Behold, that which much abaseth the pride of the most vain-glorious, is, to think upon a beer, and tomb, and reflect on that ample grave, whereinto all mankind insensibly sinketh. That is it which Job called, the stone of darkness. That, which the Ancients named, the secret of horrour. The greatest Princes of the earth resemble Alexanders stone, the most excellent of the world in the brightness of lustre: but so soon as it was covered with dust, it had neither force nor beauty beyond other stones: How great, rich, active soever they be, the dust of a sepulcher makes it appear they are nothing. But God alone hath immortality without dependence, because he is what he is. All that which may be, and not be, hath ever some time assigned when it was not, or wherein it shall no more be. One may at the least find an imaginary time, when the most eminent Powers were nothing, and for so much as concerneth men, it is no difficult matter to give them limits, to which, and in which they no longer shall be men: But of God alone we may truly say, his years not onely decrease not, but know not what it is to increase. For the Eternity of God (to speak properly) is very long, and very short: very long in extent, for it spreadeth over all Ages; very short, because in an instant it possesseth all it can have in the infinity of times, being ever like the center of a circle, which looketh towards all the lines without stirring out of one place.

Lapidem caliginis. Job 28. 3. Secretarium horroris.

Tu autem idem ipse es, & ann tui non deficient. Sæcula cuncta tenens, antè omnia sæcula solus. Novatiani l. de Trin. c. 31.

Man hath more non-essence, than Essence.

4. Our third Annihilation is, that we have much more non-essence, than essence, according to Plato's argument: because if we have the essence of a man, we have not therefore the essence of Heaven, of earth, creatures, nor plants, although some similitude thereof. We are confined, and limited within a particular essence which comprehendeth a soul ignorant and unsatiable, a body feeble and frail; a strange connexion of a nature mortal and immortal; an alliance of a ray of the sun with a dung-hill, of a spirit prompt and subtile, with most infirm flesh. But God, who is, what he is, containeth in himself all possible essences, and which is more, containeth them under the sole form of the Divinitie. The world is bright in the light of stars, resplendent in flames, subtile in air, streaming in eternal veins of rivers, stable on the foundation of the earth, rich in mynes, fruitfull in plants, displayed in flowers, and all because it is a world, and it a creature. But God in one sole indivisible, and under one sole form, concludeth the fervour of Seraphins, the science of Cherubins, the majesty of Dominations, the height of Thrones, the excellency of Principalities, the strength of Virtues, the superintendence of Arch-angels, the charitable offices of Angels, the greatness of Heaven, the beauty of stars, the splendour of lights, the activity of fire, the subtilitie of air, the fruitfulness of earth, the eternal freshness of fountains, and all we may call great, beautifull, or pleasing. God, I say, comprehendeth them under this great title, I am that I am. That is it which made S. Augustine say: This, and that is good: Take away this, and that, when you speak of God; and behold the Sovereign Good: so shall you see God, who is not good by a borrowed goodness; but the Good of all good.

Excellency of the simplicity and universality of God, in comparison of the world.

This first essence is lovely (said Maximus of Tyre.) And verily it is the chief of beauties. But how think you, is it lovely, like a meadow all strewed over with flowers, or as Heaven all enamelled with stars? Take away this meadow, these flowers, this Heaven, these stars, God is nothing of all created things, but it is he, from whom all creatures derive being, beauty, goodness, force, unity, and lasting. I well know what he is not, but cannot say what he is. I am satisfied in speaking with S. Bernard: In the great God, all is God, and there is not any thing in him, which is not himself.

Ego sum qui sum. Bonum hoc, & bonum illud, tolle hoc & illud, & vide ipsum bonum si potes: ita Deum videbis non alio bono bonum, sed bonum omnis boni. Aug. l. 8. de Trinit. c. 3. Maximus Tyrius. Orat. de Deo. In Deo non est nisi Deus. S. Bernard, de consider. l. 5.

Mutability of men.

Finally our fourth misery is, that our essence being so short and slender, faileth not to be afflicted with so many mutations, so many vicissitudes, that we may say, there is almost nothing less in us, than our selves. All change (saith the Philosopher) beareth with it some image of non-essence, and therefore we who change every moment are (as it were) nothing in nature to be trusted to. It is not known with what knot, with what chains men should be tied, or fettered, so variable, and inconstant these Proteuses are. Ages alter us, and in changing us, change themselves. Infancy becometh adolescency, adolescency is taken off by youth, youth by manhood, manhood by declining years, and those years by decrepit age. If you reckon well, you shall find every one of these mutations, is a species of death.

As time alters our bodies, a thousand other things make impression on our minds. Humours, passions, conversations, customs, accidents, vices, and virtues, so often transform us into other men, that one may say, we are the most natural pourtraicts of inconstancy in universal Nature. There is none but God can say: I am the God, who changeth not. There is not any the least shadow of vicissitude in the great abyss of light; as he is one without number, infinite without limits, eternal, free from floud and ebbe of time, so he is immoveable without augmentation or diminution. He stands immoveable within himself, and reneweth all various nature out of himself. He takes nothing of men, which he gave them not. Essence, is proper to him, as eternal to him.

Ego Dominus & non mutor. Malach. 3. 6. In se manens innovat omnia, & nihil accipit quod ipse non dedit, ut sit illi quod ei sempiternum, semper ejus proprium. S. Leo. ep. 93. c. 5.

It is a maxim in Theologie, that simple forms, which of themselves constitute a Person, make no difference between the subject and nature; that is to say, God is his Deity, his life, his eternity, and all he is, without diversity. It is for things composed of divers pieces to be susceptible of many forms; and consequently of sundry mutations: But God being from all eternity a most pure Act, as he hath not any thing but himself, can have no difference with himself: He hath nothing in himself better than himself: He hath no part eminent one above another. For he is without parts; and all that agreeth to him under this title; I am, what I am.

Non sui alicujus optimum, habet unum optimum, totum. S. Bernard. l. 5. de consider.

5. If you are not yet satisfied enough concerning the greatness of this sovereign Being, and demand something more particular, the Word will tell you in S. John what he learned in the bosom of his Father: God is spirit. All substance in the world; or above the world is spirit or body: but as the body is base and abject, so beauty, strength, power, abideth in the power and jurisdiction of spirit: It is the spirit which doeth all, which animateth, which acteth, which quickeneth, which governeth all the instruments of nature; which worketh great miracles in little bodies, and hath nothing so admirable, as it self. The better part in us is spirit; and God is nothing

Deus spiritus est. Joan. 4.

Beauty of spirit.

Totus spiritus & ennoia, &

rum ratio, & rerum lumen. l. 2. c. 16.

thing but ſpirit; all ſpirit, all intelligence, all reaſon, all light, (ſaid S. Ireæus.) But what ſpirit, but God the Father and Creatour of ſpirits, who is as much exalted above the higheſt Intelligences, as ſpirits are above bodies.

Our ſpirits reſemble the fire of this inferiour region, a groſs, and material fire, which cannot here live, unleſs you put it to wood, cole, greaſe, or ſuch like. But the ſpirit of God is like the fire near to the celeſtial globes, which Philoſophers hold to be ten-fold more ſubtile than air, and not to ſtand in need of any nouriſhment in its ſphere, but from its ſelf.

Perfections of God. Magnitudinis ejus non eſt finis. Pſal. 145. Excellus, & immenſus. Baruc. 4. Intra omnia ſed non incluſus extra omnia ſed non exclusus. Iſodor. de ſummo bono. c. 2.

If we conſider the four perfections which give us a full Idæa of the divine Eſſence, to wit, infinity, immenſity, immutability, eternity, this great Spirit poſſeſſeth them by title of eſſence. Strive not to comprehend him, for he is infinite. Infinite not in a certain manner, not by compariſon of one thing with another; not in poſſibility, but abſolutely, actually infinite: as an ample, and moſt glorious treaſure of all eſſences, and perfections. Aſſign him no limits; for he is immeaſurable, & extended through all meaſures without meaſure; not by a local extent, but an indiviſibility of preſence. He is high and immenſe. He is in the whole univerſe without confinement. He is out of all the univerſe, without any excluſion from it.

Repreſent him not to your ſelf under many forms, if you deſire to figure him in his Nature, for he is immutable. Enquire not of his age, for it exceedeth eternity, ſuch as you may imagine it, The preſent day paſſeth not with him, and yet he is in it, ſince all things are in him.

Non peragitur in eo hodiernus dies, & tamen peragitur, quia in eo ſunt iſta omnia. Auguſt. 1. Confeſſ. c. 6.

But if we regard the three excellencies, which in your opinion more concern divine manners, to wit Wiſdom, Goodneſs, and Sanctity; I not onely affirm he is wiſe, but I ſay he is the abyſs which ſwalloweth all wiſdoms: I do not onely ſay he is good, but the ſource of goodneſs, nature & bounty; a ſource never emptied but into it ſelf & which continually ſtreameth out of it ſelf: I do not onely ſay he is holy, but the root, the object, the example, & form of all ſanctities.

Sanctimonia, & magnificentia in ſanctificatione ejus. Pſal. 95. 6.

Finally, if we behold the eminencies which illuſtrate him, in reſpect of the eye he hath over exteriour things, as are power, juriſdiction, providence, juſtice, and mercy; this Spirit is ſo powerful, that he can all, but impotency; ſo predominate, that there is not any thing from heaven to hell, which boweth not under his Laws; ſo provident, that he hath a care of the leaſt butterfly in the ayr, as well as of the higheſt Chetubin of the Empyreal Heaven; ſo juſt, that his ballance propendeth neither to one ſide nor other; ſo merciful, that he pardoneth all. O great God! Great Spirit! How terrible art thou to our underſtandings, and how amiable to our wils! Thou commandeſt by words, thou ordaineſt by reaſon, thou accompliſheſt by virtue all which is, and giving birth to all things, onely reſerveſt to thy ſelf Eternity. Let it not then be ſtrange, if ſtrucken with thoſe rays which dazeled the eyes of Seraphins, we yield to thy greatneſs, and rather chooſe to enter by love into thy knowledge, than by knowledge into thy love.

6. Let us alſo in concluſion reflect on this munificent Spirit, who repleniſheth all the world with his bounty, ſpreading it over all creatures with incomparable ſweetneſs. Do you not think you behold the great Oceã which inceſſantly furniſheth the air with vapours, and waters for all the earth, dividing himſelf to ſo many objects, yet perpetually entire in his greatneſs, and ever regular in the meaſure of his eternal paſſages. He is ſingular in eſſence, but very divers in his titles and effects; and making his circuit round about the world, every one gives him names after his own manner. Some call him Indian, others Perſian, ſome Arabick, ſome Æthiopian, and ſome Britanick; others ſurname him with epithets quite different, every one deviſeth what he liſt, and in the mean time he ceaſeth not perpetually to paſs on his way, and not content to encompaſs the whole earth as with a girdle, he cleaveth the mountains of Calpe from Arbyla, (thoſe famous pillers of Hercules) to enter thereinto, and bedew the world with his pleaſing ſtreams. He runs a long way, he makes a great circuit; he advanceth delicious Iſlands in the midſt of his boſom: one while he ſwelleth upon one ſide, preſently retireth back from another. He is angry, he is pacified: He bears and ſwalloweth veſſels: He engulphs earth, he killeth flames; he ſometimes by long wandering paſſages goeth under the world, and purifying his waters, diſtilled through thoſe large ſources, maketh fountains and rivers to moiſten mortals. And, that nothing may be wanting to his greatneſs, he mounts up to heaven, there to beget clouds, and entertain ſtore-houſes of waters, as in Cobweb lawn, to give afterward the ſpirit of life to trees, to plants, and all the productions of nature. Oh how admirable is he! Yet is all this but a ſilly drop of dew in cõpariſon of the divine Eſſence. God who is all in all things; being not able to be ſufficiently known by us, in the ſimplicity of his Eſſence, is called by many names, ſignified by an infinite number of figures, repreſented in divers attributes, and inexplicable excellencies: Yet ſay we all we can of him, we affirm he never is ſo well eſteemed, as when we account him wholy incomprehenſible: He not onely environeth the world with his preſence, but beareth it within his arms, and boſom: He formeth it in his Idæa's, he accommodateth it in his diſpoſe, he penetrateth it by his virtue, maintaineth it by his wiſdom, and eſtabliſheth it by his power. He is without, yet not excluded from it; he is within, yet not contained; he is under, yet not drenched, he is above, yet not advanced. He confirmeth ſcepters, and crowns, he raiſeth Cities, Provinces, and Monarchies, he erecteth States; he circumſcribeth laws; he directeth virtues, he enlighteneth ſtars in heaven, he engraveth the beauty of flowers in the meadows; and travelleth throughout all nature, without taking pains; ever preſent, yet always unſeen; ever in action, yet always in repoſe; ever ſearching, yet not needing any thing; ever loving, yet never burning; ever amaſſing, yet never penurious; ever giving, yet never loſing any thing; drawning to himſelf, yet hath nothing without himſelf. Good God, what ſay we, when we ſay G O D.

An excellent ſimilitude of God with the Ocean.

Yet thou (ô ſinner!) thou yet wilt lift an armed hãd againſt thy Lord, againſt a God Omnipotent, who notwithſtanding will not appear potent towards thee, but to do thee good. Blind and inſenſible fugitive from the ſovereign Eſſence in the region of nothing, and whither wilt thou go, not to find the reproches of thy crimes? A caytife pleaſure, a wreched gain, a ſatisfaction of vengeance, diſſolute company take God out of thy heart, to reſign thee as a prey to thy paſſions. Thou wilt adore the favours of men, that are like the rain-bow in heaven, and which having made oſtent of ſo many ſplendours, and varied paintings, leave us nothing but water and morter. Thou wilt build fortunes upon a foundation of quick-ſilver, upon a frail reed, upon a man, who beareth all the figures of vanity. Thou wilt ſeek for Paradiſe in the Capitol, as ſaid Tertullian. Thou wouldſt find ſovereign beatitude in the Courts of great men, and perpetually eſtranged from heaven & the living God, thou graſpeſt nothing but Chimæraes of honour, and feeble images of content. The ſtrength of Pharao (ſaith the Prophet Iſaiah) ſhall be thy confuſion, and the confidence thou haſt in the ſhadow of Ægypt, ſhall be the reproach of thy countenance.

Cælum in Capitolio quæritis, averſi ab ipſo Deo & cælo. Apol. c. 40. Iſaiah. 30. 3. Decalvare, & tondere ſuper filios deliciarum tuarum. Mich. 1.

Shouldſt thou not now forſake all thy ſuperfluities? Oughſt not thou to wear ſack-cloth, and carry aſhes of penance, having buried the children of thy delights (loves and vanities,) which ſo far tranſported thee into the forgetfulneſs of eternal bleſſings?

If God be the Essence of essences, why dost thou please thy self with making so many nothings, by committing sins without number, infidelities without consideration, and ingratitudes void of shame? If God be a Spirit, why holdest thou thy self perpetually fixed to carnal pleasures, which flatter to strangle thee? Look on worldly ambitions, and thou shalt see them bordered with precipices: Reflect on delights, and thou shalt find them strewed all-over with thorns: View the ways of sin, and thou there shalt observe nothing, but remorse. Ought not we at this time to resolve upon consideration of the greatness, and goodness of God, to bear a reverence, and an eternal love towards him? a reverence, by faithfully keeping all his laws, and commandments, and holding his will more dear, than the apple of our eyes; a love, by dayly offering our selves, if it were possible, a hundred times for him, in as many Sacrifices, as our soul hath thoughts, and body members? My God, make me from henceforth to enter into the bottom of my soul, and to silence all these troublesom creatures, all these inordinate passions, which so often bereave me of the honour of thy sight. Appease their storms, and surges, that I may silently speak to thee, and enter with thee into the great abyss of delights, which thou reservest for souls the most purified, that there I may be rapt in contemplation of thy bounties, may be absorpt in consideration of thy beauties, and may wholly dive into thy heart by sacred ardours of thy love.

The third Example upon the third MAXIM.

Of the weakness of man and inconstancy of humane things

AGRIPPA.

Drawn from Josephus, 18. book of his antiquities, and S. Luke Act. 11.

Arist. WHo saith Man, says all vanity: He is a wretched creature (affirms that Ancient) whom fortune tosseth as a tennis-ball, whom misery, and envy poize in a ballance, whom time despoyleth, death takes away, and of whom inconstancy makes a continual metamorphosis. He entereth into the world by the gate of sin, with a body as frail, as his spirit is barren: weakness of mortal members, and stupidity of heart are given him as a portion of his birth, and a necessity of his condition. If you (as yet) be not perswaded of this verity, and more esteem to confide in the world, and to frame to your self an arm of straw, than to seek support from him who sustaineth with three fingers of his power, the whole globe of the earth, King Agrippa (of whom S. Luke maketh mention in the Acts of Apostles, and Josephus in the eighteenth book of his Antiquities) is able to give you a fair lesson of it.

Bernard. l. 2. de consider. c. 9. Fragili corpore, mente sterili, cui infirmitas corporis, fatuitas cordis cumulatur traduce sortis.

Agrippa grand-child of Herod. You have heard in the History of Herod, how this unnatural Prince put his two sons to death, lawful children by the chast Mariamne. This Agrippa of whom I speak, son of the youngest, named Aristobulus came into the world with great priviledges of nature dexterous, courteous, amiable, pleasing born to court, and entertain the favour of the world. Judea was a Theater too streight for his great Spirit, he burnt with impatience to be seen in the Court of Tyberius Cæsar, where his mother was already become gracious with one of the greatest Princesses of the Empire, Antonia, mother of the great Germanicus, and the Emperour Claudius. It was no hard matter for him to satisfie his desire: For behold him presently at the Court of Rome, where he closely adhered to the person of Drusus, the Emperour Tyberius his son, honoured by all the world as successour of the Empire.

Amities of great men barren. Agrippa to well knew how to gain this great Prince, by the sweet charms of his conversation, that he could not live without him: but as Tyberius was a frugal man, suffering his son not to fall into any excess, so Drusus was full of free affection towards his favourite, the effects whereof were yet very slender. In such sort, that Agrippa entertaining correspondence with the son of so great an Emperor, more pleasing than profitable for him, dayly consumed as the butter-flys in the flames of this greatness; so profuse was his expence above his ability. The mother was extreamly troubled at it, and restrained (what she might) her sons purse; but he ever found ways to open it again, till such time as she dying, and the son seeing himself at liberty, he flew into exorbitant expences, and became indebted a third, or a fourth part, more than he was worth.

A pretty touch of Lewis the twelfth to Francis the first. This is it which ordinarily overthroweth young men, who expect great fortunes, and mighty favours. They think to be presently in the midst of the City, when they afar off see the hand of the dyal. They suppose they possess blessings, which will never be had; they promise, are engaged, much turmoyl, and passionately hoping, ruin all their hopes. Behold a little the goodly support may be expected from men of the world. Drusus the Emperours son, who bare all glory in bloom, is taken into the other world, without making any mention at all of his favourite: Agrippa falls from the chariot of favour, and found there was nothing got by the service of his Master, but debts, and discontents.

Affliction of a Courtier frustrated of his hopes. He reflects on the father, to see if any ray of compassion will dart from his eyes: But Tyberius commanded him to be gone from the Court, saying for a full reason, he could not endure to look on what his son had loved, without renovation of his memory, and grief. The young Prince returneth into Judæa, where, though the grand-child of a great King, he found himself so needy, that he wished to die, not having wherewith to live.

Poverty the chief scourge. There is nothing more bitter to men of quality, amongst all the scourges of the world, than poverty, which ever draweth along with it four evil companions, dependence upon another contempt, shame, and misery. This generous heart thought that death would better his condition: But Cypre his wife, a good Princess, chased away this melancholy humour, and descending so low, as the shame of begging for him, procured some little money, that he the more sweetly might pass this miserable life: for verily he sometimes lived at Herod the Tetrarchs charge, sometime upon Flaccus, Lieutenant of Syria. But this kind of life being beggarly, & waited on with much reproach, he grew impatient, and resolved to return to Rome, to bury himself in the shadow of favour, since he could not touch the body of it. The poor Princess his wife, seeing there was not any would lend him money, unless she bound her self for him, did it couragiously, exposing her person to all the persecutions of creditours, to help her husband.

Loyalty of a wife to her husband. But a man much indebted is like one possessed, round beset with a Legion of devils; no sooner went one out, but ten tormented him. Agrippa saw himself assaulted by creditours, Provosts, and Sergeants, which more terrified him than arms, or warlick Engines. The most powerful of them all, was a Controuler of the Empetours house, who required a huge summe of money from him, whereof he was accountable to Tyberius his Exchequer. To this he answered very coldly, he was ready to satisfie, if he pleased to be patient but till the next day: but that night, he stole away, and went towards Rome, to draw more near to the flame must burn him. Notwithstanding before his coming, he wrote to Tyberius, who was in his Miseries of a man indebted.

Island

Iſland of Capreæ, to ſound the likelyhood of his welcome. The Emperour who long before had his wound throughly skinned, for the death of his Son, wrot back again very courteouſly, giving him aſſurance of welcome; and the truth is, he found Tyberius, who entertained him with extraordinary favour, and lodged him in his palace. All his buſineſſes went well, had it not been this Controuller, (whoſe ſhadow he ſtill ſaw before his eyes) wrote ſpeedily to the Emperour, That Agrippa was endebted to his Exchequer in great ſums, which he had promiſed to diſcharge preſently, but fled like a faithleſs man, and diſcovered by his proceedings there was nothing but impoſture in his actions.

Generous act of Antonia.

This unlucky letter at the firſt deſtroyed all his credit. For the old man, who for all his friendſhip was reſolved not to looſe a denier, cauſed him ſhamefully to pack out of his palace, and forbad his Guards, to admit him any enterance before he had ſatisfied his creditours.

The miſerable Agrippa, ſeeking out a God of money to make his vows unto, went directly without any fear to the Princeſs Antonia to acquaint her with his misfortune, and beg her favour. The Lady was ſo generous, and bountiful towards him, that ſhe diſcharged the debt, lending him money in remembrance of his dead mother, and for that he had been bred with her ſon Claudius, beſides ſhe took ſingular pleaſure in his humour.

This man whoſe fortune ebbed and flowed, ſaw himſelf ſuddenly raiſed, ſo that entering into amity with Cæſar, he made a ſtreight league with Caligula, by the expreſs commandements of Tyberius, who appointed he ſhould follow him. Theſe were two notable ramblers, whom chance had ſo very well coupled together, as well for conformity of their humours, as the encounter of their hopes. They began a life wholly ſportive, not thinking on the time to come, but to hope well of it, nor dreaming of any thing, but that which might make them merry.

Flattery of Agrippa.

Agrippa perſiſting in his ordinary delights, undertook one day as he went in coach with Caligula to ſpeak of Tyberius, ſaying, That he was as old as the earth, and that it ſeemed death had forgotten him: That it was high time he payd tribute to nature; as for himſelf, he wiſhed nothing elſe in the world, but quickly to ſee Caligula Prince of the world in his place, well knowing he ſhould lay hold on a good portion of the felicities which all men were to have under his Empire. He found not that Caligula, although ardently deſirous to ſee himſelf ſuddenly Maiſter, ſhewed to take any pleaſure in this diſcourſe, ſo much he feared the Emperour Tyberius. He kept his thoughts in his heart, not truſting his tongue with them, leaſt ſtones and buſhes might have ears.

It happened by chance, that Eutyches Agryppa's coachman heard all his Maſter ſaid, & was ſome ſpace of time without ſhewing any appearance of it, but afterward being brought before the Provoſt of the City, at his Maſter Agryppa's requeſt, for a pilfery committed by him in his houſe, he ſaid he had many other things to ſpeak, which concerned the Emperours life, whereupon the Provoſt carried him to Capreæ, where Tyberius plunged in his infamous pleaſures was ſome time without ſeeing him. Agrippa who would needs excuſe himſelf before he was accuſed, wholly forgetting the diſcourſe he had held with Caligula, earneſtly preſſed this ſervant might be heard, ſo far, as therein to employ the credit of Antonia, who was very powerful with Tyberius. The Emperour anſwered, Agrippa need not fret himſelf ſo much in this affair, and that it might perhaps be too ſoon decided for him. This put more diſturbance upon him than he had before, ſo that to ſatisfie him, Eutyches needs muſt be ſent for, who urged his accuſation very coldly, upon which Tyberius who ſpake but half a word, and ſaid nothing to Macro Captain of the Guards but Take, take him, neither naming whom, nor how. Macro that thought not of him at all, who was ſpoken of in this buſineſs, ſtood much amazed, not knowing whom he meant, which made the Emperour repeat the word again in choller; ſaying plainly: I command you ſeiz on the perſon of Agrippa, ſo that inſtantly he was taken almoſt in Caligula's arms, and put to the chain before the Palace gate with other Criminals brought thither.

His priſon.

It was then very hot weather, and he being extream thirſty, ſaw a ſervant of Caligulas named Thaumaſtus paſſing along, who carried a pitcher of water; he called him, entreating he might drink, which the other preſenting with much courteſie, he having drunk ſaid: aſſure thy ſelf, I will one day well pay thee for this glaſs of water thou haſt given me; if I get out of this captivity, I will make thee great. Thereupon leaning to a tree, an owl in a ſtrange manner perched over his head, which a certain priſoner (an Almaign by Nation,) a great Southſayer perceiving, foretold him (as Joſephus relateth) that this bird would prove a good Augur, and that he ſhould overcome all his affairs: but when he ſaw her the ſecond time, let him expect death within five days. Note that theſe kind of predictions proceed from a cunning ſleight of the divel, nor are their iſſues every proſperous for ſuch as look after them.

Strange prediction.

Notwithſtanding Agrippa ſeeing himſelf in this condition deſpaired not of his fortune, he is carried to priſon, the good Princeſs Antonia, (whoſe heart was transfixed) not daring in any ſort to ſpeak to Tyberius for him, whoſe humours ſhe too well underſtood. All ſhe could do was to recommend him to the Captain that he might be well uſed, and lodged, to let him take the baths, and have ſome indifferent keepers.

He remained there ſome ſpace with much anxiety, when one day as he entered into the baths, Marſyas one of his ſervants brought him news of Tyberius his death, whiſpering it in his ear in Hebrew, to this purpoſe The Lyon is dead. The Centurion who guarded him ſeeing them talk together in great ſecret, would needs have his ſhare, and underſtanding what it was, became ſo joyful that he merrily ſupped with his priſoner. Yet other reporting this bruit was falſe, the Centurion entered into ſuch enraged choller, that finding Agrippa in his bed, he made him ariſe, fettered him, thought to kill him, for the diſpleaſure he conceived to have ſo eaſily witneſſed the joy of his heart. But his anger was ſoon appeaſed, the death of Tyberius being moſt certain.

Caligula his ſucceſſour burnt with deſire to go inſtantly to Rome to deliver his good friend: but Antonia counſelled him not ſo much to haſten this affair, leaſt it might be thought he did it to brave the decrees of the deceaſed; which he found to be diſcreet adviſe. Behold the cauſe why after ſome days were paſt, he gave the royal purple, and diadem with his own hands to our Agrippa, adding thereunto a chain of gold, of like weight with that of iron wherewith Tyberius had fettered him, & cauſed him to ſway in Judæa, giving him the Kingdom of Philippis in its whole extent. A year after he got leave of the Emperour to viſit his Kingdom, where every one beheld him, with much amazement, ſeeing him return with a crown, in that place where he had been reduced almoſt to beggery. Wherefore not to be ungrateful for benefits recieved from God, he offered his gold chain in the Temple, and made Thaumaſtus, who gave him the cup of water, Controuler of his houſe; ſuch power hath a ſlight good turn well placed over a generous ſoul.

Admirable change of virtue.

When he had reigned about four years, Caligula, the little God of his felicity, after a general inundation of all the vices in the world, is ſlain by Chereas, which taught him, great men of the earth are weak reeds that in an inſtant fall by the breath of God. Every one thought his whole fortune was ruined; but the Emperour Claudius his Succeſſour, with whom being young he had been bred, ſet him above wind and tempeſt, adding to what Caligula gave him, all Judea and Samaria.

Behold how the Kingdom in the end returned to the race of Mariamne, of which it had been diſpoſſeſſed, and how Providence rendereth inſenſibly, a juſtice moſt ſenſible. Agrippa ſeeing himſelf unexpectedly ſo exalted, endeavoured all he could to gain the love of his people, to entertain juſtice and commerce, to raiſe goodly buildings, & to prepare at certain times publick ſports, and recreations. But let us ſtill purſue at the heels this frail greatneſs of men, which having touched the ſtars, is loſt in abyſſes. This unfortunate Prince ſo much deſired to become acceptable to his Jewiſh people, that through exceſs of this thirſt, he embarked in an ill buſineſs. For being arrived at Jeruſalem, at the time when the Church began, which was outragiouſly perſecuted by the Jews, to pleaſe them, he cut off the head of S. James, brother of S. John, and at the ſame inſtant cauſed S. Peter, Prince of the Apoſtles, to be taken, whom he fettered with heavy chains, of purpoſe very ſpeedily to ſacrifice him to the rage of the giddy multitude, had he not been delivered miraculouſly by the help of an Angel.

But the unhappy Agrippa perpetually adhering to men, and not fearing to purchaſe their favours at the charge of innocent and ſacred bloud, ſoon found himſelf overwhelmed under the burden of his greatneſs: to teach perfidious Princes, the great ruin of their fortunes often proceedeth from the perſecution of the ſervants of JESUS CHRIST.

The ſeaventh year of his reign, ſetting forth magnificent games at Cæſarea, the ſecond day of the entertainments, he appeared in full Theater before the Embaſſadours of Tyre and Sydon in a robe of cloth of ſilver, on which the Sun reflecting his rays, he was preſently beheld reſplendent as a ſtar, and being about to open his mouth to make a ſpeech, his flatterers began to cry out with loud applauſes, It was the voice of a God, not a man wherewith he entered into a deſperate vanity, and Joſephus ſayes, that at the ſame inſtant he ſaw the Owl, whereof the ſouthſaying impoſtour ſpake, which preſaged his death, when ſuddenly he cryed out to his Courtiers: Behold the God you have made, who ceaſeth to be a man; you have placed me among the Immortal, but I go to take place among the dead.

He felt, whilſt he ſpake this, the gripes of a violent colick, which enforced him to be carried from the theater to the bed, and from the bed to the tomb. The rumour of his malady being divulged, the people conceived ſo great a grief thereat, that men, women, and children entered into his chamber covered with hair-cloth, bewayling him, and praying for his health. He beholding them in the extremity of his pain, wept bitterly, bidding adieu to his family, and people: then remaining for the ſpace of five days in extream dolour, he yielded up his ſoul, to ſerve as an eternall example to poſterity of mans weakneſs, and the inconſtancy of humane things.

IV. MAXIM.

OF THE PROVIDENCE OF GOD.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That our ſupport ſhould be from our ſelves, without expectation of any thing from the providence of God.

The belief of a providence is the ſweetneſs of life.

IT is an unſpeakeable comfort to have the eyes of God for witneſs of our ſufferings, and when we in juſtice ſuffer with courage, to know our patience is enlightened with thoſe aſpects, which make them thrice happy.

The valourous Champions, who contended in the Olympiack games, the ſpectacle heretofore of the whole world, in that proportion they felt their skin to ſmart, their bloud to drop, their bones crack, were comforted to ſee upon one ſide, the Judges of their combats ſitting to conſider their merit, and on the other, Crowns placed aloft before them, the luſtre whereof reflected into their eyes, to charm their pains by the hope of glory.

From thence we derive an undoubted maxim, that it

THE HOLY COURT.

That the foundation of humane life ſubſiſteth in the providence of God.

it is an unspeakable comfort to the faithfull, who endure some incommodities rough and thorny, to know there is an eye of Divine Providence, which not onely seeth them, but becoming a pledge for their travels, promiseth to their perseverance assured recompence.

His goodness. 2 I observe the admirable Providence of God, in that being perpetually questioned by the diffident spirits of Libertines, it ever subsisteth, bearing in its bosom who would destroy it; and which is more, is established by the proofs, wherewith they endeavour to ruin it. I at this present lay aside the reasons, which have so often been refuted: I speak nothing at all of the consent of the wise, of the heavens motions, of the necessary dependence of creatures, of the architecture of the universe, of the order, and end of every thing, of miracles, of predictions, of spirits, of examples, and so many other arguments ordinarily used to prove Divine Providence. I onely maintain one thing, which perhaps will seem strange, but is most undoubted, that the same reasons whereof the wicked make trophey, to evict this belief from the faithfull, are arrows which recoil back upon themselves.

Manifest proof of providence. All that which makes them murmur, and cry out against the Government of a supream cause, is, that evils are seen in the world, which would not be, if a God, all good, all wise (as we affirm) took care of things temporal. To which I answer, we ought to believe a Providence, since there is evil in the inferiour order of the world which we inhabit, and the profit we derive from our evils endeth in the knowledge of the sovereign good. For I ask, from whence know we evil to be evil, but by the existence of its contrary? Had there never been health in the body, we had never known what sickness were: but when at any time we saw a man sound, fresh, and lusty, who suddenly lost his appetite and sleep, by reason of shakings and heats felt over all his body, he is said to be sick, because the order of the good constitution he before enjoyed is changed, and overthrown. Likewise when we see some evil to happen in the world, we presently say it is ill, because it is against the order of good and therefore the very wicked who complain, cannot so do, but by affirming and acknowledging an order, from which this evil is wandered.

Providentia est ratio ordinis rerum ad finem. Now whersoever there is order, there is necessarily direction and Providence, since we see one cannot so much as tell unto four, and reckon some number, one after another, without the help of reason. You commit a sin, and feel it instantly brings some remorse with it: what teacheth you it is sin, if not the Law? I entered not into the knowledge of sin, but by means of the Law. For I knew not what concupiscence was, if the Law had not told me: Thou shalt not covet, said the Apostle.

Rom. 7. 7. Peccatum non cognovi, nisi per legem. Nam concupiscentiam nesciebam nisi lex dicerit: Non concupisces. Psal. 63. 8.

Now what is law, but an order, and a sovereign reason engrafted in intellectual nature, which commandeth, and ordaineth things that ought to be done, with express prohibition of their contraries. What is it else, but an eternal rule which guideth the world by the knowledge of do, and not do: an ordinance most holy, which prescribeth all honest things, and banisheth all vice.

Sagittæ parvulorum factæ sunt plagæ eorum, & infirmatæ sunt contra eos linguæ eorum. From thence ensueth, we cannot complain of the least disorder, without confessing this eternal Providence which establisheth all orders. O the wonders of God! who causeth the arrows of those who invade his wisdom, to return against such as shot them!

An answer made to complaints against Providence. 3 Some complain there are things poore and abject in nature, which are to no purpose, because brutish man will not know their use, for fear he therein find his own ingratitude. They would have God make the world all of gold, as that Painter, who unable to pencil the beautifull Hellen with so great diversity of parts, and conformity of members, filled his table with drapery, which seemed rich, but was little to the purpose. Who seeth not the truth of that singular axiom of S. Thomas, that never would there be perfect goodness in things created, were there not some order and degrees in the same goodness. All the grace and beauty of the world would be lost, if the multitude, and disproportion of so many things were taken away, which by an admirable discrepance, & discord infinitely agreeing, consent in the good of this great All: In this it is, wherein the musick of the great God consisteth, & you will disturb it: This is his Table diversified with many colours, and you will deface it: This is his common-wealth, divided into sundry offices, and you will ruin it.

S. Tho. contra Gentes. l. 3. c. 71. Perfectio bonitatis in rebus creatis non inveniretur nisi esset ordo bonitatis.

After this so laudable diversity is blamed, the evils of nature are decried, serpents & poisons are exclaimed at, and all other creatures thought mischievous. Blind that you are, who see not, an evil well placed in the world is not an evil. Fire which burneth straw, makes gold and silver shine: water which drowneth men, daily gives life to fishes. If you take his poyson from the serpent, you bereave him wherewith to live: and what shall we say, that there may be found such among men, who have turned poison into nutriment. Every creature is good for some use. Let us not then accuse the wisdom of the Creatour, but onely correct our imprudence. Another saith he complains not there are evils, but they are ill disposed, since good men have the greatest part of them. It is an old quarrel, and which hath so many times been sufficiently refuted, with more vigour of reason, than correction in manners. The heavens, and stars are accused, when a good Prince hath lost a battle, and that having all his life time pursued innocency, ill success hath waited on his standards. Some complain that another, being so just, is plunged in a miserable suit; that the sea which drenched innocents, favoured pyrates; that hail fell upon the field with crosses and benedictions, and that death sparing so many unprofitable and guilty heads, took away that excellent man in his prime. Ignorant that we are of the blessings, and evils of life! Have we then taken the character of Christianity under condition to be happy in all worldly occasions? Is it reason since God gave us eternal blessings, he should likewise satisfie us in all these petty trifles? We say the just are not the more happy, because they do not always gain the most in play, & traffick, and that they are not the most favoured with good success in the world: as if a favourite fed with viands from the Kings own dish, should complain the King afforded him not the bread was distributed amongst his Dogs. We would that God having so charily taken us into his protection for our eternal salvation, should also charge himself to deliver us all our packets. This innocent (say you) is oppressed, and this wicked man is prosperous. How know you Gods counsels over both the one and other? This gold (saith S. Augustine) of one side is purified in the furnace, and one the other; that fish you thought happy, hath already the hook in his throat. God hath so long expected your penitence, and you cannot one moment reasonably wait on him. The decrees of his providence resemble letters written with the juce of a limon, which never are read, but by the help of fire. That day when he shall come to Judge the world in flames, will make all appear, which the weakness of our wits cannot comprehend. But without expectation of so long a term, there needs but one Session; there needeth but the quarter of a mans life to teach many examples of divine Providence.

Evils of nature.

Homines magis subeunt ordinem divinæ Providentiæ, quæ res naturales, qui propinquius ordinantur ad Deum, sicut ad finem. Hieron. Ferr. l. 1. de Triumpho crucis, c. 11.

Gloss. In Job. Tentatio in electis, non est nox sed vespera, quia lucem obscurat, sed non extinguit. Tertul ad Scapul. Animas nos-

Let us stick still to the verity pronounced by the ancient gloss upon the book of Job: Temptation is not a night for elect souls, but an evening, which darkneth, not extinguisheth light. Let us cleave to the resolution, which Tertullian teacheth us: We have enga- ged our souls by a solemn oath to this warfare of tribulation. Let us not betray our faith, to betray our glory. The Egyptian thorne was ever esteemed in the contexture of coronets, and still a sharp affliction patiently borne hath been highly valued in the diadem of constancy.

ra authoritati in hac pugna accessimus.

4 If peradventure one spirit be convinced upon this article by a million of examples, which shew, if virtue for a time hath been afflicted, yet God in the end crowneth it with immortal garlands; he falls upon the permission of sins, and you find Libertines so abominable, and unnatural as to accuse God to have too much goodness and clemency to tolerate their disorders? Why doth man complain of the evil whereof he is the Authour? If a leg be lame, or crooked, the moving virtue which of it self giveth force and vigour is not blamed, but the distortedness, and debility of the part. Why do we not at least use God in the same manner? When we behold a deformed and exorbitant will, let us not say this great Mover commits this irregularity: for he ceaseth not to dispose all creatures to good, but confess the defect is the evil will, which resisteth its Creatour.

Of the permission of sins.

What wrong doth God unto us, if he being Governour of this ample City, called the world, will not force any man, but gives every one leave to live according to his condition? He suffereth stones to abide in their own inclination, creatures in their instinct, men in their liberty. He ceaseth not to teach them good, to prescribe and give them means to perform it, and if they do otherwise, they derive from their evils, either justice or repentance. What wrong then doth he, if he make man free, to become the more like himself.

Faustus. Reg l. 2. de Grat. This Authour hath been opposed upon the point of Grace: but he may be favourably interpreted upon many things, since he was afterward reputed holy, as Baronius saith.

Have you not seen the notable discourse written by Faustus Bishop of Rheggio, where Wisdom, Power Bounty, and Justice, plead before God one against another, touching mans liberty. Power feared if he were let loose, he might abuse this free-will to his own ruin, and said, he must give all except the power to undo himself: but in the end it was concluded that that which was best and most excellent, should be granted him, to wit liberty, not to be thrown into the world like the stock of a tree, but have leave to do good, & ill, that his extraction might be rendered the more elate, and his actions the more glorious: That power would make him more noble, wisdom prudent, goodness assist him in his combats, and justice crown him in his victories.

Talem faciamus, quem in dextram partem non trahat necessitas, sed voluntas, qui malum ratione intelligat, bonum virtute peficiat. Talem faciamus cui bonitas in naturâ, malicia sit extra naturam, &c. S. Tho. contra Gent. l. c. 7. Bonum totius præeminet bono partis. Ad prudentem igitur gubernatorem pertinet negligere aliquem defectum bonitatis in parte, ut faciat augmentum bonitatis in toto.

Such let us make him, said wisdom, that he may hasten to the choice of the better part, not of necessity, but of meer good will, that he understand evil by reason, and do good through virtue. Such let us make him, that goodness may appear in his nature, and malice out of his nature. Such let us make him, that he may have good in will, and evil in power: And the first ground of his glory may be the power of sin, and the will not to act it.

Were it a matter very reasonable think you, that God should cease to do good, because man would take occasion to do ill? Know we not it is a maxim of well ordered policy, never to neglect the publick for inconveniences, and defects of some particulars. We are not ignorant free-will is one of the most excellent treasures of reasonable nature, & why should God deprive his workmanship of it, under colour that some particulars would abuse it? Ought we not to content our selves to behold in the histories of all the nations of the world, how God pursueth, chastiseth, destroyeth both evil, & evil men, sometimes openly, sometimes covertly? to reward good men in the end, and restore virtue to her throne, of which the insolency of the wicked seeks to dispossess them. Let us then for this reason adore the Providence, and acknowledge the proposition I here have proved, that the disorders condemned in nature, averre there is a first order, & a primitive rule, without which nothing can be well disposed.

Foundation of the verities of Divine PROVIDENCE.

Maxims of Providence.

THere remaineth, having succinctly refuted the objections of prophane souls, to instruct, and settle the faithfull in this belief, which is one of the greatest consolations of life; and for which cause I affirm, the doctrine of Providence is grounded upon Scripture, upon holy Fathers, and upon reason: Upon the scripture, which give us assurance in so many places.

Wisdom plainly telleth us, That God made little and great, and as there is nothing so vast, may escape his Immensitie, so there is not any thing so small, which is deprived the blessings of his bountie. His Providence governeth all things from the beginning of the world, & ceaseth not to disintangle this great Web of Ages. The tree looseth not one of his leaves, the head one of its hairs, the air one little bird, without his ordinance, as the Eternal Word teacheth us. We derive life, motion, and being from his bosom, in which he beareth us without weariness, and preserveth us without loathing. All the World is a large (a) dioceſe, whereof he is the Bishop, and Eternal Prelate, who indefatigably watcheth over his flocks, as saith Clemens Alexandrinus. (b) So soon as a creature is in being, it is moistened with sources of the divine Providence, said S. Dionysius. And according to the opinion of S. Augustine, (c) Nothing is sensibly, & visibly done in the world, which cometh not from the interiour, invisible, and intelligible cabinet of this great Monarch, whether it be commanded, or permitted.

Pusillis, & magnum ipse fecit, & æqualiter illi cura est de omnibus, Sap. 6. Nonne duo passeres asse venient, &c. Math. 10. In ipso vivimus, movemur & sumus. Act. 17 ἐξ ἑνὸς ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ἐκκλησιάζεται. Clem. Alex. (b) S. Dion. de Cæl. Hier. cap. 4. πάντα γὰρ τὰ μέχρι τῶν ἐσχάτων προϊόντα. (c) August. de Trin. l. 3. c. 4. Nihil fit sensibiliter, & visibiliter quod non de interiore invisibili, atque intelligibili aula summi Imperatoris aut jubeatur, aut permittatur.

Now observe, this divine Providence is composed of three heads, Knowledge, Disposition, & Government. Knowledge, seeth and considereth all things: Disposition, ordaineth the connexion of parts, and correspondency both of the one, and other. Government, embraceth all things which concern the end, as well to divert the obstacles, as advance the progressions. God hath all these three points supereminently. For as for knowledge, it is most perfect, as we will presently demonstrate. Disposition is such, that all the whole universe in all its parts is ruled, like a paper with musick lines. Which made Synesius say, (d) the world was the harp of God, and the divers orders of nature were the strings of it. And Junilius an African Bishop, who flourished in the sixth Age, discoursing very subtilly upon this subject, shews the relation there is between the civil world and nature, comparing the seven daies of the week, with the seven Ages of the world. The government of it is so perpetual, and visible, that Aristotle himself (e) confesseth, the communication of the first being, maintained all creatures in state, and that without its benigne influences, this great All would return to nothing.

(d) Synesius Hym. 4. διὰ σὺ τὰ φύσεως ἔνορα τὰ πάντα, μουσικὰ. Junilius in Genesim, nisi fit. Beda. (e) Arist. lib. de principio. The foundations, and four pillars of it. Knowledge of God. Psalm. 146. Sapientiæ ejus non est numerus. Deus in omnia sufficiens. Dissimulator, & præscitator perfectionis suæ nomen. Tertul. l. de pœnit. c. 3.

6 But if you ask upon what foundation of reason this doctrine is built, I answer, it is supported by four powerfull columes; Science, Goodness, Justice, and the Power of God. His Science is infinite, and and incomprehensible. For he most distinctly beholdeth all things which have been, are, shall be, and may be, in their proper essence, which is the efficient, final, exemplar, and fundamental cause of them. You must not require how this divine Spirit may suffice so many things; since all things in comparison of him, are no more than a drop of dew, compared to the Ocean. He knows all, because he created all; because the world is no world by any other reason, but that God hath known it was a world. The vapours of the earth never weary the sun: it could not breath forth so much, if he digested not more: so the knowledge of all objects of the world cause no weariness in God, because all therein is finite, and his ſcience is, as is his eſſence, infinite.

and

His goodneſs 7 To this ſcience is joined a great goodneſs, which is the cauſe God loveth all he created, and conſerveth it with a certain tendemeſs of affection, and ineſtimable ſweetneſs. The empire of man ordinarily is harſh, and violent. He diverteth the courſe of waters, he dries up fountains, he ſubmitteth Lions to the yoak, he placeth turrets on the backs of Elephants, he changeth metals, he counterfeits precious ſtones, he ſophiſticateth total nature to accommodate it to his pretenſions: but God not forcing the inclinations of things created, applieth himſelf to each according to the qualities of its eſſence. He ſhineth with the ſun, and burneth with the fire. He makes ſhowers with the clouds, pearls with the ſhells, the dew of heaven, gold, and fruits with the earth.

We underſtand there are three ſtreamings of this bounty: the one by generation, the other by ſpiration, and the laſt by creation. The two firſt are eternal, the laſt is temporal, by which he drew the world out of nothing, and having produced it, maintains it both in general and particular, affording even to the leaſt fly, all accommodation according to its nature, and condition. He is not like thoſe Oſtriches, which lay their eggs on the ſand without hatching them: but compareth himſelf to the Hen in the Goſpel, which toileth and laboureth inceſſantly, either to hatch, feed, or train up her young-ones: ſhe waxeth lean, ſhe famiſheth her ſelf, becomes angry, briſtles up her ſelf for her precious brood, and taketh that upon her for love, which ſhe cannot have by nature. It is a ſhadow of the goodneſs of God, who ceaſeth not to provide for our neceſſities, to love us as his children, to defend us as the apple of his eye. I was (ſaid he by his Prophet) as the foſter-father of my people. I bare them all between my arms, they never vouchſafing to open their eyes to my protection. Yet will I draw them to me by the bands of Adam, which are the chains of my charity.

Hoſea 11. Et ego quaſi nutritius Ephraim portabam eos, in brachiis meis, & neſcierunt, quod curarem eos. In funiculis Adam trahам eos, in vinculis charitatis. Exod. 2.

Behold in Exodus the little Moſes who floateth on Nilus in a cradle of reeds: the mother for fear of the rigour of men abandoneth him to death, the ſiſter followeth him with her eyes to ſee what will become of him: but her weakneſs could do nothing to warrant him from danger. God in the mean ſpace becomes the Pilot of this little bark, he conducteth it without ſails, without rudder, without oars, he bears it upon the waves, he makes it arrive at a good haven. He draweth out this infant, who was as a victim expoſed to make of him a God of Pharaoh, one day to drown in the red ſea the poſterity of thoſe, who would have drenched him in Nilus.

His Juſtice. 8 Adde to this immenſs goodneſs, juſtice, an inſeparable virtue of the Divinity, which ſeems to oblige God to preſerve and direct what he created. But it is to judge moſt abjectly of this divine underſtanding, to ſay as did Averroes, he abuſed his magnificence, and ſoyled his dignity, if he buſied himſelf in the mannage of ſo many trifles. S. Ambroſe judged better when he ſaid: If God wrong himſelf in the government of the world, did he not himſelf a greater injury in creating it. For to do, or not to do, what one is not obliged unto, hath no injuſtice in it; but to abandon a creature, after it is produced, is a ſtain of inhumanity. And if we regard the juſtice, which appertaineth to the government of men; what malignity and proſtitution of mind were it to think; ſouls the moſt captive, having ſome ſpark of juſtice, yet God (who muſt be ſovereign perfection) would ſuffer the world to be expoſed to fortune, or delivered over to tyrany, as a prey, and a booty, without any care of it, or inquiry into injuſtices? There is not any Age which could not furniſh out a million of proofs againſt theſe miſchievous beliefs, if we would open our eyes to conſider them, but our diſtruſts and puſillanimities blind us, and alienate us from knowledge of thoſe truths, which God reſerveth for the moſt purified ſouls.

Ambl. 1. offic. c. 13. Si injuria eſt regere, multò major injuria feciſſe, cum aliquid non feciſſe nulla ſit injuſtitia, non curare quod feceris ſummæ inclementiæ.

9 To conclude, the laſt volume which ſhould ſettle our faith in the verity of divine government, is the magiſtral power God exerciſeth over all the world, which he ruleth, tempereth, and directeth with one ſole thought, much otherwiſe than did heretofore thoſe practick wits, who vanted to animate ſtatues, becauſe they by certain engines gave them motion. Wretched, and blind that we are, ever bowed down to the earth, & perpetualy diveſted of thoſe great lights of Saints! We meaſure God by the ell of men, we cloth him after our faſhion, and we hold impoſſible to the Divinity, what our underſtanding cannot comprehend. Shall we never ſay with the Prophet Jeremiah: O moſt ſtrong! O onely great, and onely potent! The God of hoſts is thy name. Thou art great in thy counſels, incomprehenſible in thy cogitations, and thy eyes are upon all the waies of the children of Adam.

His Power

Ὁ θεὸς φύσει ἀρχὴ τοῦ κόσμου. Ariſt. de mundo.

Hier. 32. 19. Fortiſſime, magne, & potens Domine exercituum, nomen tibi magnus conſilio, & incomprehenſibilis cogitatu, cujus oculi aperti ſunt, ſuper omnes vias filiorum Adam.

We daily ſee upon men, who are but worms of the earth, ſo many tokens of Gods power. A King ſpeaketh, and a hundred thouſand ſwords haſten out of ſcabbards at the ſound of one ſyllable. A maſter of a family builds, and at one filly beck, behold ſo many artificers, ſo many mules and horſes, ſome draw materials out of the bottom of quarries, others carry them in waggons, ſome make morter and cement, others hew ſtones, ſome raiſe them aloft, others lay them, ſome play the carpenters, and others poliſh marbles. There are ſome who work in iron, and others in braſs; all is done to the liking of one man, who is poſſeſſed of a little money.

Do you never conſider God as a great King in an army, as a great father of a family in a houſe, who by his ſovereign power governs all he created, not with a toilſome care, but an incomparable facility. He gave in the begining of the creation an inſtinct to all living creatures, and there is not any ſo little a ſpider, which comming into the world, bringeth not its rules, its book, its light; it is preſently inſtructed in all it ſhould do. God ſpeaketh interiourly to all creatures in a double language, with a powerfull impreſſion, a ſecret commandement: he gives a ſignal into the world, and every one doth his office, every one laboureth regularly as in a ſhip, and all things agree to this great harmony of heaven. The little Nightingal in the forreſts, makes an Organ of her throat, ſometimes breaking her notes into warbles, ſometime ſtretching them out at length. The Swallow is buſie in her maſonrie, the Bee toileth all the day in her innocent thefts, the Spider furniſheth out the long train of her webs, and makes more curious works with her feet, than the moſt skilfull women can weave with their hands. Fiſhes play their parts under the water, beaſts of ſervice labour in their duty, ſmall grains of ſeed, though dead and rotten, give life to great trees, which advance to the clouds. There is nothing idle in all nature, nothing diſobedient but men and divels, who employ their liberty to reſiſt him, whoſe power is as juſt, as it is eternal.

Guil. Par. de univerſ. 1. p. par. 3. c. 14. Naſcitur aranea cum lege, libros & lucernæ Deus ipſe univerſa ſinu perfectæ magnitudinis & poteſtatis includit, intentus ſimpe operi ſuo, vadens per omnia, movens cuncta, vivificans univerſa. Tertul. 1. de Trin. c. 2.

10 Let us then concluding this diſcourſe, adore the divine Providence, which holdeth the helm of the univerſe. Let us behold it, as a watch-tower furniſhed with a thouſand fires that abundantly enlighten this Ocean whereon we ſail. Let us behold it as a burning pillar in the wilderneſs of this life. Let us behold it as our pole-ſtar, and never looſe ſight of it. It is our ſupport, our ſweetneſs, our comfort. It is that which cooleth our ardours, drieth our tears, breaketh our fetters, and diſſipateth our annoys. If we be in darkneſs, it is the light, if we be anxious, it giveth counſel. If we be in a labyrinth of errours, it is the thread which guideth us, if in danger of ſhipwrak, it is the haven, and if we be at the gates of death, it is life.

Away with all curiosities, southsayers, sorceresses, and superstitions unworthy the name of a Christian. Fie upon despaire, and mindsaffliction. Let us learn in all things which appertain to us, speedily, and effectually to fix our selves on the will of the omnipotent, let us continually say, God seeth this affair, since nothing escapeth the quickness of his eye: He loves me as his child, because he is goodness it self: He is just, because he is the measure of all justice: He is potent, because there is not any thing can resist his will. Let us expect awhile; the trouble I endure is but a flying cloud, and God will do all for the best, Let us say with S. Augustine.

O Sovereign Father, who governest the vast frame of heaven, I submit to thy direction. Lead me on the right hand, lead me on the left, turn to what side thou pleasest. I follow thee without reply, or delay. For what should I get by resistance but to be dragged weeping; and to bear, becoming evil, what I might do sincerely becoming good.

Auguſt. de civit. Dei c. 8. l. 8. Duc me, ſumme pater, vaſti moderator olympi, quacunque placuit, nulla parendi eſt mora. Adſum impiger: fac nolle comitabor gemens, malusque patiar facere quod licuit bono.

Heaven, earth, and sea, said Nicephorus Gregorius, (a) fight against a wicked man as a fugitive from Providence, and a disturber of Justice.

(a) Δρα κατὰ θεοῦ καὶ τῆς δίκης ἀλαστορί. Niceph. Greg. l. 7. (b) Jon. 2. 4. Omnes fluctus & gurgites tui super me transierunt, verumtamen rursus videbo templum sanctum tuum.

Let us learn to sleep securely in this conformity to the will of God, as a little infant on the teat of his nurse. It is at the sight of this providence, that Jonas buried in the belly of a whale, and covered under the Oceans waves made a chappel of the devouring gulph, which was to have been his punishment, speaking affectionately to God: (b) Behold all thy waves and abysses pass over my head, yet I despaire not to behold thee in thy Temple.

It was in sight of this that the Patriarch Noe shut up in the Arke, whilst wrathful heaven thundered over the earth, the winds were unfettered, the pillars of the world tottered with fatal convulsions, whilst men and houses were torn in pieces to serve as a pastime for the Sea, and that yels of beasts mingled with the cries of so many mortals ecchoed round about, lastly when all the world swam, he rested in an incomparable tranquillity, adoring the counsels of Gods justice. Sacred Providence, we prostrate on the earth adore thee, vindicate us from the bondage of our passions, make us die to so many dead things of mortals, that we hereafter may live in thy delight.

The fourth EXAMPLE, upon the fourth MAXIM.

Divers observations upon Providence.

LEt us a little withdraw our minds from discourses to the consideration of examples, like those who labouring on some curious works, refresh their eyes with beholding the verdure of meadows, or lustre of Emeralds. Volumes might be compiled without end by him who would follow the foot-steps of divine Providence, in so great a labyrinth of times, and Histories so innumerable. But it is not my purpose in these abbreviations, where I endeavour to suppress much, and well express a few things.

If you behold this Providence in nature, there are eternal miracles, which astonished the wise, animated all voices, gave matter to all pens, and filled all the books in the world. On what side soever we turn our eyes, we meet this great Mistress with a hundred arms, and as many hands, which incessantly travel to do us good. It enlighteneth us in the beautie of stars and lights, it warmeth us in flames, it refresheth us in the air, it delighteth us in the enamel of meadows, it moisteneth us in the streaming of chrystal fountains, it profiteth and enricheth in the fertility of fields, so many trees and shrubs, such diversity of fruits, such wholesome hearbs, such a great quantity of viands so well divided into all the seasons of the year, so many living creatures, some whereof come from the water, others from the earth, the rest from the air, every part of the world bringing its tribute, so many medicinable waters, so many rivers which afford such delicious shores to the land for commerce, and all humane accommodation.

Providence of God in the ordinary works of nature.

Vid. Senec. l. 4. de benef.

I now let all this pass, and coming to matters more particular, demand of you who was the cause, that in the Canary Island called Ferro, when it is roasted with droughts, and heaven affordeth no succour by showers, nor rivers by waters, there is found a huge tree, which seemes to change all the leaves thereof into as many petty fountains: for every on distilleth water, and all render it in such abundance, that it sufficeth both men and their flocks? Who doth all this good husbandry, but the divine Providence? And who is it supplies scarcity of rain in Egypt, & commandeth Nilus to over-flow the fields in his limited time, to bear in his inundations the wealth of Pharos, but it?

Particular providence over divers countries. Joannes Metellus.

Who maketh Antidotes grow in places, where poysons spring, but its wisdom? If Africk have many serpents, there are Psylles, which destroy them. If other countries breed store of snakes there are Ashen flowers, which drive them away. If Egypt hath a Crocodile, it affords an Indian rat, which bursteth it. There are likewise trees to be found which having venemous roots upon one side, yield a remedy on the other. By what hand are framed so many wonders of nature, which make books incessantly speak, but by that of this great Work-man?

Historia Stirpium part. 4.

But if you on the other side will consider it in the protection of men, what doth it not by the ministery of its good Angels? I see upon one side in histories the little King Mithridates involved in lightening-flashes, whilst he innocently sleepeth in his infant cradle, the flames consuming his clothes, and linnens, and not touching his body at all. To whom think you should I attribute this?

Admirable protection of men in rare accidents.

On the other side I ponder the prodigie so loudly proclaim'd in the Greek Antholigie of a ship-wrack, equally surprizing a father and a son, which took away the life of the father, and gave the son leave to arrive in a safe harbour, having no other vessel but the corps of his deceased father, who gave him life by his death, as he had afforded him birth by his life. Who did this but the Master of Life and Death.

Philippus Anthologia Græc. l. 1.

Besides, I read in the relations of Muscovia, set out by the Embassadour Demetrius, that a countrey Boor, being by chance clammed in the hollow body of a great tree full of honey, and finding no means to come forth of his licorish captivity, behold a Bear hasteneth to the same tree, to eat of the honey, whereof these beasts are very greedy: which observed, the poor forlorn creature, not discerning what this might be, but catching hold, (as one almost drowned) of any thing which good luck offered him, grasped the Bear, who feeling himself taken, laboured hard to flie through fear conceived and draweth out the peasant, by an admirable accident, wherein it was no easie matter to say, which of the two was most affrighted. Who directed this but the eye of Providence?

Demetrius Legatus.

I admire also in the earth-quake of Apulia, that happened the year, 1627. the last day of July, (where one writeth, that in the Citie of S. Severin alone, ten thousand souls were taken out of the world) how in the horrour of such infinite ruins and sepulcher of so many mortals, a great bell fell so fitly over a child, that it inclosed him, and doing no hurt, made a bulwark for him against any other danger; who ballanced the motion of this metal, but the fingers, which distended heaven.

Will

Providence over Empires.

Will you paſs to particulars of Empires? You will be rapt with admiration, when you come to conſider the beginnings, progreſſions, and events of every one. You ſhall ſee them ſpring like ſmall veins of water unknown, and with time to take ſuch encreaſe, as to become huge rivers, large enough to overflow the fields. Sometimes it will ſeem to you, they are onely ſet upon a needles point, and are ready to ruin; in the mean ſpace there is an inviſible hand, which ſupporteth and re-eſtabliſheth them by their proper falls. You admire, how God ſo long ſuffers ungrateful, and perfidious Nations to draw them unto him, and afterwards the meaſure of their ſins filled up; if they muſt be deſtroyed, it is but to cauſe others to riſe out of their ruins.

The Aſſyrians after the reign of thirty eight Kings, changed into Medes, and Chaldæans: the Medes after the ſway of nine Kings, and three hundred and twenty two years, ended in Aſtyages: The Chaldæans after two hundred and nine years in Darius the Mede. But they like two rivers, united in the perſon of Cyrus, to make great the Monarchy of the Perſians. The Perſians after two hundred thirty years, and fourteen Kings, diſſolve into the Grecians: The Grecians are multiplied to Ptolomeyes, and Seleucides. All are finally ſwallowed in the Roman Empire. Rome loſt it ſelf after one thouſand two hundred twenty nine years, accounted from the foundation to the Emperour Auguſtulus, who is obſerved, as the laſt Monarch before the great wrack, which made the Empire a prey to ſo many Nations, that had fed it with their bloud. From the diviſion of the Roman Empire, ſprang our French, Spaniards, Engliſh, Goths, Vandals, Lombards, Polacks, Otomans, and ſuch other Powers.

Providence over the Church.

If from thence you advance your thoughts to the government of the Church, which is the principal work of God, and reflect upon it from its cradle to the preſent Age, entertaining in your memory its infancy, encreaſe, travels, perſecution, glories, and crowns, you will ſtand amazed at the bottomleſs depth of the counſels of the Divine Providence.

What mother ever had ſo much care, and tender affection over her little infant ſleeping in the cradle, as this Providence for the Church and Chriſtianity? It is a remarkeable thing, that at the ſame time when Nebuchadnezzar ruined the Temple of Jeruſalem in the Eaſt, the Capitol was built in the Weſt, to plant there one day the Croſs, and that Rome in the ſpace of one hundred forty two years, having been ſix times taken, and ranſacked by Alaricus, Genſericus, Odoacer, the Heruli, Theodoricus, Beliſarius, and Totylas, when one would have thought it were brought to nothing, was ever preſerved by God to be the ſource of lights, and the mother of all Churches

Diarium Hiſtoricum.

How many times hath God tied ſecret virtues to the ſtandards of Chriſtians? How many times made winds and tempeſts to fight under their Enſigns? How often hath he opened for them lands inacceſſible, calmed ſtormy ſeas for them, changed deſerts into Paradiſes of delight? Petty handfuls of ſouldiers to diſcomfit huge Armies, take Towns impregnable, cleave rocks, and hew through mountaines, to do the work of Giants, and find facility in all, which humane reaſon conceived impoſſible!

Read Paulus Æmilius, and Gulielmus Tyrius upon the conqueſt of the holy land; and you ſhall ſee, that birds of the air ſeemed in pay with Godfrey of Bovillon: For who can be but aſtoniſhed to hear it told, how when he beſieged Jeruſalem, the Sultan having taught pigeons to carry meſſages, diſpatched one of them with a letter which ſhe bare under her wings, to give adviſe to the beſieged? But good hap would have it, that a Hawk, ſeazing one her juſt over the Chriſtian army, took her, and made her to let fall what ſhe carried, to inform ours of the enemies deſign. How many ſuch like accidents ſhew us the care God hath of his, and that he never ſuffered them to be overthrown, but to vanquiſh their vices, and to humble their pride by the counterpoiſe of forraign Powers?

Paul Æmil. l. 4.

Strange accident.

What may we ſay of Councels? What may we likewiſe think of great bodies of Juſtice? How many times have we ſeen counſels diſcovered, and reſolutions, of which it ſeemed no creature had a thought? God governed the hearts and tongues of thoſe, who ſought to abuſe them againſt him, a great Spirit ſwayed all thoſe members aſſembled, and ſecretly did its work, to the admiration of the whole world. One ſame motion guided within compaſs all thoſe ſtars, as in Archimedes his ſphere, and accorded them by their proper contrarieties. Great God have we not cauſe to ſay what he did in Seneca; Throughly to puniſh the wicked man who woundeth the Divine Providence, I ordain nothing, but that he underſtand the wrong he hath done to a good father.

Vis illum veras pœnas dare? Sentiat quàm bono patri injuriam fecerit. Senec. contro. l. 1.

V. MAXIM.

Of Accidents.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That all is done by chance, by neceſſity, or humane providence.

THE HOLY COURT.

That all is done by the will of God, except ſin.

Three ſquadrons againſt Providence.

THE enemies of Providence uſe all kind of engins to oppoſe their own happineſs, and crack their own eye-ſtrings, that they may not behold the great eye, which purſues the wicked even into the ſhades of death. I find the Chaldæans made three ſquadrons, that we may ſpeak with holy Job, wherewith to aſſail this great Miſtreſs of the world. Some hold all is done by Chance, and that nothing but Fortune predominateth in the actions and affairs of the world: others, will ſubject all to the laws of fatal neceſſity: the third put their whole confidence confidence in carnal prudence, which not unlike reeds, takes away their ſupport, and leaves them remorſe.

Happy he, who amongſt ſo many ſtraights, ſhelves, and ſhip-wracks, can hold the right way, ever caſting his eye towards Providence, as his Pole-ſtar, and never looſing ſight of it, that he may never looſe himſelf. Let us now endeavour to ruin theſe three Companies of Chaldæans by the arms of Scripture, holy Fathers, and Reaſon.

The miſery of impiety.

It is a pitiful thing to ſee a giddy ſoul, which ſeeketh God, and will not find him, making ſo many errours as paces, ſo many ſtumbles as ſteps, and as many ſacriledges as there are creatures in the whole world. The Prophet Eſay complained in his time of thoſe who dreſſed up Altars to Fortune, and made Sacrifices to her. But this Sect took with time ſo great encreaſe, that it filled the whole earth. For blind Gentiliſm beholding ſo many ſundry accidents in the life of man, the cauſe whereof they could not penetrate, imagined there was a certain Deity, blind, unequal, and furious, which diſtributed all conditions, and held good, and bad luck, as day and night in its hands. This Idolatrie of Fortune was ſo general, that Plinie durſt ſay: Fortune alone is invoked throughout the world, in all places, at all times, in all languages; none talk but of her, ſhe onely is praiſed, ſhe onely accuſed; ſhe gives all preſents, makes all expences, and if you well weigh the great book of the accounts of our life, you ſhall find, Fortune filleth all the leaves of it.

Eſay. 65. Qui ponitis Fortunæ menſam, & libatis ſuper eam.

A dorers of Fortune. Plin. l. 2. c. 6. Toto mundo, & locis omnibus, omnibuſque horis omnium vocibus fortuna ſola invocatur; una nominatur, una accuſatur, una agitur res, una cogitatur, huic omnia expenſa, huic omnia feruntur accepta, & in totâ ratione mortalium ſola utramque paginam facit.

The Romans who in arms overcame all other Nations, do go beyond them in ſuperſtition, not contenting themſelves with one ſole Fortune, made many, which had no other foundations of their Deities but Chymæraes of brains bereaved of reaſon, as S. Auguſtine ſheweth us in his fourth book of the City of God. One was called Fortune the firſt born, becauſe they held it was the beginning of all things: the other was all covered over with duggs, and was termed Mammoſa, in teſtimony of its fruitfulneſs. One was called Fortune the ſtrong; the other feminine, the other a virgin, the other inconſtant, the other ſtable. One was for certain days, another for all times: One for Emperours, all of gold, which they kept in their chambers as a relick, and another for the people, of wood or earth.

Fantaſies of Ancients upon the names of Fortune.

Aug. l. 4. de civit. Dei. c. 2.

Laſtly not ſo much as young men, but adored a barbed Fortune, that their firſt beard might grow in good faſhion. Good God! what ignorance, what a cloud! See we not how groſs theſe ſuperſtitions are, ſince the bloud of Jeſus waſhed away the ſtain? Notwithſtanding the world is filled with ſlaves of Fortune who ceaſe not to impute all proſperities, and adverſities of life to the hazard of chance.

That Fortune is in the power of Providence.

2. Now to decide this point: we muſt know Fortune is nought elſe, but man himſelf, when without thinking upon it, he makes himſelf the accidental cauſe of an effect not pretended.

Ariſt. de cauſis Fortuna eſt cauſa per accidens in his quæ per electionem alicujus gratia fiunt.

A man through deſpaire ſought for a halter to hang himſelf, and ſtirring the earth in an unuſual place met with a treaſure: it was ſaid to be fortune, yet is this fortune nothing elſe but man, who in ſearching gave occaſion to this effect, which followed though never by him intended. In reſpect of man this chance is obſolutely caſual, in reſpect of the prime cauſe which is God, it is a Providence. Behold a man cruſhed under the ruins of a tree, he expected not this tree ſhould fall, and therefore it is his fortune: But God, without whoſe diſpoſe one ſole leaf of a tree droppeth not off, had foreſeen this fall from all eternity: which enforceth us to affirm, that all fortunes of men are encloſed within the power of Providence.

A notable doctrine of

It is a notable doctrine of a great Biſhop of Paris who ſaith, God, Father of all eſſences, begetteth and eternally ſpeaketh his Son, or his Eternall Word, and that in this Word he once ſaid all he would do, and all which ſhould happen: in ſuch ſort, that there is not any accident, order, or mean in this great connexion of Ages, enchained one within another, can eſcape the vivacity of his eye, and the extent of his Providence. There it is he hath ordained all the bleſſings of nature, grace, and glory: There it is he hath ſeen all the evils of offence, yet willeth he not, nor can he will, they ſhould be of him, or by him, as being unworthy his ſanctity, his glory, and goodneſs. But as for the fortunes and misfortunes of men, baniſhments, bands, priſons, maladies, afflictions, proſperities, riches, honours, treaſures, glories, and crowns, he hath appointed them according to his divine pleaſures, to be inſtruments of good deſires, and glorious actions. Wherefore let us never ſay, good and ill haps of the world come by chance, without Gods diſpoſe.

William of Paris. Guliel. Pariſ. 1. part. de univer. part. 3. c. 24.

To me, ſaith the Great God in the holy Scriptures, belong all the beaſts in the forreſt, and I behold the beauty of the fields diſcloſed from my boſome. With me are riches, glory, pomps, wealth, which reſt in the protection of my Juſtice. It is by me Kings hold the rains of Empire in their hands, and Law-makers open their lips to pronounce Oracles. The trumpet ſounds in the midſt of the City, and the people tremble, not knowing the cauſe of their miſery: But there is no evil of puniſhment in the City, which I have not cauſed for moſt juſt reaſons.

Mee ſunt omnes ferę ſilvarum, & pulchritudo agri mecum eſt. Mecum ſunt divitię, & gloria, opes ſuperbę, & juſticia. Per me Reges regnant, & legum conditores juſta decernunt. Si clanget tuba in civitate, & populus non expavęſcet, ſi erit malum in civitate quod Dominus non fecerit. Pſal. 49. 10. Prov. 8. 18. Amos. 3. 9.

(a) The ſecond ſquadron of our Chaldæans taking a quite contrary way to this, will bruitiſhly maintain all things are done by a fatal neceſſity, which ſome attribute to ſtars, others to divine preſcience. For as much as concerneth ſtars, it is a diſtinct queſtion, which would well deſerve a much longer diſcourſe, than this preſent deſign permitteth. (b) We have ſhewed in ſome other former tracts, and will alſo manifeſt once again, how vain, and frivolous the ſcience of Horoſcopes is, being taken in that height; whereunto the vanitie of ſome impoſtours hath raiſed it, not here intending to condemn thoſe who handle Aſtrologie within limits permitted by the Church. Let us now be contented to ſay it is a ſavage ignorance to ſeek to infer from the courſe of planets an abſolute neceſſity upon mens actions, ſince even judicial Aſtrologers the moſt fervent and obſtinate, durſt never proceed ſo far. All ſay the ſtars make impreſſions of certain qualities upon bodies, and minds; but that they may be diverted by precaution: which gave authority to the famous axiom of Ptolomy, cited by S. Thomas in the book of deſtiny, affirming, (a) the wiſe man ſhall rule the ſtars.

(a) Second ſquadron.
(b) Vanity of Aſtrology.
(a) S. Thom. opuſc. deſt. Sapiens dominabitur aſtris.

(b) Tertullian in the treatiſe of Idolatry, ſaid pertinently, that evil Angels are made prime maſters of the curioſity of Horoſcopes; and that as they were baniſhed from heaven, ſo are their diſciples from the earth, as by an extenſion of the divine ſentence. He addeth, that man ſhould not at all pretend to the Kingdom of heaven, who makes a practiſe to abuſe both heaven and ſtars. It ſeemes God purſueth thoſe, who addict themſelves to ſuch vanities, as fugitives from Divine Providence. And it is very often obſerved, that great-ones, who are enſnared in the ſervitude of this curioſity, have felt violent ſhocks, and many times moſt dreadful events. (c) Henery the ſecond to whom Carden, and Gauricus, (two lights of Aſtrology) had foretold verdant and happy old Age, was miſerably ſlain in the flower of his youth, in games and pleaſures of a Turneament. The Princes his children, whoſe Horoſcopes were ſo curiouſly looked into, and of whom wonders had been ſpoken, were not much more proſperous. Zica King of the Arabians, to whom Aſtrology had promiſed long life to perſecute Chriſtians, died in the year of the ſame prediction. Albumazar, the Oracle of Aſtrology logy, left in writing, that he found Christian religion, according to the influence of stars, should last but a thousand four hundred years: he already hath belyed more than two hundred, and it will be a lie to the worlds end. The year 1524. wherein happened the great conjunction of Saturn, Jupiter, and Mars, in the sign Pisces, Astrologers had foretold the world should perish by water: which was the cause many men of quality made arks in imitation of Noahs, to save themselves from the deluge, all which turned into laughter. The year 1630. was likewise threatened by some predictions, with an inundation should drown half mankind, which proved false by a season quite contrary. It was foretold a Constable of France well known, that he would dye beyond the Alps, before a city besieged, in the 83. year of his Age, and that if he escaped this time, he was to live above a hundred years; which was notoriously untrue, this man deceasing in the 84. year, of a natural death. A Mathematician of John Galeazzo Duke of Milan, who promised himself long life, according to his planets, was slain at the same time when he prognosticated this, by the commandment of the same Duke. Another Astrologer of Henry the seaventh, King of England, advised this great Prince to take heed of Christmas night, was asked, whither his own star would send him that night: to which he answered, to his own house in security of peace: Yet was he instantly sent to the tower to celebrate the vigil of this great festival. One might reckon up by thousands, the falshoods, miseries, and disasters which wait on these superstitions.

(b) Tertul. de Idol. c. 9. Expellantur mathematici ſicut angeli eorum, urbe & Italia: interdicitur mathematicis ſicut culum Angelis. Non poteſt regnum cœlorum ſperare cujus digitus aut radius abstitur cœlo.
(c) Alexander de Angelis l. 4. c. 40.

Existimant toti circa unum caput humanitus Deos. Aurelius.

Who can then sufficiently deplore the folly of one, who forsaking the great government of God, the fountain of wits, and treasure of fortunes, makes himself a slave of Mercury, or Saturn, contrary to the voice of Scripture, decision of Councels, Oracles of holy Fathers, Laws of Emperours, consultations of the wise, experience of people, and consent of all the most solid judgments?

Against the necessity inferred of prescience.

We will not labour to ruin a doctrine forsaken both by honour and reason: We onely speak against those, who will infer a necessity derived from divine prescience, by force of which, sins themselves, according to their understandings, are directly caused by the decrees of heaven. It is the opinion of Velleius Paterculus, who said, destiny did all the good and evil in the world, and that it was a miserable thing to attribute that which proceedeth from above, to the demerit of men, and to make the ordinances of heaven to pass, as crimes of mortals. This Maxim was defended by Hereticks even to fury, and it is a wonder men have been so wicked, as to burden the prime sanctity with all the ordures of the world.

Ita efficitur, quod est miserrimum, ut quod acciait, etiam merito acciisse videatur, & casus in culpam transeat.

We well know, if destiny be taken for the ordinance by which God establisheth the lives of particulars, and states of Empires, it is nothing else but the Divine Providence whereof we speak: but good heed must be taken from concluding sins within the list of Gods will, who onely being pleased to permit them, can not in any sort establish or will them. And it is here an impertinent thing to say, All God hath foreseen shall necessarily happen, otherwise he would be deceived in his foresight, which cannot be affirmed without blasphemy: but he foresaw all future things, they then of necessity will happen. Who sees not it is a childish toy, and that this captious argument must be overthrown, by saying, All which God hath foreseen necessarily, happeneth by necessity, and all he foresaw indifferently, happeneth by indifferency. Now so it is, that of all which dependeth on our liberty, he hath not foreseen any thing necessarily, but indifferently: We must then conclude, that all is done by indifferency, not fatal necessity. Hearken to the excellent decision of S. Iohn Damascene.

Damasc. l. 2. Orth. fidei c. 32.

God foresaw all things; but he determineth not all things; He well foresaw all which is, and shall be in your power: but he determines not, because he willeth not sin, nor will likewise constrain any man to virtue. (b) Plato in his Common-wealth detesteth all opinions, which seek to introduce into the beliefs of people propositions unworthy of Gods goodnes, namely those which make him authour of sin, adding, we must not endure to hear it spoken or written by any man in a well rectified Common-wealth.

Omnia quidem Deus præscit, non omnia tamen præjubet: præscit enim ea quæ in nostrâ sunt potestate, non autem ea præjubet: quia nemo vult peccatum, nec cogit ad virtutem. (b) Plato. l. 2. de republicâ. Θεὸς αἰτίαν ἀναίτιον.

Who knoweth not, that such are the causes, such the effects? If the causes be necessary, the effects likewise are enchained within the limits of necessity: If they be contingent, they are all in indifferency. Now the prescience of God (to speak properly) is not the cause of our actions, unless it be by meer accident and occasion; then it cannot make them necessary. Is it not true, that the great eye of God equally beholdeth things past, present, and future? And as our eye maketh not things present by beholding them, since a wall is neither white nor black by force of my sight; and as our memory makes not things past, by repassing them by their species; so the prescience of God makes not things future by forseeing them: they are not because God hath foreseen them, but he foresaw them, because they so should happen.

Paus. Reg. de gratia c. 2. l. 2. Si ad factorem, bono, reflicta, bonus esse potuisti. Si ad præcognitorem, tu me progressurum tuorum ordine, ut de te malum præscirem, compulisti.

O man, if thou beholdest him who made thee, thou mayest have been good. But if thou contemplatest him, as him who knew thee before the beginning of Ages, thou hast enforced him to make an evil judgement upon thee, because thou hast made thy self evil.

Our action, although it be not the first dated in execution, at the least in the Idæa and order of nature, it always foregoeth the divine prescience: if we regard its first intentions, we may all be honest men; if we consider our proceedings, we constrain him to foresee of us, what is in us. If prescience imported any necessity, we might conclude God were necessited in all the actions he doth throughout the world, because he eternally hath foreseen them all, which were most impious. Let us not then say: But if God hath so foreseen it, it will happen by an inevitable necessity: for there are three sorts of necessities; one most absolute, as that of the Essence of God; the other natural, as light in the sun, heat in fire; the third is a necessity conditional, as is that, If God foreseeth such or such a thing, it shall happen: I say, it is a necessity of supposition, for you presuppose he foresaw it, but instantly you learn he foresaw it not, but because it should be, and that his prescience is no more the cause of our actions, than our memory of the taking of Rochel, and wars with the Huguenots.

3. Squadron of nice ones according to humane prudence.

4. After this brain-sick band, another riseth, which comprehendeth the subtile and more refined wits, according to the judgement of the world, who suppose all good success proceeds from prudence and humane industry, without the helping hand of God. They are such, as according to the saying of the Prophet, sacrifice to their nets, who kiss their hand as an independent worker of great actions, who savourly tast all they do, like Bears, said to lick their paws, when they have eaten honey.

Habac. 1. 16.

An observation of the Grecians upon the dependence we have from on high.

Greek Authours tell us, Mercury was bred by the howers, to teach us, all wisdom and humane eloquence not guided nor supported by the measures of heaven, can neither have nourishment, nor subsistence. There is no one more blind, than he who thinks himself clear-sighted in affairs without the prudence of Heaven; all succeeds ill with him, and he findeth by experience, that God begins the change of fortunes, by the corruption of counsels. The reason thereof is very manifest, since we know all created spirits, work not but by the dependence they have upon the increated Essence, as also that all Intelligencies have so much excellency, as they have relation lation to the first Intelligence, which is the Word of God.

Mentem tunc hominibus admit supera illa mens, quæ cujuscumque fortunam mutare constituit, consilia corrumpit Velleius. l. 2.

Weakness of humane wisdom.

If we consult with our own thoughts and knowledge, as being near of kin to us, we shall find they have three ill properties; which is, they are heavy, timorous, and uncertain: as heavy, they creep on the earth; as timorous, they glance at all objects, and resolve on nothing; as uncertain, they are perpetually floating. There is none but God, who raiseth them by his exaltation, setleth them by his stability, and staieth them by his immutability.

Vanity of Politicians, without Gods direction.

All they, who disunited from the eternal Wisdom, think to prosper in governments, honours, wordly affairs, are Icaruses, that seek to counterfeit birds with waxen wings; the least ray proceeding from the throne of the Lamb will burn them, and make their height serve for no other use, but to render their falls the more remarkeable. If they be lettered, they shall stead them as forrests do thieves, to cover their crimes, and if they have dignities, they shall be unto them, as the golden and silver precipices of the Empeour Heliogabalus, which were not devised but to make his ruin the more memorable. Doth not the Apostle proclaim aloud with a voice of thunder to the posterity of all Ages: I will pull down the wisdom of the wisest according to the world, I will rebuke the prudence of the most subtile? And did not holy Job repeat the like Oracles upon the dunghill, saying: God oftentimes giveth success of affairs most shamefull to the most able Counsellours, and he reduceth Judges to a certain stupidity of understanding? Hath not the experience of Ages shewed so often in the histories of Pharaohs, Herods, and all such like, that there is no greater wisdom in the world, than to be an honest man? To be wise is to use wisdom, and to make it serve for direction, as the eye for sight.

Nicephorus Gregoras. l. 7. Τὰ σοφὰ ἐκεῖνα ῥήματα φησὶ ἀσεβοῦς πλοῦτος εἶναι.

Perdam sapientiam sapientum 1. Cor. 1. Adducit Consiliarios in stultum finem, & judices in stuporem. Job. 12. 17.

Senec. ep. 118. Sapere sapientia usus est, sicut oculorum videre.

5. Let us draw three concusions from these three propositions we have deduced; The first whereof shall be, never to do like those vulgar & abject souls, which is to curse, and detest our condition, and fortune, as it were an effect of some false Divinity, and not a Divine Providence. Remember daily within your self those words: Nothing is done one the earth without cause. God hath disposed all with weight, and measure.

1. Conclusion against those who curse fortune.

Nihil in terrâ sine causâ fit Job. 5. Omnia in mensura, & numero, & pondere disposuisti. Sap. 11.

Recal into your thoughts the singular consideration of Boetius: (a) We must patiently suffer all which is done within the circle of Providence, seeing we have bowed our necks under its laws, by the condition of our birth. (b) So soon as you are born, you enter within the jurisdiction of Gods ordinance, you have undergone the yoke to receive good or evil fortune, as he shall please to appoint. I ask, if you should resolve to give law to him frō whom you ought to take it, were you not most unjust, & unhappy? Most unjust, because you would incroach upon Gods inheritance; most unhappy, because you could not kick against the prick, but to hurt your self the more. Were you embarked in a vessel, you must go not according to your own will, but the course of wind, and tide. If you learned the trade of husbandmen, you must cast into the earth, to reap again what will come of it, and you should sometimes have barren, sometimes fertile, and fruitful years. You have entered into humane life, which of its nature is replenished with inconstancies and vicissitudes: one while there is good another while evil hap. Let fortune roul as God shall please, nothing with him is hazardous. Would you be so hardy, as to tie your self to the wheel of a chariot perpetually running, to stay the courie which the Divine Providence affords it? You desire, say you, a stable fortune in the world, and understand not, that were it so, there would no longer be either world, or fortune, since the condition of these inferiour things is in continual mutation.

(a) Boet: de consol. Æquo animo toleres oportet, quicquid intra fortunæ aream geritur, cum semel jugocolla submiseris.

(b) An excellent resolution upon wordly accidents.

When you see the wicked flourish in honour, riches, and reputation, say not the prosperity of a wicked man is heavens sin, that God walketh upon the vaults of his palace, and abandoneth the care of worldly affairs. Expect a little, Justice will come, although many times with a leaden pace. How know you, whether God will convert this man by surchatging him with prosperities, to confound his ingratitude? How know you, whether resolving to deprive him for his crimes of eternal blessings, he gives him some use of temporal benefits in recompence of some moral vertues he hath heretofore exercised? Rather say to God: O God how profound are thy thoughts: and how inscrutable to the ignorant, and foolish! Expect the day which will draw aside the curtain, and make you see all the secrets of the world. God expecteth it with so much patience in his eternity, why will not you expect it in your mortality?

Deorum crimen Sylla tam felix. Senec. ad Marcia.

Psal 91. 6. Nimis profundæ factæ sunt cogitationes tuæ: vir insipiens non cognoscet, & stultus non intelliget hæc.

6. The second conclusion shall be, never to adhere to this bruitish and savage opinion, which puts a fatality upon all the actions of men and all events. Beware of the foolish discourse of him, who says, If my hour be come I shall die, and if not, I have nothing to fear. For see you not according to these unbridled maxims, all deliberation, all prudence, all order of humane life must be taken away? Were here a fatality, we need no more talke of ships to pass the seas, nor medicines to cure maladies, nor bread to feed the hungry. A man besotted with this folly, might free from danger walk on the waves; for if his destiny bear him, he shall never perish by water; He need not at all make use of medicine, for his death can neither be delayed, nor hastened. What avayls it so much as to eat? For if he must die of hunger, what ever he do he shall fail, and if his destinie threaten him not that way, he shall live in full assurance. Behold here prodigious dotages. But God, hath he not fixed the number of my years, as saith Job: You keep a reckoning of his years and monthes: you have set him limits, which cannot be broken?

Vis tu esse insanientis injuriosus æternitati Dei, & cum illo expetita quæ infra te sunt. August. in Psal. 91.

2. Conclusion against Fatality.

Job. 14. 5. Numerus mensium ejus apud te est, constituisti terminos ejus, qui præteriri non poterunt.

I affirm, God knows the number of your days, and hath determined them: Hath he not on the other part obliged you to your conservation by the law of nature? Since you have no revelation from above, that God will have you die in such or such a fashion, you ought to preserve your life to the last breath, and if through rashness you run among precipices, shipwracks, and musket-shots, without obedience, without reason, without discretion, you are the murderers of your selves God hath foreseen you must die at such an hour, and of such a death: but he hath likewise foreseen it would happen unto you through a most perverse will, and an enraged temerity, which sought to tempt the counsels of the Omnipotent, against all the maxims of verity. Know you not, God hath set fire and water before you, and that you may take which of them you please? Liberty of Free-will is absolutely given to man to become a Master over all his actions, with a constancy of mind, either voluntarily to keep, and conserve good, or to resist evil with the like freedom, said Tertullian.

Tertull. adverf. Marc. c. 6. Tota libertas arbitrij in utramque partem concessa est hominis, ut sui Dominus constanter occurreret, & bona sponte servando, & mala sponte vitando.

7. The third conclusion will teach us to settle our labour by heavens direction in a good temperature, so that we stand not with arms a-cross when we should travel, expecting from Gods hand what we ought not to expect without our cooperation, and that on the other side we take heed, not so to presume of our own abilities, as to ascribe thereunto all good successes which happen. For both the one and other is hateful before God. We know what the Sage Greek said to a Carter plunged in a myre, who called aloud on Minerva, not seeking to stir himself: My freind, with Minerva you must stir a hand. God is very ready to aid you, but you must on your part use correspondence. Set up sayl, and God will give wind, till the earth, and you shall receive receive Heavens benediction. But if you think to pleaſe your ſelf with an ill rectified devotion, and not to care for the affairs of your family, will you not be like thoſe barren trees, which make a noiſe with their leaves under the breath of winds, and never bear fruits? On the other ſide, beware of thinking to be happy by means meerly humane and politick, without Heavens direction: For ſo doing, you will build upon quick-ſilver phantaſms of greatneſs, which will afford you illuſions in this life, to drench you in the other into eternal confuſions. When you have done all which juſtice and conſcience dictate, leave ſucceſſes to God, and know there are ſtrokes from Heaven that cannot be vanquiſhed, either by prudence of counſels, or any humane remedies. We are to be anſwerable unto God with our good deſires, not powers; the petty gods of the earth can do nothing againſt the Decrees of Heaven. Take theſe words of S. Paul, not as ordinary, but as Oracles of an immutable Veritie: (a) Prudence of fleſh is death: but prudence of ſpirit is peace and life.

3. Conclusion against humane prudence, and lazyness. Σὸν ἄδυε καὶ χεῖρα κίνει.

Nec conſilio prudenti, nec remedio ſagaci divinæ providentiæ fatalis diſpoſitio ſubverti, vel reformari poteſt. Apul. Metamor. 9. Heu ſatis ſuperi certaſſe minores. Sil. Ital. l. 5. Tob. 6. 3.

(a) Rom. 8. Prudentia carnis mors eſt, prudentia autem ſpiritus, vita, & pax.

If you have good ſucceſs in ought you do, thank God, and look on him (ſaith (b) S. Bernard) as an Omnipotent Will, a virtue full of affection, an eternal light, a ſovereign beatitude, which repleniſheth all here below with the abundance of his ever-honoured bounty. But if in doing all you can, you find main oppoſitions, and irkſom afflictions in the world, ſay as the chaſt Sara did, ſeeing her ſelf injured by her ſervant: O God, I turn my face to the place whence I expect my conſolation. I fix mine eyes on thee, becauſe thou ſettleſt all my hopes. I beſeech thee deliver me from the fetters of this diſgrace, or deliver me out of this world. Thy counſels are impenetrable to the weakneſs of my underſtanding; but I am wel aſſured of one thing, that he who faithfully ſerves thee, ſhall never be deceived. If his life be aſſaulted with afflictions, it ſhall reap Crowns. If it be expoſed to the ardour of tribulations, thou wilt ſtretch out an aſſiſting hand. If thou exerciſeſt it under thy chaſtiſements, it ſhall be to make it find out the path of thy mercies.

(b) Bernard. de conſider. l. 5. Ad te Deus faciem meam convertis, ad te oculos meos dirigo. Reto Domine ut de vinculo impreſſi hujus abſolvas me, aut certe deſuper terram erigas me, &c.

The fifth EXAMPLE upon the fifth MAXIM.

Of the Providence of GOD over ſtates and riches of the world.

EULOGIUS.

Drawn from the obſervation of Paul a Greek Authour.

THe Divine Providence is a marvellous workman, which ruleth here below over the heads of mortals, it laboureth in this great maſs of mankind; it takes men of earth to make them of gold, and of thoſe men of gold, makes men of earth. It commixeth ſlaves and Kings, and cauſeth the one, not thinking of it, to ſpring from the other in the revolution of times, as Plato ſaid. But we who know not all its ſecrets, ſometimes blame the works of it, which ſhould rather ſtir up our admiration, than be ſubject to our cenſure. One complaineth the wealth of the world is not well divided, and that the wicked have ever the greateſt ſhare. Men who oftentimes know not how to part with a finger breadth of land, but by diſ-joyning moſt intimate charities, would make themſelves diſtributers of the worlds fortunes, as if they looked more narrowly into the world, than he that made it.

Paul Syllegus. l. 3. c. 48.

I will here ſet down a memorable hiſtory, drawn out of a rare Grecian Authour, named Paulus, who compiled many Narrations, learned from the beſt of his Age. He recounteth how in the time of the Emperour Juſtin the elder, about the year 528. after the birth of Chriſt, there was in Thebais one named Eulogius, a ſtone-cutter by his trade, of poor means, but very rich in virtue. Which maketh us ſay, Poverty reſembles the Iſland of Ithaca (as ſaid Archeſilas) which though rough and buſhie, failed not to breed the braveſt men of Greece, whom ſhe made uſe of as a ſchool for all the exerciſes of virtues.

Poverty the Iſle of Ithaca. Λιμὴν μὲν γὰρ ἀγαθῶν ἀνδρῶν ἡ πενία. Stob. ſerm. 93.

This man, who at that time had no other wealth on earth but his hands, ſpared not to ſtore up treaſures of good works, as pledges in Heaven. He feared God, was devout, chaſte, ſober, abſtinent, courteous, peacefull, charitable, and embraced eminent virtues in a mean fortune. It is a ſtrange thing, that notwithſtanding his labour, which was hard enough, he faſted moſt part of his time even to Sun-ſet, and with the little money he got by the ſweat of his brows, relieved the poor. He walked like Abraham before pilgrims, he waſhed their feet, and received them into his little houſe with all poſſible charity. Then ſeeking out needy perſons of his own Pariſh, to give them ſome refection according to his abilitie, he extended his compaſſion even to beaſts, not ſuffering any thing to eſcape his bounty. One would have ſaid, ſeeing all this poor tradeſ-man did, he had been ſome rich Lord, ſuch abundance appeared in ſo low a poverty.

Virtues of a good poor man.

It happened, that a holy Hermit called Daniel, who lived in great reputation; for the excellent endowments of his ſoul, paſſing along that way, ſojourned in the poor cottage of Eulogius, who received him like an Angel deſcended from Heaven. He, who was a moſt ſpiritual man, looking very far into the Maſon's life, found therein ſuch eminent perfection, that he well perceived devotion many times lodged with little noiſe in a ſecular life, and that God, who is a great Maſter, had ſervants every where.

Daniel the Hermit made a raſh demand.

This ſo enflamed him to the love of thoſe virtues he obſerved in his hoſte, that returning to the Monaſtery, he exerciſed great devotion, as faſting three whole weeks together, with intention to obtain an ample eſtate from God for Eulogius. Fervour ſo tranſported this good man, that he conſidered not, that God, who preſerveth us to health, loveth us not to curioſity, and that the banquets he made for his greateſt ſervants, as Elias and S. Paul the Hermit, when he for them opened the treaſures of Heaven, were onely bread and clear water of fountains. Notwithſtanding, he without intermiſſion, importuned Heaven by his prayers, complaining, God who was moſt juſt, gave riches in exceſs to ſo many ſinners, to puff up their pride, and foment riot, when the poor Maſon, who deſerved rivers ſhould ſtream nothing but gold for him, was invaded by harſh poverty, which tied up his hands from virtue. But he perſiſting day and night to beg the fruit of his requeſt, heard a voice from Heaven, which commanded him to lay aſide ſo indiſcreet a requeſt, ſaying, If his Eulogius left his poverty he would forſake his conſcience. But he pertinaciouſly perſevering in the purſuit of his deſire, through a goodneſs wholly blind, anſwered, He well knew the contrary, and that this good man would never become evil with the bleſſings of God, but would rather make them mount up again to their ſource. That were he made rich, it would be but for the poor, and that wealth would change nothing in him, but to make him the more profitable for all the world: adding thereto, he would anſwer for him body for body, and ſoul for ſoul. God, who was willing to let the Hermit find by very ſenſible experience the temerity of his requeſt, permitted the Maſon in an inſtant to become a wealthy and able man. For, digging in the earth, he there found a very rich treaſure, which made him even in an inſtant bury his piety. Behold him changed into another man. He, who before perpetually ſang

Ἰχὶ βαθὺ σιγὴ γάρ.

Change of fortune causeth change of manners.

the praises of God, among the wants of poverty, like a little Gold-finch among thorns, groaned under the burden of this gold, grew pensive, anxious, sad, and suspitious. He forgot piety and himself, to converse with his gold. In the end, he resolved to steal out of his Countrey, where he was very well known, and to travel to Constantinople, the Port of all Nations, there to unfold the change of his fortune with the more liberty. Yet had he some discretion, not instantly to appear in full view; but to polish, and trick up himself, making some apprentiship in the school of the world, and of civil life, to correct all that which the defect of his birth had left in him, either of rudeness or imperfection. And being of a good understanding, and handsom presence, he put himself in the conversation of honest men, and drawing near to the fountain of light, began to haunt the Court, to fashion himself for arms in the Emperours Regiments, where being full of crowns, and daily having opportunity to oblige souldiers, he so well knew how to gain hearts, and purchase the good opinion of all the world, that mounting step after step, he was in some few years made Captain of the Guard to the Emperour Justin. Behold him transported from the element of terrestrial men, into a new sphere, to converse with Gods.

Riches the mother of vices, and neglect of God.

There he was seized on by a dead drunkenness, which change of fortune usually causeth in weak understandings. He no longer looks back on his extraction, but to hide the defects of it. He no more remembers ancient amities, but quite to deface the marks of them. He neither knew God nor men, but for his own ends and services. He walketh up and down the Citie of Constantinople like a God in a Comedie, wearing rubies, and dragging silk after him, and he who scarcely had iron to forge a hammer or a trewel, will now no longer spit, but in gold and silver. Prayer is a trouble to him, fasts are torments, ceremonies of the Church amusements, and constraints. This eclipse of devotion is waited on by a desperate exorbitance of feasts, game, and love. The more shamefull his birth was, so much the more he makes himself ostentous and magnificent, to divert all the suspition of it. It is the fashion of many Great-ones derived from inferiour rank, to drown their former condition in profuse riots, and to do as that Roman, who sought to cover by strength of gold and silver, his fathers cottage, who was but a sheapherd.

Vision of Daniel the Hermit.

Being engulphed in these vast delights, the Hermit, who knew not what was become of his Eulogius, had a frightfull vision, wherein he saw himself suddenly brought before the Tribunal of God. He seemed to stand trembling before this awfull Throne, environed with Angels of fire, who held instruments of terrour in their hands. The Judge sitting with incomparable majesty, looked on him with an incensed eye, and shewed him a man buried in roses, and wasted with riots, saying unto him: Is this then the care thou hast had of thy brothers soul? Afterward turning to the Angels, executours of his justice, Strike (said he) and spare not this respondent. The poor man half dead with fear, presently understood this out-cast shewed him, was Eulogius, who having found great riches by his means, led a riotous life at Constantinople. He presently threw himself at the feet of the Judge, humbly beseeching him with tears and groans, to suspend the rod of his indignation, on condition he would reduce his friend unto duty.

He went to Constantinople, and spake to Eulogius.

Verily, he failed not instantly to hasten to the place where he was, and found him in this ample Citie, the most eminent of the Eastern Empire, in glorious equipage, perpetually near the Kings person, or so overwhelmed with visits, affairs, and delights, that it was a whole moneth before he might speak to him, though he daily much endeavoured it. In the end, it was Gods will one day, he was admitted into his Cabinet; when beseeching him to send away his people, for the importance of the business he was to treat, that done, he presently made himself known, remembering Eulogius of his former poverty, his trewel, and masons life; adding, that by his prayers he came to this eminent fortune, he confidently blamed him for his ingratitude, and infidelity towards God. The other who took no contentment, that amidst his golden glitter and silk, the old ragge of his first fortune should be remembered, brake off the discourse, and shamefully driving him out of his Cabinet, asked his waiters what they meant to bring a fool and a melancholy lunatick before him; which was the cause the unfortunate Father Daniel was so loaden with blows, that he thought he should have been slain in the place. Yet all bloudie, he crept out of the chamber as well as he could, and lifting his eyes up to Heaven, humbly besought God, steeping every word in his tears and bloud, to send Eulogius not more riches and honours, but disgrace and poverty, knowing it was the onely means to reduce him to reason.

Fall of Eulogius.

This quickly came to pass as he wished. For the Emperour Justin dying, Eulogius was removed both from the favours he hoped, and those he possessed, which disposed him to a bitterness of heart against Justinian, then seated in the Empire. But it being dangerous to suffer ill affection towards the Prince, to encroach upon the heart, he already was so giddy, that nothing wanted but opportunity to undo himself.

Rebellions and seditions, direfull for people.

Behold here a hydeous treason plotted against the new Emperour, which aimed to ruin the whole state of the East, and to bury Constantinople in its ruins. Hypatius, and Pompey, nephews of the Emperour Anastasius, who preceded Justin, had also pretences for the Empire, which having been little countenanced, either through want of time, or defect in their merit, failed not to be reproduced in this new State, wherein Justinian's affairs seemed, as yet, much unsetled. These Rebels had drawn to their side huge factions of mutinous spirits, and envenomed the peoples minds, by decrying what they could the government of Justinian, under the shadow of exactions of excessive sums of money, levied on all sides. So that in short time, the whole Citie was seen in arms and filled with malecontents, who under colour of defence of publick good, committed shamefull outrages, and pillages unpunished.

The people never fail to favour rebellions, and to second the evil purposes of the factious, for that is the way to put ones self between two dangers, and to be exposed as a prey to all violence. The Emperour seeing the malignity of this storm, and well understanding he could not divert it but by strong resistance, dispatched the Regiments of the Heruli to over-run the Rebels. They being rough gamesters, made a great massacre of the people, whilst the blind iron made no distinction between forreigner, and native. This served more to exasperate minds transported with extremities, saying: They no longer must hope for safetie, since the Prince had sold their lives to Barbarians.

The sedition was so much enkindled, that women and children became parties, ceasing not to throw stones and fire from on high out of windows upon the Emperours souldiers. They seeing themselves charged of all hands, entered into an inexorable fury, which was waited on by so strange a butchery, that it in an instant covered the streets with bloud and dead bodies. The Patriarch beholding all this misery, had recourse to the arms of heaven, since earthly Powers could do nothing, so that he presently advanced a procession of Ecclesiasticks, who bare the books of the Gospels, and Images of our Saviour. But the the Heruli became then enraged Elephants with the sight of their bloud, nor could they look on any Image but of revenge, or entertain any Gospel but the sword. They onely called force to counsel, when reason was banished, and acted all which violent rage might in an unlimited power. You would have said, signal had been given for fire and sword, to commix and confound all that might be disordered. Crimes were freed from chains of laws, and Religion, which useth to become a veil for protection of suppliants, had no obstacle in it to stay the heat of this fight.

The Emperour, who onely required to pacifie the sedition, needs would call the people into the Theater, to sweeten and inform them of his intentions: but the rebellious cried out instantly, it was to deceive, and the more easily to ensnare them: and the excess of their wickedness having taken away the hope of pardon, they took Hypatius, and lifted him on high upon a target, to pronounce him Emperour, in sight of all the world. The whole Citie stood five days in so horrible confusions, that it seemed a very image of hell.

In the end, God favouring the right of lawfull Princes, Justinian found effectuall means to disarm rebellion, attracting some by great liberalities, and dis-countenancing the rest; he so changed the face of affairs, mingling likewise force with industry and favour, that he caused Hypatius the imaginary Emperour, to be taken with Pompey his Associate, and condemning them to death, dissolved the whole conspiracy, which had before been so fatal to the people, that thirty thousand remained dead on the place. Eulogius was far engaged in the faction of Hypatius, so that saving his life by flight, all his goods were confiscated. The miserable man not knowing of what wood to make his arrow, returned to his former trade, and hid himself in great obscurity, to make it a veil for his crimes. Notwithstanding, moved with remorse of conscience, he began in this alteration of state, to make a virtue of his necessity, and to sacrifice his body to penance, which had been vowed to sensuality. The Hermit Daniel afterward met him by chance, and perceiving him much milder, and more tractable than he was at Constantinople: How goes the world with you, Eulogius, (said he) having been the King in a Tragedie, what part play you now?

To which, all over-covered with shame, he replied, His ingratitude had abused the blessings of God and men, yet for all this not lessened their goodness, and that if Father Daniel would once again pray for him, not to restore him to the Court, where he too long lived in the death of his innocency, but a little to sweeten the sharpness of his poverty, he would be gratefull for it all days of his life. The Hermit answered: Confide not in me, my friend, the experience of your follies hath made me wiser than I was. Though poverty be irksom, it is an evil necessary for you. Remain in the condition, whereunto your birth disposed you, and ask not riches again, which would onely serve to make you nought.

VI. MAXIM.

Of PRÆDESTINATION.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That our Salvation is a thing done, nor need we take care of it.

Mahit ortus scrutari, quàm nosse tuos. Lucanus.

1. GReat things are not unlike the sources of Nilus, whereof the Ancients said, nature made them rather to be looked after, than found: so, many great wits have been employed to enquire the causes of Prædestination, yet all have confessed: It was an abyss of the riches of Gods wisdom and knowledge, whose judgements are incomprehensible, and ways not to be tracked. Rom. 11.

Maxims against fatalitie.

Fear not the judgements of God, which of themselves are nought but justice and goodness; but fear your works, which have so little assurance, and so much iniquitie. Say not your salvation is a thing done, and that God having determined it from all eternity, without calling you to counsel, good works can do nothing to advance your happiness, nor bad to encrease your unhappiness. Know God, who of his meer bounty calleth you, will neither save nor damn you, but by justice. Think not it is destiny, or necessity begins this business: God by his grace hath put the mould and cizars into your hands, to fashion your self such as you desire to be reputed. First secure your self of your self, by contributing to the graces which prevent you: He who is good to himself, shall never find God evil.

The great judgement of Tertullian fore-stalled the

THE HOLY COURT.

That our eternal happiness is yet in our hands, and expecteth our endeavour.

disputation of men, when he said: (a) It was neither a good faith, nor very solid to referre all to the will of God, and so flatter the world, by saying nothing is done in the world without the Ordinance of God: but we must understand there is some power in us, which God himself expecteth to accomplish the work of our salvation. To say then, The great God hath determined of us in his eternity, without making any reflection upon our works, Is to make a pillow for the sloth of some, and to prepare a precipice for the despair of other. Let us not in this article make God so liberal, that he gives us blessings wherewith we may take occasion to be evil, and think his mercy will countenance our sluggishness. He sleepeth too much at ease, who thinks to carry his happiness behind him. (b) What care would you have a man take of his salvation, who thinks it depends not at all upon his care, and what despair will not strike down a feeble brain, who shall imagine all his travels do nothing for his avail towards beatitude, since the conclusion of his good or ill hap, were estimated without any consideration of his merit? A labourer would not trouble himself to till the ground, which were infallibly condemned to barrenness, or to a certain proportion of fruit, and his industry to be idle. And who would care to polish his soul, if his glorie were confined without any regard to his his free-will? All labours would seem nought but wretched accessories, and good works, but frivolous amusements.

(a) Notable saying of Tertullian. Non est bonæ & solidæ fidei, sic omnia ad voluntatem Dei referre & ita adulari unumquemque dicendo, nihil fieri sine jussione ejus, ut non intelligamus aliquid esse in nobis ipsis. Tertul. l. de exhort. castitatis.

(b) Note the danger that followeth, if the consideration of good works be taken away.

True doctrine of Prædestination.

2. But, when we fix our thoughts upon this verity, which says Prædestination to be a Divine Providence, by which certain persons are mercifully drawn out of the mass of corruption, and picked out to be exalted to eternal beatitude by ways infallible, and that it is chiefly done by the mercy of God, who decreeth in his eternal counsel to prevent us with his grace; and that according to the correspondence we therein ought to use, he judgeth of our good or ill hap, we call it a proposition conform to the doctrine of the Church, advantagious to the glory of God, and infinitely available for repose of conscience. These are the three points upon which we must insist in this discourse.

Three points of reasons of this doctrine.

S. Paul and S. Augustine interpreted in the matter of prædestination.

And first, there is no cause to become jealous upon the words of Saint Paul, and Saint Augustine, who seem sometime to attribute all to the meer will of God, without admitting any consideration of our good works. For we must weigh with our selves these two great men, like two huge seas, that through impetuous power of water, swell so upon one brink, that they seem for a time to leave the other drie. But as the Ocean, after he hath largely dilated himself upon one side, returns within the limits God prescribed him; so these men falling upon contumacious spirits, who rebel against truth, return into a peacefull equality to build the house of God. The one sought to overthrow a Judaical opinion, which maintained the eternal happiness of Prædestination was of necessity tied to the bloud of Abraham, to Circumcision, to works, and ceremonies of the old Law; without observation of which, the Jews acknowledged no salvation. Behold the cause why the excellent Apostle, who saw in this a contempt of grace, and a manifest foil given to Gentilism, which he had taken into his protection, strongly insisteth and argueth with a torrent of reasons to confound this arrogance of the Hebrews, who boasted the reliques of a dying law, and ran after it with chymæraes. From whence it comes to pass that all the reasons he produceth, have no other aim but to exalt the mysteries of redemption, and to shew, that the origin and beginning of our salvation consisteth in the grace of Jesus Christ, who calleth us to Christianity of his meer mercy, without consideration of the observation of the Mosaical Law, or other works, which preceded this calling.

Rom. 6. 23. Ephes. 1. 4. S. Aug. l. de prædest. Sanctor. c. 19.

And it is in this sense he saith, grace is life eternal, because it is by its means we obtain beatitude; and in this sense, that he assureth us God chose us before the worlds creation to be Saints, to wit, according to the same interpretation of Saint Augustine, we were selected in the ideæs of God from all eternity, to participate in the grace of the Gospel, we thereto contributing nothing on our part. For the first grace being the beginning of all merit, cannot be produced by merit. Finally, it is in the same sense he maintaineth, God loved Jacob, and hated Esau, before they had done good or evil. For it is to be understood, he gave temporal favours, and spiritual graces likewise to Jacob, which he gave not to Esau, although he had bestowed on him favour sufficient for his accommodation. Otherwise, if one would bring this passage to the point of Prædestination to glory, who seeth not we must conclude, that as Jacob was prædestinated to eternal beatitude, without any consideration of good works, so Esau had been reprobated without any regard of his demerits: which is most false, and condemned by the Church. Let us then undoubtedly hold, that all passages of S. Paul, which he alledgeth in this point, have no other scope but to exalt the free gift of redemption, and fruits of the Cross of Jesus, above all legal ceremonies.

Rom. 3. 11.

3. And as for Saint Augustine, he labours mainly to ruin from the top to the bottom, the opinion of Pelagians and Semipelagians, whereof the one said, we were chosen to glory immediately by the good works we do by our own natural forces; and the other, to exercise some corrective upon this opinion which seemed too rigid, have written, The works of nature dispose us to grace, and grace to glory. Now our eminent Doctour undertaking to humble this proud nature, which they sought to raise to the prejudice of grace, and the bloud of our Saviour, gives many assaults, wherein he hath no other aim but to teach us this Prædestination, which he calleth preparation to grace, is not due to the merits of our free-will; but that God by his mercifull bounty poureth it into our hearts, to be the beginning of good works, to which he affordeth life eternal, crowning the favours himself inspired; and in this regard, he with S. Paul exalteth good works, which are productions of that seed of grace, which the Holy Ghost sowed in our hearts. Doth not the Apostle say (a) God prædestinated those he foresaw would be conformable to the Image of his Son; where four of the most famous Fathers of the Church S. Cyril, S. Ambrose, S. Chrysostom, and Theodoret, no otherwise understand this passage, but that prædestination to glory, followeth the prescience of good works? And what would S. Augustine affirm, when he said (b) the will of God could not be unjust, and that prædestination proceeded (besides the grace of God) by most secret merits, which were discovered to this divine eye, that discerneth all the actions of men?

S. Augustine onely pretendeth to ruin the opinion of Pelagians.

(a) Quos præscivit & prædestinavit conformes fieri imagini filii sui. Rom. 8.

Aug. de prædest. Sanctor. c. 3. Antequam faceret nos præscivit nos, & in ipsa nos præscientia; cum nondum fecisset bona.

Aug. l. 13.

(b) Quæ voluntas Dei injusta esse non potest: venit enim de occultissimis meritis. Apud Mag. l. 1. dist. 41.

4. Is there a soul so replenished with contradiction, which averreth not, That what God doth in a certain time, he determined to do it in his eternity? Now Faith teacheth us, he in that time by him determined, rendereth life eternal to the just for reward of their merit, as himself pronounceth in S. Matthew: (c) And therefore it is necessary to confess, God before all Ages was resolved to give the Crown of glory, not indifferently, but in consideration of good life, and laudable virtues. And for this it is to no purpose to say, the end of our intentions goeth before the means, whereby some infer, God first decreed beatitude, which is the end, then considered good works, which are the addres to this end: For I answer, when the end possesseth the place of salary, as this here doth, the merit is always presupposed before the recompence. And although the Master of a Tourneament wisheth the prize to one of his favourites, yet his first intention is, he shall deserve it by his valour. God taketh the like inclinations in this great list of salvation; he wisheth all the world palms, but willeth it to them, who well know how to make use of the helps of his grace.

Manifest reason.

(c) Matth. 25. Answer to objections.

Thus the most ancient, and graveſt Fathers of the Church thought; this sentence they agreed on before the impostures of Pelagians in the golden Age of the Church through a most purified ray. And to this purpose Tertullian said: (d) God, who is very good of his own, was ever just of ours. And S. Hilarie said most perspicuously: (e) That Election was not an effect of judgement indiscreet, but that from the choice of merit, proceeded the distinction made for glorie. S. Epiphanius expressed the like opinion, That there was no exception of persons in the proceeding of God, but that it passed according to the merit, or demerit of every one. Behold what we may gather from the soundest tradition of the Church.

The doctrine of the most ancient Fathers concerning prædestination.

(d) Tertul. de resur. carnis. Deus de suo optimus, de nostro justus.

(e) Hilar. in Psal. 64. Non res indiscreti judicii electio est: sed ex delectu meriti discretio est.

(f) But if we now weigh the second Article whereon we insist, which is the glory of God; it is an easie matter to see this opinion, which appropriateth a certain fatality of divine decrees, without other knowledge of cause, agreeth not with this immense bounty of God, nor the sincere will he hath to save all the world:

(f) The second point of reasons. That God is glorified in that he hath our works for prædestination to glory.

world: It is not suitable to his justice, nor to his promises or menaces he makes to virtues, or vices: besides it tormenteth minds, weakens the zeal of souls, and throweth liberty and despair into manners.

The complaint a Reprobate may make.

Why should not a miserable reprobate have cause hereupon to say: Ah, my Lord! where are the bowels of goodness and mercy, which all pens testifie, all voices proclaim, and laws establish? Is it then of honey for others, and of worm-wood for me? How cometh it to pass without any knowledge of merit, you drew this man from the great mass of corruption, to make him a son of your adoption, a coheir of your glory, and have left me as a black victim, marked with a character of Death? What importeth it me, that in this first choice you made, you did not condemn me without knowledge of cause? to think no good for me, was to think ill enough for me. Was I then able to row against the torrent of your power? Could I intrude into your Paradise, which you have fitly disposed like the Halcyons nest, whereunto nothing can enter but its own bird? You have built your Palace of a certain number of chosen pieces, in such sort, that the account thereof being made, and proportions valued, one small grain might not be added to encrease the number. What could I do in this dreadfull exclusion, but accuse your bounty, and deplore my unhappiness?

Aug. de verbo Apost. ser. 11. Si posset loqui pecus, & dicere Deo, quare ipsum fecisti hominem, ut pecudem? Answer to objections. Gloss. in Daniel.

Behold what a reprobate soul may object: and it were bootless to answer, that a bruit beast might complain in this fashion, that God had not made it a man, or the like might be alledged for infants, who die without Baptism: For as concerning beasts, nothing is taken from them, rather much given, when from nothing, being, and life, is afforded them with contentments of nature; and as for little infants, they endure no evil, and are no more disturbed to be deprived of the sight of God, than was Nebuchadnezzar for the Scepter of Babylon, when he in his infancy was bred among shepheards, thinking himself the son of a Peasant, and wholly ignorant of his Royal extraction. But to say, A man who dies at the age of discretion, and is delivered over to eternal flames, was condemned by God, without any other fore-sight of his works, is it not a cruelty, not worthy of ought but Calvinism? as if a father might be excusable in marrying one daughter richly, and cutting the others throat, to set her on a pyle. He who would judge wisely, must flie the very shadow of an opinion so damnable, and all which may seem to favour it.

The fruits of Gods glory derived from our Maxim.

6. Now as concerning the Doctrine which establisheth Prædestination upon grace and prevision of good works, it seems to stretch far towards the point of Gods greatest glory. It discovereth us his science, in attributing unto him an infinite survey over all the actions of Adams children before all Ages, by which it seasonably fore-saw all that was to be done, by all particulars, in so great a revolution of times: It in an instant affordeth us this most innocent knowledge, seeing we learn by the same way, that the prescience which God hath of our works, is no more the cause of our happiness, than my memory of the fireing of Rome, which happened under Nero; or than mine eye of the whiteness of snow, and fresh verdure of meadows by its simple aspects. Nothing happeneth, because God fore-saw it, but God fore-saw it, because it should so happen by motion of our free-will, and not by the laws of necessity.

Qui non est præscius omnium futurorum non est Deus. Aug. de civit. Dei l. 5. c. 9.

Moreover, the Justice of the great Master is very eminent in this action; for we do not say he works at random, and seeks to make boast of his power in the misery of mortals: but with the Scripture, that he separateth light from darkness with a diamond, to wit, a most strong and resplendent knowledge of the merit, and demerit of men. What sense is there to make a power, which takes its glory from ignorance, and is potent in contempt of reason? Is not this to make all terrible, even to its own favours? What sense is it to appoint a Judge to satisfie the whole world according to desert, and to make him sign Decrees irrevocable in favour of some one, before knowledge of all merit? Cannot we make him potent, unless we make him unjust?

Notable passage. Adamante divit lucem, & tenebras. Eccles. 16. 14. Secundum 70

Adde also, that in the feeling we have of Prædestination, the mercy of the most mild Father shineth with visible marks. For we do not make him to damn him through a negligence of thoughts, and coldness of affection, which cannot be in a God so active, or a heart so loving: but we believe his goodness extendeth to Cain and Judas, and would they have endeavoured, they had the means to gain beatitude, which never fails any man, if he want not correspondence.

Goodness of God.

In the end, we likewise acknowledge in this point the most prudent government of God, who will have nothing idle in nature, nor grace. He could enlighten us without the Sun, and afford us fruit without the earth: but he will his creatures operate, and that one unfold the rays of his substance, another supply with the juice of its bosom. In like manner, he is pleased we make his grace to profit us, to raise our riches out of his favours, and derive our glory from his bounty. He will give a title of merit to our happiness, to advance the quality of his gifts. He will crown in us, what comes from himself, as if it were wholly ours. Why shall we shut up the eyes of his wisdom? why tie up the hands of his liberality? An Ancient said, He more esteemed the judgement of certain men, than their proper benefits. God will, we value both in him, that we enjoy his bounty by favour, and his judgement by merit. The actions of the Sovereign Monarch are free from controul, as his gifts from repentance.

Si voluisset Esau, & cucurrisset, & Dei adjutorio pervenisset. Aug. ad Simp. l. 1. q. 2.

Third point. Repose of Conscience.

I will leave you now to conclude, what quiet we may have in our consciences upon the matter of Prædestination. I leave you to think whether a good soul have not cause to say: O be the Divine Providence praised for evermore, since it so worthily hath provided for me. I cannot adore its counsels, unless I love its goodness. It sweeteneth my pains, it comforteth my cares, when it teacheth me, my eternal happiness depends on him and me; on him, who loveth me tenderly, and on me, who cannot hate my self, unless I derogate from my essence, after I have failed in all virtues. Courage then, we roul not under this fatality which writeth laws on diamonds, and ties us to inevitable necessities. The fodder is not cast, we have yet the mettal boyling apace in hand; we may appear on the mould of virtue, we may make our selves such by the grace of God, as to put our salvation in assurance, our life into repose, and death into crowns.

I cannot fear God with a slavish fear, since he is nought but goodness: but I will ever dread my works, since I am frailty it self. Let us hereafter live in such sort, as we would be judged. Let us consecrate our life to innocency, and banish all sin. Let us undertake piety, humility, obedience, alms, and devotion towards the Blessed Virgin, which are most assured marks of Prædestination. Let us not presume of our own forces, nor despair likewise of Gods mercy. If we stand upright, let us still fear the declining of nature, which easily bendeth to evil, and if we stoop, let us quickly raise our selves again, making all avail to our salvation, yea, our proper falls. We have a great Advocate in Heaven, who openeth as many mouthes for us, as we have inflicted wounds on his body. We have inflicted them through cruelty, and they will receive us through mercy, serving us towards Heaven for a chariot of triumph, as they were to us on earth a mirrour in life, and a sepulcher in death.

Drawn out of Simeon of Constantinopl.

The sixth EXAMPLE upon the sixth MAXIM.

Of the secret Power of Prædestination.

PROCOPIUS.

Marvellous secret of Prædestination.

PRædestination is an admirable secret, wherein experience teacheth us, there is nothing which the happy ought not to fear, nor any thing the miserable may not hope. Stars fall from the firmament, to be changed into dung-hills, and dung-hills of the earth mount to Heaven, to be metamorphosed into stars. The graces of God insinuate themselves by secret ways, and the impressions of the will are extreamly nice: all that past, is a dream, and the future a cloud, where thunders murmur in the dark.

Historia Patrum orientis, & Radenus.

We tremble when we read in the History of holy Fathers, that an Hermit, grown white in the austerities of Religion, understanding a notable thief had gained Heaven, by a sigh he cast forth in the instant of his death, was much displeased, and presently became nought, because God was good, blaming his mercy, to trie his justice: For one sole censure made him loose forty years of penance, and drew his foot out of Paradise, to deliver his soul to hell. I purpose here consequently to produce a singular conversion, that you may admire, and fear the secret ways of God. Simeon of Constantinople is the Authour of it, who enlarged it with many words, but I will abbreviate it into good proportion, which shall render it no whit the less effectual.

Actor. 12.

The Emperour Diocletian having pacified Ægypt, sojourned sometime in Antioch, of purpose to destroy the name of Jesus Christ, in the same place where the faithfull began to be called Christians. Theodosia, a great Ladie, came to him, bringing her son along with her, named Neanias, in very good equipage, with purpose to prefer him in Court, and satisfie her ambition. To make her self the more acceptable, she freely protested, her deceased husband died a Christian, that she had often attempted to work him to forsake this superstition, adverse to Gods and men, and that being unable to prevail upon his inveterate obstinacy, she had manured this young plant, (speaking of her son) carefully training him in the service of the gods and Prince, with infinite detestation against Christianitie.

Procopius presented to Diocletian.

Diocletian, who was much delighted with such accidents, loudly praised the Ladie, and casting his eye on Neanias, he found him of handsom shape, good presence, understanding, and valiant, whereof he conceived great hope he might prove hereafter a principal instrument of his desires. That which also pleased him the more, was, that putting him on the discourse of his education, he said his father did all he could to win him to Christianity, but that he ever stuck to his mothers side; not enduring the impertinencies of a Religion, which professeth a son as old as his father, a mother without a husband, a childbirth joyned to virginity, a God crucified, a Cross divinized, and such other extravagancies, whereat he set himself a jeering with so much tattle, that he gained the Emperours heart.

Scoffing dangerous.

Scoffs have this proper in them, that they penetrate very far into jocund minds, and though they proceed from a soft spirit, they often make more impression, than iron. The Emperour so well liked his humour, that he gave him a charge in the Citie of Alexandria, with two Companies to forrage round about, and cleanse the Countrey from the sect of Christians. The mother conceived much joy thereat, and the son, who seemed already to touch Heaven with a finger, put himself into action, for accomplishment of his Commission.

Admirable Conversion.

But, O the bottomless depth of Gods judgements! Behold he going about to surprize, is surprized, and of a Lion is become a Lamb, and of one victorious, a victim. He being near the Citie of Apamea in Syria, the earth shook under his feet, the air was enflamed with lightening, and thunders roared in the clouds, a voice came from Heaven, which said unto him: Neanias, whither goest thou, and to what purpose is this equipage? He, although much astonished, answered it was for the Christians. The voice replied, Is it then to me you go? But he, having the hardness to ask it, who are you, saw a Cross in the air, and heard these words: I am Jesus the Crucified, Son of the living God, and you shall hereafter be a vessel of election for me. This vision beat him down, to raise him like S. Paul, and of a persecutour, in a moment made him a Confessour. He secretly sent for a Gold-smith, and causing him to make a rich Cross, he embraced it, he kissed it, and carried it hanging about his neck, to engrave it in his heart.

In stead of persecuting the Christians, he turned his arms against a race of Sarazins, who over-ran the Countrey, and ravished maids, to satisfie their bruitishness, which filled houses with terrour, and tears. The Cross gave great success to his arms, and in short time having chased away this pernicious faction, he went to the Citie of Antioch, being already fully instructed in the points of his religion.

Inter-view between Procopius and his mother.

The mother, who knew not what had passed in this maatter, entertains him with much joy, not satisfying her self either with his sight, or in congratulating his triumphs. But he, who no longer cared for any thing under God, said: "I have obtained other victories which you know not. And what? replied the mother. Madam I have vanquished my self by the grace of God, and departing hence a Pagan, am returned a Christian, desiring nothing more in the world of you, but since you gave me birth, you will take example from me. How, my son (sayes the mother) you are disposed to be merry. No, replies he, and drawing out his Cross, behold, said he, the marks of the Religion I profess. She much amazed, drew him aside into her closet, and asked him, who had recommended this abomination to him, and whether he were become a fool? "There are none but fools (said he) who with reverence look after deaf, and dumb gods, the time is come these feeble Deities must be abjured, and all the works of darkness: and speaking this he ransacked his mothers closet, which was very sumptuous, breaking and throwing down the golden and silver idols, and withal saying, these silly entertainments were onely good to make money of, to distribute among the poor.

Revenge of Theodosia.

Theodosia was so offended at this act, that without any regard of bloud, and nature, she went to the Emperour, and related all had passed, resolving rather to deliver her sole son to executioners, than to loose the satisfaction of her revenge. Diocletian as much surprized with astonishment, as enflamed with anger, having praised the mother for her zeal, wrote to Justus Governour of Palestine, and commanded him to seize on the person of Neanias, and to seek by all means to reduce him to obedience, and in case of refusal, to take away his sword, and proceed against him with all the rigour of punishments ordained for Christians.

The Governour having received the Emperours Mandate, went with his Guards to the house of Neanias, Neanias, and signified the tenour of his Commission, withal delivering into his hand the Emperours Letters, wherein perceiving some blasphemies against our Saviour, he tare them in pieces, and said to Justus: Execute your Commission. I have a bodie to suffer, but not a soul to betray my Religion. The other conjured him by all the ways of friendship, to take pitie of his age, and not become an enemy to his own life and fortune, adding, timorarious counsels are sources of irrecoverable evils. But the valorous Champion drawing out his sword, threw it at the Judge's feet, professing he was wholly gained to Jesus Christ, whereupon he fettered him, and led him to Cæsarea.

Constancy of Procopius.

His sufferings for Religion.

In few days he was brought to the Palace, to answer upon accusations objected, which he most freely averred, persisting in the confession of his faith with admirable constancy, which was the cause, the Judge proceeding according to ordinary forms exercised against the faithfull, made him cruelly to be beaten with rods, in sight of all the world. Diocletian thought by these shamefull and barbarous ways, to stifle Christianity: but these outrages practised upon men of quality, enkindled the courage of Christians, and sowed seeds of Martyrs. Many Pagans were seen, who deplored this punishment, beholding a young Lord whom they had lately seen triumphant in courtesie, in arms, and valour, delivered into the hands of hangmen, to be used like a thief. The Martyr perceiving the peoples tears, said: Fathers, and Brethren, bewail not my sufferings, lament your own errours; my pains will pass away, but the torment of infidelitie shall be everlasting. Then lifting his eyes to Heaven, he fervently besought God to fortifie him in his combats, to whom he resigned the total glory. Justus seeing him more courageous than he wished, sent him back unto the prison, where he was comforted with the sight of Angels, and it is said, our Saviour himself appearing, baptized him with his own hands, and gave him the name of Procopius, and heartened him, bravely to finish his combats.

The next day he came forth of prison, like the Sun out of clouds, his body reflecting lustre and majesty, when they thought him spent with excess of torments. The whole Citie was filled with rumour, and many souldiers secretly coming to the Bishop Leontius, were converted to faith, whereof the Governour advertised, made them presently to be beheaded, fearing to exasperate the Bands, if he longer deferred their execution. Procopius having once again been tormented, before he was brought back to prison, recommended these first victims to Heaven by his prayers, whose example was quickly waited on by twelve Ladies, full of honour, who made open profession of faith. Justus thinking it was a feminine heat, which would be quenched when torments were applied to their bodies, caused them cruelly to be tortured, commanded their sides and arm-holes to be burnt, yet they persevered, singing and praising God in the ardour of the most exquisite torments.

Theodosia mother of our Martyr, being present at this spectacle, felt her self touched to the quick: for the spirit of God entered powerfully into her. It suddenly took off the film, which in her had clouded the light of reason, making her see into the bottom of her soul, at which she conceived much horrour.

Change of Theodosia.

"Alas then, said she, within her self, who ever "lodged a heart so barbarous as thine, in the body of "a woman? All the bloud thou seest shed, distilleth "now to satisfie a revenge thou conceivedst against "thine own bloud. Thy son is in prison all rent and "torn, and if he yet have not rendered up his soul, he "keeps it on his lips, expecting (perhaps) thy last "words. If thou art not yet satisfied, go bathe thy "self in his wounds, and pull away that little life na"ture gave him by thy means, and which cruelty "taketh from him by thy practises. Ah Theodosia, "the most rigorous of women, and the most un"fortunate of Mothers, though thou hast abjured "nature, renounce not the God of nature. Hear the "voice which speaketh in thy heart, and render thee "to that Jesus, who begins to resign thee up to thy "self. Why wilt thou not do, what they act before "thine eyes? They have neither hearts of steel, nor "bodies of brass, more than thou: but more resolu"tion, because far greater faith. And why shouldst "not thou be faithfull, by imitating their example. "If thou hast provoked Gods mercy, thou hast not "wasted it. Let us go to Heaven by the purple way, "since the Providence of Heaven presenteth it unto "thee. The bloud of thy poor son yet speaks to "thee in so many tongues, as there are drops of it "shed in the streets. Let us follow him, and never "think that done too late, which soon shall work thy "eternal salvation.

She feeling the combat of these cogitations in her heart, suddenly cried out as in an extasie: I am a Christian. The Judge, who feared this act, gave semblance to hear nothing of it, but she redoubled her voice so loudly, and made so solemn a profession, that it was impossible for him to dissemble it: So that seeing she would not desist from this resolution, he was enforced to send her into the prison, where her son remained.

Procopius beholding her to come fettered with other Ladies, was infinitely joyed at this spectacle, and cried out aloud:

"Madam, my dear mother, who brings you? To "whom she answered: Loving son, the cause which "put you here, brought me hither to be the compa"nion of your death, since I am the murderess of your "life. I have betrayed bloud and nature, and deli"vered my bowels to executioners, to satisfie passion. "Virtue and honour being lost, nought else remains "for me, but the happiness to die with you for Jesus "Christ. It is Son, at this instant, I must accomplish "the words you spake to me at your return, that I "should take example from you, as you birth from "me. O God, most honoured Mother, behold here "a great touch from Heaven, (said Procopius) I have "nothing more to wish in the world, since I this day "behold you the precious conquest of Jesus Christ. "It is at this time when being a mother by nature, "you shall likewise be a mother to me by the example "of your piety: You are come to the point whither "God would have you, and all that is past, was but "to augment the glory of your conversion. Let us "go by the way of bloud, to the place where the soul "of your good husband, and my dearest father, expe"cteth us.

His imprisonment and martyrdom.

These two hearts wholly dissolved into the love of God, spake in thought, having not language enough to express their affection. Theodosia being in a short time after baptized by Leontius, was led to execution with the twelve Ladies, where she appeared as the singular ornament of this holy Quire, leaving her head in the place, where she had first confessed Jesus Christ, with a constancy so heroick, that she drew tears from all the world. Procopius having been tumbled up and down at divers Sessions before the Tribunals, whipped, roasted, broyled, salted, torn in all his body, the strength of his courage no whit shaken, stretched out his neck to the executioner, and yielded up his fair soul to God, learning in the conversion of his mother, and his own, the divine power of this great Prædestination.

VII. MAXIM.

of the Divinitie of JESUS.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That God will be served in any kind, and that every sect hath reason in its Religion.

THis Maxim of the Prophane Court, is an old dotage of obsequious spirits, who having no zeal for faith, and likewise less courage against impiety, do in apparence approve all Religions, and follow none. That is it which made Symmachus say, God was a great secret, and that it was no wonder every one sought after it, and spake according to his weak endeavour of it, some in one fashion, and some in another: That is it also which made Maximus Madaurensis write, He was too great to enter whole and entire into the understanding of man; but must be taken piece-meal, every one contenting himself to adore some Symbol of God, which seemed most convenient unto him.

Behold the shortest way can be taken to arrive at gross impiety; for it is to make a Roman Pantheon of Religion, where you shall have a thousand imaginary Divinities, without one least glimmer of the knowledge of the true God. Lies for some space accord together, although they spare not to oppose one another; but true Religion hath this property, to tend wholly to Monarchy, and if you speak to it of tolerating other sects, as if they were reasonable, it is to thrust thorns into the feet, and put straws into the eyes of it.

2 Cor. 6. Jesus hath nothing to do with Belial, the faithfull with the unfaithfull, nor the Temple of God with the synagogue of devils. All religions which wander from the ray of Christian and Catholick verity, are but chymæraes of piety, spectres of wisdom and flames, which lead these souls into an abyss of fire and darkness. There is but one Redeemer, to whom are due all services and adorations. And it is my desire for your comfort to shew you, that the Authours of all Sects, having in the end appeared so monstrous, it onely appertained to the Eternal Son of the Father celestial, to bear the testimony of all creatures for the homage of his Divinity.

THE HOLY COURT.

That none but Jesus is Authour of truth and salvation, to whom all creatures bear witness of his Divinitie.

harmony, which hath manifested the Word Eternal to the world, involved in times, and the increated Wisdom, included in the body of an infant. If we will look into signs from Heaven, I may say, that at the approach of this Nativity, the Sun appeared encompassed with a marvellous rainbow, willing thereby to give notice, the time of reconciliation was near, and that the great Mediatour, who should reunite all things in his Person, came to sanctifie the world by a universal peace. Oros. l. 6. c. 20. Suet. in Aug. c. 95. Senec. Lat. qq. Dio. l. 45.

I might alledge what was witnessed by Eutropius in his sixth book, and by Eusebius in his Chronicle, how three Suns were seen to shine at one time, afterward united and incorporated in one sole globe; in my opinion, so to denote three substances, to wit, of the Word, the soul, and flesh conjoyned in the sole person of our Saviour. I could say, how at that instant the Sun was environed with three circles, the one whereof bare a coronet of ears of corn, to testifie the plenty, which the Word Incarnate should bring into the world. I could adde what Albumazer the Chaldæan wrote in his Introduction, sixth Treatise, and first Definition, touching the apparition of a Virgin, in the first aspect of the sign Virgo. But let us rest satisfied, that Heaven spake aloud, making use of a new star, as of a tongue to declare the living God, and that this apparition became so famous, that even Infidels had authentick testimonies thereof, as we may see in the narration of Chalcidius, a Platonick Philosopher. And it is strange, that Plinie (a) himself speaketh of a certain star with silver rays, infinitely resplendent, which shewed God in a humane figure. Three suns. Plin. l. 2. c. 37. (a) Plin. c. 25. l. 2. Fit & candidum comtes argenteo crine refulgens, at vix contueri licet, facie humanæ Dei efficiem in se ostendens.

If we speak of the air, know we not it was illustrated with a great and divine light, which S. Luke called (b) the glorie of God. If we speak of waters; tradition teacheth us, a fountain was seen to spring in a poor stable, which was honoured first with the birth of the Son of God (c). If we speak of the earth, hath it not contributed to the revelation of the Word, when it made some of its trees bow, to adore the Saviour (d)? Did it not bear flowers visibly imprinted with the most noble characters of the living God, as Rovillius depainteth the Granadil? The birds of the air have rendered their homage by the means of a dove, which appeared in the Baptisms fishes in that, which served as a Steward, and Cashmaster to Jesus Christ. Four-footed beasts were remarkeable in the crib, because we have learned from the Prophet Isaieh, the Ox hath known his Master, and the Ass the crib of his Lord. (b) Gloria Domini circumfulsit eos. (c) Baronius. (d) Sozomen. l. 5. c. Rovillius de plantis. Joan. 1. 32. Matth. 17. 27. Agnovit bos possessorem suum, & asinus præsepe Domini sui. Isaiah 1.

of the revelation of the WORD INCARNATE, and how all creatures bear witness of his Divinitie.

THe great God, whom the Prophet Isaiah called, the hidden God, and who according to the saying of the Psalmist, had spread round about his throne a veyl of darkness impenetrable to mortal eyes, was unscarfed in the crib in the first of his days, in such sort, that you need lift up but simple clothes to know him. The Word Incarnate so visibly replenisheth all the world with its knowledge, that a man must be blind not to see its lights, and stupid to resist its love. We will content our selves at this time, to express three proofs: The one drawn from the voice of insensible nature; the other from reasonable nature; and the third, from divine reasons.

Voice of nature. It is an admirable thing to see, that Heaven and the elements have been willing to bear a part in the great arm, another a hand, another a leg, another a foot, in the end, every one made his part, pursuing the same course; none of these excellent Masters knowing ought of his companions works: Notwithstanding, that all these pieces, wrought in sundry Ages, by so many several hands, and in Provinces so far distant one from another, being set together, it was found every piece was so curiously composed, and fitted to the entire body of the statue, that it might be said, All these Sculptours had long agreed together for the accomplishment of such a work.

2. (e) If we pass from the voice of nature, to voices divinely humane, as are predictions; what is there more admirable than the universal consent of prophesies? He who should tell us, that a most beautifull statue of white marble had been seen in a Temple, all framed of pieces laid together, made by sundry artizans in divers Ages; in such sort, that one began the head of this statue, having no other determinate design; the other not seeing the head which was made, nor knowing it to be done, made a body, another an arm, (e) Voice of prophesie.

If then this discourse in the Idæa's of men, have any place in the truth of Histories, as many have thought, must we not say some Intelligence governed the minds of all these Artizans, to cause them insensibly to consent in all the dimensions of this Master-piece so excellent and exact?

Let us here say the like, when we behold the great model of the Word Incarnate, which God placed in the frontis-piece of his works, to be admired and adored by all intellectual Nature. We find Prophets divided one from another, the distance of many hundred years, different in age, humour, condition, style, invention, order, and connexion, who could neither see one another, nor agree together in any kind, as were David, Daniel, and Isaiah: yet all without mutual knowledge laboured in the History of the great Saviour of men; one speaketh of his birth, another of his life, another of his doctrine, another of his manners, another of his miracles, another of his death, another of his victories and triumphs. When we take pains to gather together, and consider all these pieces, we find them measured and fitted with such proportion, that we are enforced to affirm, it is not a work of mortal hands, but an enterprize of the Spirit of God.

Excellent prophecies touching our Saviour. 49. Genes. Non auferetur sceptrum de Juda, &c. Donec veniat qui mittendus est.

Who inspired the Patriarch Jacob, that prophesied so many years before all Prophets, that the Messias, who was the hope of all Nations, should come, when the Scepter of Judea was taken out of the hands of Judah's race: which was fulfilled punctually in the time of Herod, who put the true Heirs of this Royal Line to death, to satisfie his ambition, and content his tyranny? Who dictated to the Prophet Daniel, (a) that after the Edict of King Artaxerxes, granted in favour of the re-establishment of the Temple, there should be seventy weeks to the birth of Christ, that is to say, the space of 490. years, which was found true by calculation of the best Historians. Who made the Prophet Aggeus speak with this thundering majesty, and worthy the lips of the God of Hosts, WITHIN A SHORT TIME I WILL MOVE HEAVEN, EARTH, AND SEA; THE DESIRED BY AL NATIONS OF THE WORLD SHAL COME, AND I WIL REPLENISH THIS HOUSE WITH GLORY? Was it not the same Spirit, which afterward wrought those great mysteries we see; who then shewed them to his faithfull servants? It is he who guided the pen of Isaiah, when he proclaimed the Messias should be born of a Virgin: he, who revealed to the Prophet Micah, this birth should happen in Bethlehem: he, who opened the eyes of Zacharie, to see him in the triumph he afterwards made in Jerusalem: he, who deciphered to David all the particularities of his passion in the second Psalm. This great consent of Prophets without design or art, astonished the Jews, who had the Scriptures in their hands, and could reckon up all the versicles of their Bible. They well saw, it was the uncontroulable voice of Prophets, but their vanity had so blinded them, that they rather wished to have no Messias, than to acknowledge him poor according to the world; although his very poverty had been reckoned by the Prophets in the number of his greatnesses.

(a) Dan. 9. 26.

Agg. 2.

Isaiah 7.

Micah 5.

Zach. 9.

Psal. 2.

Strange testimony of Gentilism.

3. Perhaps it will appear to be less strange, that the Hebrews, who were a chosen people, had so many revelations touching the Word of God. But who will not be rapt with admiration, to consider the words, which the wisest, the greatest, and most glorious of Gentilisin, left to posterity, concerning this mystery? I speak not of Trismegistus, of Pythagoras, of Numenius, nor of others, whose writings may be called in question. I speak of Plato, Aristotle, Cicero. How came that into Plato's mind, which he so eloquently afterward couched in the fourth book of his laws? to wit:

(a) That God should be to men the rule and measure of all things, and principally if it were so, or ought to be so in any part of the world, that there were a Man-God.

(a) Ὅτι δὲ ἀνθρώπων χρημάτων μέτρον καὶ πολὺ μάλιστα τῶν τοιούτων ἀρχὴ ἁρμοττόντως ἂν εἴη. Plato l. 4. de legibus.

From whence think you came it, that Aristotle, who proceeded so advisedly in all his Maxims, let this word fall:

(b) That it was no unbefeeming thing for the Gods immortal, to reveste themselves with humane nature, to destroy the errours, which were crept into the world?

(b) Non esse Diis immortalibus indecorum hominis induere naturam, quo ab erroribus seiocentur mortales. Celius refert. l. 17. c. 34.

Who suggested to Cicero, one of the wisest Politicians that ever was amongst men, what he wrote in his Book of a Common-wealth?

(c) That the time would come, there should be no other law at Rome, than at Athens: but that amongst all Nations, and in all times, there should be one same, eternal, and immutable law, one common Master, and Emperour over all, which should be God himself, the inventour, teacher, and introducer of this law: and that he who obeyed him not, should flie from himself, as a despiser of his own nature. But in this alone that he would not obey, he were grievously chastised, although he might escape all other punishment.

(c) Cicer. l. 3. de Rep. Nec erit alia lex Romæ, alia Athenis, alia nunc alia posthac: sed apud omnes gentes, & omni tempore una lex, Deus ille legis hujus inventor, disceptator, lator, &c. Jam nova progenies cœlo dimittitur alto. Te duce si qua manent sceleris vestigia nostri, irrita perpetuus solvent formidine terras. Virgil.

It were a thing superfluous, to alledge here the verses of the Sybils, which it is known were so expresse, that many of the principal of the Gentiles were converted to Christianity, by reading the testimonies these divine women rendered of the Word Incarnate.

We all likewise know, God to make this argument the more visible, permitted a little before the Nativity of our Saviour, that Virgil, the most eminent of all Poets, composed that his excellent work, where he expresseth in Latin verse the conceptions of Sybilla Cumæa, and speaketh plainly of a child which should be sent from Heaven to pardon the sins of men, and fill the earth with blessings. And to shew this was not alone in the minds of particulars, we read that towards the reign of Augustus, Julius Marathus foretold, Nature should bring forth a King for the worlds Empire. Which so amazed the Senate, according to the relation of Suetonius (d) the Historian, that they forbade to breed up children which should be born within the time this Southsayer had prefixed. Doth not Josephus (e) also make mention of the prediction, which said: Nations came from Judea should become Masters of the universe? The Romans understood not this language, but applied it, some to Augustus, others to Vespasian, until such time as truth drew aside the curtain, and made the accomplishment of these predictions, perspicuously appear in the Person of our Saviour.

(d) Sueton. in Aug. 54.

(e) Joseph l. 7. c. 11. de bello Judaico.

Nay not so much as Porphirie, yea Mahomet, and devils, but give some Elogie of honour to Jesus. Porphirie in the Treatise he made of the blessings of Philosophie, saith: It is a great matter that devils themselves have spoken in favour of Jesus, confessing him to be endowed with singular pietie, for which cause he entered into possession of most happie immortalitie. And Mahomet, That the spirit of God bare record to Christ the Son of Mary; that the soul of God was given him; that he is the Messenger, Spirit, and Word of God, that his doctrine is perfect, and enlighteneth the Old Testament. O God of the universe, how powerfull is verity, to derive testimonies in favour of his Word from the very lips of the most prophane!

Porphyrius. περὶ ἰδίου φιλοσόφ.

Alcoran. Azoar. I. 4. 11. 13.

4. Let us adde also some divine reasons in this brevitie, vitie, whereunto we have voluntarily confined our selves. Who sees not that humane understanding, constrained by the consideration of mysteries, doth homage also to the Incarnation of the Son of God? Where is that darkness which can hinder the bright day of faith? What can Infidels say? That this mystery is impossible? Impossible, how? Either on Gods part, or mans, or from the repugnance of humane understanding with such like propositions, because by their saying they involve contradictions. How, would it not be possible to God, he being Omnipotent, Immense, Infinite? How, according to the confession of ancient Philosophers, can he repleniſh all the world with his Divinity, and is not able to accommodate himself with enough of it to divinize his holy Humanity? Is it because we say it is united to the Word in this mystery, in a quite other fashion, than the Spirit of God is with the world? I admit it: For the union of it is truely personal. But must it not be confessed, the Word in this divine Essence, as under title of efficient cause, it hath an influence infinite over all the effects of the world, and as under title of final cause, it hath a capacity to limit and measure all the inclinations of creatures; so under title of substantial bound, it may confine and accompliſh by its personality all possible Essence? Why shall we tie the hands of Divine bounty in its communications, since it binds not our understanding in its conceptions?

Reasons of seemlinesse.

Is it not a shamefull thing that man will estimate, and set a value upon the Divine Essence? If God please not man, he shall not be God. Should we say, man is incapable of this communication? And how is it, that the holy Humanity resisted the Omnipotency of God, to the prejudice of his own exaltation, since it is found as soon in the union of the Word, as in the possession of Essence? See we not in nature, that the rays of the Sun draw up vapours from the earth, and incorporated with them, do create Meteors in the air, not any one making resistance to his exaltation? What contradiction can there be in our understanding against such a maxim, seeing it appears the most famous Philosopher said, This union of God with man, might be very fit, and Plutarch also speaking of the communication of the Creatour with the creature, pronounced these words, That God was not a lover of birds, nor other living creatures, but a lover of men; and that it is a very reasonable matter that he communicate himself to his loves, and delights? But this would seem to abase the Divinity. Hear what Volusianus said: I wonder, that he, to whom this whole universe is so small, can be shut up within the bodie of a little child, having a mouth open to crie, as others.

Plutarch. in Numa. Θαῦμα δ' φιλορνιε, δ' φιλόθηρ ἄλλα φιλάνθρωπον.

Volusianus. Miror si intra corpus vagientis infantiæ latet, cui parva putatur universitas, &c.

What uncomelinesse is there, if God be united to a little body? Have not Plinie (a) and Seneca (b) said, That nature was ever so admirable as in little bodies, and that it was a slavery in Great-ones, to be unable to be little? I wonder the Sovereign Lord of all things is so long absent from Heaven, and that all the government of the World is transferred to so little a creature. From whence proceedeth this amazement, but from the baseness of our thoughts? If we said, God being made man, ceased to be God, and were despoiled of his Empire, Greatness, Essence, there would be somewhat wherewith to question this Mystery: but when we say God came to Man by inclination of a Sovereign bounty and mercy, not leaving himself, when we say humane nature is received into the Word, as a small source into a huge river, and not loosing its Essence, is fixed upon the personality of the Word it self, is it not to honour the power, majesty, and wisdom of God?

(a) Plin. Natura nusquam magis quàm in minimis tota est.

(b) Servitus magnitudinis non posse fieri minorem. Senec.

Homo quippe ad Deum accessit, Deus à se non decessit. Auguſt.

5. In what were the Divinity abased? Can it be in doing a work so noble, so singular, so divine, that it deserveth to entertain the thoughts of men and Angels, through times and eternity? What is more specious, and more sweet, than to represent to ones self the Person of our Saviour, who in himself makes an alliance of all was most eminent in spiritual and corporal nature, to wit, of God, and man; verily, say I, one composed of an unheard-of composition, to render the majesty of his father palbable, and visible, to the hands and eyes of mortals? What dignity, to behold in the world a Man-God, become a part of the world, to possess the Spirit of God from all eternity, who proposed this person as the end of his communications, the bound of his power, the first-born of all creatures; who held all Ages in breath for him, all hearts in desires, all minds in expectation, all creatures in prophesies? The Book of God hath written me in the beginning of its first page, said the Word with the Psalmist.

In capite libri scriptum est de me. Psal. 39. 8.

All creatures of this great universe, all predictions and conceptions of these two great books, the world, and the Bible, tended to the accomplishment and revelation of this God-Man, who should set a golden head upon all nature intelligent, sensitive, and vegetative. All creatures were but leaves, and flowers that promised the great fruit which the Prophet calleth, The fruit of earth sublime.

Isaiah 4. 20.

We must religiously speak what deserveth to be heard with reverence: It is for this incomparable man that God created the world; and all creatures are but as silly rays from the Diadem of glory, which covereth his head.

Religiosè dicendum, reverentèr audiendum est, quia propter hunc hominem sibris & honore coronandum Deus omnia creavit. Rupert. l. 13. de glor. Trinit. & proceſ. Spiritûs Sancti.

What a spectacle to see them all wound up as the strings of a harp, to praise and declare unto men the Name of God, to behold the nine Quires of Angels enter into this consort, and every one of them to honour this first Essence, by so many distinct perfections; notwithstanding all to confess their ability, cannot reach that degree which the Divine greatness meriteth? And thereupon behold here the Word Incarnate, which passing through all the spheres of nature, grace, and glory, enter into the new sphere of the hypostatical union, where it appears as a rainbow imprinted with all the beauties of the father; he manifesteth them to men, and making himself an adoring God, a loving God, an honouring God, he adoreth, he loveth, he honoureth God, so much as he is adorable, amiable, and honourable, through all Ages for evermore.

Let us unfold our hearts in the knowledge, and love of the Word revealed. Let us adore this great sign, this eternal character of the living God, for whom all signs are. Let us make a firm purpose not to pass over a day of our life, wherein we afford him not three things due to him, by titles so lawfull; Homage, Love, Imitation. Homage by adoring him, and offering him some small service directed according to times, in acknowledgement of the dependence we have of him, by an entire comformity of our wils to his: Love, by loving all he loves, and hating all he hates: Imitation, by ever bearing some mark of him upon our flesh, according to the Apostles precept, who said: Glorifie, and bear God upon your bodie. And to conclude, let us often say:

Feed (O Lord) thy poor begger with continual influences of this Divinitie, I ask and desire with all my heart, thy love may penetrate, repleniſh, and transform me wholly into thee. Bloſius.

The

The seventh EXAMPLE upon the seventh MAXIM.

The triumph of JESUS, over the Enemies of Faith.

JULIAN the Apostate.

Recedentes a te in terra scribentur. Jer. 17.

ALl those who forsake the Word of God are wretched men, blotted out of Heaven, to be written on earth, and whose names the earth it self being unable to preserve, abandoneth to forgetfulness, or contempt, and very often to execration. This is manifested by many sensible proofs in the examples of the Emperour Julian, who betraying his Religion, and dishonouring the character of Christianity, made himself one of the most miserable Princes that ever was under Heaven, leaving his soul as a prey for devils, his enterprizes to ill success, his life to a most bloudy death, his person to the scorn and hatred of men, and his memory to the detestation of all Ages.

Qualities of Julian, which shew, that without true Religion all is unprofitable.

Notwithstanding he wanted no eminent qualities, which might have raised him; had he not forsaken the source of height and glory. Birth gave him Constantius, brother of great Constantine, for father, Basilina, a most noble Princess for mother, an Emperour for uncle, three for cousin-germains, Constantinople for his native soil, and to serve for a Theater of great actions. He had a good wit, strong body, tongue eloquent, conversation pleasing, and courage masculine. There was not any science in the world whereof he had not some tincture, he most prosperously mingled arms with letters, and appeared as courragious in the front of Armies, as in learned Schools.

He very little esteemed his body, so much was his soul divorced from his flesh: worldly riches were nothing at all in his hands, nor did he value them, but to give them. He said, It was for those who had no spirit to beg praise from the body, that he was ever handsom enough who was chaste, and that if Painters made fair faces, chastity beautifull lives. His counsel was, to avoid love as an enraged Master, according to the saying of Sophocles, to live in the command over proper passions, and free enjoying of himself. The Gentlemen of his chamber, and all domesticks, who most nearly looked into his life, gave assurance, never was any thing more chast. He slept little, fed very soberly, continually afflicted his body, accustomed it to travel, in such manner, that he was seen in the snows of Germanie, and broyling ardours of Persia, perpetually in the same state.

After indefatigable toyls of the day, he betook himself by candle-light to studies of the night. He almost never lay but on the bare boards, and waked at an hour prefixed, not needing any one to give him notice. He expected so little service about his person, that being at Paris, which he called His well-beloved Citie, in the time of a sharp winter, when the Seine was frozen, scarcely would he suffer a fire to be made in his chamber, so discourteously he used himself. He hated not, superfluities, Bals, and Comedies, and if needs he must sometime permit them, it was more to reprove, than behold them. He afforded good and speedy justice, his heart was patient, and temperate towards the people, whom he freed what he could from tributes, making his impositions accord with the ability of particulars, and saying, He would leave his treasures to be kept by his good friends, which were his subjects.

Is it not a lamentable case, that so great a man was so miserably lost, with so many excellent parts, for want of preserving the best, which is piety. It is true, that almost all our Historians have written of him with much rigour, dissembling what was good in him, to render him the more odious; but for my part, I am of opinion, the greatness of Christianity more appeared therein, if having shewed the ornaments of nature which this Prince had, we make you plainly see, all that very ill succeeded with him, and that we cannot find any other source of his misery, but his infidelity.

The causes of his corruption.

The judicious Readers shall here observe the cause of his ruin, and consider the first education of children is an impression very tender, which being not well mannaged in the beginning, filleth the whole life with disorders. Tutours are the fathers of spirits, said S. Irenæus, as having more influence over the resemblance of souls, than carnal fathers over bodies. Ill luck would have it, that little Julian being left young in the guardianship of his uncle Constantine, was recommended to Eusebius of Nicomedia to be instructed in faith. Now this Eusebius was a wolf in a lambskin, who counterfeiting to be very Catholick, ceated not by his credit, to advance Arianism: so that this young Prince fashioned at first by so ill a hand, could not entertain belief and reverence towards the Person of our Saviour. Heresie is the key of Atheism, and when a soul is disposed to contempt of its gracious Mother on earth, it easily learns no longer to acknowledge a Father in heaven.

Tutours are fathers of spirits.

Ecebolus an hypocrite.

He being so ill grounded in the elements of faith, was put under the discipline of a Rhetorician, named Ecebolus, who turned with all winds, and admitted Religion according to the times. For when he saw Christian Emperours reign, he for ceremony seemed a Christian. If Pagans swayed, there was none more insolent than he. If Empire returned again to Christians, he placed himself in Church-porches, beseeching every one to tread on him as a thing contemptible. He above all hearkened to, and honoured Libanius, one of the greatest Sophisters of his time, but a Pagan till death. He had a spirit mild, and very indifferent upon articles of Religion, he equally received Christians and Pagans into his school, and permitted S. Basil himself to preach to his schollars: but omitted not silently to contrive the means how to reestablish the Altars and Temples of the Gods. He reflected on Julian as the Palladion of Gentilism, and bound him fast to his own person, by the charms of his eloquence, to apply him to his counsels.

School of Julian.

All the little piety which Julian might have learned from a man who had none, began to wither away in a school where all was known but God. Apollo there possessed the name of Jesus, Diana of Mary, Aristotle & Plato were the Prophets, Isocrates the Preacher, and the names of Tritons were there better understood, than of S. Peter and S. Andrew the fisher-men. This new disciple took such a tast of eloquence, that it made him forget devotion: he would have given a whole Province for an Epistle of Libanius, and it seemed to him, he who was King of words, might become a King over hearts, and Empires. His spirit of fire took nourishment on all sides, and devoured as well cedars as thorns. He as yet retained some affection towards the knowledge of sacred things, but curiosities predominated in his mind. He penetrated all he could, into the secrets of sciences, to loose the mystery of faith.

It is the beginning of infidelity, to deifie a man by the tongue, and to think the Kingdom of God consisteth in words. Who hath not faith and virtue, satisfying himself with learning and sciences, resembleth those Indian trees, which bear muskie Pears, whose smell is very oderiferous, and tast pleasing; but yield a pestilent juice, wherewith they use to envenom arrows.

Julian

How he became depraved.

Julian ſtill manuring his ſtudies, and neglecting piety, became very vain, greedy of ſlighteſt applauſes, a great talker, a profuſe ſcoffer, extreamly curious to know things future, doubtfull in faith, temerarious in ſearch of things divine, wedded to his own opinion, obſtinate in his errours, and laſtly an enemy of Chriſtianity.

Judgement of S. Gregorie Nazianzen.

S. Gregorie ſaith, he then obſerved in him an inconſtant wit, a fickle head, a wandering eye, unſteddy ſhoulders, roaming feet, vehement laughter, garbs and countenances immodeſt, queſtions ridiculous, anſwers much worſe, and many other things which promiſed nothing good in him. Maximus, a Pagan Philoſopher and a Magician, concluded his corruption, pouring into the bottom of his ſoul the blackeſt impiety that might be.

He was twenty years a Chriſtian, and ten projecting the change of his Religion, ſtill much tottering; yet never daring to let it break forth, for fear of the Emperour Conſtantius his couſin, who was very ſuſpitious, and one who never would have ſuffered this alteration of Religion in him. He kept him much under, without train, officers, money; ſaw him very ſeldom, and uſed him with ſeverity: ſo that Julian feared the Court like fire, and never durſt lift up his eyes before Conſtantius, whom he called the hangman of his family.

Fear, which is an ill Miſtreſs of duty, held him in under the maſk of Religion whileſt the Emperour lived, who nothing at all miſ-doubting his wicked purpoſes, aſſociated him to the Empire very ſolemnly. For, having in a great aſſembly of his States pronounced a brave Oration upon the choice he made of him, he with his own hands gave him the Purple Robe, calling him Brother, and conjuring him to ſet his ſhoulders equal with his, to ſupport the burden of Empire; and to knit this amity with a ſtronger knot, he gave him his ſiſter Helena in marriage, who was not long liv'd. All ceremonies of dignity and wedlock done, he ſent him to govern the Gauls, where he performed many brave feats of arms againſt the Almaignes.

He is a Chriſtian for policy, and was an Infidel in his ſoul.

Then was the time when in ſo great liberty he was uttterly depraved, yet ſtill ſo reſerved, that although already a Pagan in ſoul, he durſt not paſs great feſtivals without going to Church, and performing all the ceremonies of Chriſtian Religion, as he did on the day of Epiphanie whileſt he was in France, according to the obſervation of Ammianus Marcellinus. He vaunted in an Epiſtle he wrote to the Athenians, that he had three times paſſed the Rhene, pacified the Gauls, ſubjugated all the rebellious towns, delivered twenty thouſand priſoners out of the hands of Barbarians, and ſent much matter of triumph to Conſtantius. But whether it were that vanity, by which he extolled his ſlighteſt proweſſes, made him odious, or whether ſuch as envied his glory, did him ill ſervice with the Emperour, all he did, had not that great ſplendour which he paſſionately deſired in all his actions.

Marcel. l. 21. Proweſs of Julian among the Gauls.

Conſtantius, who ever dreaded this his nature, much like a ſtanding water, cauſed him to be narrowly looked into at firſt by truſty men; but he by little and little ſhook off this yoke, and made himſelf to be beloved, as much as he might, among the Gauls, as well the natives of the countrey, (who were pleaſed with the freeneſs of his humour) as the ſouldiers, whom he ſecretly won with fair promiſes and large hopes.

Subtility of Julian to invade the Empire.

In the end, whileſt the Emperour, who was an heretick, began the perſecution of the Eaſtern Church, this man prepared a faction againſt him in the Weſt. For imagining he was already ſtrong enough, he cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed Emperour by ſecret practiſes, feigning otherwiſe to refuſe all he deſired. He began to play this goodly game with impatient ardour, being then at Paris, for there it was where the legions of ſouldiers, encompaſſing him at the ſhutting in of evening, called him Auguſtus with loud cries: whereupon he at firſt made a ſhew he would flie, and hide himſelf: but at break of day he appeared, gently reprehending the ſouldiers for what they had done, and apparently ſeeming to refuſe the title of Emperour. They, who were hired to undertake this attempt, cried out ſo much the louder, as he the more denied the honour offered him. He in the mean time, to omit nothing in this diſſimulation, held forth his hand like a ſuppliant, and intreated this might not be, wherewith they ſeemed offended, unleſs he ſpeedily embraced what they preſented. He was requeſted, that to content the Legions, he would inſtantly grace himſelf with a diadem. He anſwered, It was an ornament he never thought upon, nor regarded it at all. Some thereupon cried out aloud; he might do well to put his wifes dreſſings upon his head. But he replied, It were no good preſage to adorn a Cæſar's head with womens attires. Whereupon ſome ſaid, he muſt then make uſe of rich horſ-trappings to counterfeit a diadem. But Julian oppoſing it, ſaid: He neither would be a woman, nor a horſe.

The Count Maurus, who had the word, pulled off his chain, and put it over his head, the ſouldiers redoubling their acclamations with much alacrity. When altogether unable ſufficiently to diſſemble this jugling, he not onely accepted this diadem, but promiſed to each ſouldier five crowns of gold, and a pound of ſilver, and then preſently diſpatched an Embaſſadour to the Emperour with expreſs letters to this purport:

Embaſſage of Julian.

That the ſouldiers had ſaluted him Emperour, which in the beginning he much diſliked, endeavouring to repreſs them as well by authoritie, as fair ſpeeches, but they perſiſted ſo obſtinate in their enterprize, that he ſhould have incurred the peril of his life, had he not given them ſatisfaction. Behold the cauſe, wherefore he was enforced to take the diadem, with all poſſible repugnance. But that he more eſteemed the judgement and approbation of Conſtantius, than all the Empires in the world, and beſought him not to hearken to envious ſpirits, who laboured to embroil them, to advance their own ends; but that regarding his birth and loyaltie, he would confirm him in the honour conferred, proteſting to be nothing the leſs pliant to his commands, and that the period of his obedience, ſhould be the end of his life.

Conſtantius fell into ſuch a fury upon this news, that he deigned not ſo much as to ſee his Embaſſadour, but ſent him preſently a letter of diſclaim, which he deſired might be read to the Army, commanding forthwith to lay down the title of Auguſtus, unleſs he would leave his life. Julian, who already had paſſed the Rubicon, hazardeth the buſineſs, and advanced towards Italie with his troups: wherewith the Emperour infinitely irritated, made an Oration in the midſt of his Army, ſhewing to the ſouldiers the treaſon and wickedneſs of Julian, in terms very preſſing, and ſaying, He went to require a ſpeedy ſatisfaction, well knowing, God condemneth the ungrateful with an everlaſting judgement. Hereupon every one cried out, he muſt needs march on to fight with the traitour and rebel: and verily the Emperour haſtened thither by great journeys, at which time he felt himſelf ſeized by a feaver ſo ardent, that he burnt like an oven, and was beſides ſo troubled all night with dreams and horrible viſions, which told him his good Angel had forſaken him, and that it was time to leave life and Empire: which he did, being chaſtiſed by God for his cruelty towards Catholicks, and by his death, left Julian in full poſſeſſion of all. He inſtantly pulled off the maſk, and cauſed the Temples of the gods to be opened, perſecuting Chriſtians, not ſo much by the bruitiſhneſs of Diocletian, as with ſubtile wiles of a wiſe Politician.

Numen parcendi ſuffragio damnati ingrati.

Death of Conſtantius.

But behold the invincible force of our Religion, and how unhappineſs is neceſſarily tied to all their deſigns, Puniſhments of Julian remarkable.

deſigns, who forſake the true God. He was reſolved to ſhut up the name of Chriſtian within a narrow nook of the earth, calling us by the name of Galileans. But God limiting the enterprizes of this impious man, and not confining his own name, hath covered with the beams of his own glory and knowledge, all the parts of the habitable world, and contrariwiſe the name of this deplorable Prince is ignominious: For although Emperours the moſt bloudy againſt our religion, are named without addition, never almoſt is Julian pronounced, but that for a note of eternal infamy, the Apoſtate is added. He ſet out an Edict, by which he deprived Chriſtians of the knowledge of letters. Yet God hath permitted millions of Writers to ſpring up in Chriſtianity, whileſt other ſuperſtitions, as Judaiſm, Gentiliſm, and Mahometiſm, being now fallen into extream ignorance, there is none but Chriſtianiſm, the mother of ſciences, and miſtreſs of mankind.

He reſolved to re-edifie the temple of Jeruſalem, and having given the commiſſion thereof to Alipius, balls of fire were ſeen to iſſue from the foundations, as faſt as they laid them, which made the deſign as frivolous, as the place was inacceſſible. He extreamly affected honour, yet change of religion made him ſo contemptible, that the moſt abject people mocked at him, ſaying, he muſt ſhave his beard to make halters, and that he ſpent ſo much in ſacrifices, that he would unfurniſh the world of ſheep and oxen. He ſought to give himſelf authority, yet were his laws ſpiders webs, continually broken by his ſubjects. In the end, to imitate Alexander, he would undertake a war againſt the Perſians; but after infinite many toils, he was there ſtrucken by a blow from Heaven, which quickly concluded his life, and ſhut up his mouth by the blaſphemy we have heard, when, filling his hand with bloud, which diſtilled from his body, he threw it againſt heaven, and ſaid: Thou, O Galilean, haſt vanquiſhed.

This miſerable Prince, who thought by the help of his falſe Gods, to command the waves of the ſea, and to walk upon Stars, being pulled from the Empire at the age of thirty and one year, and the firſt of his reign, was carried on a beer, as a ſad ſpectacle for all thoſe who adored his fortune. His death was waited on by the bone-fires of Perſians, and joy of Chriſtians, whoſe chains this day were diſſolved, his memory was buried in execrations and horrours, nor were there any, yea, of pens the moſt facred, who had not gall for him: ſo true it proves, that a man who hath defiled his ſanctification, and ſets Jeſus aſide, findeth hell every where, as in all things he ſought to oppoſe the Divinity.

VIII. MAXIM.

Of the Perfections of JESUS, which make him amiable.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That we ſhould love things viſible, not troubling our ſelves with inviſible.

ALl the greateſt evils in the world do ordinarily proceed from the ill manage of love, which exceeding the limits preſcribed by God, cauſeth every where a deluge, to occaſion afterward diſaſters. Senſual men perſwade themſelves, one cannot love but by the eyes: And verily they are thoſe, who according to the ſaying of Clemens Alexandrinus, begin the ſkirmiſh in all the battels of worldly love. And if we follow the opinion of the Prophet Iſaiah, we ſhall term them The feet of the heart, ſince by them it goeth to objects of bodies; to which it inclines.

Διὰ τοῦτο λαμβάνουσι τὰς ἀφορμὰς ἐκ τῶν αἰσθητῶν. Clem. Alex. Natibus oculorum ibant. Iſaiah 3.16. Baſeneſs of worldly loves.

But, O good God, how wretched are theſe loves of things viſible! ſince they idolatrize a little skin, and reſemble the people called Aſtomes, who are clothed with leaves, and live on ſmoke. The carnal man, who daily crucifieth himſelf upon ſo many croſſes, as he entertaineth thoughts for the creature he loveth, is taken by the eye, with a little exteriour skin, called by the Phyſitians Epidermis. Pull that away from this body, which gives him ſo many martyrdoms, he would think that a monſter, he now adoreth for a Goddeſs. Is not this a ſtrange weakneſs of judgement, and muſt we not confeſs the eyes ſo enflamed in their purſuits, are very ſcanty in their fruition, reſerving to themſelves no other object, than thin colours, which put upon them ſo many illuſions, to occaſion ſo many flames?

Aſtomorum Gens veſtita frondium lanugine, halitu tantum vivens.

Love of inviſible things moſt penetrating.

I hold, every judicious man will be enforced, through the ſole conſideration of nature, to affirm the moſt noble loves, yea, the greateſt are employed on things inviſible. For behold, a woman, who with a moſt lively and fervent affection loved her husband, be he taken away, and carried to a tomb in the flower

THE HOLY COURT.

That all love is due to Jeſus Chriſt, by reaſon of his incomparable excellencies.

of his age, and greateſt ſplendour of his fortune, ſhe preſently becomes paſſionate at it, more through neceſſity, than election: It is not (to ſpeak truly) the body ſhe loveth; for ſhould that be left to her diſcretion, it would in a ſhort time become inſupportable. What is it then ſhe eſteemed moſt in this perſon? The ſpirit, which imprinted the character of its beauty, and vigour upon this mortal fleſh: yet that notwithſtanding ſhe ſeeth not at all, nor ever did, which maketh us believe, her love was of a thing inviſible.

We love excellent men, though ſeparated from us by ſo many lands and ſeas, yea, by death it ſelf, becauſe we have ſeen ſome ray of their wits upon paper: We love virtues, which have neither bodies, nor colours; yea, the Amoriſts of the world, confeſs they often feel vehement paſſions, not for the nobility, riches, or beauty of ſuch women as they court; well imagining, there are other of them much more accompliſhed in all kind of perfections, who notwithſtanding make no impreſſion upon their minds. What is it then they love? That, which they cannot ſee, ſpeak unto, nor think on; ſo true is it, that the moſt penetrating arrow of love, proceedeth from things inviſible.

But if that be acknowledged in natural objects, how much more by juſt titles, ſhould it be in things divine, which have attractives ſo much the more noble and entire, as they have qualities more ſolid and eminent. I will here ſhew, God hath ſet a Jeſus compoſed both of viſible and inviſible, upon the frontiſ-piece of the Temple of Eternity, as a lively Image of his greatneſs, to draw to himſelf the love of Angels and men.

Excellencies in the Person of our SAVIOUR.

Works of Great men. 2 Reg. 18. 18. Vocavitque titulum nomine suo, & appellatur manus Absolom.

1. GReat-ones naturally delight to do works, wherein they heap together the most visible marks of their power. So Absolom, made a proud monument to preserve his memory, which he called The hand of Absolom. So Solomon made a magnificent throne all of ivory, covered with plates of gold, environed with statues of Lions, very gracefully set out, and the Scripture assureth us, there never was such a piece of work through all the Kingdoms of the world.

3 Reg. 10. 18. Non est factum tale opus in universis regnis. Baron. Annal. Just. 31. Cedr. l. 4. c. 30

So Justinian the Emperour made the Altar of Saint Sophie of gold, silver, and precious stones, out of all the rarities in the world, which he caused to be melted, and incorporated into one mass; a wonder never till then known, nor used. So we have many times heard talk of the seven wonders of the world, which are at this time, but seven silly Fables upon a piece of paper.

Singular work of God. A God Incarnate.

I now demand of you, if mortals, who can do nothing immortal, do notwithstanding endeavour to leave contracted works to posterity, for witness of their greatness; what should the Father of glory and sovereign Monarch of the whole world do? Were it not a thing very reasonable, and befitting his Majesty, that having distended the rich pavillion of the Heavens over our heads, which is notwithstanding no other than the works of his own hands, (as the Scripture speaketh) he made a monument, wherein he might employ the strength of his arm, and assemble together all the most delicious attractives of his beauty, and the most conspicuous characters of his power? And this verily is it he did in the mystery of the Incarnation, affording to the earth, a Man-God, of whom we cannot discourse, but must say what S. Hilarie did: My understanding feareth to touch the discourse of this great Word, and I have not a word which trembleth not to be uttered before such a divine light. Let us imitate those sacred creatures of the Prophet Ezechiel, which clasp their wings, when they hear the voice of God in the firmament: Let us hearken, and say with reverence, what Saints did of the excellencies of the Person of Jesus Christ.

Hilar. 2. de Trinit. Filium mens veretur attingere, & trepidat omnis sermo se prodere.

Excellent qualities of Jesus Christ. Isaiah 9. Candor lucis æternæ.

2. If we seek his name in the Prophet Isaiah, he teacheth us, he is called ADMIRABLE. If we look for his beauty in the writings of the Wiseman, he instructeth us, it is THE BRIGHTNESS OF ETERNAL LIGHT. If we consider the band of two natures in the Person of the Redeemer, and so much riches and treasure arranged in good order, we shall find the Prophet Zacharie compareth them to a Pomegranate. If we reflect on his Divinity, it is THE ANGEL OF THE FIRST FACE, according to the Evangelical Prophet. If we weigh his continuance, HE IS THE ELDER OF THE DAYS, AND FATHER OF AGES. If science, HE IS THE INTERPRETER, AND ORACLE OF DIVINE MYSTERIES. If the harmony of his wisdom, HE IS THE HARP OF THE LIVING GOD, in the thirty sixth Psalm. If his office, HE IS THE ETERNAL BISHOP OF SOULS, in S. Peter. If his effects, HE IS THE RESTORER OF AGES. All lips are opened with singular prerogatives in honour of the Saviour, and are all dried up in the abundance of his praises.

Zach. 12. Adrademmon, malogranatum. Κατὰ. 70. Isaiah 64. Revelator secretorum. Genes. 41. Ægyptiis. 1 Pet. 2.

It seems Constantinus Manasses said well in his Ecclesiastical Annals, when he named the Word Incarnate, the universalitie of perfection: For it is there where God hath engraven as on gold, the last draughts of his love, power, wisdom, consummation of his designs and counsels over men. And it is that, which, according to my opinion, moved the grave Authour William of Paris, to say, it was the Face of the last beautie. Now know, that to understand this title, it is necessary to consider an axiom of Saint Thomas, which saith, The great diversitie of creatures in all the orders of the world, hath no other aim but to represent the Divinitie by some image whatsoever. And in so much as the Sovereign Essence is infinite, it was expedient to produce many things, that the one might supply the others defects, and all conspire to express some character of Divine perfections. So that God beholdeth himself figured in such varietie of beauties, as appear from earth to Heaven.

Jesus a concurrence of all perfections. παγκάλως. Facies ultimæ pulchritudinis. Guil. Paris. 1. p. de univer. p. 1. c. 26.

Divina assimilatio est causa diversitatis in rebus. S. Thom. opusc. 2. c. 102.

But all these beauties being unable to pourtraict him to the life, he painted himself in the mysterie of the Incarnation, which is his true table, his design, his work, wherein he included his Essence, and all his Excellencies, and in which he bounded, and limited himself, it being impossible to make any thing more worthy, or greater, than a God humanized, and a man deified.

He is the visible Image of a God invisible, the first-born of all creatures, because in him, and by him, all things were made, and it pleased the heavenly father, that in his Person alone a plenitude of all perfections should inhabit.

Colos. 1. 15. Imago Dei invisibilis primogenitus omnis creaturæ, quoniam in ipso condita sunt universa, in ipso complacuit omnem plenitudinem inhabitare. Per eum & in eo scire vult Deum, & cœli.

The Valentinians said, God the Father of the universe, is in his Paradise as in the midst of a garden enamelled with flowers, and that these flowers were the Intelligencies, whom he enlightened with his lights, sanctified with his virtues, animated with his aspects, and quickened with his own life. That he beheld himself in all, and saw therein some draughts of his beauty very well expressed: yet notwithstanding they being most insufficient in comparison of the first Essence, it pleased the Eternal Father to make a Man-God, to be the King of all these Intelligencies, which they termed, Aeons; and for this purpose they added, That having taken the most exquisite beauties from all the flowers of this divine garden, he fitted and enchased them in the great work of the Word Incarnate. It were too prophane Theologie to take it outwardly by the letter, and it is no wonder if Tertullian mocked at it, objecting to them they made Æsop's Jay, or Hesiodus his Pandora, of the Redeemer. But if we speak according to true Divinity, we say, this God-man containeth in eminency all the virtues and beauties of Angels, to the end he may, in, and through all, hold the primacie. But to give at this time some limits to a discourse, which of its nature runneth as it were into an infinity, we say, that as the first Adam falling, was infected with sin, darkened with ignorance, ruined in power; so the second Adam bearing himself as the restorer of humane nature, took three eminent qualities upon him, wherein all his excellencies conclude, which are sanctity, wisdom, and power.

Tertul. Apolog. c. 2. Invention of Valentinian.

Ut sit in omnibus primatum tenens. Colos. 1. 19.

Three excellencies of Jesus, wherein all other are concluded.

His sanctity.

And to begin with sanctity, we find the word, Holy, was heretofore properly given to three sorts of people. First, to those who were purified by the bloud of the Hoast, wherewith they were sprinkled, for so were the expiations of the old Law performed, to figure the effusion of the bloud of Jesus Christ: Saints were anciently those who were chafed and sprinkled with bloud of the victim, immolated in the Sacrifice, say school Divines. 2. This name was appropriated to those who alienated themselves from secular life, and affairs, to serve God. 3. Such as in this separated life, lived much purified from the dregs and contagion of sensuality. This being so, who seeth not, the excellent title of sanctity wholly appertaineth to Jesus Christ, because he purgeth all the Mass of mankind, not onely by the sacred effusion of his bloud; but likewise being sequestered, and separated from his mothers womb, to the honour of his Heavenly Father, he led a life in the most eminent height might ever be imagined. His sanctity hath three incomparable Prerogatives. First, it is a sanctity not of participation, but of essence, to wit, of necessity, and indeindependencie, sanctity being as intimate to God, as his Divinity: That is it S. Dyonisius Alexandrinus would say in the disputation against Paulus Samosetanus, that the sanctity of S. John Baptist, and all other Saints, was the work of God; but this in Jesus, was the nature of God himself. Secondly, that it is the original and exemplar cause of all sanctities in the world, which borrow all lustre of lights from the first sanctity. Thirdly, that it hath been through all times in freedom from sin, as well because the created sanctity of Jesus Christ, was governed by the increated sanctity, as for that it was moistened with sources of capital Graces, and inseparably tied to the beatified vision. O Eternal Word! how worthy art thou to be called by thy Prophet Daniel, The Holy of Holies, worthy the Seraphins should sing for thee eternally the Trisagion, Holy, Holy, Holy, worthy to bear the seal of Sanctity, and to imprint thy characters upon all the Saints. I will establish thee (saith the Scripture) as the true seal of the world, because I have chosen thee.

Exod. 24. 8. Ille verò sumptum sanguinem respersit in populum, Hic est sanguis fœderis quod pepigit Dominus nobiscum. Sancti quasi sanguinantes.

ἁγαγὼ μὲν ἅγιον ἅγιων ἀνωνόμασε, ἅγιον ἅγιος ἐφώνει.

Ungetur Sanctus Sanctorum. Dan. 6.24.

Posuit te quasi funiculum, quia te elegit. Agg. 2. 2.

4. The great and eminent wisdom is united to sanctity: for as very well saith S. Bonaventure t As all plenitude of Grace was in Jesus Christ, so there was a plenitude of wisdom by a necessary association. It was a wisdom increated on the part of the Divinity, a wisdom beatifying, capital, infused, experimental in the holy Humanity, acquired unto it from treasures of infinite sciences; in such sort, that it had knowledge of all things created, past, present, future, possible, impossible, discovering the most small Atomes from the highest Heaven, to the lowest depths.

His wisdom. Sicut in Christo fuit omnis plenitudo gratiæ, ita & omnis plenitudo sapientiæ. S. Bonavent. Theol. verit. c. 15. l. 4.

The Word of the celestial Father, God of God, light of light, wisdom of wisdom, knoweth all the Father knows: but knowledge cometh to him from the Father, as well as Essence. It is the river Tygris whereof the Scripture (a) speaketh, which overfloweth in the beginning of seasons; the river which spreadeth it self into divers channels to moisten all the wise, which are the plants of his garden. His thoughts are of larger extent than the sea, and his counsels far deeper than abysses.

Verbum Dei Patris, Deus de Deo, lumen de lumine, sapientia de sapientiâ novit omnia, quæ novit Pater, sed ei nosse de Patre est, sicut esse. Aug. l. 15. de civit. c. 14.

(a) Eccl. 24. Tygris in diebus novorum, fluvius Dionysius. A mari abundavit cogitatio ejus, &c.

The two Testaments, as well Old as New, behold Jesus Christ, as the Cherubins did the Propitiatory: but there is as much difference between the Old and New, as between the grain of corn, and the ear, according to the saying of Job the Monk, in Photius. The doctrine of Jesus Christ surpasseth all other doctrines, because it hath its force and root in the Cross, as S. Hierom speaketh (b): Jesus fortified all his doctrine, by the merit of his Passion.

(b) Omnem doctrinam suam patibulo roborabat. Hier. ad Aglasiam.

Adde, that as wisdom is observed in the order and oeconomie of great affairs, when they are well proportioned to their ends, so there cannot be a matter either more important, than that of the eternal salvation of men, or which hath been mannaged with more choice, order, and success, or which hath succeeded by means more distant from the tracks of humane wisdom. The science of Jesus Christ hath enlightened the most ignorant with the knowledge of secrets unknown to Philosophers, and his word hath been as the eternal seed of so many sundry books, as were hitherto published, and which will encrease to the consummation of the world. And although the most able Philosophers, had they been persecuted by Tyrants, would not willingly have lost a tooth for defence of their Maxims, yet the wisdom of our Saviour is such, that having possessed the heart and hands of those who profess it, causeth them to pour out all the bloud of their veins, and to use so much courage for preservation thereof, as it afforded them lights in its establishment.

His power. Data est mihi omnis potestas in cælo, & in terrâ. Matth. 28. 18.

5. From thence consider, it is his absolute power over all things, and note, if you please, that it is manifested principally in three Articles. First, the facility of prodigies and miracles, which appeared in Jesus Christ. For this large house of nature, which we call the world, had no other motion but from his will, and he therein commanded so universally, that he seemed to hold the Heavens and elements under hire, to be instruments of his wonders. He lighted new stars at his birth; he eclipsed the ancient Sun at his death, he walked on waters, as on marble pavements, he caused the earth to cast up the dead four days after. We find many of Pharaoh's Magicians have done false miracles; but it was, saith Saint Augustine, by speedily applying active natural things to passive. We find Saints have done true miracles, but in the quality of Ministers. It onely appertaineth to Jesus Christ to do them with an original power, which hath its source in his bosom; with an absolute command, which receiveth not any modification in all nature; with a simple will, which needeth no other instruments. It onely belongeth to him to do them for the full mannage of the worlds government, and to transmit them into the person of Saints, to the consummation of Ages.

In the second place, I say this power marvellously shineth in the great Empire of the Church, which his Heavenly Father hath put into his hands to build it, raise it, cement it with his bloud, illuminate it with his lights, nourish it with his substance, to make laws in it, establish Sacraments, eternize sacrifices, create Pastours, and Priests, and invisibly to rule in it by a visible head, a power not to be shaken even unto the gates of hell; to exercise a jurisdiction over souls, to bind them, to unloose them, pardon sins, change hearts, ordain their predestination according to his will. Finally, this great power appears, in that he first of all opened Paradise, his soul being exalted from the first day of his creation, to the vision of Gods Essence, and afterward passing through all the Heavens, to place himself at the right hand of his Father, and put his Elect into the possession of the Kingdom he had purchased by his bloud. Have not we cause to crie out thereupon, and say: O happy be, whom you have chosen, to raise him to the Hypostatical union! He shall dwell in the Palace of the Divinity, and we shall be filled with the blessings of thy house. Thy Temple, which is his sacred Humanitie, is infinitely holy.

Beatus quem elegisti & assumpsisti, habitabit in atriis tuis, replebitur in bonis domus tuæ: sanctum est templum tuum, mirabile in æquitate. Psal. 64. Temple of Justinian.

It is said, Justinian having finished the magnificent Church of S. Sophie, which he built with so much industry and charge, such numbers, and such a general contribution of endeavour, of riches, and power of the whole Empire, placed therein a statue of Solomon, who seemed to be astonished, and to hide himself through shame and confusion, to see his Temple surpassed by that of the Emperour. It was a vanity of a worldly Prince: But we in verity, would we represent what passeth here, should paint both Moses, and all the Prophets absorpt in a profound reverence, in the consideration of the Temple of the Church, and the wonders of Jesus Christ.

6. Let us for conclusion of this discourse, adore that which we cannot sufficiently comprehend, and endeavour to bear an incomparable love to the Person of our Saviour, for the excellencies we have expressed. But if you require the practise of this, I say it is reduced to three heads, which are to adhere, to serve, and suffer. The first note of faithfull affection appears in a strong adherence to the thing beloved, so as the Scripture speaking of love, says, it causeth one soul to clasp unto another. If you begin heartily to love Jesus Christ, you will find you shall think upon him almost insensibly every moment, and, as saith S. Gregorie, every time you fetch your breath, there will come a pleasing idea of God to fill your soul with splendours and affection. You will feel a distast and unsavourines of heart against all earthly things; so that it will seem to you, that the most pleasing objects of the world, are mingled with gall and wormwood. You will seek for your Jesus in all creatures, Practise of the love of Jesus reduced to 3. heads. 1. To adhere. Conglutinata est anima ejus cum ea. Gen. 34. 3.

Numquid quem diligit anima mea vidistis. Cantic.

you will languish after him; all which beareth his name and memory will be delightsome to you; you will speak of him in all companies, you will have an earnest desire to see him honoured, esteemed, acknowledged by all the world. And if you perceive any contempt of his Person, which is so estimable, you will think the apple of your eye is touched. Your solitude will be in Jesus, your discourse of Jesus, Jesus will be in your watchings, and in your sleep, in your affairs, in your recreations, and you will account it a kind of infidelity to loose sight of him but an hour. Love is a great secret, very well understood by Abbot Moses, in Cassianus, Let our soul (saith he) sigh and think it self sequestred from the sovereign goodness, so soon as it looseth never so little sight of the divine presence, accounting it a spiritual fornication to be separated one sole moment from beholding Jesus.

Suspiret, ac toties se a summo bono anima nostra sentiat recessisse, quoties se ab illo intuitu deprehenderit separatim, fornicationem judicans, vel momentaneum a Christi contemplatione discessum.

Siquis diligit me, sermonem meum servabit. Ioan. 14.

For the second degree, as it is not enough in worldly amities to have affections, languors, and curious lip-complements, but you must necessarily come to some good effects, and considerable offices, which are the marks and cement of true affection; so you must not think the love of Jesus consisteth in slight affectations of idle devotion. He must serve who will love; his will must be wedded, his command entertained and executed, his liveries put on, and we wholly transformed into him by imitation of his examples. S. Augustine to confound the weakness of our love towards God, pertinently maketh use of the practise of prophane loves. Behold (saith he) these foolish and dishonest Amourists of the world. I demand, whether any one surprized with the love of a woman, attyreth himself any otherwise, than to the liking of his Mistress. If she say, I would not have you wear such a cloke, he puls it off: I command you in the midst of winter to take a sommer garment, he had rather shiver with cold, than displease a miserable creature. But yet what will she do if he obey not? Will she condemn him to death? Will she send him executioners? Will she thrust him into a dungeon? Nothing less, she will onely say, if you do not this, I will never see you more. This word alone is able to make a man tear himself in pieces in the endeavour of complacence, and service. O foul confusion of our life, and prostitution of spirit! A God, who makes a Paradise of his aspects, and a hell in his separation from us, promiseth never to behold us with a good eye, unless we keep his commandements: nor can his menaces but be most effectual, since he hath sovereign authority in his hands. He deserves to be served above all things: service done to him is not onely most pleasing, but after this life gaineth recompence. In the mean time we rather choose to live the slaves of creatures, and dwell under the tyranny of our passions, than to embrace the yoke of God. Were it not fit we hereafter order the small service we do to God, as well in our prayers, as actions, in such sort, that there be neither work, word, nor thought from morning till night, which hath not all its accommodations, and is not squared within the rule God desireth of us, with intentions most purified, and indefatigable servours?

Augustin. serm. 19. de verbis Apost. Inhonestos amatores ostendite. Siquis amore feminæ lascivientis, vestit se aliter quàm amatæ placet. & illi dixerit nolo te habere tale birrhum; non habebit: si per hyemem illi dicet, in lacinia te amo, eligit tremere quàm displicere. Numquid illa tamen damnatura est? Numquid adhibitura tortores? Numquid in carcerem mittet? Hoc solum ibi timetur, non te videbo, faciem meam non videbis.

Finally, the last character of love is to suffer for Jesus, the father of sufferings, and King of the afflicted. The Kingly Prophet said: I shall be satisfied when thy glory shall appear to me. Another translation importeth, I shall be well pleased, when I shall behold my self marked with the characters of thy sufferings. Jesus Christ in the great sacrifice of patience made in the beginning of Ages, supplyes the person of a great Bishop, putting on flesh wholly imprinted with dolours, a heart drenched in acerbities, a tongue steeped in gall: Round about him are all the most elevated and courageous souls, who all wear his livery, and both constantly and gloriously dispose themselves to this great model of dolours. Would we at the sight of so many brave Champions lead a life lazy, languishing, and corrupt? Know we not all creatures of the world groan, and bring forth, that all elements are in travel, and in a ceaseless agitation? The air it self, (say Philosophers) is perpetually strucken with the motion of heaven, as with a hammer or whip, that this benummed mass may not hatch any poyson. Rivers are cleansed, and purified by the streaming current of their waters. The earth is never in repose, and the nature of great things, is generously to suffer evils. The clock goeth on by the help of its counterpoise, and Christian life never proceedeth in virtue, but by counter-ballance of its crosses. Our souls are engaged by Oath to this warfare, so soon as first we enter into Christianity, said the noble Tertullian. Suffering is our trade, our vow, our profession. Love, which cannot suffer, is not love, and if it cease to love when it should bear, it never was what it professed.

3. To suffer. Satiabor cum apparuit gloria tua. Psal. 16. Satiabor cum affluxerò ad similitudinem tuam.

Animus nostra authorati, in hac pugna accessimus. Tertul. ad Scap.

A lover said in Olympius, that when he was onely some little moment absented from the creature he most loved in the world, all the best seasons were irksome, all discourses troublesome, and the greatest delights turned into bitterness. Flower-deluces seemed cole-black in the meadow, when he beheld them in his pensive solitude, roses the most vermillion, grew pale, gilli-flowers lost their lustre, the very bay-trees which resist winters cold, could not withstand the sadness caused by this absence; but in a moment they all appeared quite withered to him. Viands with him had no relish, wine tast, nor sleep repose. But so soon as this creature returned, all was animated by her presence. Flower-deluces became white again, roses resumed their vermillion, gilli-flowers their beauty, lawrels their verdure, wine and viands their tastfulness, and sleep its contentment. But if there happened any harsh and painful accidents, which he must bear for her sake, they seemed a Paradise.

Olympius. Te sine, væ misero mihi, lilia nigra videntur Pallentesque rosæ, &c.

All worldly loves speak the same; yet are we unwilling to say, or do any thing for this excellent Word of God, which is endowed with a beauty incomparable, exalted above all the beauties of the sons of men. This Jesus, who maketh a Paradise spring from his eyes; This Jesus, who distilleth honey from lips of roses, for the comfort of his elect; This Jesus, who causeth Nations to tremble under the force of his word, as under flaming arrows, and is attired with the conquest and tropheys of souls.

Behold him on the bright empyreal Heaven, crowned with a diadem of honour, and revested with celestial purple, who regardeth us, who beholdeth us, and never ceaseth to draw us unto him. So many brave spirits have followed him, amongst torrents, thorns, and flames, which they found replenished with a sweetness, that charmed their pain in the sight of their best beloved.

It is this sweetness turned the stones of S. Stephen into flower-de-luces, and changed the burning coles of S. Lawrence into roses. For it, S. Bartholomew despoiled himself of his skin as freely as of a garment, and S. Catharine hastened to the wheel armed with keen rasors, S. Tecla to Lyons, S. Agnes to the wood-pile, S. Cicely to the sharp sword, and S. Appollonia suffered her teeth to be torn out with as much ease, as the tree suffers his leaves to fall away from him. O the sweetness of Jesus, who makes all the valiant, and knoweth how to turn doves into eagles of fire! Shall we never understand, what it is to love him, towards whom all generous hearts sigh, and for whom all charities are crowned with immortal garlands?

The

The eighth EXAMPLE upon the eighth MAXIM.

Drawn from the Eccleſiaſtical hiſtory.

Of the admirable change of worldly love into the love of Jeſus Chriſt.

S^t. BONIFACE.

IT is a thing very rare, to ſee worldly love ſuddenly tranſported from the viſible to the inviſible, from the temporal to eternal, from errour to truth, and from wretched paſſion to perfect charity. Notwithſtanding Hiſtories furniſh us with ſome examples, and we often obſerve, thoſe who were very ſenſible in worldly affections, when they found a good object, were more fervent and couragious in the love of God. Such were the heart of Saint Auguſtine, ſuch likewiſe of generous Magdalene. For both of them knew ſo well to make uſe of their loſſes, that they ſeemed to have ſerved their apprentiſhip unto creatures, to learn how the Creatour ought to be beloved.

Worldly lovers being converted, are the moſt fervent in the love of God.

A goodly compariſon.

Architects, when they build vaults and arches, make certain counterfeits of wood, which they call Centries, to ſerve as preparatives for their deſigns: but ſo ſoon as they thereon have raiſed true and ſolid works, they deſtroy fiction to admit veritie. Much ſo it happeneth to ſouls as yet ſenſual; they are taken with ſleight affections, which many times are not diſhoneſt, but ever light, and far diſtant from perfection. Yet therein is to be learned what we ſhould do for a God immortal, ſince we undertake ſo much for a mortal man. But Jeſus inſenſibly building his architecture in theſe loving hearts, ruineth all theſe feignings of amity, there to eſtabliſh his love.

Aglae a noble dame.

This which I ſay, is evidently to be ſeen in the perſon of Aglae, and S. Boniface, whoſe acts I will here produce to give inſtruction how to ſanctifie worldly love by the love of Jeſus Chriſt. This Aglae was a Roman Dame, of prime quality, having a delicate wit in a beautifull body, and powerfull paſſions in a great fortune. She had been married, but becoming a widow in an age as yet furniſhed with verdant freſhneſs, grace, and beauty, ſhe had not buried all her affections in the tomb of her husband.

She is a worldly widow.

After ſhe had a little wiped away the firſt tears, which nature exacteth as tribute in ſuch like accidents, ſhe quickly plaid ſo much the Courtier in her ſlight ſorrow, that ſhe ſeemed greatly to deſire, as ſoon as might be, to finiſh what ſhe had never well begun. She failed not to be ſought unto by many gentlemen, who ſaw her to be accompliſhed with all parts deſired in an eminent marriage; and although ſhe denied not to like their ſervices, yet making no reſolution to marry, ſhe was all for her ſelf, and for none elſe; ſo much ſhe feared to take a maſter, inſtead of a husband.

Superfluities of widows.

It is nothing commendable in a Chriſtian widow, to make a ſhew no longer to have a heart for the world, ſo to draw all the world into her heart, to change a moaning life into perpetual chatter, & turn her widow-hood into a petty Empire. Aglae was not yet entered into vice, but pleaſed her ſelf ſo much to afford the love of her perſon, and receive none, that ere aware ſhe was ſurprized, and having diſdained maſters, ſaw her ſelf become the ſlave of a ſervant.

Boniface Aglaes Steward.

His ſweet behaviour.

She had a Steward in her houſe named Boniface, a witty man, and of a good preſence, who manna-ging the affairs of his Miſtreſs diſcreetly, forgat not his own. He ſo well knew how to pleaſe her, to conform to her humours, to feed her with glorie, wherof ſhe was very ambitious, to free her from cares, and fill her heart with joy, that he already poſſeſſed no ordinary place in her favours: beſides that, he was handſom, he had a ſingular grace in jeſting without offence to any, to utter good conceits, and entertain his Miſtreſs with all the delightfull occurrents of the Citie. Love entereth in very far by this gate. It is not always beauty which ſurprizeth, for if it be not joyned with promptneſs of wit, and diſcourſe, it is a bait which floats on the water without a hook.

Diſpoſitions to love ſhould be avoided.

Familiar converſation with an Officer ſo pleaſing, was no ſlight ſnare in the houſe of a young widow, who lived eaſily, and loved pleaſure. It is not without cauſe Saint Hierom would not endure to ſee about widows, ſervants ſo frizled and quaint, fearing leſt love might render them Maſters over their proper Miſtreſſes. Aglae began with pretty love-tricks, which are the little idols of affection, not obſerving, that all theſe gentle daliances in a carriage too free, ſtill thought to be conſtant in innocency, are not without danger. But by ſucceſs of time ſhe felt her paſſion ſo much enkindled towards this Steward, that ſhe neither thought, ſpake, nor lived but for him, not daring to diſcover her fancies, ſo much is vice aſhamed of its own conſcience.

Aglae in love.

Boniface, who had an intelligent and ready wit, well enough imagined from whence theſe extraordinary favours proceeded, which he received from his Miſtreſs, but the more he ſaw her grow paſſionate for him, the more he perſiſted in his duty; whether that he in the beginning would divert this affection, which he perhaps thought not firm enough, or whether he was willing to kindle the fire by a ſlight reſiſtance. His Miſtreſs beholding him more ſerious in this matter than ſhe wiſhed, let him plainly enough underſtand, that having had the ſtewardſhip of her eſtate, he ſhould have the like of her heart, and entertained him with more courteſie, than was fit for a man of his employment and condition.

Diſorder of love.

She in the beginning mannaged her affections with ſome diſcretion, following the adviſe of Boniface, who knew how to hide the matter; his fortune not making him looſe the rememberance of what he had been, nor paſſion, providence in what he might be. Notwithſtanding, it being a thing very difficult long to reſtrain fury, all compoſed of fire and violence, the favours of Aglae ſo plainly appeared, that they no longer could be hidden from the world, which is a hundred-ey'd Argus. She occaſioned ſpeech of her even to infamy, with ſo much noiſe and ſcandal in the Citie, that it much abaſhed all ſuch as had relation to her. But being of a haughty humour, which rather uſeth to irritate paſſion by cenſure, than amendeth manners, ſhe neglected what was ſaid of her, ſince ſhe ſtood free from controul: For love, which had bereaved her of innocency and gravity, deſpoiled her likewiſe of the care of reputation, (one of the greateſt miſeries may happen to a wretched ſoul.) She well ſaw her kinred neither had the will or power to hinder her pleaſure, which made her change cloſe affection into manifeſt whoredom.

Love is weakned by too much eaſineſs

Love ſometimes is weakened by over-much eaſineſs of entertaining of it. It is like the Polypus, which finding nothing to oppoſe nor devour, eateth it ſelf by gnawing its feet, and fins. So this paſſion finding no more reſiſtance, with which it ordinarily is cheriſhed, leſſened, and loſt it ſelf. Aglae began at firſt to be weary of the frequency of this infamous familiarity, then recalled again into her heart the ſenſe of honour, next of virtue, and laſtly, God more fully touching her ſoul, ſet her in open view to her ſelf, and made her entertain a great diſtaſt of this inordinate life.

Boniface on the other ſide, felt his conſcience much galled, and thought on nothing but to break his chain, which he often begged of God, giving many alms in the height of his uncleanneſs. Aglae called him to her in this disposition, and said: She was resolved to make an end of the exorbitancies of her life, that it was in conclusion to wearie heaven and earth too much by her sins, and that if love had wounded her, repentance would cure her, God having left her no other remedie upon evils past, than sorrow to have committed them. As for the rest, as he had followed her with so much facilitie in wickedness, it was no reason he should forsake her in the way of repentance. That she was a woman, he a man, that his sex obliged him to take at the least so much courage as her self, in a matter which concerned eternal salvation, and that desiring to equal him in this resolution, she should have the happiness above him to have prevented him.

Admirable conversion.

Boniface replied, She might confidently do what she thought good, he would ever account it his glorie to wait on her in so good a purpose, and that God could not do him a greater favour, than to change the commandments of his Mistress into precepts of salvation.

Devotion of Aglae in enquiry after Martyrs.

The Ladie answered, She found nothing more necessary than to implore the mercy of God by the bloud of his Martyrs, and therefore he should take a voyage into the Province of Cilicia, where daily many such were made, and bring her thence some relicks. The Steward, who could not forget his sweet nature, said unto her: Madame, you would much wonder, if from the Countrey of Martyrs I return a Martyr, and that my body be brought back to serve you for relicks. Aglae replied, Mock not, but do speedily what I tell you, and think your self most happy to be at the feet of so many glorious Confessours.

He failed not to put himself quickly on the way with men, and money, handkerchiefs, and perfumes for performance of his purpose, and handled the matter so, that he was speedily in the Citie of Tharsus, at that time the Theater of Martyrs. Scarcely was he arrived, but he heard twenty Christians were led forth into a publick place to be martyred, and being already changed into another man, who breathed nothing at all but the glory of God, he stole from his company, and went presently into the open place, where perceiving the Martyrs, he brake through the throng, hastened to kiss their chains and wounds, moistening his eyes with their bloud, and earnestly beseeching them to pray unto God for him.

Boniface martyred.

The President Simplicianus, seeing this young stranger meddle so far in a matter whereunto he was not called, commanded him to withdraw: but he speaking with a generous confidence, and publickly professing what he was, he caused him to be apprehended, and to be put to the torture, where he was roughly handled: for the executioners not content to have pulled off his skin with iron pincers, thrust slivers of pointed reeds between the flesh and nails, which caused most exquisite torments. Notwithstanding the valorous Champion had no other words in his mouth in the extremity of his torments, but:

My Saviour Jesus, I give thee thanks for the favour thou hast done me to day, by letting me suffer for thy sake. It is good reason the bodie which hath so much offended thee, bear somewhat for thee. If executioners encrease my torments, augment the assistance of thy grace, and crown my combat with a faithfull perseverance. He spake with so much fervour, grace, and devotion, that those present were much moved thereat, which the Judge perceiving, commanded molten lead to be poured into his mouth, to enforce him to a cruel silence: but that not succeeding as he imagined, the people mutined, and brake down an Altar, set up there for sacrifice to Idols, whereat the Provost was somewhat astonished, and thinking it not fit at that time any further to incense them, he sent all the Martyrs back into prison.

The next day he went to the place with more violence and terrour, and thinking to terrifie Boniface, he shewed him a cauldron of hot scalding pitch, threatening withal to burn him, if he obeyed not the Emperours Edicts. To which the Martyr answered, There was neither fire, sword, nor any horrid torture able to separate him from Jesus Christ; he then shewing himself very resolute, without leisure given to say any more, was plunged into the cauldron, from whence he by miracle came forth entire, to the admiration of all the world, which began to work great conversions among the people.

Simplicianus fearing a second sedition, caused his head speedily to be cut off with an ax, and to consummate a glorious Martyrdom. In the mean space they who were of his company, sought round about for him, at which time they heard there was a young Christian stranger to be executed, who had shewed very much constancy in his punishment. They thinking nothing less than of him, said, it was not their Boniface, who ever would more readily be found among Courtisans, than the executioners of Tharsus. Yet coming to the place for curiositie, they found his head upon one side, his body on the other, extreamly amazed at what was passed. They bought his body for five hundred liures, and having it in their hands, they asked him mercy with weeping tears, for the rash judgement they had given to the prejudice of his virtue.

Upon this, they had nothing so much in their desires, as to carry back the body to their Mistress Aglae, supposing they could not give her any relicks, either more undoubted or acceptable. The holy woman had already had a revelation from the mouth of an Angel of the glory of Boniface, and being on the way to encounter him, so soon as she met him, she prostrated her self before his body, and said:

Speech of Aglae to Boniface.

My dear Boniface, I shed not tears over thee, they would fall too low to bewail such a death, as thine. Thou wentest out a penitent from me, and returnest a Martyr, thou art become a Master from the first day of thy apprentiship, thou hast vanquished, ere scarce seen, the enemie; yea, the Crown wherewith thou soughtest to glorifie other Martyrs, is fallen on thy own head. Ah, how many bloudie gates were to be opened to thy generous soul, to afford a large passage to its triumphs. Iron hooks which have dissevered thy holy members, have united thy heart to Jesus. Reeds thrust under thy nails, have confirmed thy constancie. Boyling cauldrons found in thy heart a love more fervent than their flames, and the ax which separated the head from thy bodie, placed a Crown on thy head. I behold thee with an eye wholly rapt with the beauties of thy glorie. I a thousand times kiss thy wounds, and take part in thy tropheys, and sanctifie my self by loving thee, as a Martyr of Jesus Christ. What then remains, O blessed soul, but that I imitate thee, and though executioners forbear my bodie, never to spare my pains? That all my life may be but a martyrdom, and that there be not any part in me, which serves not as a victim to the sacrifice of my patience.

Aglae, having performed her duties, and caused a Church to be built, dedicated to God in memory of the Martyr S. Boniface, entered into a Monastery, and perfected her self in the glorious travels of penance, finishing her course near her well-beloved, and entombing her ashes at his feet.

THE

THE SECOND PART OF MAXIMS of the HOLY COURT.

THE DESIGN.

WE have directly looked towards God in the first Part, deducing Maxims which most nearly concern the Divinitie. I now descend in this Second, to those which touch the direction of this present life; and consider them in three respects, whereof one tendeth to the service of God, the other to our neighbour, and the last stayeth upon our selves. In the first, I treat of Pietie, against all counterfeit devotion. In the second, I shew we must carry our selves towards our neighbours with justice, sinceritie, and sweetness, excluding our own ends, dissimulation, and crueltie. In the third, I entertain what concerns the ordering of our selves in prosperitie against Epicureans, and in adversitie against impatience, upon accidents of humane life: wherein I endeavour throughout effectually to observe the disorders which Plato and Aristotle noted, were the causes of the destruction of Families, Cities, and Empires.

THE SECOND PART.

Touching the Direction of this present Life.

IX. MAXIM.

of DEVOTION.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That if Devotion must be used, we should embrace that which is in fashion, accommodating it to our ends.

IT is a matter very considerable, that Devotion is subject to many more illusions than all other virtues, of which we have proof enough from our own experience, although we could find no other foundation in reason. But if the judicious Reader desire to know the cause, I will tell him, that as nothing hath been so much turmoiled and counterfeited as Religion, which hath in all Ages been disfigured by such variety of Sects: so it is no marvel if Devotion, which is according to S. Thomas, as the branch of this tree, find the like contrarieties.

The cause wherefore Devotion is subject to so many illusions.

Bodies most delicate, are soonest corrupted by extream impressions: so this virtue, which is of a temperature very subtile, since it is as it were the cream of charity, may easily be perverted by the evil manage of it. Adde, that the wicked spirit seeing this exercise is very necessary for us, seeks to envenom it

THE HOLY COURT.

That we must be devout for God, and that if Devotion be not solid, it is no longer Devotion.

in its sources, to the end we may draw poison from those things which might be our remedy.

Besides, men either through superabundance of idleness, presumption of ability, through love of their own conceits, or desire of novelty, multiply their inventions upon this matter, and many make golden calves to themselves in Bethel, in stead of the Cherubins of Jerusalem. The Lacedemonians ever attired their gods according to the fashions and humours which then swayed in their Citie: Every one delights to dress up devotion by the pattern of his passions.

Goldé calves taken for Cherubins. The practice of the Lacedemonians.

I affirm one cannot worthily enough praise the practise of so many devout souls, which live in singular purity, either in Religious or Civil life: And I may say, it is an Host of the living God, as terrible in his mildness, as he is sweet in his terrours. I honour all the bodies, yea the particulars, with the honour their deserts have acquired. But as the strong-eſt truths fail not to be invaded by ſome obſcurities, ſo it is no wonder, if in the ordering of virtues, ſome defects creep into the life of particulars, which ſhould no way prejudice the integrity of the general.

Of Dark Devotion.

Groſs and afflicting Devotion.

THere is a dark Devotion, which is rude and ſtupid, another nice, a third tranſcendent, and a fourth ſincere and ſolid. I call a ſtupid devotion that, which eſtabliſheth all virtue in indiſcreet and immoderate auſterities, which very often kill the body, and extinguiſh the total vigour of the mind: that, which without any obligation of the Church, or of ſome particular Order, or ſage direction, ties it ſelf to ſtraight and rigorous obſervations, rather for ſatisfaction of ſelf-will, than through any other ſenſe of piety, and which placeth in this act all Chriſtian perfection, not minding ſo many other duties, which ſtrictly bind us to matters more conſiderable.

We have heard the Idolaters of the Eaſtern parts kill themſelves with recital of a fearfull number of prayers to their Idols, roul in the ſcorching ſands, clog themſelves with fetters, and laſh themſelves with razors, thinking by theſe ways they may arrive to the top of ſanctity. Nor can we likewiſe be ignorant what is ſufficiently declared unto us by holy Scripture, that many of the Ancients were much enclined to theſe ſuperſtitious devotions, eſtabliſhing therein all the order of ſpiritual life, in ſuch ſort, that they perpetually afflicted their bodies, and in the mean time ſuffered their hearts to ſway in empty vanities, burning avarice, rigours, and cruelties towards their neighbours wholly inſupportable.

Such was the devotion of Phariſees, ſo often rebuked, and condemned herein by the lips of the eternal Truth. For when you ſaw them walk in publick, you beheld men lean and disfigured, who bare ſcrowls of parchment on their heads, wherein they wrote ſome ſentence of the Law of God, and tied thorns to the border of their gowns, to prick and torment their heels; whileſt the heart uncontroulably committed all diſorder. Such alſo was the devotion of certain ſuperſtitious, reproved by the Prophet Iſaiah in the 58. Chapter, where God ſpeaketh, ſaying unto them: Who ever hath gone about to exact ſuch faſts from you, and ſuch devotion as you practiſe? to afflict the bodie a whole day together, bow the head, lie on ſackcloth and aſhes? Is this then that which you call faſting, and can you think days and times ſpent in ſuch actions are very acceptable to God? I will teach you another kind of faſt: Break off thoſe bargains you have made with ſuch iniquity, tear in pieces the bundles of unjuſt and inſupportable obligations, let the poor go at libertie, who are overwhelmed with wants. Take the yoke from them which they can no longer bear, give food to the hungrie, lodge pilgrims, and wayfarers in your houſe, cloth the naked, and diſdain not your fleſh.

Iſaiah 58.

Diſſolve colligationes impietatis, ſolve faſciculos deprimentes.

Three blemiſhes of anxious devotion

3. This dark Devotion hath three things, which make it much to be ſuſpected, and are the cauſe it is not well proportioned to the manner of life of ſolid ſpirits. Firſt, when it is extreamly ſubject to novelties, ſingularities, and pride, which proceed from fooliſh confidence in ones own judgement. Many, who are wiſe according to their own way, reſemble the Bat, which employeth the chriſtalline humour of his eyes, to make large wings to himſelf, but yet very uſeleſs: ſo they conſume all the lights and inſpirations of God, to create wings of pride and vanity, which onely ſerve them to flie in the night, and ignorance of themſelves. Now, it is well known to all, that the moſt fatal plague in matter of religion and devotion, is the deſire to ſeek direction from ones own opinion, which the learned Gerſon very well obſerved, when he ſingularly well ſaid: (a) If you ſee one walk in the way of proper judgement, although he had already one foot in Paradiſe, take this foot and withdraw it. For it were better to walk in the ſhades of death under the conduct of humilitie, than to have a Paradiſe in the pleaſures of proper fantaſie. Drunkenneſs is taken by wine (ſaid the Prophet) and pride by its own opinion.

The Bat employeth her eyes to make her wings.

(a) An excellent ſpeech of Chancelour Gerſon. In vitis patrum libro de diſcretione, littera S. fol. 171. citatus a Richardo Allo.

Such there are, who after infinite many pains paſſed over in religious Orders, have miſerably loſt themſelves, following the curſed ignis fatuus of their own opinion. Had penſive devotion no other blemiſh, it were always much to be feared: but beſides I affirm, that as fiſher-men fiſh in a troubled water, ſo the devil fiſheth in the melancholy of a perplexed ſoul, principally when it is tied to ſuperiours, which govern conſcience. We know by the Scripture and Fathers, the importunities and ſmooth practiſes of the evil ſpirit to undo us. Satan every where hath laid his nets before us, the whole earth is nought but a ſnare; ſnares in riches, ſnare in poverty, ſnare in meat, ſnare in drink, ſnare in eating, ſleep, words, workes, in all our actions: but we muſt confeſs there is no ſnare more miſerable, nor of greater force, than ſadneſs and melancholy: becauſe it is that which bloweth out the candle, which puts out the light of the mind, and by this means makes ſport for the enemy of our felicity.

Ecce tetendit ante pedes noſtros laqueos infinitos, & omnes vias noſtras variis replevit deceptionibus ad capiendas animas noſtras: Ecquis effugiet? Laqueos poſuit in divitiis, &c. Aug. ſoli.

Doth not Caſſianus obſerve, that an Hermit named Heron, who had ſweat for the ſpace of fourty years under the habit of religion, and grown white amongſt ſo many glorious palms, yet ſuffering himſelf to fall into a devotion dark, anxious, and ſolitary, was ſo deceived by the ſubtility of Satan, that at the latter end of his days, he threw himſelf into a pit, from whence he was drawn half dead, nor was it poſſible to make him ſay, he had done ill in this act ſo exorbitant and deſperate: proper judgement having ſo bewitched him in this ſadneſs, that all his own reſolutions ſeemed oracles unto him?

Caſſian. collat. 2. de diſcretione.

Horrible iſſue of a hollow devotion.

And although a ſoul ſeldom falleth into ſuch extremities, notwithſtanding for a third inſtance, we may bring a proof taken out of S. Thomas, who ſaith, That ſeeing ſadneſs is the moſt venemous of all paſſions, becauſe it gnaweth the root of the heart, which conſiſteth in a certain alacrity and largeneſs, ſpreading it ſelf from the fountain of life through all the members, it is impoſſible that any man who ties himſelf to a penſive and melancholy devotion, can long perſevere in the way of virtue.

S. Thom. 1. 2. q. 37. art. 4.

Gilbertus a great Doctour, writing upon this ſentence of S. Paul, drawn out of the firſt to the Corinthians, ſixth Chapter, Gloriſie, and bear God in your bodie, hath theſe notable words: You muſt bear Jeſus Chriſt, not drag him. He dragg eth him, who is ſurcharged with him, and who indiſcreetly afflicteth himſelf in the ſervice he doth to the Divine Majeſtie, not conſidering Jeſus is the flower of the field, or the poſie of myrrhe between the breaſts of the ſpouſe, and not a load of hay, under which you muſt needs groan like a wheel ill greazed.

Gloriſicate, & portate Deum in corpore veſtro. Notable adviſe of Doctour Gilbertus.

Portari vult Chriſtus non trahi, non eſt ſanum Chriſtus ſed ſtus campi, & faſciculus myrrhæ inter uberæ ſponſe.

4. On theſe ſame grounds ſuperſtition is raiſed, which through errour feareth all it ſhould love by virtue, and ſcarcely knoweth God, but by violating his clemency through a falſe preſumption of his ſeverity. What ſenſe is there to enter into devotion, as if one were lifted upon a rack to be tortured, and to think there is no piety in the world, if the bodie be not torn, and the ſpirit beaten down.

Superſtitio ſemandos timet, quos colit, vitat. Senec. Epiſt. 114.

One muſt be crucified in his thoughts by vain apprehenſions, infinite many ſcruples muſt be nouriſhed, ſins imagined which never were ſins, and conceits fed, that if one have walked on ſtraws a-croſs, a great ſacriledge is committed. Some impoſe a thouſand fantaſtical obſervations upon themſelves, ſome inflict volun-voluntary tortures, and you shall find of them, who leading a life wholly innocent, make themselves hells in their own consciences, watchings wither them, dreams terrifie them, and if the leaf of a tree wag, it is a spirit which comes to surprize them, nay, if some fatal bird croak in the obscurity of night, it is the voice of a dead man, who bids them prepare to pass into another world.

Out alas! Is it possible a soul which hath never so little feeling of the Divinity, can think God, infinitely mercifull, is as a Minos and Rhodamant, mentioned in Fables, who spitefully comes to prie into all our actions, to number all our steps, takes pleasure to prepare punishments for us, and to raise his tropheys on our ruins. Is it so hard a matter to believe a good directour, who perswades the contrary, as that for want of a little instruction, labours in religion should be undertaken without relaxation, disturbances without repose, and miseries without comfort?

Affected Devotion.

Quaint Devotion.

Effeminate and nice Devotion is of another strain. For it hath not learned to kill the body for the life of the spirit; but seeketh out witty ways to accord God and the world together, and under pretext of piety, to take those pleasures which may flatter the most refined sensuality. We now adays see many women of quality, who engross this second order, and who being little interiour, open themselves with profusion to all, whatsoever hath in it exteriour ostent. Some fall into it for satisfaction of their own wills, others by servile imitation and complacence, to the humour of powerfull persons, who like the great Orbs of heaven, draw along the lower planets; some through interest of fortune, others for colour of piety, and the rest by amusement. I know some who therein proceed sincerely, and did the wicked and Libertines understand the purity, excellency, and sanctity of so many good souls, who handle devotion as it should be, of which the Church is at this present furnished with a good number, they would be ravished with sight of the interiour, and take their lives to be a perpetual miracle. But we must confess, there are many devotes, who wander from these purer paths, to run after a fantasm of piety: and although I here note defects, I would have virtuous souls know, my censure no more toucheth them, than thunder the stars in heaven.

All exteriourly.

The first endeavour of this sophisticate devotion, consisteth in making an Oratory, or little houshold Chappel, in building a little magazin of relicks, begged on all sides, with more curiosity than Religion, setting candlesticks and pictures in order, in providing rich ornaments, in inventing new fashions of crewets, in weaving girdles, and dressing up a little mercery of trinkets. And though these actions which concern the care of Altars are very laudable, yet are they often very much perverted, both by the intention, which is vain and execution, most indiscreet. We many times find in these cabinets so religious and curious, a Venus with our Lady, a Cupid near S. Michael, and a pair of beads hanging on the toes of some little giddy marmouzet. This is to renew the practise of that Lady named Marcellina, of whom Saint Augustine speaketh in the book of heresies, who mingled the pictures of our Saviour, with those of Pythagoras. Furthermore these places, which seem dedicated to piety, so follow the humour of their Mistress, as they are accommodated to all: and if they in the morning have seen a Priest celebrate Mass, they will make no difficulty to entertain a Ball that very evening. All this devotion is pompous and proud in its furnitures, there is not so much as hair-cloths, and disciplines but are made of silver, rather to see the bright lustre of it, than feel the smartings. It hath mysteries and marvellous intrications, which many times look on the earth under a veil of skie-colour.

Aug. lib. de hæres. c. 7.

The pomp, and practises of it.

It seems to many, the aim of piety is nothing else, but to seek out all its petty accommodations and contentments in the world, to have liberty to do all, game-courtship, costlinesse of apparrel, a caroach to ones self to flutter through the streets; whilst the essential parts of marriage are contemned, affairs of the house neglected, and a husband enforced to murmur, who doth expresse more impatience in an hour, than the other gaineth devotion in ten years.

If question be made of choosing a ghostly Father, there are of them, who much delight in change, and if Seneca said, that Roman Ladies in the time when divorces were permitted, reckoned their husbands by the number of Consuls, who altered every year; one may more justly say, that some devotes measure their Confessours by the course of moons, by taking almost every moneth a new. Other stick so close to one, and set him in so high account above all humane things, that according to their opinion, he alone hath the grace, Sacraments, and bloud of Jesus Christ in his hands. But if they must be deprived of him, there is no more piety nor religion for them in the world: the paths of Sion mourn, Churches and Altars are but wildernesses, and the hope of salvation hath lost its lustre.

Senec. lib. 3. de benefi. cap. 16.

Such services and diligence must be used to a slight conscience, as if it were a huge Common-wealth. After the tediousnesse of a confession, which maketh those to loose patience, who were most resolute to attend it, you must give and receive frequent visits, spin out discourses, and eternal prattle: one cannot suppose they are all of God, who is more honoured by silence; one would hardly believe a soul should need such polishing, which appeareth not to be so much refined in the knowledge of things divine. One thinks, this devout creature through superabundance of charity, beareth all the sins of the house, another, that she tells all the tales in the Citie; and those, who easily suspect what themselves do without difficulty, imagine there are other ties, which I had rather conceal.

This devotion is not foolish according to the world; but having learnt to make an arrow of any wood, to hit the mark of its interests, she maketh use of a Confessour, pliant and mercenary for this purpose. If any be found in the world who stretch their conscience, who teach to withhold goods ill gotten, to sooth humours, entertain libertines, and lodge sin almost in the bosom of Theologie, these are sanctified spirits, and Prophets in fashion.

There is enough done, if there be outward shew enough. If some small alms be drawn out of those great treasuries of gold and silver; and that she communicate often. For since some Priests are satisfied with saying Mass but once a year, it is come to pass that certain devotes, as if they meant to supply their defects, take almost so many Communions as there be days in the year. God forbid I should blame an exercise so holy, which cannot be too much recommended, but it troubles me they go to it without any feeling of that awfull Majesty, and seek access to God as unto fire to make it tractable. Frequent Communions, which ought not to be permitted but with great discretion, as a reward for the most solid virtues, are turned into pillage, according to the greedy humour of a spirit, giddy and inconstant. There needeth but the want of some small circumstance to stay a Priest, and hinder him from saying Mass; but these devotists pass all over, and some of them have found the way, to accord the Communion and a Comedy, upon one and the same day.

What will ensue of this, but that such women may draw water from the fountains of our Saviour, like the Danaïdes in the hell of Poets with a sive. They often often beat profanation to Altars, to bring back vengeance; and know not the many evils which assail them, proceed from the contempt of holy things.

Callipedes. After so many Communions, these souls profit in spiritual life, no more then a Cavalier shewed at Rome, who labouted much in running in a wheel, and at the end of his travel, had gone no further than when he began. What was it that a dozen of Communions have taken from them one hair of vanity? Are they less pompous, less powdered, less frizled, more reserved, more chast, more discreet? You see to come from thence wily spirits, who perpetually byass all to their own ends, who busie themselves in affairs, who betray the most holy amities, who practise little furies of choller, who render themselves inexorable in the most civil requests, who have hearts of ice towards the miseries of mankind, who make tribute of all, and deifie all in themselves, yea, their own follies. I speak this, to make the solidity of solid devotions the more appear, which are practised in the Church, answerable to treatises written by blessed Sales, and my Lord Bishop of Bulley.

Reasons of the nullity of this devotion 6. You may easily judge by such proceedings, how weak and frivolous all these manners of serving God are. But if you thereunto will apply the lights of reason, you shall observe, that any thing is so much the more solid and firm, as it hath foundation and support upon the Divinity; because Eternity onely appertaineth to the Divinity, which rendereth things lasting. Now this Eternity, which is in God as in its source, distilleth by participation into those things which adhere, and are most perfectly united unto him. Behold the reason why we must conclude, that true devotion, which hath much union with God, hath so much the more subsistence. Bees bred of the body of a Bull, bear upon them a little resemblance of a Bull, and the tree in the seed, whereof you shall have some characters engraven, will many times represent them in its leaves and fruits. Every thing naturally tendeth to the imitation of its original. What marvel then, if true devotion which is derived from the Eternity of God, being unable to have eternity of it self, as a creature, hath at least a band strong and durable: whereas quite contrary, this apish devotion being meerly terrene, hath no true root in God, nor can draw any nourishment from thence, whereupon ensueth, it must drie up and wither. Every plant which my heavenly Father planted not, shall be rooted out, said our Saviour in S. Matthew.

Omnis plantatio quam non plantavit Pater meus, eradicabitur. Matth. 15.

A soul solidly Christian, resembleth the Palm, which beateth its strength on the top: it hath all its vigour in God, and of God. He is the source and end of all good works. And if God chance to fail it, the whole fabrick of salvation falls to the ground. Besides, this devotion becomes ruinous, because it wholly depends on consolations derived from creatures mutable, short, unable to content a soul onely made for God. Every creature proceedeth from nothing, and if you disengage it from the preservation of the first being, behold it is forthwith in its nothing, it cannot furnish you with any thing but wind, to feed you like a wretched Chameleon, which is the cause the creature that flicketh unto it, remains ever hungry. And this is it which S. Augustine hath divinely spoken: My God, my life, and my happiness. It is fit I confess my miseries unto thee, after so many silly trifles of temporal consolations have separated me from thee, who art an eternal and an immutable good, I am dissolved, and have been powred through the conduit-pipes of my senses, parted and divided into such and so many objects, and I have every where found hunger, thirst, and penury in plenty it self. For nothing was able to fill me, since I could not perceive in my self a Good, solid, singular, inseparable, which contenteth all desires, and satisfies all appetites.

Deus in omni opere fons, & finis. S. Paulinus.

Aug. solil. 13. Et tu Domine vita mea beata, fac ut miseriam meam confitear tibi, &c.

Isaiah 36. 5. Ecce confidis super baculum arundineum.

Adde, that in searching for petty sensual consolations, they are not always had, but one often meets with repulse, with affliction and gal, from whence comes to pass, that false piety, which is tied to these curious nicecies, as they fail, it looseth all support and vigour.

All these kinds of devotion resemble the bird called by the Grecians Clotide, a counterfeit swallow, which doth nothing but chatter with such loudness, that she deafens all the world: she much loveth the warm and clear air; but so soon as she feels the first approch of winter, she is stark, creeps along, and hangs the wings as half dead: she will pass the seas with other swallows to seek out heat, & yet she flies scarcely one day but repents it. To return back, she is ashamed, follow she cannot. It remains she become prey to some unhappiness. Behold justly the image of this plaistered devotion. If the false swallow be a chatterer, this devotion is often nought else but babble. If she seek for warmth, this is nourished with temporal prosperities and sensual comforts. If the one be so quailed with cold, the other bears the least adversity with strange impatience. If the one making shew to follow, the rest stays in the way, how many souls see we, who not having well run their race in matter of devotion, nor taken God for their scope, rest in inconstancies, agitations, troubles of mind, and in the end break with God.

Plin. l. 1. c. 25.

Of Transcendent Devotion.

Transcendent Devotion. 7. I Pass to the third kind, called Transcendent Devotion, which practiseth to pursue unusual ways, and to refine all other devotions by subtility of wit. Common things, which are often the best, are not for its purpose. It can abide nothing uniform and temperate; but must of necessity raise much noise and ostent, to make it self known. It affecteth unheard-of observations, extracted methods, chymerical words: you would say, it is a rich trader, who hath a shop of spirituality, and huge magazins stored with specious titles; but when you come to look narrowly into it, you shall find there so many leaves and bark, so much vanity and empty merchandize, that this which at first so affrighted the simple, serves afterward for an object of scorn to the wisest.

Sublime prayer. We are not ignorant there are kinds of excellent ways to treat with God, reserved to souls the most eminent, and that it were a rash attempt to condemn mystical Theologie, wherein so many worthily religious have prosperously proceeded. We know the exercise of prayer goeth by degrees, and that according to Richardus de Sancto Victore, the first is thought, the second, meditation, and the third, contemplation. Thought ordinarily is inconstant and indeterminate; Meditation is confined and limited to certain points; Contemplation flieth like an eagle with more liberty, and picks up (as saith Synesius) the flowers of increated light, to colour and illuminate it self the more. Thought is a simple impression on things divine, Meditation is a more exact search into the Maximes of our faith; but Contemplation is an immoveable aspect of this first Verity, which feedeth and satiateth the soul with the sweetnesses of God.

Rich. l. 1. de contempt. c. 3.

Synesius hymn. 4. vbi quæ?

Divers degrees of contemplation. This Contemplation also is divided into divers degrees. For there is one ordinary, which maketh use of imagination and of sensible species drawn from the sight of objects, though it subtilize and purifie them by the help of the understanding. There is another termed immediate and perfect, which goes directly to God, without any mixture of fantasies or aid of creatures; but if it be much discharged from all things create, it is called dark contemplation, because the soul being in it wholly dazeled, and (as it were) blinded with rays of the divine Essence, frameth not to it self any sensible idæa of God, but beholdeth him by the way of negation, banishing all representations tations and resemblances of creatures, the more firmly to adhere unto the simplicity of the first Being. But if it proceed in a superiour manner, then it mounteth to the contemplation, termed the most eminent, which is the whole-sister of the beatified vision, and the last heaven whereunto S. Paul was rapt, a sphere totally enflamed with seraphical love, where the use of sense and exteriour man, seems quite annihilated, and the spirit transported to the ineffable conversation with the Divinity.

S. Ambros. l. 3. de virginibus. Influentibus divinis corporeus peregrinatur affectus, & usus ille exterioris hominis exolescit.

S. Thomas in 3. dist. 52.

Now we must observe upon this discourse, what the learned S. Thomas said, That whilest our life is shut up in this mortal body, its manner of actuating proceedeth by simple and ordinary ways, which conduct us to the Creatour, by contemplation of creatures: and if any one understand spiritual things in this sublime nakedness, which is discharged of images, it is an admirable way, and surpasseth all humane things. First, it is necessary to have a pious affection to matters divine. thence we pass to meditation, from meditation to ordinary contemplation, which is attended by admiration, and admiration by a certain spiritual alacrity, and this alacrity by a certain fear with reverence, and fear by fervent charity diffused into the exercise of good works. These are the most assured ways to walk in spiritual life.

The ordinary manner of proceeding in things divine.

But these transcendent souls will in the beginning lift a man up from the earth, and make a Seraphin of him from the first day of his apprentisship. To meditate well, is nothing else but to make a review of our self and actions, to adapt them to the commandments of God, and counsels of Jesus Christ. You must flie fervently even to the third Heaven, and remain there rapt, without knowledge whether one be on this side or that side of the world. But alas! how many times happeneth it these Eagles descend from this false emperial heaven, to fish some wretched frog in the marsh of this inferiour earth?

Illusions of this transcendent devotion.

After all these large temples of prayers, gilded with so goodly words, we see in the Sanctuary a pourtraict of a Rat, a soul faint and pusillanimous, shut up in self-love, tied to petty interests, imperiously commanded by so many tumultuous passions, which play their prize, whilest the spirit slumbers in this mystical sleep, and living death.

They will in the beginning go equal with the seraphical souls of Saints, who arrived at this purity of prayer by great mortifications, and most particular favours from God. But they imitate them so ill, that in stead of being suited with great and solid virtues, they retain nought but ostentous forms, and a vain boast of words.

What importeth it a devote, who cannot tell how to govern her house, to know the retire, introversion, extroversion, simplification, dark prayer, mystical sleep, spiritual drunkenness, taste, fire, quiet, the cloud of glory, and so many other kinds, which serve to disguise devotion? Know we not many spirits of young women loose themselves herein, and seeking too much to refine ancient piety, have made it wholly to vapour out in smoke, finding themselves as void of humility, as they were puffed up with presumption? From thence often proceeds the curiosity of matters ravishing and extraordinary, to gain to themselves the reputation of great spiritual persons, and to sooth themselves with the opinion of a false sanctity. When one is once gained by a false pretext of errour, it is no hard matter to be perswaded all we think on is a vision, all we say is a prophesie, and all we do is a miracle. The evil spirit finding souls drunk with this self-love, hath played strange pranks, which may be read in Epiphanius and Cassianus, and whereof it would be an easie matter to produce many examples, were it not much better to deplore than recount them.

8. This vanity not satisfied to harbour in the mind which bred it, extendeth to the chairs of Preachers, where the curious and phanatical spirits of Auditours would willingly hatch chymæra's for such, as are yet but young beginners in the mystery. One will have, that use be made of thoughts transcendent and extraordinary, and many times extravagant, entangled with a perplexity of periods, which leave nothing but noise in the ear, and arrogance in the mind: the other, who is most ignorant, startles at this quaint Theologie, and seeks to wrest mysteries, and disjoynt mens judgements, thereby to draw upon all sorts of people, discourses of the Trinity and Incarnation, involved in visionary imaginations, and turned about on a counter-battery of affected antitheses; and if this be not as ordinary in all sermons, as was the Delphick sword, which heretofore served for all purposes in sacrifices, it is to be ignorant in the ways of souls elect. The other delighteth in doctrines unheard-of, in a vast recital of Authours, and forreign tongues, as if he went about to exercise devils, and not instruct Christians; some one boasts to alledge neither Scripture, Fathers, nor any passage whatsoever, for fear of marring the plaits of his periods: he makes trophey to take all within his own fancy, and to borrow nothing of the Ancients, as if Bees, who rob flowers in the garden to make honey of them, were not much better than spiders, who spin their wretched webs out of their own substance. There are of them, who desire to bundle up an endless train of fantastical conceptions, without Scripture or reason who seem to tell wonders and rarities most ravishing, but if any man will weigh them in an equal ballance, he shall find vanities, onely big with noise and wind. They who have the itch of ear, are devoted to the beauty of language, and bestir them rather to talk than speak in a sermon. They adore discourses replenished with a youthfull eloquence, and devested of wisdom, having no sinews for support, and less sting to transfix a heart.

The word of God altered in chairs, by the extravagant opinions of hearers.

Sapientiæ, atque facundiæ caupones. Tertul. l. de anima. c. 3.

Good God! how knowing would Preachers be, did they understand (as saith S. Paul) how to speak, both on Gods part, before God, and in Jesus Christ, as being shut up within the Word, before they bring forth a word; and Auditours should be well instructed, if they all heard (as saith S. Paulinus) with the ear through which Jesus Christ entereth. To preach God, hatred of vice, and love of virtue, with a discourse firm and rational, and first of all to perswade himself, what he wisheth others may practise; this is the mark whereat all preaching should aim. We have cause to praise God that he hath rendered our Age very fruitfull in men able and sufficient in this kind, to whom I bear such respect, and whom I so much admire, that I seek not to censure them. It were to be wished the younger sort would rather frame themselves by their examples, than to be surprized with an itch to please certain ears, and so many unjoynted judgements.

All such as judge of Preachers onely by the garb and exteriour shew, use to deifie their vices; and it is a note one doth not always please God when he seeks over-much to please those who like nothing but extravagancies. Care must be had of Citie-bruits and vulgar opinions, as the Eagle regardeth flies. Light never blushed to be despised by rear-mice, and a prime spirit is not troubled at the finister judgements which the ignorant make, so that he learn to cast up his reckoning with God, for whom he laboureth. Onions hinder the attraction of the adamant, and all these popular opinions do nothing but disturb a spirit on which they make impression.

Solid

Solid Devotion.

9. LEt us diſ-involve what we may, the devotion of Sacraments, books, and ſermons from theſe ſophiſticate forms, which varniſh the luſtre of it, and let us learn to ſeek it in the pureſt ſources and fountains of our Saviour.

True devotion. 1 Cor. 13. Ὁ φρονεῖν τῶν θεῖα μὰ ἐν μὲν ἀνθρ. Hermes.

True Devotion, if you deſire to know the condition of it, beareth the ſame liveries which S. Paul gives to Charitie: It is patient, it is not offended with any thing, but that which tendeth to the diſpleaſure of God; it digeſteth all acerbities, turning them into its colour and taſt; it is ſweet and benign; it hath no emulation, but for virtues; it doth nothing unſtily; it hath not any thing to do with the puffings of vanitie, nor ambitions, which invade worldly ſpirits, it ſeeks not its own ends, it is not moved with anger to ſee it ſelf deſpiſed, it thinks no ill, it rejoyceth not at iniquity, but enlargeth it ſelf chearfully in the truth, it ſuffereth all, it believes all, it hopeth all, it endureth all. It is a devotion always joyfull, always content, ever active in its dutie, not prying through curioſitie into others affairs. It hath thoughts innocent, an eye ſimple, hands clean, little noiſe, and much fruit. A Devotion which complaineth of none, is troubled at nothing, which ſpeaks little and doth much, which hath more good effects, than ſlight complements, more ſilence than eloquence, more humilitie in the interiour, than oſtent in the exteriour, which flieth on all the actions of life, as a Bee on flowers, and converteth them all into honey. Oh what a Treaſure of peace, what a treaſure of love, what a treaſure of glorie is this devotion.

There needs but one great word to expreſs great things. Diſquiet not your ſelf upon the multitude of precepts and books, to know how you may arrive to this excellent virtue, which ſoweth the ſeeds of perfection in the heart. The firſt ſtep you muſt make towards it, is the knowledge of the will of God. Know what he would have of you, what you of him, in what manner he expecteth it, and what deſire you have to pleaſe him.

That man offendeth in ſerving, who underſtands not how he ſhould ſerve, and it is ever a main part of obe-
An Epiſtle to Demetrius, written by an Ancient, and tranſlated by a great perſonage of this Age. dience, to learn how you muſt obey. There are things forbidden, and things commanded, ſome permitted, others adviſed. God forbids the evil, commandeth the good, permits the indifferent, adviſeth the perfect.

Who puts himſelf in a way of devotion, puts himſelf in a way of perfection: but who flieth above nature, ought not for all that to deſtroy the law of nature. To ſay one is devout, and fails in the duties of common charity, which commandeth us to do to our neighbours, what we would have done to our ſelves, is to have fair titles, and feeble actions.

That man is not exempt from the law, who would do above the law, and there is not any more obliged to avoid things not permitted, than he, who for the love of God denieth himſelf ſuch as are permitted. Devotion is not practiſed to excuſe ſins, but to perfect virtues.

A ſoul truly devout, hath three aſpects, which repleniſh the whole capacity of the duties it profeſſeth; one upon God, another on it ſelf, the third upon a neighbour. It ſerves in common piety, and above common piety: that applieth it to all the ordinary actions of our Chriſtianity, and the other diſpoſeth it into a more ſublime commerce than the common, yet contemns not the common. It hath its retirement, its prayers, its meditations, guided and digeſted, not for ſatisfaction of will, but edification. It keeps all the ſenſes well governed in great equality, the tongue under the rule of diſcretion, the heart in a ſecure peace, and towards a neighbour carrieth honey in the mouth, charity in the hands, and example in all its actions, which make it live in all the antipaſts of Paradiſe.

As there is no corporal riches comparable to health, ſo there is not any ſpiritual wealth in the world, that comes near the alacrity which God diſtilleth into a heart truly and ſolidly devout, freely unlooſened from earth, to be reſigned to Heaven.

Non eſt ceniſio ſuper cenſum ſalutis corporis, non eſt delectamentum ſuper cor lis gaudium. Eccleſ. 30.

The oyl of conſolations (ſaid Hugo) drieth up in worldly veſſels, but as for the conſolation and joy which is drawn from Devotion, it is ſo exuberant, that there is no veſſel here below able well to contain it. It is neceſſary the heart break into ſighs, and diſſolve into deſires for the preſence of God. I call your conſciences (O devout ſouls) to witneſs, that I were eloquent if I could make to paſs through my pen, what you feel in your hearts. I affirm, that if there be any life in the world, which is able to nouriſh and foment the joy whereof I ſpeak, it is the Chriſtian life, holily and purely led according to the rules of the Word of God, and I borrow the proofs of what I ſay, from the great wit Tertullian, who in the Book he compoſed of games and ſportive entertainments, ſheweth by lively and urgent reaſons, there is no game nor recreation in all the world, can be compared to the ſoul of a Chriſtian, whoſe conſcience is a portative Theater, where inceſſantly are preſented many admirable ſhews. All which is powerfull and energetical to glad a well-compoſed ſoul, and to entertain it in eternal delights, is eminently found in the exerciſes of piety. If the chief ſource of peace and alacrity, be to be throughly reconciled to God, is it not in this Angelical Devotion, is it not in piety, that an entire reconciliation is made with our Maſter, that the ſtool, the ring, and ſhoes of hyacinth, are put on to walk in the paths of his commandments? If there be nothing ſo majeſtical, ſo delicious, ſo pleaſing, as the contemplation of truth, whereon our ſoul liveth, as the eye on colours, the Bee on dew, and the Phenix (as it is ſaid) on the thinneſt vapours of the air; is it not here, where after ſo many errours, ſo many fantaſies, ſo many illuſions, which turmoyled our minds in the diſturbances of the world, we enjoy in purity and plenitude the conſideration of the moſt noble Maxims of ſpiritual life? If it be a ſweet and ſenſible repoſe, having obtained remiſſion of ſins of the life paſt, to return into the peaceful harbour of a good conſcience; is not here the rock where ſo many waves are broken, where ſo many little curs, which ceaſe not to bark in the bottom of a troubled conſcience, are appeaſed, and where the ſoul becomes a calm ſea, beautified and curled with the rays of an enamoured and ſmiling Sun? Finally, if there be no greater pleaſure in the world, than to deſpiſe temporal pleaſures, and to trample under foot the vanities which Monarchs themſelves have ſet over their heads; where are they deſpiſed, but in this ſchool of virtue, where mortification of paſſions is learned, and the exerciſe of goodly and heroick actions, which give the ſoul an antipaſt of Heaven in this mortal life, and an enfranchiſement from fear of death? How can a devout ſoul which lives amongſt ſo many helps, ſo many remedies, ſo many comforts give the leaſt advantage to one black and cloudy thought of the world? What can we find out able to contriſtrate us amongſt ſuch ſuccours and lights? O a thouſand times happy ſoul, which having chaſed away all theſe illuſions of vanity, beholdeſt with a clear ſerene eye the ever to be adored rays of this verity!

Remit conſolari anima mea, memor fui Dei, & delectatus ſum, & exercitatus ſum, & deficit ſpiritus meus. Pſal. 76.

Tertul. de ſpectaculis. Hæc ſpectacula ſancta, perpetua, gratuita. Quid jucundius quàm Dei patris, & Domini reconciliatio, quàm veritatis revelatio, quàm erroris cognitio, quàm tantorum retro criminum venia &c.

The ninth EXAMPLE upon the ninth MAXIM.

Of Solid Devotion.

SOlid Devotions reſemble thoſe rivers which run under the earth; they ſteal from the eyes of the world, to ſeek for the eyes of God, they ſtudy ſolitudes and retirements, they are wholly ſhut up within themſelves, and it often happens, that thoſe of whom we ſpeak leaſt on earth, are the beſt known in Heaven.

I verily think, among all the great examples which may be produced of piety in Courts, there will not any one be found more ſincere, or more ſtrong, than that of S. Lewis, as it appeareth by all the acts of his life, namely, that which was written by his Confeſſour. It is an eaſie matter to judge his was a moſt holy life, becauſe the moſt diſ-intereſſed, he having no other aim, but to diſſolve his perſon, his Kingdom, his wife and children, into the will of God, to make the world no longer to be ought elſe, but a Temple of the Divinity.

S. Lewis the true Table of the moſt ſolid Devotion.

The Divine providence drew him out of his Kingdom with an Abraham's faith; gave him among ſo many lands and ſeas, the conduct of a Moſes, and to ſet a ſeal on him of all his greatneſs, cauſed him to end his life with the patience of Job. We find many Princes who embraced piety, one after one faſhion, another after another, and who have covered great vices with great virtues; but it is a very hard matter to find one either more univerſal in all actions of virtue, or more free from blame in the point of innocencie, than our S. Lewis. David ows all he is more to pennance, than to innocency. Conſtantine the Great, before he was a Chriſtian, ſaw himſelf moſt unhappily ſtained with the bloud of his allies. Theodoſius the elder, was enflamed with choller, which coſt many people of Theſſalonica their lives. Arcadius perſecuted S. Chryſoſtom, at the ſolicitation of the Empereſs his wife. Honorius his brother, who was very pious and innocent, had nothing warlike in him, and ever better knew what the white cock named Rama did, in whom he took pleaſure, than the capital Citie of the world, whereof he was Emperour. Theodoſius the younger, entertained love or hatred according as his Eunuchs and women dictated.

Beliſarius, one of the braveſt Captains which the earth ever bare, had a very commendable ſouldier-like piety; but did all at the will of Theodora the Empereſs, obſerving her paſſions, even to the taking the Pope, and putting him into priſon by her command. Narſes who ſucceeded him, did wonders, and ſubdued Totila, the moſt valorous King which ever reigned among the Goths, he was very devout to the Bleſſed Virgin, to whom he attributed all his victories, but withal ſo inſolent, that to be revenged for a word of diſdain, which his Miſtreſs the Empereſs of Conſtantinople ſpake, he gave Italie over as a prey to the Lombards.

Finally, to conclude this Relation, and to ſpeak of that which more nearly concerneth us, Charlemaigne was the greateſt Emperour of the world in matter of religion, valour, policy, liberalitie, ſweetneſs and affability; but the love of women, though expiated by ſharp pennance, ſet blemiſhes on this Sun, which the memory of enſuing Ages, hath much ado to waſh off. It is a ſtrange thing, that God chaſtiſed the ſins of the father in his own daughters, who had very little care of their honour, through too free an education and indulgence of the Emperour, who ſpared the puniſhment of his own ſins in another.

There hath not been almoſt in all the Monarchies, but one S. Lewis, who was ſo like to virtue, that if it upon one ſide appeared incarnate to mortal eyes, and on the other ſhewed this great King, there would have been much ado to know which were the copie, and which the principal. He had three things very recommendable in him, religious wiſdom in the brighteſt luſtre of the world, humility planted even upon the rubies and diamonds of the Royal Crown, courage and valour invincible, in a devotion incomparable.

Who would ſee a manifeſt token of his wiſdom, let him behold how his ſpirit in the greateſt concuſſions of worldly accidents ſtood ever in the ſame poſture, without any whit forgoing the ordinary exerciſe of his piety. One ſole action of his life, which was his taking in Ægypt, made what I ſay well to appear. This good King having loſt a great battel, which ruined all his affairs, ſaw the wide fields covered with the bodies of his ſervants, and Nilus overflowing with the bloud of his French, himſelf ſurprized and taken by his enemies, and led into the Sultan's Tent among clamours, out-cries, infernal countenãces of Sarazens, and all the images of death, able to overwhelm a ſoul of the ſtrongeſt temper: notwithſtanding, though his heart were ſteeped as a ſponge in a ſea of dolours and compaſſion, ever making uſe of reaſon, he entered into the Barbarians pavillion, not at all changing colour, and as if he had returned from his walk in the garden of his palace, he asked his pages for his book of prayers, and taking it, diſpoſed himſelf to pay the uſual tribute of his oraiſons in a profound tranquility of mind; which I conceive to be very rare, ſince there needeth oftentimes but the loſs of a triſle, to ſtay devotion, which is not yet arrived to the point of ſolidity.

But if you therein ſeek for a perfect humility, conſider what paſſed in the Councel of Lyons, and ſee how he laboured to depoſe the Emperour Frederick the ſecond, who was ruined in reputation in the opinion of almoſt all the world. Other Princes who have not always their hands ſo innocent, but that they readily invade the goods of others, when ſome religious pretext is offered them, would have been very ambitious to be enſtalled in his place whom they meant to deſpoil; but the univerſal conſent of great men, judged this throne could not be worthily ſupplied, but by this great King: yet he notwithſtanding declined it, as a wiſe Pilot would a rock, and thought better to chooſe the extremity of all evils of the world among Sarazens, than to mount to the Empire by ſuch ways.

But that which is moſt conſiderable in the matter we handle, may be obſerved in his valour, never weakened by his great devotion: for he was one of the moſt couragious Princes in a cold temperature & with reaſon, that was then under Heaven. It was courage, which taking him from the ſweet tranquility of a life wholly religious, cauſed him to leave a Kingdom repleniſhed with peace, contentment, and delights, to go to a land of Sarazens, & live in all incommodities imaginable to nature. It was courage, which cauſed him ſo many times to expoſe his royal and valiant perſon, not onely to the toyls of a deſperate voyage, but to the ſtrokes alſo of moſt hazardous battels: witneſs, when at his arrival in Ægypt, the coaſt being all beſet with Sarazens, very reſolute to hinder the paſſage of his ſhip, he threw himſelf firſt of all from the ſhip into the water, where he was plunged up to the ſhoulders, with his target about his neck, and ſword in hand, as a true ſpectacle of magnanimity to all his Army, which encouraged by the example, came to the land, as the King had commanded. The greatneſs of the ſun is meaſured by a ſmall ſhadow on the earth, and there many times needeth but very few words to illuſtrate a great virtue. So many excellent pens have written upon his brave acts, and made them ſo well known to all the world, that it were to bring light into day, to go about to mention them.

Divers Ladies excellent in piety.

If some say, He is to be a pattern for Kings and Lords; Ladies, who should manure devotion as an inheritance for their sex, shall never want great lights, and worthy instructions, if they will consider those, who being more near to our Age, should make the more impression upon their manners.

See the reverend Father Hilarion of Costa.

If we speak of the endeavour of prayer, look upon Barbe Zopoly Queen of Polonia, who continuing days and nights in prayer, all covered over with sackcloth, affixed good success to the standards of the King her husband, and for him gained battels.

If account be made of the chastity of maidens, and sequestration from worldly conversation, reflect on Beatrix du Bos, who being one of the most beautifull creatures of her time, and seeing the innocent flames of her eyes too easily enkindled love in the hearts of those who had access to her, put her self upon so rough a pennance for others sin, that she was fourty years without being seen, or to have seen any man in the face.

If you speak of modesty, let wanton Courtiers behold Antonietta de Bourbon, wife of Claudius, first Duke of Guize, who after the death of her husband, was clothed in serge, and went continually amongst the poor with her waiting-women, to teach them the practise of alms.

If charity be magnified toward persons necessitous, cast your eye upon Anne of Austria, Queen of Poland, who accustoming to serve twelve poor people every munday, the very same day she yielded her soul up to God, when she had scarcely so much left as a little breath on her lips, asked she might once more wait on the poor at dinner, and that death might close her eyes, when she opened her hands to charity.

If the instruction of children be much esteemed, fix your thoughts upon Anne of Hungarie, mother of eleven daughters, and admire her in the midst of her little company, as the old Hen-Nightingale, giving tunes and proportions of the harmony of all virtues, and so breeding these young creatures, that they all prospered well with excellent and worthy parts.

If you delight in the government of a family, which is one of the chiefest praises of married women, take direction from Margaret Dutchess of Alencon, who governed the whole family with so much wisdom, that order, which is the beauty of the world, found there all its measures, and that if the domestick servants of other Lords and Ladies are known by their liveries, she caused hers to be known by their modestie.

If you desire austerities, look with reverence on the hair-cloth and nails of Charlotte de Bourbon, the Kings great Grand-mother; and behold with admiration Frances de Batarnay, who during a widow-hood of three-score years, was twenty of them without ever coming into bed.

If you praise chast widows, who can pass without an Elogie, Elizabeth widow of Charls the ninth, who in a flourishing youth, being much courted by all the great Monarchs of the world, answered, That having been the widow of a Charls of France, she had concluded all worldly magnificencies, and that nothing more remained for her, but to have Jesus Christ for a spouse. And verily she spent the rest of her days in a conversation wholly Angelical, amongst religious women, whom she had founded.

If constancy in the death of kinred have place, let the lesson be hearkened unto, which Magdalen, wife of Gaston de Foix gave, who having seen the death of a husband, whom she loved above all the world, and afterward of an onely son remaining the total support of her house, made her courage to be as much admired among the dead, as her love was esteemed among the living.

And what stile would not be tired in so great a multitude of holy and solid devotions, and who can but think the choise becometh hard by abundance? unless we will say, such as have been the most persecuted, were the most eminent. Where it seems it is an act of the Divine Providence, to have many times given to vicious and faithless husbands, the best wives in the world, as Mariamne to Herod, Serena to Diocletian, Constantia to Licinius, Helena to Julian the Apostate, Irene to Constantinus Copronymus, Theodora to the Emperour Theophilus, Theodelinda to Ithar, Thira to Gormondus King of Denmark, Charlotte de Albret, to Cæsar Borgia, Catherine to Henrie of England. This Ladie was infinitely pious, yea, beyond limit. It is good to be devout in marriage, and not to forget she is a married wife, much way must be given to the humours of a husband, much to the care of children and family, and sometimes to loose God at the Altar, to find him in houshold cares.

Good wives of bad husbands.

Katherine of England. Flor. Remond.

But this Queen onely attended the affairs of Heaven, and had already so little in her of earth, that she shewed in all her deportments to be made for another manner of Crown, than that of Great Brittain. She for the most part shut her self up in the Monasteries of Virgins, and rose at mid-night to be present at Mattins. She was clothed from five of the clock, not decked like a Queen, but contented with a simple habit, saying, The best time should be allowed to the soul, since it is the better part of our selves. When she had the poor habit of Saint Francis under her garments, which she commonly ware, she reputed her self brave enough. The Fridays and Saturdays were ever dedicated by her to abstinence: but the Eves of our Ladies feasts, she fasted with bread and water, she failed not to confess on wednesdays and fridays, and in a time when Communions were very seldom, she had recourse thereunto every sunday. In the fore-noon she continued six hours in prayer; after dinner she read two whole hours the lives of Saints, and speedily returned to Church, from whence she departed not till night drave her thence. This was to eat honey and Manna in abundance, in a condition which had too strong ties for the earth, to be so timely an inhabitant of Heaven.

Whilest she led this Angelical life, her husband, young and boyling, overflowed in all sorts of riot, and in the end came to this extremity, as to trample all laws, both divine and humane under foot, to repudiate his lawfull wife, who brought him children, to serve as pledges of marriage, and wed Anne of Bollen.

Since this love, which made as it were but one tomb of two parts of the world, never have we seen any more dreadfull. The poor Princess, who was looked on by all Christendom as a perfect model of all virtue, was driven out of her Palace and bed, amidst the tears and lamentations of all honest men, and went to Kimbolton, a place incommodious and unhealthy, whilest another took possession, both of the heart and scepter of the King. So that here we may behold virtue afflicted, and a devotion so constant, that the ruins of fortune, which made all the world tremble, were unable to shake it. She remained in her solitude with three waiting-women, and four or five servants, a thousand times more content, than had she lived in the highest glory of worldly honour, and having no tears to bewail her self, she lamented the miseries she left behind her. There is yet a letter left, which she wrote to her husband a little before her death, plainly shewing the mild temper of her heart, and the force of devotion, which makes the most enflamed injuries to be forgotten, to procure conformity to the King of the afflicted, who is the mirrour of patience, as he is the reward of all sufferers.

My King, and dearest spouse, Insomuch as already the hour of my death approcheth, the love and affection I bear you, causeth me to conjure you to have a care of the eternal salvation of your soul, which you ought to prefer before mortal things, or all worldly blessings. It is for

for this immortal ſpirit you muſt neglect the care of your bodie, for the love of which you have thrown me head-long into many calamities, and your own ſelf into infinite diſturbances. But I forgive you with all my heart, humbly beſeeching Almightie God, he will in Heaven confirm the pardon, I on earth give you. I recommend unto you our moſt dear Mary, your daughter and mine, praying you to be a better Father to her, than you have been a huſband to me. Remember alſo the three poor maids, companions of my retirement, as likewiſe all the reſt of my ſervants, giving them a whole years wages, beſides what is due, that ſo they may be a little recompenced for the good ſervice they have done me, proteſting unto you in the concluſion of this my letter and life, that my eyes love you, and deſire to ſee you, more than any thing mortal.

Henrie the eight, notwithſtanding his violence, read this letter with tears in his eyes, and having diſpatched a Gentleman to viſit her, he found death had already delivered her from captivity.

X. MAXIM.

of PROPER INTEREST.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

Every underſtanding man ſhould do all for himſelf, as if he were his own God, and eſteem no Goſpel more ſacred, than his Proper Intereſt.

THis Maxim of the Prophane Court, is the ſource of all evils, the very plague of humane life, and one may ſay it is the Trojan horſe, which beareth fire and ſword, ſaccage and rapine in its entrails. From thence proceed ambition, rebellion, ſacrileage, rapine, concuſtion, ingratitude, treacherie, and in a word, all that which is horrid in nature.

Diſloyalties that ſpring from this maxim.

Self-love, which ſhould be contained within the limits of an honeſt preſervation of ones ſelf, flieth out as a river from his channel, and with a furious inundation covereth all the land, it overthrows all duty, and deep drencheth all reſpect of honeſty. Men, who have renounced piety, if they peradventure ſee themſelves to be ſtrong and ſupported with worldly enablements, acknowledge no other Gods but themſelves. They imagine the Jupiter of Poets was made as they: they create little Sultans, and there is not any thing from whence they derive not tribute, to make their imaginary greatneſs encreaſe. When this blindneſs happeneth in perſons very eminent it is moſt pernicious; for then is the time, when not being awed by the fear of a God Omnipotent, they turn the world upſide down, to ſatisfie miſerable ambition. And ſuch Princes there have been, who have rather profuſely loſt the lives of thirty thouſand ſubjects, than ſuffered ſo much land to be uſurped upon them, as were needfull for their tomb.

Practiſe of worldly men. Ingratitude.

Others, whom birth hath not made Cæſars, extend their petty power what they may. They obſerve men, ſound their means, their abilities, their capacities, their wits and diſpoſitions. They accommodate all to their own pretenſions, they pull a feather from one, a wing from another; they flatter, promiſe, charm, and deſcend even to ſlavery, to mount up to the honours they aim at, no more afterward regarding their fortune who holp them, than a nightly dream.

The world is repleniſhed with ungrateſull, and barbarous ſouls, who cannot ſo much as endure the ſight of thoſe, who formerly ſpent themſelves in their ſervice, thinking their preſence a reproach of their crime; and there are ſuch to be found, who will make no ſcruple to ſacrifice the bloud of their

THE HOLY COURT.

That proper Intereſt is a tyranny framed againſt the Divinitie, and that a man who is the God of himſelf, is a devil to the reſt of the world.

beſt ſervants at the Altar of their Fortune. Others, who cannot reach to the height of worldly ambition, bend themſelves with all their ſtrength to money, whereof they make a Deity, and run with full ſpeed to the gainfull hopes of houſes. For this, friends diſſolve the moſt ſtable amities; for this, allies tear one another, families divide, Cities and houſes burn: and when I more nearly conſider it, I find it is a bleſſing from God, that women do not often bring forth twins, for they would perpetually contend in this world, yea, in their mothers bellies, who ſhould have the moſt land, even before they enjoyed air to breath in.

Kingdom of particular intereſt.

Of ſo many noble ſciences manured by our Anceſtours, there almoſt remains nothing for us, but wretched images. There is an induſtry eſteemed in the world above all other, called the ſleight of hand, which ſhews how to draw all to ones ſelf, to be enriched with the ſpoils of others, and to devour many little ſerpents to become a huge dragon, as ſaith the Greek ſentence. Now obſerve here three principal points, which conclude the perverſeneſs of this Maxim, the firſt whereof is tyranny, the ſecond ſacrileage, and the third diſaſter.

φῶτε, ἰς μὰ φῶλα ὄφιν ἑλκύσαν ὄφις γένηται.

Reaſons againſt this Maxim, and firſt its tyranny.

Firſt, it is a manifeſt thing, that tyranny, which invadeth the ſtate and juriſdiction of the living God, is moſt impious and audacious: yet the ſect which makes profeſſion now-adays to ſerve God with exteriour ceremonies, and proper intereſts in the interiour of the heart, tyrannically uſurpeth a right upon the eternal power of the Sovereign Maſter, which is to reflect upon ones ſelf in all things, as his end and ſovereign good. From whence you may very well conclude, his undertakings cannot be but tyrannical. Yet more to enlighten our thoughts and ſtrengthen reaſon, know there is an axiom of Divinity, that God, as he can know nothing beyond himſelf, love nothing but in himſelf; ſo he doth nothing but for himſelf. For in doing for himſelf, he doth all for us, ſince we have not any thing which tendeth not to him as to the ſcope thereof, which ſubſiſteth not in him as on its baſis, which repoſeth not in him as in its center. So doth S. Thomas underſtand that notable word of Triſmegiſtus, Unitie hath produced unitie, that is to say, God onely, Sovereign, and absolute, created one world, not many, and thence reflected his fervour upon himself, making all for his love and glorie. Wherein he ceaseth not to oblige us, since we have neither love, grace, glory, greatness, or contentment, which cometh not from him. I find the interpretation of this passage much more reasonable than theirs, who made Mercurie more skilfull in the Trinity, than all the Prophets: which is confirmed by the Author of the Ægyptian Divinity, who in the fifth Book, fifth Chapter hath an excellent Maxim: The first Agent acteth not for any end, having nothing more able than himself, for which he can act.

Agens primum propter finem non agit, quod eo nobilius non sit propter quod possit agere.

It is not so with man. For if he will well rectifie his actions, he must act for an end, and for the Sovereign End, which, as saith the worthy Boetius in the first Book of the Trinity, is not composed of This, or That; but is simply what it is, without any dependence: and pursuing this end, it is necessary he proportion the means to the butt he aimeth at; for from thence resulteth that which they call good election, which is a science the most rare and necessary of the whole world. Now this wretched Maxim overthrows order so divinely established, and mortifieth what it may in the mind of man, the consideration of the dependance he hath on God. It will enjoy that it ought to use, never to enjoy the Divinity. It diverteth all creatures from the mark to which Divine Providence directeth them, and draws them from the use agreed upon in Heaven; to appropriate them on earth, to the prejudice of the Creatour.

Quod non est ex hoc, sed tantum est hoc, illud vere est id, quod est. Boet. l. 1. de Trinit.

All which is most excellent in creatures, is not for creatures who possess it. Light is in the Sun, but not for the Sun; waters are in the Ocean, but not for the Ocean. God, who gives brightness to the one, and rivers to the other, would that both tend to the commodity of men, thereby to pass on to the glory of the Sovereign Being. The Creatour (said an Ancient) made all the most noble creatures for to give themselves, so much hath he banished worldly avarice. Kingdoms are not so much for Kings, as Kings for Kingdoms; for they are made to do them good, and to preserve them, as the goods of God himself. So soon as one is born with fair and worthy parts, he is born for the publick, and he who would retain to himself what Providence gave in common, commits a sacriledge in the great Temple of the God of nature: if he perpetually reflect on himself in all things, and draw all to himself, as if all were made for him, he opposeth his Judge, and makes himself a corrival to Sovereign Majesty.

Besides, ponder here the greatness of this first Being which is invaded, the better to understand the violence of this tyranny. To whom would you compare God? (saith the Prophet Isaiah.) God, who graspeth the vast extent of seas in his fist. God, who weigheth Heaven with all its globes in the hollow palm of his hand: God, who supporteth the heavy mass of earth with three fingers of his power: God, who poizeth mountains in his ballance: God, before whom the world, with all the huge diversitie of its Nations, is no more than a drop of dew, or the cock of a ballance in the hand of a gold-smith: God, before whom all Monarchies are but dust, and men but silly grashoppers. Were all mountains like to Lybanus on fire, and turned into victims for his sacrifices, it would be nothing in respect of his Majestie.

Qui appendit tribus digitis molem terræ, & librávit in pondere montes, & colles in statera, &c. Isaiah 40.

Since then, you little worldling, you politick spirit, will side against God, divide his Empire, raise an Altar against his, preferring your ends to his prejudice, what do you call it, if not tyranny, since it is to enterprize upon the goods of your Sovereign, who hath not any thing indispensable from his laws, no not so much as nothing it self?

Nay, if you afforded God some honourable association (though that were tyrannical) it would be more tolerable; but you allow him a wicked petty interest of honour, of gain, for companion, which you plant in your heart, as on an Altar, and daily present it the best part of the sacrifice. It is to injury a superiour, to compare an inferiour with him. It is said, the very feathers of the Eagle are so imperious, they will not mix with the plumage of other birds, if they do, they consume them with a dull file. And think you to mingle God who is an incomparable Wisdom, a riches inexhaustible, a purity infinite, with feeble pretensions, which have frenzie for beginning, misery for inheritance, and impurity for ornament?

2. Reason. It is a great sacrilege to make a Divinity of proper interest.

Feathers of the Eagle imperious. Plin. l. 11. c. 3.

The most barbarous Tyrants, as the Mezentiusses, found out no greater cruelty than to tie a dead with a living body; and you fasten thoughts of the world, dead, and languishing, with God, who is nothing but life. This is not a simple tyranny, but a sacriledge. The Civil Law saith, you must not appropriate to your self sacred gold or silver, nor transfer to prophane uses, what hath been dedicated to God; the like whereof is expressed in Laws Ecclesiastical. According to which axioms, S. Augustine said to Licentius, if you had found a golden challice, you would give it to the Church. God hath granted you a spirit of gold, and I may likewise say, a heart of gold, when he washed and regenerated you by the waters of Baptism: and now so far are you from rendering to your Sovereign Master what is due to him, that you make use of that heart as of a vessel of abomination, to sacrifice your self to devils. One sacrificeth to love, another to revenge, a third to worldly vanity. As for you, behold you are altogether upon particular ends, which take all the victims from God, to throw them into the gulf of avarice.

Χρυσὸν ἢ ἄργυρον ἐγκατασθίειν μηδὲν ὁφείλοντα. Authent. Justinia. Jus canonicum. August. ad Licentium.

Osea 5. Victima declinástis in profundum.

A man who hath conceived this Maxim in his brain, that his affairs must be dispatched at what rate soever, hath nothing of God but for ceremony; he hath created a Temple to a little devil of silver, who sits in the middle of his heart. It is the object of all his thoughts, the bayt of all his hopes, and scope of his contentments: there is his Tabernacle, his Oracle, his Propitiatory, and all the marks of his Religion. I wonder why in Ecclesiastes, where the common Translation saith, All obeyeth money, another very ancient letter, and derived from the Hebrew phrase, hath, Money rendereth all oracles, for that is it which properly the word respondere signifieth. But I cease to admire, when I consider the course of the world; for in truth I see money is like a familiar spirit, such as heretofore Pagans and Sorcerers kept in secret places, shut up in a casket, or in some broken head, or the body of a serpent: when they became any thing irresolute, they consulted with their Idol, and the devil counterfeiting voices through wood and metal, gave them answers.

Lignum offensionis est aurum sacrificantium. Eccl. 31. 17.

Χρήματα πάντα ὑπακούει. Pecuniæ obediunt omnia. Pecuniæ respondet omnia. Eccles. 10. 19.

Now adays the Devil money is in the coffer of the covetous, as in a Chappel dedicated to his name: and the Infidel, if he have any business to perform in his family, thinks not at all to take counsel of God upon it, nor to appeal to conscience; but refers all these enterprizes to the devil of silver, who gives him forth crooked Oracles. Shall I buy a Benefice for one of my sons, who hath no propension to the Church, but it must be provided, in what sort soever? The little devil answers, Buy, seeing you have money. Shall I corrupt a faithless Judge, whose soul I know to be saleable, to gain an evil spirit? Do so, since you have money. Shall I be revenged upon such a man, whom I hate as death, by suborning false witnesses, and engaging them by strength of corruption in a bad cause?

cause? Yea, since money gives thee this power? Shall I buy this Office, whereof I am most incapable; for never was I fit for any thing, but to practise malice? Yea, since it is money, which doth all. Shall I take Naboth's vineyard by force and violence, to build and enlarge my self further and further, upon the lands of my neighbour, without any limits of my purchases, but the rules of my concupiscence? Yea, since thou mayest do it by force of money: Shall I carry a port in my house-keeping, which is onely fit for Lords, sparing nothing from expence of the palate, nor from bravery, in such sort, that my lackeys may daily jet up and down, as well adorned as Altars on sundays? Yea, since thou hast the golden branch in thy hand. Finally, this is to say very little, but if thou hast readie money, desire all thou wilt, it shall come to pass. For thou hast Jupiter shut up in thy coffer, (said the Satyrist.) See you not much infidelity, a great contempt of God, plain Atheism? Moreover, that which likewise makes this manner of proceeding more detestable is, that besides its Empire incompatible with God, it insinuateth with such subtilities and pretexts of religion, as if it were most devout. Black souls of sorcerers, given over to all manner of execration, make open war against God: they say they are altogether for Beelzebub, and keep the sabbath to yield him homage, and have renounced all the functions of Christian piety: in recompence whereof they raise mists in bright mornings, by the power which the evil spirits gives them, that hearbs and trees may die, or such like, for their witch-craft extends but to bodies: But this furious passion of interests which now adays so powerfully swayeth, besides that it sucketh the bloud and marrow of the people, and bewitcheth souls which come near it with manifest contagion, appears with semblances of religion and true Christianity although it be impossible to serve two Masters, according to the words of the Saviour of the world, and to accord the devil of proper interests with the Maxims of Jesus.

Parva loquor, quibus nummis præsentibus opis, eveniet, clausum possidet arca Jovem. Satyricon. Pet. 3. Reason. False pretext of interests.

Enemies the most dangerous are ever the most covert, it were better almost to fall absolutely into disorder, than to be flesh and fish, hot and cold, to halt sometimes on Baal's side, another while on the Temple of Solomon's part, and never to serve God, but with a shoulder; yea, with all manner of hypocrisie. I wish thou were hot or cold, but insomuch as thou art luke-warm, being neither hot nor cold, I will vomit thee out of my mouth.

Utinam frigidus esses aut calidus, sed quia tepidus es, & nec frigidus, nec calidus incipiam te vomere ex ore meo. Apoc. 3. 4. Reason.

To all objections of Scripture and Saints, framed against this Maxim, we have but one onely answer: It is the world, we cannot live otherwise, the goat must browze where he is tied. He who would live as an honest man, and not be according to the fashion, shall ever be poor. To which I answer, It is so far otherwise, that one cannot be rich, persisting in integrity, that who will well examine families and houses, shall find riches the most stable, most honourable, and delightfull were ever on virtues side, as we may see in the examples of Abraham, Jacob, and David, if we will not learn it by our own experience. The blessing of God make the rich, and drives affliction from them.

Benedictio Domini divites facit, nec sociabitur ei afflictio. Proverb. 10.

But quite contrary, the fortunes which proceed by crooked and sinister ways, bring most dangerous effects along with them, for before their coming, they cause toyls and unspeakable anxieties; but being arrived, they expose a man to publick scorn, in stead of making him worthy of regard; since they insensibly are consummate, and in the end, always reserve to him who possesseth them, treasures of anger and vengeance. Would you see the proof of all I have said? Look on the travel bestowed in purchase of ill gotten goods, and you shall find it was for that, the Saviour of the world called riches, thorns, because thorns bear a fragrant flower; but the fruit is very bad, and which is more, they serve for a retreat to vipers. A silly gain, which in the beginning smiles to the eye, is the flower of the thorn; but when it is swallowed with great convulsion of mind and body, it proves an ill fruit, as likewise being involved in an impure conscience, it is as the viper among thorns. Will you therein observe publick scorn and indignation? When you behold a man of base condition, who by unlawfull ways is come to great fortunes, he is looked on as the flea, which an artificer fettered with a chain of gold, to make matter for gazers. O the flea (said one) it is well for her, she wears a golden chain: the basest of vermine, bears the best of mettals! Is she not very miserable, to have her liberty so enthralled? Why was she not content to be a flea, and not to become a Ladie? Yet was this silly creature innocent: but whosoever excessively raiseth his estate by injustice, deserves he not well to be the object of all the arms of slander, and the anger of God? Our Lord (saith the Scripture) shall wither up the roots of proud Nations.

Simon Majolus.

Radicem superbarum gentium arefaciet Dominus. Eccles. 10.

Will you see the progression and conclusion thereof: The Grashopper, according to the saying of the Prophet Joel, hath a share herein, to wit, in bravery and riot of apparel; the other part falls to the glutonous flie, which is the superfluity of diet; and the last is eaten by rust, so are unprofitable treasures of the covetous, who almost all resemble the fountain of Jupiter Hammon, so cold in the day time, one cannot drink of it, and so hot by night they dare not touch it. In the day of prosperity, they have bowels of ice for the miseries of the poor, and in adversity their goods are all on fire, pillaged, burnt and carried away, by those who least deserve to enjoy them.

Residuum locustæ comedit bruchus, & residuum bruchi comedit erago. Joel. 1. Plin. lib. 2. cap. 103.

Finally, the day of Judgement must be undergone, to expiate many times by long torments the goods we can no longer enjoy. Do we not understand how the God of vengeance speaks to the rich of the earth, who are rich in iniquity? To thee I come, thee great Dragon, who lodgest in the midst of rivers of gold and silver, and sayest, These rivers are mine: I will put a bridle into thy mouth, and will fasten to thy scales so many little fishes, as thou on every side hast entrapped by so many injustices, so many concussions, so many falshoods, and I will take thee out of thy element, out of thy honours and riches, which thou hast abused, and I will thrust thee into the desert on the sand, reproachfull as thou art, faint, and despoiled, nor shall any man compassionate thy misery. Oh, how poor are they always, who are rich with iniquitie.

Ezech. 29. Ecce ego ad te Draco magne qui cubas in medio fluminum & dicis meus est fluvius, ponam fræna in maxillis tuis, & agglutinabo pisces fluminum tuorum squammis tuis, & extrahame te & proiciam te in desertum.

(a) But what if serving God faithfully in his vocation he must be poor? O poverty, which didst receive the Son of God born, as between thine arms, in a wretched stable, and who saw'st him conclude his innocent life in so great nakedness, that it had no other veil to cover it but the bloud which gushed from his wounds; must it needs be that having been so much honoured by the King of Monarchs and all Saints, who waited on him, thou here below shouldst be reputed as the dregs of nature, the scum of the world, the fury of humane life; must Christians come to that pass, rather to desire to be esteemed crafty, robbers, and excommunicates, than poor? No man (saith Minutius Fælix) how poor soever, comes to the poverty wherein he is born; we should possess all, had we learned to desire nothing: but the rage now adays frequent, to appear in the world what one is not, the madness which maketh frogs desire to swell like bulls, is the cause many stile a reasonable fortune with the title of poverty, whilest a thousand and a thousand who live in the world, in the midst of extream miseries, had they hit upon thy fortune, would think themselves equal in point of felicity to Cæsars.

(a) 5. Reason. Against too much horrour of poverty, which nourisheth the fervour of interests.

Nemo tam pauper potest esse quam natus est, omnia si non concupiscimus, possidemus. Minut. Fælix.

One esteems himself poor, if he have not thirty, fourty, fifty thousand crowns to buy an Office; which is a fearfull exorbitance of our Age. One accounts himself poor, if he have not five and twenty thousand crowns to give with a daughter in marriage, when the daughters of France had not heretofore above six thousand. One imagineth he is poor, if vails of an Office make not thirty or fourty thousand livres of rent, when the Chancellours of France had not in former time seven thousand. O insatiable avarice, the Cerberus, and gulf of mankind! whither hast thou transported our manners and understanding? No, no, there is not any man truly poor, who is furnished for necessities, without which, life is intolerable to nature: and that which affrighteth (say you) is the gnawing care of house-keeping, which shorteneth your days, and drencheth your life in gall and tears.

Against the pusillanimous.

Weak and faithless that you are towards the Divine Providence, do you not yet behold your distrust, your humane respects, your impatience is the source of all the evils which engulf you? Little birds that flie in the air and clouds; silly butter-flies which flutter through the meadows, painted with the enamel of flowers, and flowers themselves which are but hay, repose with all sweet satisfaction, under the royal mantle of the great Providence that covers all. Birds by his help, find grain fit for them. Butter-flies suck out the dew and juice of flowers; and flowers which live but one day, unfold themselves with beauties, that nothing yield to Solomon's magnificencies. There is not any creature so little in the world, which lifteth not up its eyes to the paternal hand of God, distilling dew and Manna, and is never frustrated of its hopes. There is none but you (O wretched creature) who having a reasonable soul, stamped with the image of God, suffer your discretion to contribute to the excess of your miseries; do you not well deserve to be poor, since God is not rich enough for you?

Whose are the children which give you occasion of so much care? Is it you (O mothers) who have stretched their sinews, spun out their veins, numbered and knit their bones in your entrails? God hath made them, God will direct them, God will bear them on the wings of his providence, God will dispose them where you imagine not. But you would not have them suffer any thing; why then did you produce them into the number of men, if you be unwilling they should participate in the burdens of men?

Resolution of great courages in poverty.

If you and they fal'ing from a flourishing estate, should be reduced to beggery, could you imagine you might be forsaken by the providence of God, yea, although you under-went the strokes of warfare, which his beloved Son did here on earth? What shame would it be for you, if even those who have been in the world as great as Monarchs, are come to this estate? Belisarius, who thunder-struck three parts of the world by the lightening of his arms, who had possessed all which a great virtue might deserve, all which a great fortune might give, having seen himself engraven on gold & silver, almost equal to the Emperour Justinian his Master, came to that pass through extream disfavour, as to stretch out his hand for alms, yea, did it couragiously, braving his unhappiness by an abundance of virtues: And you, who are much short of his quality, deject your spirit in a slight humiliation befallen you. Rusticiana wife of Boetius, one of the most glittering beauties of Rome, in publick miseries saw her self reduced to such poverty, that she was clothed as a countrey woman, no whit therewith dismayed; yea, appeared before the face of Kings in defence of her husband massacred: & you cannot endure to be seen at the Church in a modest habit, or a plain neck-kercheff. Alas your opinion, and your curiosity, is the greatest part of your evils!

Were it not better to undergo all the miseries of the world, in the fidelity we offer to God, than through disordinate love of proper interests, to become a devil? For what fitter title deserves he, who doing all for himself, looks on himself as a Divinity, accounts other men who are under him, as flies and catterpillers, tyrannizeth over inferiours, tormenteth equals, striketh at superiours, breaketh laws both divine and humane, to hasten unto gain or honour, and to anticipate his punishments, makes to himself an hell in his own conscience. If these truths perswade you not sufficiently the way of duty, consider a man of interest in the following example, and see by his success, that there is no greater unhappiness in the world, than to be fortunate contrary to the rules of a good conscience.

The tenth EXAMPLE upon the tenth MAXIM.

Of liberalitie, and unhappiness of those who seek their own ends by unlawfull ways.

ANTIOCHUS the GOD.

I Resolved to present unto you in this History Antiochus the God, who made a God of himself, a man as much perplexed as unhappy in his aims; to oppose him against Ptolomeus Philadelphus, who was free and generous, to the end these Princes, as contrary in qualities, as different in their successes, may make you the more sensibly see the truth of this excellent Maxim. When a great fortune and a prompt will meet together, they produce excellent effects of liberality. This Ptolomey of whom we speak, had one by nature, the other from love. For he was naturally disposed to magnificence, and the greatness of his condition seconded his purposes. The revenue he received from Ægypt, might then amount to fourteen thousand eight hundred talents, which were the matter of his bounty, but the form rested in his heart. He thought nothing to be his, but what he could give, and was willing gold should be drawn from his treasures, to relieve mens necessities, as water out of the streams of his Nilus. To know how to give well, is a great science. It belongs not to all (said Socrates) to mannage the Graces well. There are some who give so ill, and to such as merit so little, that the Graces being Virgins by condition, are made prostitutes through the sottishness of their usage. But this Prince was as wise in choice of persons, as liberal to distribute favours. He willingly did good to those who made profession of true piety, and loved learning, well knowing it was to sow seeds in a land not ungratefull. It is observed in all times, that Princes and men of quality, who have disobliged the Religious and learned, have had ill success in their affairs, and given their reputation as a prey to posterity. That is it which lost the miserable Antiochus, surnamed the Illustrious: for though his father had shewed him an example to oblige the Hebrews, who then stood most eminent in religion and divine knowledges, he unhappily engaged himself to torment them, and by this means heaped after his life a thousand disturbances, and darkened his name in an eternal History.

Drawn from the Prophet Daniel. 11. S. Hieron. upon Daniel. Polyæn. Appian.

Magnificence of Ptolomey.

Socrat. apud Stobæum. τὸν πλοῦτον χαρίτων ἱερὸν οὐ πόρνον ἀνάγκης.

It is very dangerous to disoblige pious and learned men.

Much otherwise Ptolomey favoured the people of God, with al sorts of courtesie. For not satisfied to have grãted liberty to more than a hundred thousand Iews, who were in his Territories, even to the redeeming slaves at his own charge from Masters who possessed them, he bestowed most costly gifts on the Temple of Jerusalem. From thence distending his benefits to men of learning, he furnished that incomparable Liberary, wherein in the end were numbered seven hundred thousand books, and having given the charge of it to Demetrius Phalereus, he caused to be brought thither, as we find in so many histories, the books of the law, with the seventy two Interpreters, who translated them into Greek, to be a singular ornament of his Liberarie.

Ioseph. l. 12. c. 1. Liberary of Ptolomey.

berarie. All this passed over with ceremonies, magnificencies, and the wonders which so many Authours recount, the King wept for joy, such affection he bare to things divine, in comparison of which he no more esteemed gold, than dirt. By which means he gained the affection of all men, causing himself to be beloved and adored by the whole world.

Manners of Antiochus.

But Antiochus the God, being as the Antipodes, opposite in manners to him, esteeming himself as a Divinity, thought upon nothing but to satisfie his ambition, augment his revenues, and seek his own ends, to the prejudice of equity, and all the most holy amities. Which was the cause, that undertaking a wicked design of invading the Kingdom of Ægypt, he set a huge

War against Ptolomey.

Army on foot against Ptolomeus Philadelphus, of whom we speak, without any pretext, but the satisfaction of an enraged ambition which possessed him. Ptolomey, who for the love of books abandoned not the sollicitude of war, had put his Kingdom into such order, that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, besides he had two thousand carriages for the war, four hundred Elephants, an hundred and fifty tall ships. So that Antiochus coming with all the strength of Asia to surprize him, found one ready to talk with him: for the Ægyptian without any incommodity to himself, tyred and supplanted all his endeavours, which were grounded more upon passion, than good discretion. This man loth to return with so much shame, being unable to get a Kingdom, sought to win a wife. He passionately courted Berenice, daughter of Ptolomey, whether he were in love with her, or whether he would make use of this marriage, to give some colour to peace, which could not be concluded without leaving on his face the marks of his temerity. Ptolomy, a Prince very peaceful, readily inclined to the resolution of matching his daughter with him, that he might quit his Territories of him; but it was understood he had been already married to Laodice, by whom he had children, which seemed to make this matter meerly impossible. Notwithstanding this unhappy Prince, who betrayed God and men without reflecting on any thing in his designs but proper interest, sware deeply to give assurance, that he kept not Laodice in the quality of a wife and Queen, but of a concubine, whom he would dismiss so soon as the love of a lawful wife should possess his heart. They who desire are ordinarily credulous. It was wished peace might be purchased for the wearisomness of war, and this Princess must be sacrificed as a victim, without consideration, that as faith and treachery upon one side were incompatible in the person of Antiochus, so on the other Laodice, a Princess much like her husband, would not suffer another to lodge in her bed.

It was ended by a marriage

Notwithstanding, the marriage is concluded, Berenice is conducted to Damietta by her own father, who gave huge treasures with her in marriage, she is put into the hands of this false husband, who carried her to Babylon, the capital City of his Kingdom.

Berenice daughter of Ptolomey entereth into Babylon.

This beautiful Queen, who had all attractive graces on her cheek, and the caduceum of Mercury in her hands, by reason of the peace she made between two puissant Nations, was received with much applause. Besides there went along with her a great number of mules laden with gold, silver, and all the most splendid riches of Ægypt. For the father, who was so liberal towards strangers, had made spare of nothing to his daughter. The solemnity of marriage was performed with extraordinary pomp, there was nothing but games, theaters, publick joys; Heaven smiled, and the earth assisted in these Hymeneal rites. There was none but Laodice, who being repudiated, looked on these triumphs with an owl-like eye, and a countenance surcharged with the vapours of her envy, which hastened to raise a tempest.

Laodice repudiated.

She failed not to flie out in the beginning, and to speak whatsoever a desperate jelousie could suggest to her, to embroil affairs, and stir up the Kingdom: but finding her self not throughly seconded, she covered her discontent under silence, and the fury of her revenge, under an apparance of sweetness, supposing craft might afford that which force had bereaved her of.

Beholding her self far distant from Court, and put into a condition wherein she could not disturb any thing, she with a malicious prudence dissembled all that which lay on her heart, feigning to have no other pretence upon the Kings marriage, but that she onely desired to gain from him some solace, to sweeten the change of her fortune.

Forthwith she wrote a letter to King Antiochus, very cunningly excusing her self of all had passed, and shewing:

Her cunning.

That if she at the beginning spake a little too boldly touching the alteration he had made in his Kingdom, it was a folly pardonable, since it onely proceeded from the love she bare him. That the disfavour she suffered by being deprived of a God, seemed at first so harsh unto her, that she could find no means to digest it: But that time had shewed her some part of her duty, and her evil fortune daily taught her the humility, she could never learn in Empire. That she acknowledged it was not for her to controul his affections, but observe them, and rather to entertain admiration for her who hath the honour to enjoy his love, than envy it. That she now hath no care to think on thrones and scepters, but that the sovereign happiness, wherein she desires to breath out the remainder of her miserable life, is to approach near his person, more dear than all the world, and to behold with an eye more innocent than she had done, the prosperity of his affairs.

Antiochus was very well satisfied with Queen Berenice, and already had by her a fair son, who was as the seal of marriage: yet touched at the beginning with some compassion to see Laodice so humbled, he gave her leave to come nearer him, which Berenice all made of goodness, and over-credulous, never sought to hinder.

She returned with shews of humility, pretext of amity, and admirable conformity. Antiochus saw her, and readily entertained her with discourse and witty merriments, thinking her unable to re-enkindle his affection: but she still had a commanding beauty accompanied with a wily wit, and a voluble tongue of power to win love; which the other very easily laid hold of, though he ever mannaged it to his own ends.

The Chronicle of Alexandria hath a remarkeable passage, telling, that Perseus looking on the head of Medusa, which he had cut off took in poyson from it, whereof he became blind. We must not too much trust these beauties and loves, which after a long course of sway seem dead, when they but disappear. Flames sometimes break out of wrinkles and ashes, to inflame hearts they had heretofore possessed.

Antiochus quickly felt the sting of this Gorgon, whose insolence he thought he had vanquished. For having formerly surprized him by slight daliances, she renewed her battery, and by force of her continual conversation, began to possess him as much as heretofore. Berenice retained nothing in all this great pomp of her fortune, but countenances and shews; whilst the other became Mistress of his heart, and had so bewitched the soul of this God, as to make him become a beast. The wicked woman staied not there, but infinitely desirous to place her son Seleucus in the throne of the Antiochuses, and fearing the mutable condition of this unfortunate lover, prevented his inconstancy, and gave him (as saith S. Hierom) not the Nectar of Gods, but the poison appointed for offendours, to send him speedily unto the other world. Presently after she caused her ſon to be proclaimed King by the ſubtile practiſe of two powerfull Favourites, who aſſiſted her in this affair, and at the ſame time laid hold of the little ſon of Berenice, and gave him unto two murderers, to butcher him.

Behold whither the miſchief of a woman, abandoned by God, reaſon, and all humanity goeth, when inceſſed love, and blind ambition have let looſe the reins to diſorder. The poor Queen extreamly overtaken by this diſloyalty, came forth in publick with her great ſorrow, conjuring all the world with tears and ſighs, able to rent rocks aſunder.

To take pitie of a poor ſtranger, their lawfull Queen, and who had never ſought any thing, but their good: whileſt ſome not content to poiſon the King her husband, had murdered the little innocent, who was lawfull heir to the Crown, and would for full accompliſhment of cruelty, ſerve the mother ſo: Then ſhewing her boſom, added, She was readie to receive therein the bloudie ſword, which had cut off the life of her moſt precious child, in an age ſo tender and lamentable, if the people thought it might be for the Kingdoms good; but what could it benefit them to ſee a deplorable Queen torn in pieces before their eyes, who had no other crime, but her integritie towards them?

The people were ſo moved with this diſcourſe, that they cauſed Berenice to ſave her ſelf in the beſt fortreſs of the Citie, and inſtantly demanded their young Prince might be brought forth. The murderers (as Polyenus affirmeth) already miſdoubting the peoples fury, had prepared a ſuppoſitious child, who marvellouſly well reſembled the young Prince, and preſently producing him clothed in his garments, they for ſome time appeaſed the ſedition. The wicked Laodice, ſeeing her buſineſs ſucceeded not to her mind, feigned much to deſire a reconciliation with Berenice, and by practiſe of the miniſters of her fury, found means to get ſome companies to ſteal into the Cittadel, whither ſhe was retired, who cut the centinels in pieces, and killing all the Queens officers, came to her chamber to murder her. It was a pittifull ſpectacle to behold the poor maids, who were about her perſon; for ſtanding in defence above the ſtrength of their ſex, they pulled the weapons out of the ſouldiers hands, running up and down amidſt ſwords and partiſans, like Lioneſſes, until many all bloudy fell at the feet of their good Miſtreſs, leaving an eternal monument of their valour and fidelity. The poor Berenice was amongſt the dead, unworthily maſſacred on the bodies of her ſervants. Three maids ſurvived this aſſaſſinate, who bathing the Queens body with their tears, and humbly kiſſing all her wounds, clothed her again with Royal garments, and laid her on the bed, invoking Heaven and its powers to their aid. The people flocking with the bruit of this great murder, enthroned the Caſtle, and put the murderers to flights, who durſt not then boaſt to have committed this execrable aſſaſſinate.

The Queens maids on the other ſide carried themſelves very diſcreetly among ſuch extream dolours: for as yet forbearing to publiſh Berenice's death, for fear of giving advantage to Laodice's plots, they ſhewed themſelves at a window, and told the people their Miſtreſs had been wounded by the cunning practiſes of Laodice, but that (thanks be to God) the wound was not mortal, ſhe onely ſtood in need of ſome little reſt, and good attendance, to take breath and be cured, to the end ſhe might acknowledge their good ſervices. Polyenus ſaith, that the buſineſs being drawn at length, and the people deſirous to ſee the Queen, the maids put a counterfeit into the bed, dreſſed up for the purpoſe, and framed ſome words, feigning a low and mournfull accent of their Miſtreſs. This cunning held the ſubjects in obedience, and the enemies in fear, whileſt a Courtier diſpatched to Ptolomey the ſon of Philadelphus, advertiſed him of all had paſſed. He failed not to haſten ſpeedily to Babylon with a potent army, where he ſurprized the Conſpiratours, affrighted with the image of their crime. Callinicus fled, and was afterward ſlain by a fall from his horſe. The wicked Laodice was taken and led to puniſhment, where the people underſtanding the death of Berenice, and the dreadful exorbitancies of this wretched woman, meant to have torn her in pieces, loading her memory and aſhes with maledictions. The Kingdom was for a time reduced under the obedience of the King of Ægypt, who carrying away infinite riches, and eſtabliſhing Governors in Provinces, returned to his own country. One may ſee by this hiſtory, that men of intereſt deſirous to ſwallow all by ways unlawfull, looſe their fortunes, honours, and lives, leaving their ſouls to the pains of hell, and their memory to the execration of poſterity.

XI. MAXIM.

of CRAFT.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That the life of curious wits is not governed but by fiction, and that the deceiver ſtill finds ſuch as will be deceived.

Diſſimulation

CRAFT, one of the prime Maxims of an ill Court, is now adays become the leſſon of all Ages, each ſex, and condition; and it ſeems to many, that to proſper well in ſubtilities, is the flower of wiſdom, and utmoſt period of felicity. All are not fit for arms, learning picks out wits with too much adviſe, arts are painfull, and require in thoſe who profeſs them ſome ability, which is not produced but by time and much induſtrie.

But in the myſtery of counterfeiting, diſſembling, and guil, every one perſwadeth himſelf he therein can quickly acquire ſome skill, and be able to triumph over ſimple ſilence; and if he muſt labour in it, to ſtrike the beſt ſtrokes by the help of the tongue.

From thence it cometh to paſs, that children are framed to this exerciſe almoſt from their cradle. Women, yea, they who make account to refine in devotion, keep now adays ſhops of counterfeiting: the great-ones think it is their trade; the mean, who are as their ſhadows, take the ſame courſe. The world becomes a Theater of fictions, where truth hath much ado to be known, ſo many falſe viſages are put Diſſimulation reigneth every where.

THE HOLY COURT.

That Sinceritie is the Queen of virtues, and that the deceiver is taken in the ſnare he prepareth.

put upon it. To ſpeak truly, one would ſay the earth had changed its nature, and were now become a Sea, where the ſimple, like poor creeping worms, are abandoned to the malice of the moſt ſubtile. It was a worthy ſpeech of the Prophet, who ſaid to God, Alas, Lord! have you then made ſo many mortals, like ſilly fiſhes, and wretched worms, which have no government? Deceit hath ſowed its ſubtilities every where, it hath every where ſpred nets and ſnares, and never ceaſeth to drive, take, and entrap: and it ſeems would catch the whole world with its book. It rejoyceth at its own crime, as if it were a virtue, and maketh ſacrifices with the inſtruments of miſchief. It judgeth of happineſs by the multitude of preys, and acknowledgeth no other God, but its own good fortune.

Habac. 1. 14. Facies hominem quaſi Piſces maris, & quaſi reptilia.

2. Now as for you, who are perſwaded in this Maxim, that to proſper in converſation with men and affairs of the world, neceſſarily the fox's skin muſt be put on, ſimplicity being too ſottiſh and diſarmed to bear any ſway in humane life. I pray at leiſure conſider ſome reaſons which I intend to preſent, and rather weigh them in the ballance of judgement than of Paſſion. Firſt know, that in the inſtant you reſolve to be crafty, to be a lier, a deceiver, you proclaim war againſt a great Divinity, which will follow you ſtep by ſtep all your life time, which will diſcover you when you ſhall not know it, even to the bottom of your thoughts, which will overthrow all your pernicious intentions, and hold the ſword of God's vengeance over your head, even to the gates of hell.

1. Reaſon againſt counterfeiting, the blemiſh of truth.

The power of truth.

This puiſſant adverſary againſt whom you undertake reſiſtance, if you as yet know it not, is truth, the moſt ancient and admirable of all virtues, which hath ever been, and which ſhall never end; nay, could you make your thoughts penetrate into an abyſs of time, and could you flie through ten millions of Ages, there ſhould you find truth. But if you ſay, it was not before Heaven and earth, and that in pronouncing this word, you had ſome reaſon (which cannot be) at the leaſt denying verity, and ſpeaking truth, yet muſt you find truth; ſo neceſſary is its being. It runs through time (ſaith S. Auguſtine) not being under the laws of time; it paſſeth through all, and ſhifteth not place; it is hidden in night, not obſcured by night, it is in the ſhadow, not ſhut up in ſhadows; it is not ſubject to ſenſe, ſince it ſwayeth over underſtandings. It is always near us, nay, let us rather ſay, It is within us, or we live in it; and although it do not occupie place, it poſſeſſeth all place in its Empire. It exteriourly giveth notice, it appeareth inwardly, it turneth all into the better, and is not changed by any into worſe. Of it, unleſs belied, one cannot think ill, and without it, unleſs by flattery of ſelf preſumption, we cannot enough diſcern. What then ſhall we ſay more, ſince God himſelf is Truth, verity of Eſſence, verity of Reaſon, verity of Speech, as Theologie teacheth us. All virtues are truly for him, but he is not called by their names, as he is by the title of truth (a). It is the apple of his eye, his heart, his ſolace, his delight, his power, his wiſdom, his throne, and dignity. All what God is, is nothing but verity. It penetrateth all virtues, as fire and light do all the parts of the world. There is not any thing ſo victorious or triumphant in all greatneſs; for it never ceaſed ſince the beginning of the world to cruſh heads which rebel againſt light. It hath untwiſted ſo many webs, ſcattered ſo many wyles, overthrown ſo many lies, brought to nothing ſo many ſects, deſtroyed ſo many humane powers, trampled under foot ſo many dragons. And you who pretend to be the cunning and refined ſpirits of the time, renounce it; you take up arms againſt it, and are not afraid of it; you think to avoid it, but it will avoid you, and the firſt of your afflictions ſhall be to looſe ſight of it. O my God, what a bold enterprize is it to draw a ſtrong adverſary upon us, and to provoke thy juſtice, when we may enjoy thy Clemency!

Auguſt. l. 2. de liber. arb. Non peragitur tempore, non migrat locis, nec nocte intercipitur, nec umbra includitur, nec ſenſibus corporis ſubjacet: omnibus proxima, omnibus ſempiterna, &c.

(a) Ego ſum via, veritas, & vita. Joan. 14. 10.

Remember you the ſon of Cyrus, who cloſely attempted on Æthiopia with his arms, and prepared to make war againſt it? But the King thereof to ſtay him, was pleaſed to ſend him his bowe, and cauſed to be ſaid unto him, Ad hunc venis, that is, you come againſt the Maſter of this bowe. He was ſo amazed at the ſight of this armory, that he ſurceaſed from the temerity of his counſels, to provide for the ſafety of his perſon. Now had you ſeen the arms of truth, which from ſo many Ages have quailed ſo many monſters, and gained ſo many victories, you would fear to conteſt with ſuch a Princeſs. She will never forſake you, if you renounce untruth, and if you do it not on earth, you will be enforced to do it in hell. Hyppocrates gave the eyes of a ſtar to truth, but ſhould he have ſeen her face more uncovered, he had ſaid it was a Sun, which illuminateth by its light, animateth the beſt ſpirits by its vivacity, as it diſſipateth the miſts of lies by virtue.

A notable Act of a King of Æthiopia. Herod. l. 3.

Hippoc. ep. 10.

3. Beſides, not content with this, when you in this manner undertake diſcourſes of ſilk, and promiſes of wind, to reveal a ſecret, to lay ſnares for the ſimplicity of a man, to ſatisfie your paſſion, or ſerve your ends, you commit another crime moſt pernicious to humane ſociety; for you ſeek by theſe ſleights to ruin all belief and fidelity. The Ancients made ſo much account of humane faith, which is conſtancy and ſtedfaſtneſs of words conſonant to the heart, and performance of promiſes, that the Romans placed it in their Capitol, cloſe by the ſide of their prime Divinity, and one of their Poets durſt ſay, Faith was before Jupiter himſelf, and that without it the world would not be, and that it was a Divinity which had a Temple in the hearts of men, the moſt purified and beſt worthy of God. If with one ſingle glance of an eye, you might ſee the world as a huge Theater, you therein ſhould behold Empires, arms, laws, Cities, Provinces, ſciences, arts, riches, infinite magnificencies, you would be enforced to ſay, the baſis which ſupporteth all this great majeſty of Common-wealths, is fidelity, without which, Cities would rather reſemble Cyclopean caverns, than Temples of peace and juſtice. But if you deſtroy it, not by improvidence or frailty, but by the form of a ſetled life, and by example cauſe others to imitate you, is it not to overthrow all that which is beſt eſtabliſhed, and to profane whatſoever is moſt holy?

2. Reaſon. Diſſimulation ruineth humane faith.

Excellency of fidelity. Cato Cenſorius. Silius. Ante Jovem generatum eſt tantum in pectore Numen.

4. You perhaps will ſay, publick virtues little concern you, ſo you may advance your particular intereſts. I will not tell you, this anſwer better becomes the mouth of a Tartar, than a Chriſtian; but I dare well aſſure you, theſe ways of craft and deceit, which ſo much pleaſe you are moſt prejudicial to your honour, and moſt fatal for your ruin. For firſt of all, ſay you be a man of quality, you are not ſo unnatural, but you have ſome ſenſe of honour. Now reſt aſſured nothing ſo much villifieth you as to be reputed a crafty man, who carrieth labyrinths in his heart, and ſnares in his tongue. Dyon Chryſoſtomus judiciouſly obſerved, that nature gave ſubtility as an inheritance to creatures, the moſt feeble and abject, as to Apes, Foxes, Cats, and Spiders: but the moſt generous, as Eagles and Lions, know not what ſlights and wiles mean. We muſt likewiſe affirm, all the moſt eminent and divine ſpirits are very naturally inclined to ſincerity: and that it onely belongs to inferiour ſouls, and ſuch as diſtruſt their own ability to amuſe themſelves in ſearch of inventions and tricks, to involve thoſe, who treat with them by the way of ſincere freedom.

3. Reaſon. Craft ſhameful to the author of it.

Debaſement.

See you not, mirrours render forms when they are leaded? & think you natively to repreſent the draughts of verity, unleſs your ſoul be ſolid and ſtable, ſupported by its proper weight, on conſtancy and magnanimity? Seneca noted, that women the moſt deſtitute of Subtile women.

Seneca in Octavia. Petius instruxit dolis, sed vim negavit.

of strength, are most inclined to fraud and doubleness of heart, (what I speak, nothing concerneth the prudent and generous, who know how to correct infirmities of sex by virtue) but our daily experience teacheth us, that there are of them very crafty, and such as under a pure and delicate skin, with a tongue distilling honey, often hide the heart of a panther, all spotted over with subtility, as the skin of this beast with diversity of mirrours. Their throat is more slippery than oyl, (said the Wiseman) but in the end you find effects more bitter than worm-wood, and more penetrating than a two-edged sword. What sense is there that a Noble man, who would in all things seem more than a man, should take upon him the vices of women, and inclinations onely fit for silly creatures?

Novissima illius amara quasi absinthium, & acuta quasi gladius biceps. Prov. 5. 4.

Sincerity preserved in the light of nature.

It is a strange thing to see what the light of nature dictated to the souls of infidels, so alienating them from all manner of deceit, that they made scruple to treat with their enemies by way of dissimulation. We learn in Titus Livius, that one called Philippus, giving an account to the Senate, what he had negotiated in the Court of the Macedonian King, declaring particularly the course he took to entertain Perseus, under pretext of peace, and to feed him with fair words; the old Senatours stood up, and aloud protested much to disavow such proceedings, as matters opposite to Roman generosity. Violence (said that great Captain Brasidas) though it seem unjust, is always more excuseable in a man of authority than craft, which secretly contriveth some black business under colour of amitie. What could there be more odious in nature, than a man, who to deceive the world, might have the art to change faces every hour, and seem sometimes white, sometimes black, sometimes gray, another while grizly, sometimes hairy, another while beardless; in such sort, as to be meerly unknown to those who should treat with him? Now what deceivers cannot do on their faces, they act in their souls, through a strange profanation of Gods Image, they take upon them a thousand countenances, and a thousand impostures, to train a poor victim into the snare. They flatter, they promise, they swear, they protest, they call Heaven and earth to witness; you would take all their words for eternal truths: but if you speak to them an hour after, and that it be time to pull off the mask, they with a brazen brow will deny all they said, they will mock at all they promised, and disavow all they have done, with the same lips which before contrived it. What Behemoth, what Leviathan was ever beheld so prodigious in nature?

Tit. Liv. l. 2. Decad. 5.

Thucid.

Hatred and horrour of doublenesse.

Phot. Bibliot. p. 67.

I know Ctesias among the great rarities of the Indies, makes mention of a Martichore, a beast which hath the face of a man, and the body of a Lion, who counterfeiteth the sound of flutes to charm passengers, and then entrappeth and kills them with the tayl of a scorpion, all brittled with pricks, and which is more, makes the same serve for bowe, arrows, and quiver. Needs must this be terrible but to see it before our face, is to have one beast for an enemy, which may by prudence be avoided, which may by force be vanquished, and with weapons mastered: but in a faithless man, you discover under a smiling brow, a thousand plagues, a thousand Centaurs, a thousand Geryons, infinite many Charybdes, and Syrens, who lay snares for you, who undo you, who ruin you, who strangle when they seem to embrace you. Can you then admire, if among the six abominations of the heart of man, deceit be one of the first? Laws have not severity enough, arms terrour, nor scaffolds punishments to chastise, affright, torment a man with a double tongue and heart, who persecuteth truth, killeth faith, poisoneth friendship, and many times plotteth effects of death even in a banquet, the solace of life.

Linguam mendacem, cor machinam cogitationes pessimas. Prov. 6.

5. All this is to no purpose, will some Polyphemus say, so that one prosper in the world, either by treason or craft; little heed must be given to the judgements of certain men, who are onely able to bark at our fortune, not to hinder our felicity. Here now is the knot of the business, wherein we must consider, that besides that the ways of treachery are laborious and shamefull, they always carry along with them the confusion, misery, and ruin of those who embrace them. Who diggeth a pit (saith the Wiseman) shall fall into it, and the stone shall return back on his head who threw it. The reputation of honesty is so necessary in the mannage of affairs, that such as lost integrity of manners, sought to retain the bark, to cherish a renown amongst men, swoln up with smoke and imposture. A deceiver fears nothing so much as to be discovered, and to lay open the face of designs which he closely worketh for the ruin of others. Judge now how hard a matter it is, to practise at this present in the world with such proceedings, in an Age most vigilant, and where little children are almost grown wise. What a trouble is it to hide your jugling in a Court, where are so many Argus eyes, who perpetually watch upon all actions. If one be surprized before the act, he must expect to be flouted even by foot-boys, and used like one who cannot hit upon it to be wicked, although this trade be very easie, and who having sold his conscience to devils, knows not how to evict payment, unless he plead it in hell. But if a man some one time come to the point of what he projected, which he can hardly keep from breaking through the ears of others, they who are deceived, seldom wanting eloquence either in themselves or their own ashes, were they dead, to decrie treachery; yet must he hereafter for one trick of craft, loose reputation and credit, two pillars of discretion. All the world will avoid you as a rock or a monster, what ever you do, you have but one heart, and one tongue, to invent and tell lies: but you shall raise a thousand against you by it: For all those who know you practise this trade, and that you make it your endeavour to deceive, will bend all their sinews and strength, to entrap you in the same snares you laid for others, in such sort, that you shall become a prey aimed at (if it were possible) by all the world.

4. Reason. Craft pernicious.

Qui fodit foveam incidet in eam, & qui volvit lapidem, revolvetur ad eum. Prov. 26. 27.

Troubles & miseries of dissimulation.

Where have we ever seen a deceiver to prosper in all his enterprizes to the very end? You may as well number the waves of the sea, and leaves of trees, as recount the lamentable and tragical events of all these common cheaters, who never had the power to avoid God's vengeance. The pernicious Machiavel, who taught the art to deceive, produceth the example of an infamous Prince, whose impostures succeeded so ill, that by mistaking, he drank the poison prepared by himself for another in a banquet, and ended his detestable life. Is not this man abandoned by religion, wit and reason, to seek to perswade treachery with so weak examples? If he will work this way, let us oppose both against him, and the like experience of passed Ages, to set (as it is said) the Sun in full splendour before their eyes.

Dreadfull events of deceivers.

The

The eleventh EXAMPLE upon the eleventh MAXIM.

of Craft.

VIce many times hath a ſhop near unto Virtue (as ſaid Origen) and deceives Merchants under colour of ſelling good commodities. Craft readily counterfeiteth wiſdom, and ſome there are alſo, who make the wiſe to paſs for ſubtile. But there is ſo much difference between them, as between glaſs and diamond. Craft is a falſe prudence, which maketh uſe of ſubtilities againſt right and juſtice; but true wiſdom, though it be ſubtile, is never crafty: For it pretends nothing at all againſt equity and good conſcience.

The wittie conceit of Theodora. Zonara in Theophilo.

If you deſire to know wary wiſdom, and to diſtinguiſh it from craft, look upon what the Empereſs Theodora did, one of the worthieſt women of her Age. She was married to the Emperour Theophilus, an Heretick, and a capital enemy to the honour of Images, which he forbade to be kept or eſteemed, upon pain of death. Notwithſtanding this pious Princeſs, who maintained Religion in the Empire what ſhe might, and ſweetened with much wiſdom the wild humours of her husband, ſpared not to have in private pictures and holy Images, affording them ſingular veneration. It happened one day, that Dender the Emperour's fool, who played this part at Court, rather through natural blockiſhneſs, than diſſimulation, came (as he was roaming up and down) into the Empereſſe's chamber, and found her reverencing thoſe Images. He failed not in dinner-while to give the Emperour notice of it, at which time he uſed to entertain him with a thouſand merriments, ſaying aloud, He found Manna (ſo he called the Empereſs) with her babies, and that ſhe was ſuddenly ſurprized with it. Theophilus preſently doubted it was Images his wife honoured, and at the riſing from the Table, he ſought her out all foaming with anger, and asked, where thoſe puppets were ſhe adored in the preſence of Dender? Truly we muſt confeſs, devout women have ſometimes a marvellous dexterity to excuſe a buſineſs; for ſhe ſuddenly hit upon a handſom evaſion, which freed her from the importunity of her husband. For inſtead of ſeeming troubled and overtaken, ſhe ſmiled very ſweetly, having therein an excellent grace: Behold Sir (ſaith ſhe) verily one of the prettieſt knacks happened in your Court of a long time. This fool Dender, who ſtill doth ſomewhat worthy his name, came into my chamber, as I ſtood before my looking-glaſs with my women, and confuſedly ſaw our faces repreſented in the glaſs, he thought they were images, ſo ſubtile wittied he is. Is not this an excellent jeſt? Then cauſing the fool to be taken by the arm, they ſet him before the looking-glaſs, ſaying: How now Dender, are not theſe thy babies? The Emperour was ſo ſurprized with the wittie conceit of a diſcreet Princeſs, that he believed ſhe had reaſon, and all the matter was inſtantly turned into laughter.

Stratagem of Chares. Polyenus. l. 2.

I term not this example a piece of craft, but a prudence, as the ſtratagem of a Captain called Chares, who enjoyning his ſouldiers ſome labour upon his fortifications, and ſeeing they undertook it coldly, becauſe they feared to marre their garments, which were handſome enough, he preſently commanded every one ſhould uncloth, and take the apparrel of his fellow. That done, and all the ſouldiers being perſwaded their caſſocks would not be ſpared by thoſe who put them on, they wrought in good earneſt, and very quickly performed the task impoſed upon them.

This ought to be ſtiled with the name of wiſdom, rather than any other title. But if we obſerve what paſſeth in the world, we ſhall find there are two ſorts of crafts. Some are politick addreſſes and ſubtilities, which proceed not fully to injuſtice; but which notwithſtanding aim at intereſt, at reputation and glory, by ways not ſincere.

Baro. de aſtutiâ. Craft of the world.

So there are men who reſemble thoſe houſes, which have goodly gates, and moſt magnificent ſtair-caſes, but never a fair chamber: they have ſome ſweetneſs of ſpirit, ſome readineſs and prattle, which is never wanting, but no depth nor capacity, yet will ſeem able among company: which is the cauſe, that not daring to examine or ſolidly debate a point of doctrine, or a buſineſs, they preſently flie to the concluſion, and find handſom evaſions. Others have admirable tricks to ſeem wiſe, by making uſe of another mans labour, and like droans eating the honey which the Bees gathered. Other, in handling affairs, and ſeeking to get diſpatches, amuze and dazzle with variety of diſcourſe, ſuch as they negotiate with, to the end to entrap them. Other, to croſs a buſineſs, cauſe it to be propoſed in the beginning by a man, who underſtands nothing thereof, of purpoſe to give ſome ill impreſſion of it. Other, break off a diſcourſe they began upon ſome matter, to draw on the more appetite. Others, make a ſhew to have nothing leſs in their thoughts, than what they moſt deſire, and let their main texts creep in the manner of a gloſs. Other, have tales and hiſtories in ſtore, wherein they can enfold in covert terms, what they will not openly affirm. Other, in things important cauſe the foord to be ſounded by men of leſs note, and many (as it is ſaid) pull the cheſt-nuts out of the fire with the cats foot.

Theſe are ſleight merchandizes taken from the ſhop of worldly policie, which proceed not ſo far as to great injuſtice. But there are black and hydeous ſubtilities, which tend to the ſubverſion of humane ſociety, and deſerve to be abhorred by all living men.

Such were thoſe of Tryphon, (of whom it is ſpoken in the Book of Macchabees) which were moſt fatal to the people of God. This wicked man, being the Tutour of young Antiochus, ſhewed himſelf in the beginning very zealous in al which concerned the good of his ſervice, and having a deſign to ſubdue Syria, he would firſt have ſurprized the Macchabees, who were then very eminent in arms. But when he ſaw Jonathas come towards him with an Armie of fourty thouſand men, the fox played his ordinary pranks, he received him with a pleaſing countenance, and overwhelmed him with heaps of courteſies. He told him he deſired to live with him as a faithfull brother, and that he accounted it too heavie a charge, to keep ſo great an Army on foot in full peace, which could not but be prejudicial to the repoſe of the people. That he might walk confidently every where how he pleaſed, without any other armour, than the amitie of King Antiochus, which was an aſſured buckler for all thoſe who would make trial of his protection. This crafty companion not content with meer complements, carried Jonathas into all the places of his charge, with ſuch honour and reſpect, that he cauſed him to be attended as himſelf, making ſhew, that whereſoever he ſet foot, there roſes and lillies ſprang. Never doth any man take with a ſnare, until he have ſome bayt ſuitable to the appetite of him who catcheth at it. Jonathas a little loved honour, and his ſenſes were dazeled with the luſtre of pomps, and charmed with the ſweetneſſes of converſation in this ſubtile fellow. He believed, he truſted, his whole Army was caſhiered by the perſwaſion of a man who wiſhed him not well. He onely kept a thouſand men with him to be as a Guard, and entered with Tryphon phon into the Citie of Ptolemais, where he presently saw himself arrested, and his souldiers cut in pieces. The Impostour, desirous to extend his plot further, wrote to Symon brother of Jonathas, that he should not be troubled at what was past, and that his brother was onely detained for some money due to the King, which being satisfied, he should have liberty, onely let him send him a hundred talents of silver, with the two sons of Jonathas in hostage, to bring the busines to the period he desired. The poor Symon who doubted the plot, had more wisdom to know him, than force to avoid him. For, fearing left the people might murmur if he accepted not the ways of accommodation proposed, he sent the money and children, whereof the one was despoiled, the other massacred with their father, by the command of the treacherous Tryphon. This factious and cruel man pursued his plot to the usurpation of the Diadem, and dispatch of his pupil. But in the end, after a reign of two years, Heaven, elements, and men conspiring against him, he was knocked down like a ravenous beast, and buried in ruins and publick desolations.

1 Macch. 12.

I would willingly know, to whom hath treachery ever been fortunate? Was it to Saul, who after he had so many times promised David the safety of his person, yet not ceasing to persecute him, was reduced to such necessity of affairs, that he slew himself with his own hands, leaving finally his spoils to him whom he meant to beguile? Was it to the unhappie Ammon, who using treachery to draw his sister Thamar into his chamber and dishonour her, was afterward murdered at the table by his brother Absolom? Was it to Joab, who moistened with his bloud the Altar whereunto he fled, after he had slain Amasa in saluting him? Was it to Amasis King of Ægypt, who lost both Kingdom and life, for having foisted in another daughter than his own, whom he feigned to give in marriage to Cambyses King of Persia?

2 Reg. 12.

Herod. l. 2.

Impostours surprized.

So many Impostours there have been, who in all times sought to usurp Scepters and Crowns by admirable inventions: were they not all shamefully ruined in the rashnes of their enterprizes? Smerdes the Magician who had possessed the Kingdom of Persia by tricks and incomparable sleights, was he not torn in pieces as a victim by Darius, and other Princes? The false Alexander, who rebelled under Demetrius Soter, after some success, was he not vanquished under Nicanor, and slain in Arabia? Archelaus, who called himself the son of great Mithridates, overcome by Gabinius? Anduscus a man of no worth, who falsely boasting himself to be descended from Perseus King of Macedonia, and durst confront the Romans arms, was he not subdued by Metellus?

Val. l. 9. c. 16.

Ariarathres, who affected the Kingdom of Cappadocia by the same ways, sent to punishment by Cæsar?

Nicet. l. 3.

The false Alexius, who durst aspire to the Empire of Constantinople, slain by a Priest with his own sword, under the reign of Isaacus Angelus?

False Alexander discovered.

Josephus relateth, that pursuing the same ways, there was a young Jew who had been bred at Sydon, with the freed-man of a Roman Citizen, who having some resemblance of Alexander the son of Herod, whom the father had cruelly put to death, feigned he was the same Alexander, saying, Those to whom Herod had recommended this so barbarous an execution, conceived such horrour at it, that they resolved to save him, yet to secure their own lives upon the command imposed, they promised to conceal him till after the death of his father; which was done, he remaining unknown in the Citie of Sydon: But that he was now returned as from the gates of death, to demand his right, as being the indubitate and lawfull heir of the Kingdom. This Impostour had gained a subtile fellow, a servant of Herod's household, who taught him all the particulars of the Court, the better to colour his counterfeiting. He led the Bear through all the Citie with good success, and great applause of the people, who embraced this false Alexander, as a man returned back from the other world. For besides that the Jews were credulous enough in any thing which flattered them, they were ever much inclined to the race of poor Mariamne, whose son this man counterfeited to be: under this pretext he was very welcome into all the Cities where there were any Jews, and the poor Nation freely impoverished themselves, to afford some reasonable support to this imaginary King.

When he saw himself strong in credit and coyn, he was so confident as to go to Rome, to question the Crown against Herod's other sons; there wanted not those, whereof some countenancing him by credulity, others through the desire they had of alteration, bare him to the throne. He failed not to present himself before Augustus Cæsar, the God of fortune and distributour of Crowns, shewing he had been condemned to death by his own father through false rumours, but was delivered by the goodnes of the God he adored, and the mercifull hands of the ministers of execution, who durst not attempt on his person; beseeching him to pitie a fortune so wretched, and a poor King, who threw himself at his feet, as before the sanctuary of justice and mercy. Every one seemed already to favour him: But Augustus, a Monarch very penetrating, perceived this man tasted not of a Prince, for taking him by the hand, he found his skin rough, as having heretofore exercised servile labours. Hereupon the Emperour drew him aside, saying: Content thy self to have hitherto abused all the world; but know thou art now before Augustus, to whom thou must no more tell a lie, than unto God. I will pardon thee, on condition thou discover the truth of this matter; but if thou liest in any one point, thou art utterly lost. This man was so amazed with the lustre of such majesty, that prostrating himself at his feet, he began to confess all the imposture. Augustus perceived by the narration, he was none of the most daring in impostures, and said: Friend, I give thee thy life, on condition thou ransom it in my Galleys; thou hast a strong body, and canst well labour, the Scepter would have been too full of trouble; I will have thee take an Oar in hand, and live hereafter an honest man, without deceiving any.

As for the Doctour, who had been Tutour to this counterfeit Alexander, the Emperour observing him to be of a spirit more crafty, and accustomed to evil practises, caused him speedily to be put to death. One might make a huge Volume of such Impostours, as have been entrapped in their tricks; but satisfie your self with experience of Ages, and if you dare believe me, take in all your affairs a manner of proceeding noble, free, sincere, and true, throughly perswading your self, what the Wise-man said, That he who goes forward with simplicity, walketh most confidently.

XII. MA-

XII. MAXIM.

of REVENGE.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That it is good to reign over men like a Lion, and take revenge, not permitting freſh favours to aboliſh the memorie of old grievances.

THis maxim of the prophane Court more properly proceeds from the throat of Tygres and Lions, than the lips of men: but being harſh in execution, it is ever direfull in it's effects. The experience of Tiberiuſes, Caligulaes, Neroes, Domitians, Herodes, and ſo many other, who have purſued this with events ſo tragical, and lives ſo monſtrous, are fit leſſons to convince a heart, which yet retaineth ſome humanity.

How this maxim oppoſeth common ſenſe.

All power imployed onely to hurt is ever pernicious, and having made havock, it reſembleth the ruins of buildings, which overwhelm not any, but ſuch as they oppreſs by falling on them. Man is a creature more tender than any other, and muſt be handled with much reſpect: Nor is there any bloud ſo baſe, which ought not to be ſpared, as much as juſtice and reaſon may permit.

Notable verities.

The moſt part of men in theſe miſeries and weakneſſes of nature, ſeldom hit upon innocencie, but by paſſing through many errours. He who cannot tolerate ſome one, baniſheth all virtue. He muſt neceſſarily excuſe many things within himſelf, who pardons nothing in another. If he think himſelf a God, his nature ought to be mercie, and if a man, the experience of his own faults ſhould render him more favourable to the like in another.

It is a ſtrange folly to think greatly to proſper by rigour. For all done through fear being forced, cannot be of long laſting, unleſs the courſe of humanity fail. The ſavage beaſt is then much to be dreaded, when he ſees the knife on one ſide, and rails on the other. There is no ſtrength ſo feeble, which becomes not fierce upon the defenſive, within the limits of neceſſity. A man who menaceth every one with blows of a cudgel, ſword, or fire, ſhould remember he is not a Briareus with an hundred hands, and hath but one life. Now becoming cruel and inexorable, he makes himſelf an enemy of all mankind, which hath ſo many hands and ſo many lives. Such an one thinks he is well accompanied in revenge, who ſhall find himſelf all alone in peril.

The ſcope of the diſcourſe.

Then let us here ſay, there is nothing ſo Sovereign for the government of men, as the love of a neighbour, clemency, and pardon, and that the character of an excellent nature is to forgive all other, ſo much as reaſon may permit, and to pardon nothing in himſelf.

Excellencie of love.

Love is the firſt law of nature, and laſt accompliſhment of our felicity. Love from all eternity burneth in the boſom of the living God: and if he breath with his Word, as he doth with a reſpiration ſubſtantial, he breaths nought but love. He reſpiteth this love by neceſſity within himſelf, he inſpireth it by grace out of himſelf, and laſtly draws all to himſelf by love. The worthy S. Dyoniſius in the book of Divine attributes, diſtinguiſheth three ſorts of love, one is called circular, the other love in a right line, and the third oblike. Circular love properly is that which carrieth the ſoul with full flight into the boſom of God, and there holds it, as in a ſweet circle of raviſhing contempla-ἀνάλογος, ἰυφὸς, ἐλλιποὲς. S. Dyoniſ.

Diviſion of love.

THE HOLY COURT.

That mildneſs and pardon is the beſt revenge.

tions, which tranſport it from perfection to perfection, never finding end or beginning in the Divinity. Love in a right line is that which tends directly to creatures, by wayes not onely lawful and lawdable, loving them for God, of God and in God, but wayes likewiſe eaſie, and yielding to natural inclinations. Oblike love is that, which holdeth of both the other, and which imitating the Angels of Jacobs ladder, climbs to God by creatures, and deſcends to creatures by the love of God. But behold a love of enemies commanded by God, which ſeemeth not comprized in this diviſion, ſo much it ſeeketh out wayes alienated and inacceſſible to nature; yet I intend to ſhew, it may be found in the third part of this liſt, and that it is a love, which by the love of God deſcendeth unto the love of man to love him according to God: A love which I maintain to be poſſible, glorious, and neceſſarie in three proofs that ſhall make three heads of this diſcourſe.

Three proofs of this diſcourſe.

First reaſon, poſſibility of the love of enemies.

2. To deny the poſſibility of the love of enemies, is to bely the Goſpel and reaſon; the Goſpel which commandeth it, reaſon which fortifieth the juſtice of the commandment. The words ſpoken by our Saviour, Love your enemies, is not a counſel but a commandment: ſo explicateth the Councel of Carthage the fourth, chap. 93. the Councel of Agde Can. 22. and all holy Fathers, who lent the light of their ſtile to the firſt light in the Goſpel. Now to ſay God commandeth a thing impoſſible, is to make a tyranny of the Divinity, and to make a God like to the cruel duke of Muſcovia named Baſilides, who commanded from his ſubjects a tribute of ſweat and of nightingales in the midſt of winter.

Diligite inimicos veſtros.

Right of nature.

Reaſon dictateth to us this commandment is not onely of Divine right, but of nature; ſo far is it from being contrarie to nature, that to ſpeak naturally, we judge that ſhould be done to our neighbour, we would have done to our ſelves: and we deſire to be beloved by all the world, yea, by thoſe whom we have offended; we then neceſſarily conclude, we are bound to love thoſe who have done us ſome injury. Beſides, we well ſee, that to ſeek revenge by proper authority is to deſtroy the right of nature, and to make of a civil life, the life of a Cyclop, which were to have no other reaſon than ſtrength, nor limit but the ſword.

Anſwer to an objection.

Some will ſay it were good, could love as eaſily be put on as a ſhirt, but if we have much ado to love things indifferent, how can we affect bad and offenſive? Love ever purſueth good as the ſhadow the body, and God who made both love and nature, will not that it ſettle it ſelf unleſs there be ſome attractive or appearance of good, which inviteth it to love. Now what is lovely in an enemy, in whoſe perſon all is odious, yea, the very name? Behold how carnal Philoſophy with ſtrong paſſions, and weak reaſons, ſtrikes at the eternal Word; as if in the worſt man in the world, there could not ever be found ſomething which may be an object of reaſonable love. We are not commanded to affect him with a love of tenderneſs, but of reaſon. It is not said, you must love him as vicious, you must endear him as injurious or wicked, for that were to force nature; but we are commanded to love him as a man, to love him as a Christian, to love him as the work of God, and as a creature capable of life eternal: All things in the world (said an Ancient) have two handles, and two faces. Take a good hold-fast, look on the good countenance, and you shall find that easie, which you thought impossible.

Omne animal diligit simile sibi, sic & omnis homo proximum sibi. Eccl. 13. 19.

Amicabilia ad alterum sumuntur ex amicabilitate ad se. Arist. Ethick l. 4. c. 8. D. Tho. 2. 2. q. 26.

Let us also pass with Divinity to a reason more eminent, and say, it is not a thing against nature to love above nature, by the commandment of him who made nature. It is asked, whether a creature can naturally love God more than it self, since all that nature loveth, it loves as a thing united to it self, according to the saying of Philosophers: & all well considered, the most learned Divines answer, that the soul of man remaining within the lists of natural reason, should love the Creatour, more than its own life; because naturally the will well rectified hath a strong inclination to its end, which is the Sovereign Good, and the understanding necessarily judgeth the subsistence of essence increate and independent, which ought rather to be preserved than that of essence create. And if that be done by ways of nature, how may one say it is against nature to love an enemy, when there is the commandment and honour of God in it?

A remarkable consideration.

Nay, it is so much otherwise, that I will adde a reason, which perhaps may seem strange, but it is undoubted true. I say, it is much more hard to love ones self well, than an enemy. For I beseech you, why was it that the Son of God so much spake, laboured, wept, and bled, if not to teach how we should aptly love our selves? And wherefore were so many Saints, fifty, yea, threescore years at schoole in desarts, but to learn this hard lesson? And who hath ever thought any thing more difficult to be represt than self-love, which powerful in fury, and impotent within it self, forgetful of God, & still mindful of its own interests, ever gluttonous and still hungry, swalloweth like a gulph, sweepeth along like a torrent, beateth down like thunder, and in the end is buried in the ruins it made?

Self-love very hard to be represt.

If well to love ones self, this monster be necessarily be to tamed; who sees not there is much difficulty therein, and that on the other side there is nothing to be done but to love the gift of God in man, which cannot be ill but in your imagination? Why create we so many impediments in the love of an enemy, and find none in the love of our selves? Were it not natural, why in the Law of nature did Cato smilingly wipe away tough phlegme, which an enemy spit on his face when he pleaded a cause? Why was Socrates content, having received a blow on the cheek from an insolent man, to set over his head the scroul used on ancient tables, Lycus faciebat? Why did Augustus in an absolute sovereign power of revenge, tolerate with so much courtesy a certain writer named Timagenes, who perpetually barked against him? Traytours that we are to nature, so to cover our neglect and weakness with the pretext of nature.

Effects of the love of enemies in the Law of nature. Senec. l. 3. de irâ c. 38.

Second point of proofs drawn from the glory of pardon.

3. Let us yet adde more force to truth, and more scope to our pen. Let us enter into the second point of this discourse, which teacheth us the greatness and glory of a man, who knows how patiently to suffer an injury. The maxims of the world cease not to persecute us, and say: That by tolerating a first affront a second is provoked, that mildness and mansuetude serve as matter of mirth to insolency, and that a man never so much undervalueth himself, as by publishing his little courage in the revenge of an affront. Behold goodly propositions, which so oft have drawn bloud out of the veins of France in these detestable duels, nourishing afterward covert hatred and everlasting aversions. O ignorant that we are of Gods greatness, and ever unfaithful to his word! We fear by pardoning to be contemned, when the onely reason which God useth in the Gospel to perswade us unto pardon, is the excellency and glory derived from this action: for he saith. It is the means to become the children of God, who causeth his Sun to shine upon the good and the bad, who lets his showrs fall as well on the offenders, as the innocent.

Ut sitis filij Patris vestri qui in cœlis est, & qui solem suum facit oriri super bonos & malos, & pluit super justos & injustos. Mat. 5.

What beauty, what lustre, what splendour to enter into the number of the children of God! What elevation to be transported with full flight into conformities with the Omnipotent! The Prophet Isaiah saith, God measureth the waters with his fist, and poizeth the heavens in the palm of his hand; to signify, he goeth with a shut hand to punishments, signified by the waters, but proceeds with the whole extent of his goodness to reward, represented by the heavens. The rain-bow which God hath taken for the simbole of his reconciliation with man, environeth the throne of his Majesty in the Apocalips; and it is a bow without arrows (saith S. Ambrose) to instruct us, this divine Majesty is sweet and peaceful. So in the Prophet Ezechiel, after the description of this terrible cloud, which serves as a chariot for the God of Hoasts, you read these words: (a) And upward a face smiling with light; where Theodotion (as saith S Hierom) hath translated: (b) The west hath the highest place with the Creatour, meaning, the mildness of western winds, and coolenes from scorchings, is in the pavillion of glory, where this Sovereign Monarch inhabiteth. O wonder! God, who is a Sovereign Majesty, Sovereign Greatness, and Sovereign Justice, shewed himself in all times so patient to suffer men, who are the worst of all evils, that he had rather we doubted his Divinity, than make any question of his mildness: he had rather that by so patiently tolerating such infidels & sinners, the lips of blasphemers should receive encouragement to say there is no God, than by taking revenge on every sin in the heat of crime, it should be truely said there is a God, but he is ever armed with lightnings, & is inaccessible to the miseries of men, as those mountains, which all flaming cast out their entrails.

Ambros. 16. de arc & Noe. 17. Arcus contemtum ut cæret: sagitta magis terrere vult quàm ferire. (a) Et sursum quasi aspectus splendoris. (b) Aura in supernis Dei.

Non est Deus.

O Prodigie! God maketh it so great a matter to pardon an injury, that he rather permitteth his essence to be touched, than his clemency; his title of God to be taken away, than the glory of pardon: Shall we then place greatness in revenge?

Tertul. de pat. c. 2.

How many Pyrates are there, to whom God daily openeth seas? How many Idolaters, for whom he causeth stars to give light, fountains to stream, corn to grow, harvests to become yellow, and vines to ripen? How many ungrateful children, who take benefits from him as hogs do acorns, by grumbling against the tree which gave them, and never casting an eye to heaven? God notwithstanding suffereth them, and confounds their ingratitude by continually conferring favours, in an absolute power of revenge.

What answer we to that? Shall we make it our glory to do like the silly mouse, which bites that which pincheth her; or rather imitate the perfections of God, who never appears so great as in pardoning great injuries? What may we hope in revenge, but to enter into the community of a bruitish life? That is it bears do, tygers, serpents, and so many other creatures, which imploy their teeth, horns, poyson, and all the arms they have from nature to pursue revenge: Yet many times they measure it by the necessity of their defence: but to pardon an ungrateful man and an enemy, is to go out of our elements, and the base dross of earth, to enter into a sphere of glory and light, ranked in the number of sovereign beauties, to be an associate with so many noble and illustrious souls, who have in all Ages placed their glory on actions of mildness and patience.

Goodly company of courteous.

Let us, I pray you, enter into it with a firm footing & a bright forehead. There shall we see Moses at the feet of the Tabernacle to pray, & almost bind up the hands of God, to stay the course of his revenge against those, who persecuted him even to the Tabernacle.

There

There shall we see an Aaron in the majesty of his Priestly habit, bearing all the world, with the incensory and Sacrifice in hand, to appease the anger of God against his persecutours, when heaven was all on fire over their heads, and the earth became a gulph under their feet to swallow them. There shall we see a David bear honourable wounds, which the envenomed tongue of Shimei had thrown on his reputation, and to mount to the throne of Saul by the steps of patience witnessed in suffering Saul. There shall we see all the Martyrs laden with torments, opening as many mouths as they had wounds, to beg pardon for those who persecuted them, and in the midst of all the Martyrs, Jesus, the great and faithful witness, quickning by effusion of his bloud, even those who shed his. There finally shall we see Constantine laughing at his statues they stoned, a Theodosius pardoning such as dragged his an Andronicus, who at the taking of a Citie, embraced in sight of all the world him, who most eagerly had opposed him with all manner of outrage.

Let us now judge which is most glorious, either to enter by pardoning into the most noble and generous society, or in seeking revenge, to become of the number of certain wranglers, ruffians, men of the damned crew, and lastly creatures the most bruitish in the world, wholly inclined to revenge.

Third point of reasons, drawn from necessity. Dimitte nobis sicut dimittimus. Vade prius reconciliari fratri tuo, & tunc veniens offer munus tuum.

4. Let us conclude finally with the third reason, and withal say, that to pardon injuries is not so much an election of virtue, as a necessitie of salvation, since God will not we hope remission of our sins, but on condition we banish the resentment of injuries. Necessitie of salvation, since prayer and sacrifice, essential parts of our salvation, cannot subsist without the pardon of our neighbour. And pursuing this precept, we have a tradition from the Hebrews which saith: He who being entreated to pardon, after warning given before competent witnesses, if he shewed himself inexorable, was surnamed as with a title of infamy the Sinner, and held as one excommunicate, as a rotten member, and cut off from the society of the faithfull. I likewise say, necessity of salvation, since according to S. Augustine, without this virtue all devotion is but hypocrisie, all religion blasphemy, & all faith infidelity.

Augst. super Joan. homil. 10. Quid prodest quis credit & blasphemat? Adam illum in capite, blasphemus in corpore, &c.

To what purpose is it (saith this Prelate) to believe and blaspheme, to adore God in his head, and blaspheme him in his members? God loveth his body which is his Church; if you dissever your self from his body, he will not for all that forsake his own members. Hear you not the head which speaketh to you from heaven, saying: O Man, it is in vain thou honourest me, hating thy neighbour? If any one, whilst he is giving thee low obeysance with his head, tread on thy foot, thou wouldst in midst of all his complement cry out: Sir, you hurt me.

The horrour, and confusion of revenge.

What is there either more powerfull or persuasive, than these reasons? Yet notwithstanding among so many lightnings and thunders which encompass us on every side, there are to be found infinite many black souls in the world, which practise hatred, some in secret, some in publick, & make vaunts to eternize their revenge in the everlastingness of their punishments. What a horrour is it to see a man, who besought and entreated with all earnestness to pardon a brother, who hath offended him, answereth with disdain, furious and intolerable, he will never agree nor hold correspondence with him, no more than with a Turk or Moor? Ah Barbarian! Shut up that mouth, unhappy creature, and never open it, at least never open it before the wounds of Christ which bleed against thee. Thou wilt embrace no other friendship with thy brother but such as may be found between Turks and Moors. Lyer that thou art, seek yet out words more out-ragious to express the gall of thy passion: For, if thou knowest it not, Turks and Moors retain the amities and sense of man, whereof thou art despoiled. Turks even in the general desolation of Moors, entertained them into their Countreys, and afforded them helps, which thou hast denied thy flesh and bloud. If that seem worthy of thee, take a turbant, and become a Turk: But when thou hast put it on, yet shalt thou find laws which will oblige thee to love a man. The Turks have their Behiram, a feast, wherein they pardon all injuries; and wilt thou turn Turk to retain an injury? Out of God's Church, out of the society of men, out of nature, bloudy monster as thou art. Whete wilt thou any longer find place in the world, when thou once hast pulled down the Altars of clemency?

That also which is spoken in choller and hasty precipitation, might seem pardonable in repentance, were it not there are some, who in cold bloud foster suits, and immortal pertinacities, and which is worst, many times in publick shewing a fair face, in secret they transfix the heart of a poor man, like unto witches, they rip up the bowels of wife and children, to satisfie a revenge. Barbarous man, eat, rather eat the miserable heart, than pierce it perpetually with thy infernal bodkins. I would in the rest be silent, if there were not women, who being infirm in all things, get diabolical strength for revenge. What may we say of a creature of this sex, who being very slightly offended by another of the same sex, whilst she, advised by her Confessour, disposed her self to all duties of satisfaction, the other looked on her with a Gorgons eye, and foaming with anger, spitefully reviled her with bloudy words, so that nothing now remained but to take her by the hair, and drag her on the floar; which violence reproved by other, she repeated the burden of the old ballad, That she wished her not ill, but would never see her again. Inhumane and furious creature, a Megera, not a woman, what mouth will you hereafter bring to the Altars, which you seem to honour? Have you any other than that, by you polluted with this poisonous choller? What heart remains in you for God? Is there any part of it not steeped in gall? What expect you at the hower of death, and in the instant of your souls separation, but that God repeat unto you your own words: I wish thee no ill, I will not put thee upon the wheel nor the rack, I have neither rasors nor flames to torment thee; but thou never shalt see my face? Wilt thou then cherish quarrels, maintain sides, spread rumours either true or false, secretly undermine the fortune of men, and make thy self as inexorable to reconciliation, as thou art inflexible to reason? Lord have mercy on us, a cruel Angel will be sent against thee, an ill suit commenced, a ruinous business, a tedious sickness, a loss of goods, a confusion of understanding, and then shalt thou see, whether fire being in the four corners of thy house, thou still retainest the itch of revenge.

Semper jurgia quærit malus, Angelus autem crudelis mittetur contra eum. Proverb. 6.

But, you generous souls, march on by union to the chief of unities, and think the onely revenge, is well to be revenged on your self. If as I have shewed, pardon be possible, glorious, and necessarie, why foment we our curiosities to enflame our feavours? Let us take away these silly humane respects, this slender pride, which often broodeth under silken devotions, and which is the cause, that God is daily beheld and adored upon both the knees, by those who will not see nor speak to any that have committed some slight indiscretion, whilst feigning to honour God the Master with lips, the servant within the heart is strangled.

Goodly considerations to pacifie the mind.

Say (O Christian) say to thy self: Am I more powerfull in my small family than God in the universe? He daily endureth so many injuries, not threatening mortals with his thunders; what am I, who have ears so tender? Many have forgiven their deaths, and I cannot pardon a cold countenance, a silly word, a slender negligence. Is it a child, is it a young man hath offended? age excuseth him; is it a woman sex; a stranger? liberty; a friend? familiarity. He hath offended, he hath displeased thee once, and how many other times hath he done thee good offices? But this is not the first time; so much the better shall we bear, what we already have suffered.

Vid. de I

Custome of injuries is a good Mistresse of patience. He is a friend, be did what he would not; if an enemy, be hath done according to the world, what be ought. If be were wise, be hath not done it without reason; if simple, be deserves compassion. Who ever bit a dogg because be was bitten by a dogg? Or who ever entered into a combat of kicking with a Mule? If be did it in anger, let us give him leisure to come to himself, and be will correct himself without our trouble to give assistance. If it be a superiour or man of eminent quality, let us suffer that which God hath set over us; if a person of base condition, why by striving against him, shall we make him our equal? What pleasure hath a woman whose hands are so delicate, to seek to foul them with crushing flies and catterpillers? Let us reflect on the carriage of humane things, we are all faulty, and live among errours. There is no wise man whom some indiscretions escape not. We shall never live content, if we learn not to excuse in another what our selves are. Are we not ashamed to exercise in a life so short eternal enmities? Behold death comes to separate us, although we forcibly hold one another by the throat: let us give a little truce to our reason, light to our understanding, and rest to our ashes. JESUS in his last words recommended forgiveness to us, moistned with his tears, and bloud: Go we about to tear his Testament, that we afterward may pull his Images in pieces? The bloud of Just Abel still bubleth on the earth, and is unrevenged; shall we then seek to revenge it? O my God, we utterly renounce it with all our hearts, and are ready to seal peace with our bloud, that by thy bloud thou maist sign our mercy.

The twelfth EXAMPLE upon the twelfth MAXIM.

of Reconciliation.

CONSTANTIA.

THere is nothing more certain than that he, who seeks revenge, shall find the God of revenge. It followeth those who pursue it, and when they think to exercise it on others, they feel it falling on their own heads. It is onely proper to base and infamous spirits to endeavour to glut themselves with bloud, and to delight in the miseries of mortals, but souls the most noble, are ever beautified with the rays of clemency.

Zonar. Theophilus. a bloudy Emperour.

Theophilus, one of the most bloudy Emperours that ever ware the diadem, an enemy both of heaven and earth, of Saints and men, as he had lived on gall, would end in bloud. He felt his soul on his lips flying from him, and saw death near at hand, which he could not escape. It was time, he should now yield up life to others, when it appeared he could no more take it from them: But this wicked man, holding at that time Thephobus, one of his prime Captaines imprisoned in his own Palace, upon certain jealousies conceiv'd he was too able a man, and well worthy of Empire, commanded a little before his death, to have his head cut off; and causing it to be brought to his bed side, he took it by the hair, held it a long time in his hands, so much was he pleased with this massacre; then seriously beholding it, he cried out: It is true I shall no longer be Theophilus, nor art thou any more Theophobus. And many times repeating these words, he yielded up his damned ghost like a ravenous wolf, which passed from bloud to infernal flames, although certain revelations spake of his deliverance. Behold how having taken in his youth evil habits of cruelty and revenge, he persevered in them to his death, being besides most unfortunate and infamous in all his enterprises.

But contrariwise it is observed, all great-ones disposed to clemency, have been very glorious and most happy before God and men. I could here reherse very many, yet pursuing our design, I rest contented with relation of a notable pardon given by a Queen to a Prince, on a Friday in memory of our Saviours Passion.

It cannot be said, but so much the greater and more outragious injuries are, so much the more difficult is their pardon, especially when one hath full power of revenge in his hands. Now the injury whereof we speak, was the death of poor Conradinus, which well considered in all its circumstances, rendereth this clemency whereof I intend to speak much more admirable. Know then this Prince, son of the Emperour Conradus, went into Italy with a huge army to defend the inheritance of his Ancestours, pretending it to be unjustly usurped by the wily practises of Charls of Anjou: He stood at that time in the midst of his armies, sparkling like a star, full of fire & courage, when Pope Clement the fourth seeing him pass along with so much Nobility, said: Alas, what goodly victims are led to the Altar! His valour in the tenderness of his age, was as yet more innocent, than wary, and he had to do with a Captain, whom warlike experience had made more subtile in this profession. Conradinus.

Charls being ready to give him battel, resolved it was best to weary out this young vigour, & to afford him the bait of some success in appearance, the more easily to draw him into his snare. He gave the leading of one part of his army to a Captain of his called Alardus, commanding him to bear all the royal ensigns, as if he had been Charls of Anjou's person. Conradinus thinking he had nothing to do but to conquer what he saw before his eyes for decision of the difference, advanced his troups, which falling like a tempest upon the enemies, quickly dispatched Alardus, who was slain in the battel, as some histories record, carrying from all this ostent of regallity, a fatal glory into a tomb. He gave battle to Charls of Anjou.

This young Mars, supposing the war ended by the death of his Adversary, presently proclaimed victory, at which time Charls of Anjou, who lay hidden in a trench with the activest troups, as yet very fresh, came suddenly upon him. He did all that for his defence, which a brave spirit might in an evil fortune. But his army being cut in pieces, he was enforced to save himself, after the loss of twelve thousand dead in the place.

His calamity caused him to change the habit of a King, into that of a horse-keeper for his greater security, so much he feared to be known by those, who would decide the dint of war by his bloud. He embarked with his cousin Frederick of Austria, to pass unto Pisa, committing himself in this disguised habit to a Pilot, who much importuned him for his hire. He had not then about him either bread or money, so that he was constrained to pull off a ring, and leave it in pledge to the Pilot to assure the debt. He seeing these young men of a graceful garbe, and considering this jewel was not a wealth suitable to their habit, doubted some trick, and gave notice to the Governour, a crafty man, who complying with the times, laid hold of the Princes, and put them into the hands of the Conquerour. His taking.

Charls of Anjou much fearing this young Lion, forgat all generosity to serve his own turn, and did a most base act, detested by all understandings that have any humanity: which is, that having kept Conradinus a whole year in a straight prison, he assembled certain wicked Lawyers to decide the cause of one of the noblest spirits at that time under heaven, who to second the passion of their Master, rendered the laws criminal, and served themselves with written right, to kill a Prince contrary to the law of nature, judging him worthy of death, in that (said they) he disturbed the peace of the Church, and aspired to Empire. A scaffold was prepared in a publick place, all hanged with red, where Conradinus is brought with other Lords. A Protonotary clothed after the ancient fashion, mounteth into a chair set there for the purpose, and aloud pronounceth the wicked sentence. After which His sentence and death.

Conradinus

Conradinus raising himself, & casting an eye ful of fervour and flames on the Judge, said: Base and cruel slave as thou art, to open thy mouth to condemn thy Sovereign.

It was a lamentable thing to see this great Prince on a scaffold, in so tender years, wise as an Apollo, beautiful as an Amazon, and valiant as an Achilles, to leave his head under the sword of an Executioner; in the place where he hoped to crown it. He called heaven & earth to bear witness of Charls his cruelty, who unseen beheld this goodly spectacle frō an high turret. He complained that his goods being taken from him, they robbed him of his life as a thief, that the blossom of his age was cut off by the hand of a hang-man, taking away his head to bereave him of the Crown; lastly throwing down his glove, demanded an account of this inhumanity. Then seeing his Cousin Frederick's head to fall before him, he took it, kissed it, and laid it to his bosom, asking pardon of it, as if he had been the cause of his disaster, in having been the companion of his valour. This great heart wanting tears to deplore it self, wept over a friend, and finishing his sorrows with his life, stretched out his neck to the Minister of justice. Behold how Charls, who had been treated with all humanity in the prisons of Sarazens, used a Christian Prince: so true it proves, that ambition seemeth to blot out the character of Christianity, to put in the place of it some thing worse than the Turbant.

This death lamented through all the world, yea, which maketh Theaters still mourn, sensibly struck the heart of Queen Constantia his Aunt, wife of Peter of Arragon: She bewailed the poor Prince with tears, which could never be dried up, as one whom she dearly loved, and then again representing to her self so many virtues and delights, drowned in such generous bloud, and so unworthily shed, her heart dissolved into sorrow. But as she was drenched in tears, so her husband thundred in arms to revenge his death.

Collenutius histor. Neapol. l. 5. c. 4. & 5.

He rigged out a fleet of ships, the charge whereof he recommended to Roger de Loria, to assail Charls the second, Prince of Salerno, the onely son of Charls of Anjou, who commanded in the absence of his father. The admiral of the Arragonian failed not to encounter him, and fought so furiously with him, that having sunck many of his ships, he took him prisoner, and brought him into Sicily, where Queen Constantia was, expecting the event of this battle. She failed not to cause the heads of many Gentlemen to be cut off in revenge of Conradinus, so to moisten his ashes with the bloud of his enemies. Charls the Kings onely son was set apart with nine principal Lords of the Army, and left to the discretion of Constantia. Her wound was still all bloudy, and the greatest of the Kingdom counselled her speedily to put to death the son of her capital enemy, yea, the people mutined for this execution: which was the cause, the Queen having taken order for his arraignment, and he thereupon condemned to death, she on a Friday morning sent him word, it was now time to dispose himself for his last hour. The Prince, nephew to S. Lewis, and who had some sense of his uncles piety, very couragiously received these tidings, saying.

The son of Charls of Anjou taken.

That besides other courteses he had received from the Queen in prison, she did him a singular favour to appoint the day of his death on a Friday, and that it was good reason he should die culpable on the day, whereon Christ died innocent.

This speech was related to Queen Constantia, who was therewith much moved, and having some space bethought her self, she replyed:

An excellent passage of clemency.

Tell Prince Charls, if he take contentment to suffer death on a Friday, I will likewise find out mine own satisfaction to forgive him on the same day, that Jesus signed the pardon of his Executioners with his proper bloud. God forbid I shed the bloud of a man, on the day my Master poured out his for me. Although time surprize me in the dolour of my wounds, I will not rest upon the bitterness of revenge. I freely pardon him, and it shall not be my fault, that he is not at this instant in full liberty.

This magnanimous heart caused the execution to be staied, yet fearing if she left him to himself, the people might tear him in pieces, she sent him to the King her husband, entreating by all which was most precious unto him, to save his life, and send him back to his Father. Peter of Arragon, who sought his own accommodation in so good a prize, freed him from danger of death, yet enlarged him not suddenly. For his deliverance must come from a hand wholly celestial.

Sylvester Pruere writes, that lying long imprisoned in the City of Barcellon, the day of S. Mary Magdalen aproaching, who was his great Patroness, he disposed himself to a singular devotion, fasting, confessing his sins, communicating, begging of her with tears to deliver him from this captivity. Heaven was not deaf to his prayers. Behold on the day of the feast he perceived a Lady full of Majesty, who commanded him to follow her, at which words, he felt as it were a diffusion of extraordinary joy spread over his heart. He followed her step by step, as a man rapt, and seeing all the gates flie open before her without resistance, and finding himself so cheerful, that his body seemed to have put on the nature of a spirit, he well perceived heaven wrought wonders for him. The Lady looking on him after she had gone some part of the way, asked him where he thought he was; to which he replied, that he imagined himself to be yet in the Territory of Barcellon. Charls you are deceived (said she) you are in the County of Provence, a league from Narbon, and thereupon she vanished. Charls not at all doubting the miracle, nor the protection of S. Mary Magdalen, prostrated himself on the earth, adoring the power of God in his Saints, caused a fair Church to be built to this most blessed woman, and a Cross to be erected in the place where she left him, which was called the Cross of the place: Thus was God pleased to ratifie by so great miracles the pardon Constantia had given to Prince Charls.

I will shut up this discourse with a passage of so rare clemency of a Monarch, offended in the honour of a daughter of his, by a mean vassal, as it seems could never have fallen but into the heart of a Charlemaigne.

Curio l. 2. rerum Chronologicarum.

It is to this purpose recounted, that one Eginardus, who was Secretary to the Prince, having placed his affections much higher than his condition admitted, made love to one of his daughters, which was in mine opinion natural; who seeing this man of a brave spirit, and a grace suitable, thought not him too low for her, whom merit had so eminently raised above his birth. She affected him, and gave him too free access to her person, so far as to suffer him to have recourse unto her, to laugh, and sport in her chamber on evenings, which ought to have been kept as a sanctuary, wherein relicks are preserved. It happened upon a winters night, these two amorous hearts, having inwardly so much fire that they scarcely could think upon the cold, Eginardus, (ever hastening his approches, and being very negligent in his returns) had somewhat too much slackened his departure. The snow mean while raised a rampart, which troubled them both when he thought to go out. Time pressed him to leave her, and heaven had stopped up the way of his passage. It was not tolerable for him to go forward. Eginardus feared to be known by his feet, and the Lady thought it not any matter at all to see the prints of such steps about her door. They being much perplexed, love, which taketh the diadem of majesty from Queens, so soon as they submit to its tyranny, made her do an act for a lover, which had she done for a poor man, it would have been the means to place her among the great Saints of her time. She tooke this Goodness and indulgence of Charlemaigne.

Gentleman upon her shoulders, and carried him all the length of the Court to his chamber, he never setting foot to the ground, that so the next day no impression might be seen of his footing. It is true which a holy Father saith, that if hell lay on the shoulders of love, love would find courage enough to bear it. But it hath more facilitie to undertake, than prudence to hide it self, the eye of God not permitting these follies should either be concealed or unpunished. Charlemaign, who had not so much affection in store for women, that he spent not some nights in studie, watched this night, and hearing a noise opened the window, and perceived this prettie prank, at which he could not tell whether he were best to be angrie or to laugh.

The next day in a great assembly of Lords, and in the presence of his daughter and Eginardus, he proposed the matter past in covert tearms, asking what punishment might a servant seem worthie of, who made use of a Kings daughter as of a Mule, and caused himself to be carried on her shoulders in the midst of winter, through night, snow, and all sharpness of the season. Every one gave hereupon his opinion, and there was not any who condemned not this insolent man to death. The Princess and Secretarie changed colour, thinking nothing remained for them, but to be flayed alive. But the Emperour looking on his Secretarie with a smooth brow, said: Eginardus, hadst thou loved the Princess my daughter, thou oughtest to have come freely to her father, who should dispose of her libertie, and not to play these pranks, which have made thee worthy of death, were not my clemency much greater than the respect thou hast born to my person. I now at this present give thee two lives, the one in preserving thine, the other in delivering her to thee, in whom thy soul more survives, than in the body it animateth. Take thy fair portress in marriage, and both of you learn to fear God, and to play the good husbands. These lovers thought they were in an instant drawn out of the depth of Hell to ascend to heaven, and all the Court stood infinitly in admiration of this judgement. It appears by the narration, what was the mild temper of Charlemaign in this point, and that he followed the counsel of S. Ambrose, who advised a Father named Sisinnius to receive his son with a wife he had taken for love. For receiving them both (said he) you will make them better, rejecting them, render them worse. The goodness of these great hearts for all that, justifieth not the errours of youth, which grievously offendeth, when it undertaketh resolutions in this kind, not consulting with those to whom it oweth life.

Epist. l. 8. ep. 64. Si bonam duxit, acquisivit tibi gratiam: Si erravit accipiendo meliores facies, refutando deteriores.

XIII. MAXIM.

Of the Epicurean life.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That the flesh must be daintily used, and all possible contentment given to the mind.

THE HOLY COURT.

That life without crosses, and flesh void of mortification, is the sepulcher of a living man.

EXperience teacheth us, there is in the World a sect of reformed Epicures, who do not openly profess the bruitishness of those infamous spirits, which are drenched in gourmandize and lust, but take Maxims more refined, that have (as they say) no other aim, but to make a man truly contented. For which purpose, they promise themselves to drive all objects from their minds, which may bring the least disgust, and to afford the bodie all pleasures which may preserve it in a flourishing health, accompanied with grace, vigour, and vivacity of senses.

The Philosophie of Epicurus swayeth in the world.

Here may the judicious observe, that such was the doctrine of ancient Epicurus. For although many make a monster of him, all drowned in ordure and prodigious pleasure, yet it is very easie to prove, that he never went about to countenance those bruitish ones, who through exorbitance of lusts ruin all the contentments of the mind and bodie: But he wholly inclined to find out all the pleasures of nature, and to banish any impediments which might make impression on the soul or bodie. For which cause I think Theodoret mistook him, when he made him so gluttonous, as to contend with Jupiter about a sop, and that Nicetas, who representeth him so licourish after honied tarts, well understood him not: For Tertullian, S. Hieron, Laertius, and Seneca, who better noted his doctrine, assure us he was a very sober man, and speaketh not in his writings but of pulse and fruits; not for the honour he bare to the virtue of temperance, but for that it seemed he found himself better disposed in this frugality, than in superfluities, the tormentours of health. Yet notwithstanding he is ever greatly reprehensible, in that he so deifieth the contentments of nature, and this kind of life free from bodily pain and minds unquiet, that he makes a Sovereign God of it, honouring and adoring it as a Divinity.

Theodor. l. 2. Therap. Nicet. 2. Thesau. c. 1. Tertul. apol. c. 38. Hieron. 2. in Jovin. Laertius. lib. 10. Senec. l. de vitâ beatâ.

From this principle he derived conclusions, which led to a life wholly replenished with easeful idleness, much prejudicial to civil society. For he would not have a wise man intermeddle in state-affairs, nor undertake designs for the good of Common-wealths, for fear of troubling the repose of his mind, and give a most infamous advise, to tast the pleasures of marriage, without taking care for the education of children, because it was painfull: whereupon Arianus in Epictetus reprocheth him, that his father and mother would have smothered him in the cradle, had they known such pestilent words should come from his lips.

Arian l. 4. c. 20.

He now-adayes is waited on by many, who take other wayes than he did, to arrive at the practise of his Maxims. For they use their bodies to such effeminacie, that they seem single in their kind, and feed their minds what they can with tender thoughts, free from any care or affair, which may divert contentment, so that they suffer themselves with all endeavour to be dissolved in an easie truantly life, wholly to enjoy themselves.

2. Now you, who incline to this Sect, by ill habits taken in the great service you daily do your bodies, I beseech you consider how far it is alienated both from reason and Christianity. First, see you not that to imagine here on earth a life without pain, is to frame chymraes in your mind; since the world is a soil as natural for thorns, as barren of violets. All the sons of

1. Reason against this Maxim of riot. Occupatio magna creata est omnibus hominibus, & jugum grave su- per filiis Adam. Eccl. 40. Isle of amber, felicitie of Epicurus. Garcias.

of Adam (saith the Scripture) have trouble enough to carrie their yoke. Where find you this perpetual quiet of mind, this freedom from bodily disturbances which you figure in your thoughts? It is in my opinion not unlike the little Island of amber-greece, whereof Garcias speaketh, which was perceived by certain merchants, who sayled along on the Ocean. But they much labouring to take it, in such proportion as they advanced towards it, it recoyled back, and when they thought to touch it, it was lost in the waves. I dare affirm you pursue an Island more imaginarie than that, running with full speed after the false pleasures of Epicurus. It is a fantasie that mocketh you, and which amuzeth you on the surges of this life, to make you perish, seeing according to Clemens Alexandrinus, sensuality is the shipwrack of spiritual life.

Clemens Alex. Pædag. l. 3. c. 7.

A man must not be born of a mother to escape worldly molestations, since the Scripture, which cannot lie teacheth us, travell is as naturall for the children of women as flight for birds. How could there be pleasures of bodie without pain, since pleasures would never be pleasures if they had not been preceded by some incommodities? It is a witty reason of the Philosopher Simplicius, which was well considered by S. Bernard. (a) Take away hunger (saith he) and there is no pleasure in viands; take away thirst, and the most chrystal fountains would be unto you but as marishes. Hot things must be had to seek for coolnes, and cold to be delighted with heat. If you take away evil and necessitie, you take away the most active spur which sensualitie hath over nature.

Homo nascitur ad laborem, & avis ad volatum. Job 57. Reason of Simplicius.

(a) S. Bern. tract. de gratia, & lib. arbitrio. Tolle famem, & panem non curabis; Tolle sitim & limpidissimum fontem quasi pabulum respicies, umbram non quærit nisi æstuans; solem non curat, nisi algens.

The world which is so old, the earth so fertile, experience so knowing, and histories so curious, could not this day produce one sole man absolutely happie and content. The great Genius of nature Plinie, who searched into all the corners of the world to meet with a man, such as Epicurus framed in his idæa, assureth us, that after a very long enquiry, he found but one, a Musician named (b) Xenophilus, who was said to have arrived to the age of an hundred and five years, free from disquiet or sickness. This is a Rodomontado of Greece, which went about to make him brave it on paper: But might we have penetrated into his heart, and taken all the parts of his life asunder, I am perswaded we might presently find somewhat, for which he should be banished out of the imaginarie Palace of felicitie. I can as soon believe Xenophilus came into the world free from original sin, as imagine he went out of it exempt from any dolour. It were as easie to sayl prosperously amidst the tempests of the Ocean, having no other vessel but a tortoyse shell, as to live in the world without suffering. We are condemned to it before we are born, and our tears teach us this decree before we issue from our mothers womb.

(b) Plin. l. 7. c. 50. One sole man happie.

Bern. l. 2. de consid. c. 3. Quid enim calamitate vacat nascenti in peccato? fragili corpore, mente sterili, cui infirmitas corporis fatuitas cordis, cumulatur tradux fortis mortis additione. The whole world an enemy of curiositie.

What remaineth (sayes S. Bernard) to finish the description of man, and to make him a true picture of calamity, since he entereth into the world by the gate of sin, with a bodie frail, a mind barren; weakness of mortal Members, and stupiditie of heart being given him as a portion of his birth, and a necessitie of his condition? The miserable Epicurus, who was the first Authour of this lazie life, and who sought by speculation and practise into all he could imagine, bending all his thoughts and actions to this purpose, found he satisfaction in this search? Histories tell us, this great father of the happie had a stone in his bladder, which infinitly pained him: and this being a time, that knew not the operations now in use to deliver mortals from these vexations, he carried his affliction to the grave, dying with enraged dolour. Upon this you shall observe, that it seems God, nature, elements, and men conspire to torment one, who seeks with over-much curiosity, and too seriously the contentments of his bodie, and the ease of his mind.

3. But, that I may here produce a second reason, although you were permitted to please your sensuality throughout the whole latitude of your desires, and the capacitie thereof, what should you elis do, but serve a miserable bodie, and tie your self all your life time to the preservation of a fool and sick man? If you live according to the flesh, you shall die, said the Apostle to the Romans. All great spirits, who have a feeling of their extraction, the beauty and nobility of their souls, take not the necessities of life but with some shame and sorrow. They regard the flesh as the prison of a spirit immortal, and think to flatter it, is to strangle the better part of themselves, which resteth in the understanding. The Philosopher Plotinus, who was renowned as the worlds Oracle, could not endure to have his picture taken, saying, he had trouble enough to suffer a wretched bodie, without multiplying the figures thereof by the help of painting; and you imagine it is a virtue of the times to adore it, and afford it submissions which pass to the utmost period of servitude. How much the more we profit in the libertie of God's children, so much the more we proceed in disengagement from sense, and enter as into the sanctuarie of souls, there to consult on truths, and understand reasons, which vindicate us from the dregs of the world, to give us passage into the societie of Angels.

2. Reason.

Rom. 6. Great spirits enemies of the flesh.

Plotin. Porphiry upon his life.

It is a strange matter, that the subtile Divine Scotus thinks, that to understand and know objects by sensible representations, passing through the gate of our sense, and striking our imagination, is a punishment from original sin. He finds it is a harsh subjection, to make application to the bodie; to derive colours, odours, and sounds from it, which notwithstanding seemeth as innocent as the purchase of bees, who suck honie out of flowers: and shall we think there can be any felicitie to plunge our judgement into all the voluptuous pleasures of flesh?

Discourse of Scotus, concerning sense. Scotus locis disquisit. 1. indicatis.

Know we not, it many times doth to the soul, as the heron to the faulcon? He endeavoureth to flie above him, and to wet his wings with his excrements, to make his flight heavie, and render his purpose unprofitable. Alas, how many times feel we the vigour of our reason enervated by the assaults of concupiscence, which contracteth the like advantage from it's ordures, for the enthralment of the spirit! And why would we second it's violence by our weakness?

An observation of Camerarius concerning the heron.

I moreover demand of you, what can you hope from so punctually observing your bodie? You are not a Geryon with three heads and three throats: There needs but a little to fill you. For though your concupiscence be infinite, yet are your senses finite, & many times pleasure overwhelms them before they afford themselves the leisure of tasting them. If you resolve so curiously to attend the search of pleasures, you should desire the spirit of a horse, to enjoy them with the more vigour and liberty. But what sense is there to have the soul of a man, and seek to be glutted with the mire of the earth: as if one would feed a Phœnix with cartion, on which ravens live? when you have done all you can to make your self happie by diversity of worldly pleasures, beasts will ever have more than you. For their sensitive souls much sooner meet the height of nature; and as their pleasures are free from shame, so they drag not sorrow after them. They are not gnawn with cares by desiring things needless, they take what the elements afford them, and what the industry of man manures for them, & know not what it is to find poisonous maladies in the most ardent pleasures. sensuality may imagine. But admit you were resolved to become a beast with the disciples of Epicurus, yet ought you not for all that, according to your own limits, surpass the brutishnes of beasts. And I pray tell me, where is the beast which hath never so little generosity, would not think it self most miserable, if it were condemned to eat and drink perpetually, and grow lazy in an idle life? They frame themselves very willingly to the exercises nature appointed them for the service of man; and a man thinks it a great Philosophy to consecrate all the parts of his bodie to sensuality, no whit considering, he is made for the contemplation of things Divine, for the love and fruition of the first cause.

Instance upon the weaknes and miserie in service of the body.

Avicenna lib. de primâ Philosoph. 9. c. 1. apud Javellum. Notable saying of Avicen.

Avicen, an excellent wit, by the unhappiness of his birth ranked in the sect of Mahomet, coming to consider this false Prophet had placed the beatitude of the other life in the injoying sensual pleasures, was so ashamed of it, that he shrunk from his Prophet, that he might not betray his reason. The law (saith he) which Mahomet gave us, considered beatitude and miserie within the limits of the bodie: but there are promises, and hopes of other blessings much more excellent, and which cannot be conceived but by the force of a most purified understandng. Which is the cause, wise divines ever set their love on the blessings of spirit, without any account taken of those of sense, in comparison of the felicitie we one day pretend to have in the union of our immortal spirit with the first Verity. What can our worldlings answer to this Arabian? Should they not blush with shame, to see a man bred in the school of Epicurus, gone out of it to teach us the Maxim of Christianity?

Felicitas est conjunctio cum primâ Veritate.

3. Reason. Tyranny of ryot.

4. Finally, to conclude this discourse with a third reason, although the service of the bodie were possible, and not shameful to you, do you not well see it is tyrannical, and that Epicurus himself, wholly bent to pleasure, cut off all he could from nature for this onely cause, which made him think over-much care of the body was extreamly opposite to felicitie? The Platonists said, our souls were of an extraction wholly celestial, and sent from heaven to serve God on earth, in imitation of the service Angels do to him in heaven, but that many of those poor souls forgetting their original, instead of going directly to the Temple of virtue, stood amuzed in the house of a Magician, which was the flesh, that enchanted them with his charms, & had cast them into fetters, where they were enforced to suffer a painful bondage, from whence there were but two passages, wisdom, or death. To this Synesius made allusion in his Hymns, complaining, his soul from a servant of God was become a slave of matter, which had bewitched it by wily practises. And verily who can sufficiently express the servitude a soul suffers, fast linked to flesh, and which onely endeavours to dandle it, hoping by this means to give true contentment to the mind? First, pleasures are not exposed now-adayes to all the world, as the water of a river: such an one there is, who hath sold himself for the life of a hog, who will never have his fill of hogs draft, as S. Peter Chrysologus said of the prodigal child. Men covetous of bodily riches would willingly make themselves horns and claws of iron, to speak with the wise Plato, of purpose to take and defend, the one his wealth, the other his loathsome pleasures. Many times iron gates must be broken to purchase a fruition, which draweth along with it a thousand disturbances. Behold how a man who is excessively enamoured of his own health, becomes suppliant and servile to his bodie. He fears his proper dyet, all kind of airs are dreadful to him; nor can he take but with distrust those very comforts which afford him life. He makes of his stomach a soyl of drugs; he perpetually consulteth with his Physicians; he tells his infirmities to all the world; he seeks out extraordinarie cures, as he often hath imaginarie diseases; he lives in an afflicting equality, & would many times rather transgress Gods ten commandments, than fail in one of Hypocrates aphorisms. I leave you to think, what death were not much sweeter, than health so religiously preserved.

Opinion of Platonists.

Αλλα μιμνήσκει ψυχὴν ἔνδυτος ἥλιος. Synes. hym. 3.

Miser qui porcum esurit, & defecit in saginam. Chrysol. serm. de prodigo. Plato. 9. de Rep.

Inordinate love of health.

Slavery of women. Cultu magna sura, magna

See now on the other side a worldly woman, who feeleth her beautie (that short tyrannie) already in the wain, and yet would cherish it in the opinion of men, who heretofore adored it; or of such likewise, who may be taken in the same snare. What doth not this silly creature to make her self to be esteemed fair? What time wasteth she not to seem slender, to wash, paint, to divide the white, well to mingle the red, to powder her hair, to make her self ey-browes, to preserve the whiteness of her teeth, to set a vermillion tincture on her lips, little patches like flies on her cheeks, choose stuffs, and think of new fashions. What torture inflicteth she not on her bodie with those iron stayes and whale-bones? How many turns maketh she dayly before a looking-glass? What perplexities of mind, what apprehensions, least her defects may appear? And what discontent, when after such torments so miserably ended, she sees her self despised by men, before she becomes the food of worms? What Captain of a Galley was ever so cruel to fettered slaves, as vanity, and love of the body are to the soul? Pursue the track of all other pleasures, and you shall find them painful and dolorous; and in the end you will be enforced to say, there is no worse bondage than that which is afforded to wretched flesh. The Prophet Esay speaking of punishments due to sinners & worldlings, saith, they are written on box, whereupon we may say with S. Hierom, it is to shew the lasting of it, since characters graven on such kind of wood, cannot so easily be taken off. But I here consider a secret, which teacheth me box bears no fruit, onely satisfied to produce a flower, which otherwise making a goodly shew, killeth bees that suck it. The Prophet in this figure presented to us a lively image of pleasure, which surprizeth the eyes by a vain illusion, whilest it conveieth poison into the heart. Rest then assured, you shal never meet with solid contentment of mind, but by the wayes the Saviour of the world shewed us on earth to transfer us to Heaven. The just are here below, as little halcyons on the trembling of waters, or nightingales on thorns. They find their joys amongst holy tears, and their delights in austerities of life. There is nothing so Sovereign, as early to accustom to depend little on your body, and quickly to forsake a thousand things by election, which you shall be enforced to abandon of necessitie. When a manner of virtuous life is chosen, and which hath some austerity in it, custom makes it sweet, grace fortifieth it, perseverance nourisheth it, and glorie crowns it. How many worldlings dayly putrifie in a miserable condition, who have from their tender age yielded all submission to their flesh, and how many delicate bodies in monasteries have we seen, which the whole world condemned to the beer from their entering into religion, to go out of hair-cloth, ashes, & fasts, as a Phœnix from her tomb? A life without crosses is a dead sea, which breedeth nought but stench and sterility: but austerity is like the Ægyptian thorn, which had an excellent grace in crowns. We are called to Christianity, to bear a God crucified on our flesh, and as it were impressed with the Characters of Divine love. Let us carefully preserve our selves from prostituting members to sensuality, made to be the Temple of the living God, and the ornament of Paradise. Holy Job was in state so lamentable, that those who beheld him could scarcely tell, whether it were a man reduced into a dunghil, or a dunghil into the shape of a man: Notwithstanding, in the midst of these smarting dolours, which over-ran all his body, and the afflictions which assailed his mind, he received so unspeakable comforts from God, that himself confesseth to have nothing so strange in his own person, as his proper torments. Behold the reason why he exalted himself on his dunghil, as upon a throne of virtue, he adorned himself with his wounds as with a royal purple, he took the Scepter in hand over all effeminacies of body, and pronounced Oracles unto us, which to all Ages shew, that there is neither evil nor affliction wherein God maketh not his miracles of our pains, and his glorie of our rewards.

virtutis in via. Cato Censorius.

Scribe ei super buxum. Isai 30. 8. Observation upon Esay. Flower of box.

Life of the Just.

Glorificate, & portate Deum in corpore vestro.

Mirabiliter me crucias. Job. 10.

Te

The thirteenth EXAMPLE upon the thirteenth MAXIM.

The Miserable event of Lust.

AMMON the Son of DAVID.

IT is not one of the least miseries, of the greatest of all evils, I mean sin, that the ill example which often accompanieth it, doth likewise survive it. It is, to say truly, a most bitter fruit of this direful tree, or rather a scien which it in growing produceth, and which being fed from it's sap, stands upright after the fall of it. Nor is it strange, that when once the mercy of God, (onely able for this great work) hath stifled the monster sin in the soul of parents, yet fails it not (though wholly dead) to infect their families, and poison their posteritie with the stench of it's ordure.

David that great Prince, that King according to Gods heart, had lost the affections and sweet indulgencies of it, by an adultery and an homicide. He afterward weepeth, he humbly prayeth, he lowdly cries, and God, who is willing to be moved, turneth his eyes from his crimes, and that he may no more hereafter see them, applies the sponge to cleanse them: yet behold long after Ammon, one of his children, who casteth an eye on these bad lessons, & though blotted out, fails not to read them, and to learn thence the science of his own ruin. This unhappy Prince scorns to reflect on the mild temper, the pennance and zeal of his father, to look on his exorbitancies. He cannot see this Sun but in eclipse, and not seeking to make choice among so many eminent virtues, which had made him happie, he will not follow his steps but in a path, where needs he must meet with ill adventures.

Although the holy Scripture speaketh not of the wicked deportments of this Prince until his incest, yet there is a great probability he began not at the end, nor mounted this tower of confusion by the top, but rather arrived thither by the degrees of a life irregular, effeminate, and freed from the care of the soul, wholly to resign himself to the service of the bodie and it's concupiscence. But in so much as loathing, which always waits very near upon the most exquisite pleasures, is wont every moment to put the levity of sinners upon new objects, and in that, besides the pride of those who hate thee, (O God supremely amiable) perpetually mounteth, until their giddiness precipitate them into the abyss. Behold here our wicked one, our Epicure, before there was an Epicure in the world, who rejecteth mean crimes, distasteth common pleasures, and projecteth an incest with his own sister, not considering how unreasonable it is to sacrifice the honour of the royal house, the tranquility of his father, his soul and salvation, to the distemper of his fancy.

Ammon plotteth incest with his sister.

He turneth his eyes from heaven, and from the God of heaven, whose wonders his father had so often sung unto him; he is wholly for passion which predominateth over him, nor entertains any other cogitations but to satisfie it. Already this feaver, which takes away his sense, hath enflamed his bloud, leaving him nought in his veins, but the fire of hel, which more and more encreaseth. The contagion of this unsound soul spreads over the bodie. Behold (saith the historie) he fals sick for the love of his sister, who hath nothing at all in her, which can displease him, but her chastitie; because that sets before him the great difficulties of his enterprize. He hath a friend, and this proves his main unhappiness; a worldly wise one, a flattering friend, a companion of his riots: but such amities which deserve not the name, resemble false fires, which seeming all enflamed, are nothing els but smoke very easily dissipated, and whose bright splendour onely serves to lead into precipices.

Jonadab counselleth Ammon to incest with his sister Thamar.

This was Jonadab, one of David's Nephews, who having searched into the change both of his countenance and humour, quickly understood the reason of it from his lips, so that too easily complying with his passion, he lastly gave him this counsel: Lie (saith he) on your bed, counterfeit sickness, the King doubtless will visit you, you shall beg of him that your sister Thamar may come to you to prepare your diet, and he without doubt will assent to it.

Cruel friend, nay rather soothing enemy, what doest thou? Thou well knowest that thus flexibly to serve the passion of this violent spirit, thou subjectest him to the extremitie of all unhappiness. Thou strangle'st this Prince whilst thou flatterest him, and in lieu of good offices, giv'st him a hand to lead him down into ruin. Were it not better to use fire and steel for the cure of this mad man, than to comply with his malady to render it incurable? Were it not better with a bitter, but charitable correction, to purge his bad humours, than to powr into him a pleasing poison?

There is nothing more faithfully or more readily executed, than an ill advise; quickly our amourist is in his bed, he entreateth Thamar of the King, who came to visit him; where behold the father, too good for so bad a son, grants what he demandeth. The poor virgin likewise obeyeth the commands of her father, and the suggestions of her own heart, which had but too much tenderness towards so execrable a brother. She runs like an innocent victim to the knife, which must cut her throat, she follows the bait not doubting the hook, and goeth fearless into a place, where she must loose all. This dissembling sick man at first refuseth the broths she had prepared to procure him an appetite, but having given command all should depart out of the chamber, desires his sister to bring them in: she who nothing doubted the practise, readily goes in, offers them to him, but the enraged creature seizeth on her, and requires to lie with her.

Ammon dissembleth sickness.

The poor Princess surprized in this attempt, seeks to temper him with sweet words. Alas, dear brother (saith she) commit not such a violence upon me, remember with your self this abomination is without example in Israel. Banish such thoughts from you, and take heed you enterprize not an act, which will among the wise be esteemed an unspeakable folly. Whither shall I go after such a shame, or what will you do, when you have purchased so ill reputation? By all means speak to the King, he is a good father, he perhaps will freely afford you that, which you by violence would take. The enraged monster will not so much as understand her, he forceth her, he finds himself to be the stronger, and makes use of this advantage for the satisfaction of a passion, nay rather of a fury, which even the most part of bruit beasts abhor.

Thamars advise.

It is a strange thing, how those who seek their contentment in the contempt of God and his ordinances, make an ill reckoning. They meet with worm-wood even in honey: their fingers are pricked whilst they gather roses, the odour of which so soon paineth them, and in a word they see, that loathing concludeth, what was begun by disturbances and impatience. This inconstant spirit promised himself pleasures without anxiety or period, but behold him foiled in the first fruition. This infinite love finds it's end in the beginning, or rather it's change into aversion & hatred.

Behold he presently despiseth his sister, yea, excessively: mark the Scripture: The hatred was much greater, than was ever the affection. He commands her to be gone, and she exaggerating the second offence committed by him, his so unworthy usage of her after such an outrage, he willeth one of his servants to drive her out, and shut the door after her. Who can describe the griefs and agonies of this afflicted creature, defamed by her brother, and thrust by a groom out of a house, wherinto she came not but to do him service? She cast ashes on her head, rent her garments, lifts her hands over her head, goes away weeping weeping and lamenting like one distract, to seek out her brother Absolon, to give him an account of her dolours and to ask revenge.

Ammon despiseth his dishonoured sister.

Absolon close in his revenge.

This Prince (one of the most prudent and politick of his time) at the first dissembleth his resentment; to make it seasonable appear, he endevoureth to sweeten the acerbity of his soul by fair words, adviseth her to be silent, sheweth when all is done he is her brother, and that she should not take such an injury to the heart. Needs must the smoke of pleasure, turn the course of things into flames, and a momentarie contentment transmit sorrow and sadness over to posterity.

Behold Thamar lives in her brothers house, quite disconsolate, King David is enraged, nor can he appeased, and Absolon hides under the ashes of his dissimulation a fire not to be quenched, but with the bloud of this caitive.

Two years passed, and he spake neither well nor ill of this act, that he might not by his speech betray the desire he had to avenge it. In the end, at the time of his sheep shearing in Balhazor, he took occasion to invite all the Kings children to his house. He invited the King likewise, but he making excuse to charge him with so great a train, he entreats that at the least his brother Ammon might be his guest. He shrinks not back, not upon the first denial, he enforceth by the eagerness of importunitie, where behold the miserable man goes with his brothers, not knowing he must be the victim of a Sacrifice, prepared by the Justice of heaven, which hath ever undertaken the revenge of violated chastity. See in the midst of a banquet, when Ammon had taken in a little wine, and was full of jollitie, Absolon cries out, kill; and his servants following the direction he had given them, fell upon him, struck him, and left him dead in the place. The other brothers affrighted, rose from the table, got on horse-back, and came to Sion, where they satisfied the King, who thought his whole family had been massacred. They at their enterance cried out aloud, they wept with their father, who gave to the desolation of his house what remained of tears, after those torrents which had heretofore dropped from his eyes, and where his sins had happily made ship-wrack.

Ammon slain.

The murderer escapeth & forsakes the Kingdom, and David languisheth with sorrow for his absence, being unable to endure that one death alone should bereave him of two of his children. Lastly he comforted himself in it, and admired the judgements of God upon his house, who permitted that two of his sons were partakers in his crimes, and had surmounted his adultery and homicide, with an incest and a fratricide.

XIV. MAXIM.

of TRIBULATION.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That one must be evil to be happy, since the Just are most afflicted.

IT is a wonderfull thing how the Prophane Court dares propose this maxim, refuted by the experience of all Ages, observations of all histories, understandings of all people, and common voice of nature.

Camerarius in his Problems, wherein he pursueth the tracks of ordinarie life, without search into other considerations more Divine, makes a question, why those who are addicted to Religion, are alwayes most happy. And on the contrarie, from whence it is, that the wicked are most unfortunate: Affirming it to be observed throughout all histories. Now this Authour, who plainly sheweth in this Treatise he is none of the most Religious, gently toucheth some reasons, saying among other things, there is some power which pleaseth to depress the wicked, because ordinarily they are of a spirit fierce and insolent; as if impiety alone were not sufficient for their infelicity. The punishments of the wicked are so frequent in histories both Divine and humane, that in so great an Ocean of examples, which may take up more than fifty Ages, scarcely can we produce one sole notable felicitie, which felt not some great mishap. That we many times may have cause to make use of S. Augustines and S. Eucherius argument, who say, that although God punish not a crime in this life, he doth it to assure us there is a great tribunal, and a puissant justice in the other world. It were a thing superfluous at this time to oppose this maxim by effects, which are so evident, and whereof I think I have produced sufficient observations in preceeding Tomes: I had rather here employ reason, and shew all to be happy to the just, yea, tribulation.

THE HOLY COURT.

That all is happie for the Just, yea, even tribulation.

That the Providence of GOD excellently appeareth in the afflictions of the Just.

MEn curious in their censures, and distrustfull in their actions, have never ceased in all times to argue with Divine providence about the afflictions of the Just, but I with the assistance of heaven intend at this present to prove the eternal Wisdom maketh it self visibly appear, by the same things wherewith many think to overthrow it. Now I make it good by four reasons: the first whereof shall shew, worldly blessings cannot be great but by the experience of evils. Secondly, that tribulation is the nourshing-mother of all virtues. Thirdly, that there is no spectacle more glorious among the works of God, than an innocent afflicted for Justice, and patient in affliction. Fourthly, that it is a proof of beatitude.

We then deliver in the beginning of this discourse a notable maxim drawn out of Æneas Gaza, an ancient Authour, inserted in the Bibliotheck of the Fathers: Never do we sufficiently know the sweetness of good, without the trial of evil. Joseph mounted upon the triumphant Chariot of Pharao by prisons and fetters: David to the throne of Saul by many persecutions: And their great prosperities were much more sweet unto them, because they were fore-gone by sharp afflictions. We see the same in nature; where the Sun is more resplendent after it's eclipse, the sea more calm after a tempest, and the air much brighter after a shower, which made a great Statesman say: Storms and tempests contribute to the clearness of the heavens, and the smoothness of the sea. The condition of mortals hath this proper, that adversities grow out of prosperities, and prosperities from adversities. God hideth from us the seeds both of the one and the other, and many times the Ἀγῶνες τῆς καλῆς γνώσεως τῆς καλῆς γίγνεται ἀπὸ.

Mario Calique temperiem, turbines tempestatesque commendant: habet hæc vices conditio mortalium, ut adversa secunthe causes of blessings and evils are covered under one and the same appearance.

One may here object, that if we must alwayes have evil to tast good, we might infer the Angels were not sufficiently happy, because they arrived at beatitude without passing through tribulations, these being the flower-de-luces of God's garden, which neither wrought nor took pains to be clothed with the robe of glorie: we might conclude, God himself had some defect in his felicitie, since he alwayes hath a most accomplished beatitude, with exclusion of all manner of evil. I answer to that, there is very much difference between the condition of things eternal and temporal. Angels entered almost as soon into felicitie as into being, because they were placed in the upper region of the world, where miseries cannot approch, and who having besides a singular knowledge of God's favour, stood not in need to be aided by the counterpoize of adversities. But as for us, we are not onely born in a soil, which is as fertile in calamities, as forrests in brids, and rivers in fish; but besides, we are extream ignorant of God's grace, when we long enjoy prosperity; which is the cause that adversity, though necessarily tied to our condition, maketh us notably open our eyes to know the felicities which follow it, and to understand from what source they proceed. As for that which concerneth the Divinity, it cannot, to speak properly, endure any thing contrary by reason of the condition of it's essence, which is fully replenished with all sorts of beatitude. God (said Philon) is incommunicable to tribulations, he is alwayes vigorous, ever free from dolour or pain, perpetually in action without wearinesse, still plunged in a sea of most pure delights, as being the height, end, and aim of felicitie.

Thereupon unable to suffer, (as he is God) and and yet willing to undergo some special part in the great sacrifice of patience, which began with the world, he took a body, and in that body drank the cup of the passion, shewing evidently to all mortals, that tribulations by their darkness avail to the brightest rayes of glorie, which S. Augustine spake in very expres terms.

The onely Son born of the substance of the Father, and equal to the Father in Divine essence; the Word, by which all things were created, had nothing to suffer, as God, and is clothed with our flesh to participate in our punishments.

2. The second reason, which visibly sheweth the secret of Divine providence in the tribulation of the Just, is, that God being the Sovereign Sanctitie, was necessarily to procure and plant it in the souls of his elect, by all the most effectual wayes which his wisdom had ordained. Now there is not any shorter way to virtue, than a well mannaged affliction, and therefore it was necessarie to maintain adversity in the world, as the nource of great and generous actions of Christianity. It was necessarie (saith the Scripture) to trie thee by tribulation, because thou wast acceptable to God.

It is a matter almost impossible to preserve a great virtue in perpetual prosperity; one must be more than a man, and to have a double spirit: which is excellently well observed by S. Augustine, upon the words of Elizeus: I intreat your spirit may be doubled in me. Elizeus (saith he) begged the spirit of Elias might be double in him, because he was to live in the favour of Court and worldly prosperities, where the way is more slippery and dangers most frequent. His Master Elias had passed his life in many persecutions, wherefore a single spirit was sufficient for his direction, adversity being not so difficultly borne as prosperity. But insomuch as eminent fortunes are subject to deep drunkenesses, and supine forgetfulnes of God, the Prophet saith by an instinct of the Divinity: Let your spirit be doubled in me.

Prosperity under the shew of felicitie deceiveth us; tribulation is ever true: the one flatters us, the other instructeth us; the one tied up our senses and reason, the other unbinds them; the one is windy, empty, giddy, ignorant, the other sober, reserved, and prudent; the one withdraweth us from real good by the allurements of vanity, the other reduceth us by a wholesome way into the duty from whence we wandered. S. Bernard saith excellently: Prosperity is in weak and inconsiderate souls, as fire to wax, and the sun's rayes to snow. David was very wise, and Solomon much more, yet both charmed by the great success of affairs lost understanding, the one at least in in part, the other wholly. We must affirm, there is need of a strong spirit to subsist in adversity, without change of reason or constancie: but it is much more hard to tast very pleasing prosperities, and not be deceived. This is the cause why wise providence, ever to keep virtue in breath, ceaseth not to exercise it in this honourable list of great souls and we behold, that following these proceedings, it thence deriveth great advantages and many beauties. The Scripture noteth that Job (a) returning into the lustre of his former state, gave titles to his three daughters, much observed: for he called one by the name of Day, the other Cassia, or as some Interpreters say Amber, and the third Amaltæas Horn, so the Septuagint translate it. We must not think so holy a man would herein do any slight thing, or not to some purpose. But if we believe Holy Fathers upon it, he meant by these three names to signifie the three conditions of fortune. The first, (which was before his great adversities) is compared to the day rejoycing us with the natural sweetnes of it's serenity. The second, which was that of his calamity, to amber because it is properly in tribulation, where virtue diffuseth her good odours. It resembleth aromatick spices, which more shew their virtue when they are pounded and brought into powder in a morter; or incense, which never lets it so much appear what it is, as when it is cast on coals: so that this motto of the Wiseman may be attributed to it: (b) A resplendent fire, and incense burning in the fire. In the end issuing forth of tedious tribulations, and having been hardened and fortified under storms, it openeth it's bosom, and unfoldeth admirable fruits, which fitly make it to be called the Horn of abundance. Whereof we say with S. Ambrose (c) there is a certain beatitude in dolours, which virtue full of sweetnes and delight represseth, from whence it acquireth palms, and inestimable riches, as well for satisfaction of it's conscience, as the condition of glory.

3. For we affirm for a third reason, that God hath not a more glorious spectacle on earth; than a Just man afflicted and patient. Is it not that which God himself meant in the book of Job, where the Prince of darknes, telling he had gone round about the world, he said not to him: Hast thou seen the Monarchies and Empires, which bow under my Scepter, and circumvolve under my laws? Hast thou seen Palaces of Kings and Princes, whose turrets penetrate the clouds? Hast thou seen armies all enclosed with swords, making the earth tremble under the clashing of their arms? Hast thou beheld the theaters, beauties, and triumph of greatnes? Hast thou considered all the wealth which nature reserveth for me in magazins? He sayes nothing of all that. What then? (d) Hast thou looked on my servant Job, who hath not his like on earth? And what maketh him more admirable, than that which Cassianus (e) mentioneth? A man was seen abounding in all sorts of blessings, become very poor, having not so much as wherewith to cover his nakednes, fallen from a most perfect health into a prodigious malady, which disfigured his whole body, and having lost so many goodly farms,

Diu, & adversis secunda nascantur. Occultat utrosque semina deus, & plerumque bonorum & malorum causa sub diversâ specie latent. Plin. in Panegyr. Trajan.

Quando hoc incautis non fuit ad disciplinam, quod ignis ad cerам, quod solis radius ad nivem vel glaciem. Sapiens David, sapiens Solomon, sed blandientibus nimis secundis rebus alter de parte, alter en toto desipuit. Magnus qui incidens in adversa non excidit vel parum a sapientia, ne minor cui præsens felicitas si arrisit, non irrisit.

(a) Job 42. Merserus in Job.

(b) Quasi ignis refulgens, & thus ardens in igne. Eccles. 50. 10.

(c) Est ergo beatitudo in doloribus, quos plena suavitatis virtus comprimit, & coercet, ipsa sibi domesticis opibus abundans vel ad conscientiam vel ad gloriam. Ambro. offici. l. 2. c. 4.

(d) Numquid considerâsti servum meum Job, quod non sit ei similis in terrâ? Job. 8.

(e) Ex locuplete pauperrimus, nudus ex divite, ex valido tabidus, ex corporis sui sevissimus carnifex, tela radebat lanium & membrorum glebas, vermesque è profundis vulneribus manibus detrahebat. Cassia. Coll. 6. de nece Sanctorum.

Unicus ille de Patris substantiâ Natus, æqualis Patri in formâ Dei, Verbum quo facta sunt omnia, non habebat ubi flagellaretur, ad hoc autem carne indutus est, ut sine flagello non esset. August.

Quia erat acceptus Deo, necesse fuit ut tentatio probaret te. Tob. 12. 13. Reg. 4. 2. 9. S. Aug. l. 2. de mirab. Scrip.

Obsecro ut fiat in me duplex spiritus tuus.

Fiat in me duplex spiritus. Boet. de consol. l. 2. prof. 8.

farms, reduced to the extremity of being the inhabitant of a wretched dunghil: But he out-braving his miseries, and shewing himself to be nothing curious, took a rough stone to wipe his wounds, and putting his hand far into the bottom of his ulcers, drew thence the corruption and worms, which made him honourable by the lights of his patience. Have we not cause to crie out with Tertullian: (f) Oh what a trophey hath God erected in this holy man! O, what a standard hath he advanced in the sight of all his enemies? I dare freely pronounce it, there is not any approcheth more near to God, than a man laden with afflictions, and become invincible in the arms of patience. And I ask of you what made Tobie to be called the Good God (g) but this admirable virtue? I say although many have been honoured with marks of the Divinity, by reason of their favours and benignities towards men, (there being nothing which so charmeth people as the profusion of benefits) yet interest was the cause great men were flattered with such titles above their deserts; whereas quite otherwise, praise rendered to patience is much more sincere, as being expressed by a certain veneration afforded to a virtue obsolutely heroick: which makes me conclude, that men, ravished with the sight of this notable patience which shined in Tobie, when having done well evil was retributed, surnamed him the Good God, not for any other reason but his admirable constancy, having this maxim well engraven in their hearts, that God hath not on earth a more perfect Image of his greatness, than a patient man. S. Denis (b) likewise plainly calleth patience the imitation of the Divinity, and adeth, Moses was honoured with the rayes of Divine vision for his singular mansuetude.

(f) Quale in illo viro feretrum Deus de diabolo exstruxit! quale vexillum de inimico suæ gloriæ extulit? Tertul. de pat. c. 13.

(g) ὁ ἄγγελος κυρίου πλήρης μακάριος. Clem. Alex. Pædag. 2.

(b) Θεομιμησία εἰς θεοειδίαν ἀξιοπρεπῶς. S. Dionis. Ep. 8.

4. Lastly I say tribulation confirmeth us in the faith of future things, as being a manifest proof of beatitude. For reasoning, though never so little by the light of nature, we judge if there be any justice in men, it is in God as in it's source, with an incomparable eminency, and therefore we cannot imagine a Divinity without the inheritance of goodness, and equity, which perpetually accompany it. Now when we see innocent men continually afflicted, who go out of this life by bloudy and horrible wayes, many times oppressed by the tyranny of men, and having none to revenge their ashes, we necessarily conclude, there is in the other life another justice, and another tribunal, where causes must be decided in a last Court of judicature. We say with S. Paul: (i) The expectation of the creature looketh for the revelation of Gods children: For every creature is subject to Nothing, not of his own liking, but by the ordinance of him, who hath subjected him with hope of rising again: For creatures shall be delivered from the servitude of all corruption into the liberty of the children of God. That was it, which comforted all the Martyrs in hydeous torments, when their souls were torn out of their bodies with incomparable violence. For although mortal members yielded to the sword of persecution, yet they beheld, though with an eye drenched in bloud and tears, the bright glorie which waited on them, and saw as in a mirrour the thrones of those prodigious sufferings disposed all into Crowns. There S. Stephen, saw his stones changed into as many rubies to serve for matter of veneration to pietie, and an exemple of courage for all posteritie. There S. Lawrence looked on his flames turned into roses and delights. There S. Felicitas, the mother of glories and triumphs, beheld seven sons, who received her with palms in their hands into the beautifull pavillions of heaven, where all torments made an end to give beginning to infinite comforts. That is it which animated all the just in so great a heap of tribulations, and which made them speak these words of Tertullian: k) God is payable enough, in that he is the Arbiter and Feoffe, of your patience. If you commit an injury to him, be is the Avenger of it; if a loss of goods, be is the restorer; if a pain or malady, be is the Physician; since it makes God himself the debtor, who by the condition of his independent nature, being not accountable to any, doth notwithstanding particularly bind himself to patience.

(i) Expectatio creaturæ revelationem filiorum Dei expectat: vanitati enim creatura subjecta est, non volens, sed propter eum qui subjecit eam in spe: quia & ipsa creatura liberabitur a servitute corruptionis in libertatem gloriæ filiorum Dei. Rom. 8.

(k) Satis idoneus patientiæ sequester Deus, si injuriam deposueris penes eum, ubique est; si damnum, restitutor est; si dolorem, medicus est, si mortem resuscitator. O quantum patientiæ licet ut Deum habeat debitorem! Tertull. de pat. 15.

Let us conclude with four excellent instructions to be observed in adversity, which are expressed in the book of Job; (l) for it is said: He rent his garments, and having cut off his hair, and prostrated himself on the earth, adored and said: Naked I came out of my mothers womb, and naked I return into earth.

(l) Job 1. Tunc surrexit, & scidit vestimenta sua, & tonso capite corruens in terram adoravit; & dixit: Nudus egressus sum, &c.

Note, that rising up he rent his garments, to shew he couragiously discharged himself of all exteriour blessings, which are riches and possessions, signified by garments. He cut his hair, which was a sign he put the whole bodie into the hands of God, to dispose of it at his pleasure. For as those Ancients sacrificing a victim first pulled off the hair and threw into the fire, to testifie the whole bodie was already ordained to sacrifice; so such as for ceremony gave their hair to temples, protested they were dedicated to the service of the Divinity, to whom the vow was made. In the third instance, he prostrated himself on the earth, acknowledging his beginning by a most holy humility. And for conclusion, he prayed and adored with much reverence. Behold all you should practise in tribulation well expressed in this mirrour of patience.

First, are you afflicted with loss of goods, either by some unexpected chance, or by some tyranny and injustice? Abate not your courage, but considering the nullity of all earthly blessings, and the greatness of eternal riches, say: My God, although I have endeavoured hitherto to preserve the wealth thou gavest me, as an instrument of many good deeds, yet if thou hast ordained in the sacred counsel of thy providence, that I must be deprived of them for my much greater spiritual avail, I from this time renounce them with all my heart, and am ready to be despoiled, even to the last nakedness, the more perfectly to enter into the imitation of thy poverty. Say with S. Lewis Archbishop of Tholouse: Jesus is all my riches, and with him I am content in the want of all other wealth. All plenty, which is not God is mere penurie to me.

Divitiæ meæ Christus, desint cætera. Omnis copia quæ Deus meus non est, mihi inopia est.

If you be tormented with bodily pain, by maladies, by death of allies, say: My God, to whom belongs this afflicted bodie? Is it not to thee? Is not this one of thy members? It now endureth some pain, since thou hast so appointed, and it complains and groaneth under the scourge: where are so many precepts of patience? where is the love of suffering? where conformity to the cross? S. Olalla, a Virgin about thirteen or fourteen years of age, as she was martyred, and her bodie torn with iron hooks, beheld her members all bloudy, and said: O my God, what a brave thing is it to read these characters, where I see thy trophies and monuments imprinted with iron on my bodie, and written in my bloud. A creature so tender, so delicate, shall she shew such courage in the midst of torments, such transfixing pains, and can not I resolve to suffer a little evil with some manner of patience? If it be the death of an ally, behold that bodie, not in the state wherein it now appears, but in the bright lustre of glorie, wherewith you shall behold it in the day of the Resurrection, wiping away your tears, say what Ruricius did: Let them bewail the dead, who cannot have any hope of Resurrection. Let the dead lament their dead friends, whom they account dead for ever.

Quam juvat hos apices legere qui tua Christe trophæa notant. Prudent.

Flent mortuos qui spem resurrectionis habere non possunt. Flent mortui mortuos suos, quos in perpetuum existimant interiisse.

In the third place arm your self with profound humility, and looking on the earth from whence your body came, say: My God, it is against my pride thy rod is lifted up in this tribulation. Shall such a creature as I, drawn out of the dust become proud against thy commandments, and so often shake off the yoke of thy Law? I now acknowledge from the bottom of my soul the abjectness of my nothing, and protest with with all resentments of heart my dependence on thee. The little hearb, called trefoyl, foldeth up the three leaves it beareth, when thunder roareth, thereby willing to tell us, it will not lift a creast, nor raise a bristle against Heaven. Lightening also, which teareth huge trees asunder, never falls upon it. My God, I hear thy hand murmuring over my head in this great affliction, and I involve me within my self, and behold the element whereinto I must be reduced, to do the homage my mortality oweth thee. Exercise not the power of thy thunders against a worm of the earth, against a reed which serves for a sport to the wind. Lastly, take courage what you may, in the accidents that happen, and by the imitation of our Saviour, retire into the bosom of prayer, which is a sovereign means to calm all storms. Jesus prayed in his agony, and the more his sadness encreased, the more he multiplied his prayers. Say in imitation of him: My God, why are my persecutours so encreased? Many rise up against me. Many say to my soul, there is no salvation for it in God. But Lord, thou art my Protecteur, and my glorie, thou art he who wilt make me exalt my head above all mine enemies.

Factus in agonia prolixius orabat. Domine, quid multiplicati sunt qui tribulant me. Multi insurgunt adversum me, multi dicunt animæ meæ non est salus ipsi in Deo ejus. Tu autem Domine susceptor meus, &c.

The fourteenth Example upon the fourteenth MAXIM.

Of Constancie in Tribulation.

ELEONORA.

WE are able to endure more than we think. For there are none but slight evils, which cause us readily to deplore, and which raise a great noise, like to those brooks that purl among pibbles; whilest great-ones pass through a generous soul, as huge rivers which drive their waves along with a peacefull majesty.

Maffæus hist. Indicar. l. 16.

This manifestly appeareth in the death of Sosa and Eleonora, related by Maffæus in the sixteenth book of his history of the Indies. This Sosa was by Nation a Portingale, a man of quality, pious, rich, liberal, and valiant, married to one of the most virtuous women in the whole Kingdom. They having been already some good time in the Indies, and enflamed with the desire of seeing their dear Countrey again, embarked at Cochin, with their children very young, some gentlemen and officers, and with about six hundred men. The beginning of their navigation was very prosperous; but being arrived at Capo de bona speranza, they there found the despair of their return. A westerly wind beat them back with all violence; clouds gathered, thunders roared, Heaven it self seemed to break into fire over their heads, and under foot they saw nothing but abysses and images of death. If they would anchor, the Ocean tosseth them, if return to the Indian coast, contrary winds blow to stay their passage. Their sayls are torn, Mast crack'd, Rudder broken, their Ship shaken with surges, beginning to leak, industry of men fruitless, and all let loose to the sway of tempests. To conclude their unhappiness, another Southern wind violently thrust them into the port, where they met with ship-wrack. They must avoid this counter-buff, if they would not be buried in the waves. They cast anchor to stay the ship, and leaped into cock-boats, to recover shore with the more safety. Sosa first of all saved himself, his wife, and children, carried with him his gold, silver, and jewels, so much as so imminent danger would permit. The boats after a return or two, were scattered, the cable unto which the anchor of their ship was fastened, brake, the sides leaked, the keel opened, every man sought to save himself, many were drowned, other struggled with the Ocean, golden coffers, painted cabinets, and the goodly riches of the Indies swum with men half-dead, tossed by the waves amongst fardels and packs, and loosing life, lost not (as yet) the sight of that which made them live. Some became black with the buffets they received, others bedewed the sea with their bloud, yet all desired to reach the haven; so much desire of life possesseth us. Scarcely got they thither, but they saw their vessel sink down to the bottom, leaving them not any hope of return. The dead bodies of their companions, with the dolefull baggage utterly spoiled with sea-water, were cast up at their feet. On what side soever they reflect, nothing is seen but calamity. Here the dead which begged burial, there the living all drenched in water, laden with wounds, overwhelmed with toyl, worn with hunger, to arrive in a savage Countrey, where having nothing almost to hope, they have all to fear.

All that poor Sosa could do, was to kindle fire, and draw out some tainted victuals, wherewith to take refection; his heart was seized with apprehension of this disaster, in which he saw all he esteemed most precious involved, notwithstanding clearing his brow, he comforted this afflicted company, and said:

It was not time to think upon their losses, but to give God thanks he had saved their lives. That they were not so ignorant of the sea, as not to know full well, when one makes account to embark thereon, he must expect hunger, thirst, losses, ship-wracks, and all the miseries of mankind. And therefore when they happen, they must be regarded as things alreadie foreseen, and profit made of evils for expiation of sins. As for the rest, being so destitute of all things in a strange Countrey, there was no better riches than mutual correspondence, which would preserve the whole bodie adhering together, as discord infallibly ruineth divided members. He added (fetching a deep sigh) They might behold their poor Ladie with their tender infants, in the extremitie of peril, and that although both sex and age required they should be somewhat assisted, he would neither spare himself nor his, for the common safety.

All answered with tears in their eyes, he might confidently lead them where he pleased, and that they had no further hope of their lives, but in the obedience they resolved to yield to his commands. Having then remained thirteen days in this miserable Port, barricadoed with huge stones and coffers, left as remainders of their ship-wrack, to defend them by night from thieves and wild beasts, they put themselves in the way to bend towards the East, directly to a great river, which the Portingales had heretofore named the Holy Ghost. Sosa went for most with his wife, who shewed a masculine courage in a tender constitution: she had her little children by her sides, whom turn by turn every one carried. Andrew de Vase the Pilot, was in the same rank, bearing the standard of the Cross, attended also by about four-score Portingales, and an hundred servants who bare arms. Then followed marriners, poor creatures, and other inferiour people, who were not yet cured.

The good servants moved with compassion of Eleonora, whom they beheld walking on foot, framed her a kind of litter, and sought all they might to comfort her: but that lasted not long. Needs in the end must the poor Lady travel through places, where nothing was to be seen but wild beasts, and Cafres more inhumane than beasts; over rocks inaccessible, mountains which raised their heads above the clouds, valleys not to be looked down into without horrour, torrents swoln with showrs, marishes cloyed with mud, and which was most irksom, they must go at random through ways of which every one was ignorant, nor could any direct them, so that they made an hundred leagues of thirty. Their little store of victual failing, they eat first pieces of rotten whales, and other garbages of the sea, then wild fruits, leaves, and lastly spared not the carcales of beasts, which they found in the desert. From that they fell into a great scarcity of water, and if they would have any something tolerable, they muſt ſeek it among Moors and tygers, and buy it at eight crowns the pint. There were many, who overwhelmed with theſe hydeous diſaſters, left the ſpoil of their bodies to cruel Æthiopians, to birds and beaſts, bidding a ſad adieu to their companions, with the laſt words they deſired to be delivered to their friends and kinred. But the fears and preſent calamities of every one, made them to forget the dead with their requeſts. The unfortunate Soſa oppreſſed with ſorrow, conſidering ſo many miſhaps redoubled one upon another, and beholding his wife, who to comfort him, ſhewed her ſelf indefatigable both in mind and body, ſhe carrying her children in her turn, and encouraging all the reſt, it moſt ſenſibly wounded his heart to ſee a Lady ſo tenderly bred, endure with ſuch conſtancy the utmoſt of worldly miſeries.

At laſt, after four moneths travel, they came to the river of the H. G. ere they were aware, where a petty King commanded, who very courteouſly received them, partly moved with the ſight of ſo great a calamity, and partly alſo deſiring by this opportunity to make uſe of the Portingale's favour, whereof he ſtood in need for his affairs. He let them underſtand, as well as he could, his deſire of their ſtay with him, in expectation of the commodity of re-embarking. Otherwiſe, ſhould they hazard themſelves to proceed forward on their way in this miſerable equipage, they would be in danger to be robbed by a neighbour-Prince, one of the greateſt thieves in the Countrey.

The more this Barbarian King ſhewed himſelf courteous, ſo much the more Soſa grew ſuſpicious of his proceedings, and ſiniſterly judged, that ſuch ſweetneſs in a man unknown, was but the cover of an evil purpoſe. He thanked him for his favour, and very earneſtly beſought him to accommodate them with boats to paſs the river, which the other unwillingly did, ſeeing the peril whereinto they haſtened to fall. They went, there remaining not above ſix-ſcore of five or ſix hundred men, and having been five days on the river, they landed at adventure, rather conſtrained by night, than invited by the commodiouſneſs of place. The next day, they deſcried a ſquadron of about two hundred Æthiopians, who came towards them, which made them prepare for defence: but troubled at their arms, they ſhewing themſelves peacefull enough, the other by geſture and ſigns diſcovered their infinite miſeries. Theſe people wholly practiſed in tricks of deceit, and who would make benefit of this occaſion, let them with much ado underſtand, they might paſs along to the Kings Palace, where they ſhould be very well entertained; which they attempted, but approching to the Citie in arms, the King of theſe Barbarians timorous and wicked, forbade them enterance, and confined them to a little wood, where they remained certain days, paſſing the time in a poor traffick of knives and trifles, which they bartered for bread. But this treacherous Prince, who meant to catch them in the ſnare, ſeeing they had ſome commodities, ſent word to Soſa, he muſt excuſe him that he denied enterance into the Citie, and that two cauſes had put him from it. The firſt whereof, was the dearth of victual among his people, and the other, the fear his ſubjects had of the Portingales arms, they never, as yet, being accuſtomed thereto. But if they would deliver their weapons, they ſhould be received into his citie, and his people conſigned to the next towns, to be well entertained. This condition ſeemed ſomewhat harſh, but neceſſity digeſted all. They agreed with one conſent to ſatisfie the King, Eleonora onely excepted, who never would conſent to betray their defences in a place where they had ſo much need of them. Behold them diſarmed and ſeparated, ſome diſperſed into ſeveral villages here and there: Soſa with his wife, his children, and about twenty other brought to the regal Citie. Scarcely was he arrived, but all his company were robbed, beaten with baſtonadoes, and uſed that very night like dogs; whileſt himſelf had little better entertainment: For this Prince of ſavages took all his gold and jewels from him, and drave him away as a Pyrate, leaving him onely life and his poor garments. As they went out of this calamity, deploring their miſery, behold another troup of Cafres, armed with javelins, who ſet upon them, and let them know, they muſt leave their apparel, if they meant not to forſake their skins. They were ſo confounded, they neither had ſtrength nor courage to defend themſelves: behold the cauſe why they yielded, what was demanded, as ſheep their fleece. There was none but Eleonora, who preferring death before nakedneſs, ſtood a long time diſputing about a poor ſmock with theſe ſavages: but in the end, violence bereaved her of that, which modeſty ſought by all means to keep.

The chaſt and honourable Lady, ſeeing her ſelf naked in the ſight of her domeſticks, who caſt down their eyes at the indignity of ſuch a ſpectacle, preſently buried her ſelf in ſand up to the middle, covering the reſt of her body with her diſſheveled hair, and every moment having theſe words in her mouth, Where is my huſband? then turning towards the Pilot, and ſome of her Officers there preſent, ſhe ſaid to them with a ſetled countenance: My good friends, you have hitherto afforded to my huſband your Captain, and to me your Miſtreſs, all the dutie may be expected from your fidelitie: It is time you leave this bodie, which hath alreadie paid to the earth the moitie of its tribute. Go think upon ſaving your lives, and pray for my poor ſoul: But if any one of you return to our native Countrey, he may recount to thoſe who ſhall pleaſe to remember the unfortunate Eleonora, to what my ſins have reduced me. Having ſpoken theſe words, ſhe ſtood immoveable in a deep ſilence ſome ſpace of time, then lifting her eyes to Heaven, added: My God, behold the ſtate wherein I came from my mothers womb, and the condition whereunto I muſt quickly return on earth, one part of me being already as among the dead. My God, I kiſs and adore the rods of thy juſtice, which ſo roughly, though juſtly, have chaſtiſed me. Take between thy arms the ſoul of my moſt honoured huſband, if he be dead. Take the ſouls of my poor children, which are by my ſides. Take mine, now on my lips, and which I yield to thee, as to my Lord and Father. There is no place far diſtant from thee, nor any ſuccour impoßible to thy power.

As ſhe ſpake this, Soſa her husband came, having eſcaped out of the hands of theſe thieves who had robbed him, and finding his wife in this ſtate, he ſtood by her, not able to utter a word. The Lady likewiſe ſpake onely with her eys, which ſhe ſweetly fix'd upon him, to give comfort in the violence of the inſupportable afflictions. But he feeling his heart wholly drenched in bitterneſs, haſtened into a wood of purpoſe to meet with ſome prey, at leaſt to feed his little childrē, which were as yet by their mothers ſide. Thence he ere long returned, and found one of them already dead, to which with his own hands he gave burial, immediately after he went again into the forreſt, to hunt as he had accuſtomed, finding no other comfort. His heart was perpetually in Eleonora's, where he ſurvived more than in his own body, & coming to behold her once again 'or his laſt, he perceived ſhe was already deceaſed, with his other child, who died near her; there being onely left two poor maids, who bewailed their Lady, and made the wilderneſs reſound with their ſad complaints. He commanded them to retire a little aſide, then taking Eleonora by the hand, he kiſſed it, ſtanding a long time with his lips fixed unto it, & nothing to be heard but ſome broken ſighs. That done, with the help of the maids, he buried her near his two children, without any complaint or utterance of one word. In a ſhort ſpace after, he returned into the thickeſt of the forreſt, where it was thought he was devoured. So joyning his ſoul at leaſt to hers, who had tied her heart to his in death, with examples of her conſtancie.

THE

THE THIRD PART OF MAXIMS of the HOLY COURT.

THE DESIGN.

HAving in this Second Part deduced the principal Maxims which concern the direction of this preſent Life, we enter into the other, there to behold the power of death over mortal things, and the immortalitie of our ſouls in the general diſſolution of bodies. We conſider them in the ſeveral ways they take in their paſſage, and then ſee them re-united to their bodies, as in the Reſurrection. It is under thy eyes, Eternal Wiſdom, and by thy favour we enter into theſe great labyrinths of thy Eternities, therein hoping thy direction, as we intend thy glorie.

THE THIRD PART. Touching the State of the other World.

XV. MAXIM. Of DEATH.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That it is to no purpoſe to think upon death ſo far off, and that it always cometh ſoon enough without thinking on it.

1. IT is a ſtrange thing that men, being all made out of one and the ſame maſs, are ſo different in beliefs, in reaſons, in cuſtoms, and actions, as the Proteus in Poetical fables. Our manners daily teach us a truth, which ſays: There is not any thing ſo mutable upon earth, as the heart of man. Diverſitie of men.

Yet we ſee in the world many honourable perſonages, and good men who travel apace to this triumphant Citie of God, this Heavenly Jeruſalem, looking on the bleſſings of the other life, with an eye purified by the rays of faith, and expecting them with a hope, for which all Heaven is in bloom. But there are an infinite number of black ſouls marked with the ſtamp of Cain, who conſider all is ſaid of the ſtate of the other world, as if it were ſome imaginary Iſland, feigned to be in the Ocean to amuze credulous ſpirits, and fill them partly with pleaſing dreams, partly with irkſom viſions. Opinion concerning the other life.

If theſe people could find ſome apparent proofs, they would eaſily perſwade themſelves there were no death; but their ſenſes convinced of the contrary from experience of all Ages, they believe that which they dare not think on, and commonly die after ſo bruitiſh a faſhion, that a man may ſay, They had converted the lights of an immortal ſpirit wholly into fleſh.

THE HOLY COURT.

That the beſt employment of life is to be wel prepared for death, and that good thoughts of death, are the ſeeds of immortalitie.

But you, generous ſouls, whom at this preſent I intend to guid through the hopes and terrours of the other life, obſerve this firſt ſtep you muſt make, to enter into a new world with conſtancy, not unworthy a ſoul ſenſible of its immortality.

2. Life and death are two poles, on the which all creatures rowl: life, is the firſt act moveable and continual of the living thing; death, the ceſſation of the ſame act. And as there are three notable actions in things animated, the one whereof tendeth to nouriſhment and increaſe, the other to ſenſe, the third to underſtanding, ſo there are three ſorts of lives, the vegetative, the ſenſitive, and the intellectual: the vegetative in plants, ſenſitive in beaſts, the intellectual, which onely appertaineth to God, Angels, and men. The intellectual life is divided into two other, which are the life of grace and glory. In Heaven (the place of things eternal) reign thoſe great and divine lives which never die and which are in a perpetual vigour, being applied to the firſt ſource of lives, which is God. But in the more inferiour rank of the world are dying lives, of which we daily ſee the beginning, progreſs, and end. Here properly is the dominion of death, and our onely myſtery is to die well. Some do Life & death the two poles of the world. Divers kinds of life.

it of necessity, others every day anticipate it by virtue. Now it is my desire here to shew you; That death in the state wherein the world is at this present, is a singular invention of Divine Providence, whether we consider the generality of men, whether we look on the vicious, or fix our thoughts on the just.

Providence of God concerning the sentence of death, in the generality of men.

3. Some complain of death, but you would see much other complaints, if in such a life as we live, there were no death. You would see men worn with years and cares, daily to charge altars with vows and prayers, men insupportable to all the world, irksom to life, inexpugnable to death, men old as the earth, incessantly calling upon the hour of death, and almost eating one another with despair. God hath herein (saith Plato) well provided; for seeing the soul was to be shut up in the body as in a prison, he hath at least made it chains mortal.

Plato in Timæo. Pater misericors illis mortalia vincula faciebat.

What makes you so much desire life? I find (saith the worldling) it is a pleasure to behold the light, the star, elements, and seasons. There will be much more delight to see them one day under your feet, than there is now to behold them over your head? Are there now so many years you have been upon the earth, and have you not yet sufficiently looked upon the elements? There were certain people among the Pagans, who by laws forbade a man of fifty years to make use of the Physitian, saying, It discovered too much love of life; and yet with Christians you may find at the age of four-score, who will not endure a word of the other world, as if they had not yet one days leisure to look into it. But I must still perform the actions of life. Have you not done them enough? See you not that to live long, is to be long in the entertainment of travel and misery, which extend their power over our heads, according as the web of our life lengtheneth? Do you not consider we are in this life as fish in the sea, perpetually in fear of nets or hooks? Will you not say, we live here in the midst of misery and envie, as between Scylla and Charybdis, and that to decline once perishing, we daily make shipwrack? Notwithstanding we are pleased with life, as if man were not so much a mortal creature, as an immortal misery.

Ambr. l. 2. de Abel & Cain. Non advertitis senectutem hanc erumnarum esse veteranam, processionibusque ætatis miseriarum crescere stipendia, Scylleo quodam usu circumsonari nos quotidianis naufragiis?

Revolution troublesom.

Do you not know life was given by God to Cain, the most wicked man on earth, for a punishment of his crime, and will it rest with you as a title of reward? There is great cause to desire life. Were there no other miseries, (which are but too frequent) this anxiety and turmoil of relapsing actions would tyre us. What is life but clothing and unclothing, rising and down-lying, drinking, eating, sleeping, gaming, scoffing, negotiating, buying, selling, masonry, carpentery, quarreling, cozening, rowling in a labyrinth of actions, which perpetually turn and return, filling and emptying the tub of the Danaïdes, and to be continually tied to a body, as to the tending of an infant, a fool, or a sick man? That is not it which withdraweth me, (say you) But I must see the world, and live with the living. Had you been all your life time shut up in a prison, and not seen the world but through a little grate, you had seen enough of it. What behold you in the streets but men, houses, horses, mules, coaches, and people, who tumble up and down like fishes in the sea, who have many times no other trade, but to devour one another, and besides some pedling trifles hanged out on stals? When I have seen all this but for half an hour, I say: O God, how little is the world? Is it for this we deceive, we swear, and make a divorce between God and us!

Baseness of the world.

But admit we were not interessed in this action, must we not rest on the law of God, who maketh life and ordaineth death, by the juridical power of his wisdom, ever to be adored by our wills, though little penetrable to understanding? Will you I pronounce an excellent saying of Tertullian: The world is the belly of Nature, and men are in it as children in the mothers womb: the birth of men are the world's child-bearings, death its lying in, and deliveries. Would you not die, to hinder the world from bringing forth, and unburdening it self by the way the Sovereign Master hath appointed it? We have seen Tyrants of all sorts, some invented exquisite torments and tryals, others forbade eating and drinking, some to weep, some caused children to be taken from the teat, to strangle them and cut their throats, as Pharaoh and Herod. But never was there any amongst them, who forbade women with child to be delivered. The world hath for a long space been big with you, and would not you have it to be delivered at the time God's counsels have ordained? Were it a handsom thing think you to see an infant presently to have teeth, and articulate speech, and yet (if it might be) would stay in the mothers womb, using no other reason but that there is warm being.

Verum natura. An excellent

Judge now, and take the even ballance; if the world be the belly of nature, if this good mother bare us the time Gods providence appointed, if she now seek her deliverie, that we may be born in the land of the living, in a quite other climate, another life, another light, are not we very simple to withstand it, as little infants who crie when they issue out of bloud and ordure, at the sight of day-light, yet would not return thither from whence they came.

Conceit drawn from the words of Tertullian.

Providence in the death of the vicious

4. Behold the Providence of God in that which concerneth death in the generality of all men. Let us see in this second point the like providence towards the wicked, the vicious, rich, and proud Great-ones, who spit against Heaven. We must first establish a most undoubted maxim, that there is nothing so unhappy as impunity of men abandoned to vice, which is the cause the paternal providence of God arresteth them by the means of death, dictating unto them an excellent lesson of their equality with other men.

Boet. l. 4. de consol. Cum supplicio carent, ineo illis aliquid alterius mali, ipse impunitas. S. Eucher. in parænes.

Mortals circumvolve in life and death, as Heaven on the pole artick and antartick, from east to west; the same day which lengtheneth our life in the morning, shorteneth it in the evening, and all Ages walk that way, not any one being permitted to return back again. Our fore-fathers passed on, we pass, and our posteritie follows us in the like course; you may say, they are waves of the sea where one wave drives another, and in the end, all come to break against a rock. What a rock is death? There are above five thousand years that it never ceaseth to crush the heads of so many mortals, and yet we know it not.

Masius in Josuah. Notable action of Noah.

I remember to this purpose a notable tradition of the Hebrews, related by Masius upon Josuah, to wit, that Noah in the universal deluge which opened the flood-gates of Heaven, to shake the columns of the world, and bury the earth in waters, in stead of gold, silver, and all sort of treasure, carried the bones of Adam into the Ark, and distributing them among his sons, said: Take children, behold the most precious inheritance your father can leave you: you shall share lands and seas, as God shall appoint; but suffer not your selves to be intangled in these vanities, which are more brittle than glass, more light than smoke, and much swifter than the winds. My children, all glideth away here below, and there is nothing which eternally subsisteth. Time it self which made us, devours and consumeth us. Learn this lesson from these dumb Doctours, the relicks of your grand-father, which will serve you for a refuge in your adversities, a bridle in your prosperities, and a mirrour at all times.

Moreover, I affirm death serves for a perfect lesson of justice to the wicked, which they were never willing throughly to understand, for it putteth into equality all that which hazard, passion, and iniquity had so ill divided into so many objects.

Birth maketh men equal, since they receive nought else from their mothers womb, but ignorance, sin, debility, debility, and nakedneſs; but after they come out of the hands of the midwife, ſome are put into purple and gold, others into rags and ruſſets: ſome enter upon huge patrimonies, where they ſtand in money up to the throat, & practiſe almoſt nothing elſe throughout their whole life, but to get by rapine with one hand, and profuſely ſpend with the other. Some live baſely and miſerably neceſſitous. A brave ſpirit, able to govern a large Common-wealth, is ſet to cart by the condition of his poverty. Another becomes a ſervant to a coxcomb, who hath not the hundreth part of his capacity.

It is the great Comedie of the world, played in ſundry faſhions, for moſt ſecret reaſons known to Divine Providence; would you have it laſt to eternity? See you not Comedians having played Kings and beggars on the ſtage, return to their own habit, unleſs they day and night deſire to perſiſt in the ſame ſport? And what diſproportion is there, if after every one have played his part in the world, according to the meaſure of time preſcribed him by Providence, he reſume his own habit?

I alſo adde, it is a kind of happineſs for the wicked to die quickly, becauſe it is unfit to act that long, which is very ill done. And ſince they ſo deſperately uſe life, it is expedient, not being good, it be ſhort, that ſhortneſs of time may render the malice of it leſs hurtfull. If examples of their like, who ſoon die make them apprehenſive of the ſame way, and how ſeaſonably to prepare for death, it is a ſingular bleſſing for them. But if perſiſting in contempt, they be puniſhed, it is God's goodneſs his juſtice be underſtood, and that it commandeth even in hell.

5. But if at this preſent you reflect on the death of the Juſt, which you ſhould deſire, I ſay, God's Providence there brightly appeareth in three principal things, which are, ceſſation from travels and worldly miſeries, the ſweet tranquility of departure, and fruition of crowns and rewards promiſed.

The ſweetnes of the death of the juſt.

First, you muſt imagine what holy Job ſaid, That this life is to the juſt as a myne, wherein poor ſlaves are made to labour, that they may hit upon the veins of gold and ſilver. And Tertullian had the like conceit, when he ſaid, The firſt man was clothed with ſkins by the hand of God, to teach him he entered into the world as a ſlave into a myne. Now as theſe hirelings, who ceaſe not to turn up the earth with ſweat on their brows, tears in their eyes, and ſighs in their hearts, no ſooner have they met with the hoped vein, but they rejoyce and embrace one another, for the contentment they take to ſee their travels crowned with ſome good event: So after ſuch combates, ſuch rough temptations, ſo many calumnies, ſo many litigious wranglings, ſuch perſecutions, ſuch vexations and toils which choſen ſouls have undergone in the thraldom of this body, when the day comes wherein they by a moſt happy death, meet the veins of the inexhauſtible treaſure, whereof they are to take poſſeſſion, they conceive moſt inexplicable comfort. Then is the time they hear theſe words of honey: Go confidently faithfull ſouls, go out of theſe bodies, go out with alacritie, go out in full peace and ſafetie: the Eternal Mountains, to wit, the Heavens, and all the goodly companie of Angels, and moſt bleſſed ſpirits which inhabit them, will receive you with hymns of triumph: Go confidently on, behold God, who is readie to wipe away your tears with his own fingers. There ſhall be no more death, no more tears, no more clamours, no more ſorrows, behold a ſtate wholly new, what repoſe, what ceſſation of arms, what peace!

Iob 3. Qui expectant mortem, quaſi effodientes thesaurum.

Tert. de pallio. Homo pellitus orbi, quaſi metallo datur.

Iſaiah 38. In lectis egredientini, & in pace deducemini: montes & colles cantabunt coram vobis laudem. Apoc. 21. Abſterget Deus omnem lachrymam ab oculis eorum, & mors ultra non erit, neque luctus, neque clamor, neque dolor erit ultra: quia prima abierunt, ecce nova facio omnia.

Do you not ſometimes repreſent unto your ſelf theſe poor Chriſtians (of whom it is ſpoken in the acts of S. Clement) men of good place, baniſhed for the faith, who laboured in the quarreys of Cherſoneſus, with a moſt extream want of water, and great inconveniencies, when God, willing to comfort their travels, cauſed on the top of a mountain a lamb marvellouſly white to appear, who ſtruck with his foot, and inſtantly made fountains of lively water to diſtil? What comfort, what refreſhment for the drowthie multitude! But what is it in compariſon, when a brave and faithful Chriſtian, who hath paſſed this life in noble and glorious actions, great toyls and patience, beholds the Lamb of God Omnipotent, which calleth him to the eternal ſources of life? What a ſpectacle to ſee S. Lewis die, after he had twice with a huge army paſſed ſo many ſeas, tempeſts, monſters, arms, & battels for the glory of his Maſter? What a ſpectacle to ſee S. Paul the Hermit die, after he had laboured an hundred years under the habit of Religion.

Acta Clement.

Pſal. 35. Quoniam apud te fons vitæ, & in lumine tuo videbimus lucem.

The ſecond condition of this death, is great tranquility; for there is nothing at that time in all the world able to afflict, or by acts unreſigned to ſhake a ſoul firmly united to its God. But what, ſay you: Juſt men if they be rich, do they not bear in this laſt agonie ſome affection to their riches and poſſeſſions?

Nay, ſo far is it other wiſe, that they with alacrity go out of all worldly wealth, as a little bird from a ſilver cage, to ſoar in the fields at the firſt breath of the ſpring-tide. I pray tell me, that I may pronounce before you an excellent conceit of S. Clement the Roman, in the third of his Recognitions: If a little chicken were ſhut up in an egg, the ſhell whereof were guilded, and ſet out with curious and delicate paintings, and had reaſon, and choice given it either to remain in this precious priſon, or enjoy day-light with all other living creatures under Heavens vault, think you it would abide in a golden ſhell, to the prejudice of its liberty? And imagine with your ſelf, what are all the brave fortunes which have ſo much luſtre in the world? they are guilded ſhells, no way comparable to the liberty of Gods children. A good rich man dieth as Abraham, who ſays in Origen: My God, if I have been wealthy, it was for the poor; I went out of my houſe, to become a houſe for thoſe who ſtood in need of it, and am perſwaded, that thou haſt made me a Steward of thy goods, to diſtribute them, and not to brood them, as the hen her eggs.

Clementi Rom. Recognit.

Dives fui ſed pauperi; exortorio patria, domus neſcius, ipſe omnium fui domus, & patria: ſciens me non incubatorem, ſed diſpenſatorem divinæ largitatis.

But if the Juſt man die poor, he is by ſo much the better pleaſed to forſake wretched lodgings of ſtraw and morter, to go into an eternal Palace. But doth it not trouble him to leave a wife, children, and allies? He leaves all that under the royal mantle of the eternal Providence, and firmly believes, that he who hath care of the flowers in the field, birds, bees, and ants, will not forſake reaſonable creatures, ſo they reſt in their duty. But if they muſt ſuffer in this world, he will make of their tribulations, ladders and footſtools of their glory.

What ſhall we ſay of the body? Doth not the ſoul ill to leave it? The body is to the ſoul, as the ſhadow of the earth in the eclipſe of the Moon. See you not how this bright ſtar, which illuminateth our nights, ſeemeth to be unwillingly captived in the dark, but ſparkleth to get aloft, and free it ſelf from earthly impreſſions? So the faithfull ſoul readily untwineth it ſelf from the body, well knowing it hath a much better houſe in the inheritance of God, which is not a manufacture of men, but a monument of the hands of the great Workman. Repreſent unto your ſelf Job on the dung-hill, a great anatomy of bones covered with a bloudy skin, a body which falleth in pieces, and a ſoul on the lips, ready to iſſue forth as a leſſee from a ruinous dwelling. Think you he is troubled to leave his body? Nay, rather he dieth as a Phenix on the mountain of the Sun, in the odours of his heroick virtues.

2 Cor. 5. Scimus quoniam ſi terreſtris domus noſtra hujus habitationis diſſolvatur, quod ædificationem ex Deo habemus domum non manufactam, ſed æternam in cælis. Job 29. 18. In nidulo meo moriar, & ſicut Phœnix multiplicabo dies.

But that which maketh this death more ſweet and honourable than any thing, is the hope of beatitude, whereof I will ſpeak in the nineteenth Maxim. Note, that worldlings die here, ſome like unto ſwallows, others as ſpiders; the evil rich, paſs away as ſwallows, who leave no memory of them, but a neſt of morter and ſtraw; for ſuch are all the fair riches of the earth. The ambitious periſh as ſpiders, who preſent wretched threeds, and ſome little flies in them; ſuch are alſo the ſnares, purſuits, and buſineſſes of the world. But the Juſt forſake us like the ſilk-worm. For this little creature, had it underſtanding, would be well pleaſed iſſuing forth of her priſon, to become a butterflie, to ſee the goodly halls of great men, Churches and Altars to ſmile under her works. What a contentment to the conſcience of a juſt man in death, to conſider the Churches adorned, Altars covered, poor fed, ſins reſiſted, virtues crowned, like ſo many pieces of tapiſtry, by the work of his hands! Hath he not cauſe to ſay: I entered into the liſt, I valiantly fought, I have well ended my race, there remains nothing more for me, but to wear the Crown of Juſtice, which God keeps for me as a pledge.

1 Tim. 4. Bonum certamen certavi, curſum conſummavi, in reliquo repoſita eſt mihi corona juſtitiæ.

6. I yet come again to thee, (worldly man) who ſo much feareſt this laſt hour. Learn from this diſcourſe to fortifie thy ſelf againſt theſe vain apprehenſions of death, which have more diſturbance for thee, than the Sea ſurges. Is it not a goodly thing to ſee thee tremble at thy enterance into ſo beaten a path, wherein ſo many millions have paſſed along before thee, and the moſt timorous of the earth have finiſhed their courſe as well as the reſt, without any contradiction? All that which ſeemeth moſt uneaſie in this paſſage, is much ſweetened by two conſiderations, the firſt whereof is, That God made it ſo common, that there is no living creature exempt; and the other, That to diſpoſe us to a great death, we every night find in our ſleep a little death.

Exhortation to ſuch nice people as fear death.

Wilt thou then ſtill doubt to ſet thy foot-ſteps firmly in the paths which the worlds Saviour, with his holy Mother, imprinted with their tracks? After thou haſt ſlept ſo many years, and ſo long paſſed through the pettie miſeries of death, ſhalt thou never come to the great? Why art thou ſo apprehenſive of death? Sickneſs and miſeries of the world will one day perhaps make thee deſire that, which thou now moſt feareſt. Were it not better to do by election, what muſt be ſuffered by neceſſity? Haſt thou ſo little profited in the world, that thou haſt not yet ſome friend, ſome one dearly beloved, who paſſed into the other life? Needs muſt thou have very little affection in ſtore for him, if thou feareſt the day, which ſhould draw thee near to his company.

What is it maketh all theſe apprehenſions ariſe in thy mind? Is it ſo ill with thee to forſake a world ſo treacherous, ſo miſerable, ſo corrupt? If thou haſt been therin perpetually happy, which is very rare, courageouſly ſet a ſeal upon thy felicity, and be not weary of thy good hap, which may eaſily be changed into a great misfortune. Many have lived too long by one year, others by one day, which made them ſee what they feared more than death. But if thou be afflicted and perſecuted in this life, why art thou not aſhamed when God calleth thee to go out faintly, from a place where thou canſt not ſtay without calamitie?

Deploreſt thou thy gold, ſilver, coſtly attire, houſes, and riches? Thou goeſt into a Countrey where thou no longer ſhalt need any of that. They were remedies given thee for the neceſſities of life, now that thy wounds ſhall be cured, wouldeſt thou ſtill wear the plaiſters? Bewaileſt thou loſs of friends? There are ſome who expect thee above, which are better than the worldly, more wiſe, more aſſured, and who will never afford thee ought but comfort.

Thou perhaps laments the habit of body, and pangs of this paſſage. It is not death then which makes thee wax pale, but life thou ſo dearly lovedſt. It hath been told thee in the laſt agonies of death, the body feeleth great diſturbances, that it turns here and there, that one rubs the bed-cloths with his hands, hath convulſions, ſhuts faſt the teeth, choaketh words, hath a trembling lower lip, pale viſage, ſharp noſe, troubled memory, ſpeech fumbling, cold ſweat, the white of the eye ſunk, and the aſpect totally changed.

What need we fear all that which perhaps will never happen to us? How many are there who die very ſweetly, and almoſt not thinking of it? You would ſay, they are not there when it happens. Cæſar the Pretour died, putting on his ſhoes, Lucius Lepidius ſtriking with his foot againſt a gate, the Rhodian Embaſſadour, having made an Oration before the Senate of Rome, Anacreon drinking, Torquatus eating a cake, Cardinal Colonna taſting figs, Xeuxes the Painter, laughing at the Picture of an old woman he was to finiſh, and laſtly Auguſtus the Monarch, performing a complement. But if ſomething muſt be endured, think you the hand of God is ſtretched out to torment you above your force, or ſhortened to comfort you? He will give you a winter according to your wool (as it is ſaid) ſufferings according to the ſtrength of your body, and a crown for your patience.

You fear nothing (ſay you) of all that I mention, but you dread Judgement: Who can better order that than your ſelf? Had you been the moſt deſperate ſinner in the world, if you take a ſtrong reſolution to make hereafter an exact and effectual converſion, the arms of God are open to receive you. He will provide for your paſſage, doubt it not, as he took care for your birth. He will accompany you with his Angels, he will hold you under the veil of his face, under the ſhadow of his protection, & if he muſt purge you by juſtice, he will crown you by his mercy.

The fifteenth Example upon the fifteenth MAXIM.

The manner of dying well, drawn from the Model of our LADIE.

ONe of the moſt important myſteries in the world, is to die well. It is never done but once, and if one fail to perform it well, he is loſt without recovery. It is the laſt lineament of the table of our life, the laſt blaze of the torch extinguiſhed, the laſt luſtre of the ſetting Sun, the end of the race, which gives a period to the courſe, the great ſeal which ſigneth all our actions. One may in death correct all the defects of an ill life, and all the virtues of a good are defaced, and polluted by an evil death. The art of dying well being of ſo great conſequence, it ſeems God permitted the death of his Mother, to teach us what ours ought to be. The death of the Virgin Mary, is the death of a Phenix, which hath three conditions, reſolution, diſengagement, and union.

I begin with reſolution of conformity to the will of God, which is the firſt quality ſhould be had to die well. That is to hold life in your hands, as a loan borrowed from Heaven, ever ready to reſtore it at the leaſt ſummons you ſhall have from the will of God. It is not perfection not to care for life through impatience, nor to have an ear not deaf to death, through faintneſs of courage. This reſignation was moſt excellent, and very admirable in our Ladie, for two reaſons. Firſt, the great knowledge ſhe had of beatitude. Secondly, the ineffable love ſhe bare to her Son. For I leave you to think, if our deſires follow the firſt rays of our knowledges, and if we be ſo much the more earneſt after a good, as we are the better informed of its merit, what impatience muſt our Ladie needs have of life, ſince ſhe received a ſcience of beatitude, ſtrong, powerful, and reſplendent above all other creatures, God giving her leave to ſee in Calvarie the abyſs of his glories, in the depth of his dolours.

1. Quality of good death, is the indifferency of time and manner.

Patience of our Lady to endure life.

It

It is no wonder we ſo very eaſily affect life, ſeeing we are as the little children of a King, bred in the houſe of a ſhepheard, as the gloſs upon Daniel reporteth, touching the education of Nebuchadnezzar. We know not what a ſcepter, Kingdom, or crown is, in this great meaneſs of a life, baſe and terreſtrial. But had we talked onely one quarter of an hour with a bleſſed ſoul, and diſcourſed of the ſtate of the other life, our hearts would wholly diſſolve into deſires. Which makes me ſay, It was an act of a moſt heroical reſolution in the bleſſed Virgin, in thoſe great knowledges ſhe had of Paradiſe, to have continued ſo many years in this life, and if you conſider the moſt ardent love ſhe bare her Son, who was the adamant of all loves, you ſhall find the holy Virgin, who had born all the glory of Paradiſe in her womb, more merited in this reſignation ſhe made, to ſee her ſelf ſeparated the ſpace of thirty years both from Paradiſe and her Son, than all the Martyrs did in reſigning themſelves to deaths ſtrange, bloudy, and hydeous.

Martyrdom of love.

There is nothing comparable to the martyrdom of love. It is an exhalation in a cloud. It is a fire in a myne; a torrent ſhut up in ditches; a night of ſeparation laſteth Ages, and all waxeth old for it, but its deſires. Now this holy Mother to be thirty years upon the croſs of love without repining, without complaint or diſturbance, peaceably expecting the ſtroke of her hour, what virtue, and how far are we from it.

Worldly irreſolutions of death. Boet. Carm. 1. Eheu cur dura miſeros avertis aure, Et flentes oculos claudere ſeva negas?

So now adays throughout the world you ſee nothing but mourners, who are loth to live, or faint-hearted that would never die. Some crie out: Come to me, (O ſluggiſh death) thou haſt forgotten me; what do I here? I am but a living death, and an unprofitable burden to the earth? Ah (death) haſt thou ears of braſs, and diamond for me alone? Canſt thou not ſhut up mine eyes, which I daily drown in my tears? Much otherwiſe, when we ſee one die young, freſh, flouriſhing, in honour, wealth, health, proſperity, we crie out upon death as if it were cruel and malicious. To take (ſaith one) this young betrothed, this poor maid, this husband intended, this excellent man, who ſo well played the Rhodomont: to lay hold of one ſo neceſſarie for the publick, in the flower of his age! Why took it not away this cripple, this beggar, who hath not wherewith to live? Why took it not away this other, who daily dies, yet cannot die once? O our manners! O dainty conceits! O fit language! Were it not ſome little humane reſpect, we would take Gods Providence by the throat.

Whom do we contend withal? The indifferency we daily ſee in the death of men, whereas ſoon the young is taken as the old, the happie as the miſerable, the Emperour as the porter, is one of the greateſt ſigns of Gods Providence to be admired. Why then complain we that God maketh us to leave life when he pleaſeth? It is not a puniſhment, but a wholeſom doctrine, by which we learn the power of the Divine Wiſdom. Firſt, when we entered into life, our adviſe was not required whether we would be born in ſuch or ſuch an Age, ſuch a day, ſuch a year, ſuch an hour; ſo when we muſt be gone from hence, there is no reaſon to ask our counſel. Let us onely yield up this laſt loan, and not murmure againſt the father of the family. Let us not ſay, this man ſhould go before, and this after. Who knows them better than God? You complain this miſerable creature lives ſo long, how know you whether he accompliſh the years of his purgatory? How know you whether God ſuffers him to become a ſpectacle unto you of his patience? Why gnaſh you your teeth for anger, that this man rich, that man fortunate, and that other ſo qualified, is taken hence in his flouriſhing youth? How know you the miſadventures and ſhipwracks which attended him, had he ſtill continued in the world? You ſay, he was neceſſary? why, God will ſhew there is not any thing neceſſary in the world but himſelf.

Uno avulſo non deficit alter aureus.

Poor eyes of a bat, which ſee nothing but darkneſs, you would give eyes to Argus, and light to the Sun. If you deſire to take part in the prudence of the juſt, handle the matter ſo, that for the firſt ſign of a good death, you be ever indifferent to live or die, according to our Ladies example. Daily expect death, ſtand perpetually on your guard. Do as the brave bird the Grecians call Onocratalus, which is ſo well practiſed to expect the Hawk to grapple with her, that even when ſleep ſhuts up her eyes, ſhe ſleepeth with her beak exalted, as if ſhe would contend with her adverſary. Know we are continually among rocks and dangers, that there needs but one hour to get all, or looſe all, that the day of Judgement comes with the pace of a thief, and that we muſt be ready to receive it, and reſolute to combat with death, to gain immortalitie. Hold this concluding ſentence of Tertullian, as an Oracle: Amongſt the rocks and ſhelves of this ſea, called life, Chriſtian faith paſſeth on, breaking the waves, filling the ſails with Gods ſpirit, ever aſſured, yet ever diſtruſtful, and perpetually fearleſs, yet ſtill carefull of the future. As for the reſt, it ſees under its feet an abyſs not to be paſſed by ſwimming, and inexplicable ſhipwrack for thoſe who are drenched, a gulf which ſuffocates all ſuch, as it once ſwalloweth.

Inſtinct of the Onocratalus.

Conſtancy of faith.

Tertul. Idol. c. 2. Hoc inter ſcopulos velificata ſpiritu Dei fides navigat, tuta ſi cauta, ſecura ſi attonita. Cæterùm ineluctabile excuſſis profundum, inexplicabile impactis naufragium, irreſpirabile devoratis hypocriphium.

The ſecond quality of a good death, is the ready and conſtant adieu given to the world, as did the Bleſſed Virgin, who was ſo diſengaged from it towards death, that ſhe touched not earth at all, but with the ſoles of her feet.

Second quality of good death.

Philo l. 3. de vita Moſis in fine.

Philo ſaith, God gave Moſes leave to live very long, perpetually in glorious actions, in contemplations, in lights, ſo that his body was worn, waſted, and almoſt wholly vapoured out into the ſubſtance of his ſpirit. By a much ſtronger reaſon may one ſay the like of the Mother of God. For it is certain her life was nothing elſe but a divorce from the world. But as Phyſitians obſerve, that the breath of ſtorks is purified and made ſweet in the proportion as they increaſe in age, in ſuch ſort, that becoming old, they yield forth moſt odoriferous exhalations: So the life of this holy Mother, which was ever hanging about the heart of her Son, ever in the contemplation of the great myſteries of our ſalvation, perpetually in the furnace of love, wholly transformed it ſelf into her well-beloved, as one wax melted into another, as a drop of water poured into a great veſſel of wine, as incenſe waſted into flames. O what ſweetneſs of breath! what odour of virtues in her old age! Her body ſeemed to be exhaled, and to vapour out all in ſoul; the ſoul, which is the knot of life, and which poſſeſſeth in us the moſt inferiour part of ſpirituality, diſſolved wholly into ſpirit, which is in the middle, and the ſpirit melted entirely into the underſtanding, which hath the higheſt rank in the ſoul, and which bears the image of the moſt holy Trinitie. Her memory in a ſilent repoſe was freed from all rememberances of the world, her will reſided in languiſhing fervours, and her underſtanding was wholly engulfed in great abyſſes of lights; there was not one ſmall threed of imagination, which tied her to earth. O what an adieu to the world! It is very well declared in the Canticles by theſe words: Who is it that aſcendeth through the deſert, like a thin vapour compoſed of odours, myrrh, incenſe, and all the moſt curious perfumes.

Notable ſpeech of Philo of Moſes his ſtate.

Ὅσος γὰρ ἐν ἀνθρώποις ἄνθρακα ἀναθυμιᾶται.

Harph. c. 49. libri de myſtic. Theol.

Cantic. 1. 6. Quæ eſt iſta quæ aſcendit per deſertum ſicut virgula fumi, ex aromatibus myrrhæ, & thuris, & univerſi pulveris pigmentarii.

Which ſaith in a word, the holy Virgin was wholly ſpiritualized, wholly vapour, all perfume, all ſpirit, and had (as it were) nothing of body, maſſineſs, or earth.

The three ties of the world. Geneſ. 12. Egredere de terra tua, de cognatione tua, & de domo patris tui.

O how many unreaſonably fail in this ſecond condition! When death comes to ſound his trumpet in our ears, and ſaith to us: Let us go, thou muſt diſlodge from thy lands & inheritances, never to return again, from thy kinred, from the houſe thy father gave thee, to wit, thy bodie; how harſh that is to ill mortified ſpirits, and which hold of the world by roots as deep as hell, and as big as arms. Go out of thy land. O how hard is this first step, to go out of the land, to forsake the land, not at all to pretend to the land, to the gold, to the silver, to those jewels, that inheritance, to all that glorious glitter of fortune? See the first torment of worldly spirits. Such there have been, who seeing themselves in the last approches of inevitable death, have swallowed their gold like pills; other to eternize themselves on earth, have caused formidable sepulchers to be built, wherein they put all their wealths, as the Ægyptian King Cheopes, who prostituted even his own daughter, to raise unto himself a Pyramid for burial, so enormous, that it seemed the earth was too weak to bear it, and Heaven too low to be freed from its importunity. Besides, he caused to be engraven upon it, that the manufactures alone of this sepulcher, had cost six millions of gold in coleworts and turneps. Others caused to be buried with them dogs, horses, slaves, apparrel, dishes to serve them in the other world.

Desperate desire of worldly goods. Joannes Nider.

Anno 1544. Belforest. Goodly monument of the Empereis Marie.

Yea, it is not long ago, since there was found in Rome a coffin of marble eight foot long, and in it a robe embroidered with Gold-smiths work, which yielded six and thirty pounds of gold, besides fourty rings, a cluster of emeralds, a little mouse made of another precious stone, and amongst all these precious magnificencies, two leg-bones of a dead corps, known by the inscription of the tomb, to be the bones of the Empereis Marie, daughter of Stilicon, and wife of the Emperour Honorius, who died before consummation of marriage. About twelve hundred years were passed, after she was buried with all these goodly toys, which (no doubt) gave much ease to her soul. My God, how are we tied to earth! Tell me not, the like is not done now adays, for it is worse, since they were buried after death with their riches, and you (O mortals) alive as you are, build your sepulchers thereon. We see men, who having already one foot in the grave, if you speak to them of the affairs of their consciences, all the spirit yet remaining, is perhaps for two or three hours besieged by an infinite number of thoughts of worldly wealth. Death crieth out aloud in their ears, saying: Go from thy land, and you pull it to you as with iron hooks.

After that cometh kinred, allies, table-frends, friends for game, buffons, amourists, and all the delights of former companies. Some weep, others make shew of tears, the rest under a veil of sorrow, make bones-fires in their hearts, they seem all to appear about the bed, and to sing this sad song of S. Augustine: Alas, do you leave us, and shall we hereafter meet no more together? Farewel pleasing amities. Adieu feasts, adieu sports, adieu loves. This nor that will any longer be permitted from this moment for ever. Behold another very slipperie and dangerous step, notwithstanding you must leave it: Death hasteneth, and says: Go from thy kinred.

Aug. Confes. 6. 11. Dimitis ne nos & a momento illo non erimus tecum ultra in æternum? Et a momento isto non licebit hoc & illud ultra in æternum?

In the last, the body and flesh is presented, which seems to say: Ah my soul, whither goest thou? My dear hostes, whither goest thou? Thou hast hitherto so tenderly pampered me, so pompously clothed me, so wantonly cherished me. I was thy Idol, thy Paradise, thy little Goddess, and where will you put me? into a grave with serpents and worms? what shall I do there, and what will become of me? Behold a hard task, principally for such of both sexes, as have dearly loved their bodies, like the Dutchess of Venice, of whom Cardinal Petrus Damianus speaketh, who was plunged into sensuality with so much profusion, that she could not endure to lodge but in chambers full of delicious perfumes of the East, she would not wash her self, but in the dew of Heaven, which must be preserved for her with much skill. Her garments were so pompous, that nothing remained but to seek for new stuffs in Heaven, for she had exhausted the treasures of earth. Her viands so dainty, that all the mouthes of Kings tasted none so exquisite, nor would she touch her meat, but with golden forks and precious stones. God, to punish this cursed superfluity, cast her on a bed, and assailed her with a maladie so hydeous, so stinking and frightfull, that all her neareſt kin were enforced to abandon her, none staying about her, but a poor old woman already throughly accustomed to stench and death, yet could not this proud creature part with her infamous body but with sorrow. She was of those souls that Plato calleth Philosemates, which tie themselves to flesh as much as they can, and after death would gladly still walk round about their flesh, to find a passage into it again.

Damian. opusc. in instit. ad Blanch. c. 11. The prodigality of a Venetian Ladie, and her punishment.

Know you what is to be done to die well? Cut off in good time, the three chains which straightly bind foolish and sensual souls. For the first passage that concerneth earthly goods, seasonably dispose of your temporal. Entangle not your hands for so short a time as you are to live in great affairs, perilous, and uncertain, which will perplex you all your life, and throw you down to death. Do not like evil travellers, who stay to reckon and contend with their hostes, when it is already fair day-light, and that the guid wrangles and sweareth at them. Digest your little business, that you may leave no trouble in your family after death. Make a Will clear and perspicuous, which draweth not suits after it. Preserve your self carefully from imitating that wicked man, who caused all his gold and silver to be melted into one mass, to set his heirs together by the ears, who killed one another, sprinkling the apple of discord, and the object of their avarice, with their bloud. Say to your self, I brought nothing into the world, nor will carry any thing away, no not the desire of it. Behold one part of my goods, which must be restored to such and such; these are true debts that must necessarily be discharged. Behold another for pious legacies. Another for alms to persons needy and indigent, another for my servants male and female, and my poor friends who have faithfully served me. They have wasted their bodies and lives, to contribute all they might to my will; there is no reason I should forget them. Nay, I desire mine enemies have some part in my will. As for my children and heirs, the main shall go to them, they will be rich enough, if they be virtuous enough. Behold how the temporal should be disposed.

The way how to be well provided for death.

And for so much as concerneth kinred, give the benediction of God to your children, and all your family; leave worthy examples of contempt of the world, of humility, of patience, of charity: procure a full reconciliation with your enemies, entertain your friends with sage discourses, which may shew you gladly accept Gods visitations, that you die full of resolutions to prepare them a place, and that you expect from their charity, prayers and satisfactions for your negligence and remisness. If needs some small tribute must be paid to nature in two or three drops of tears, it is tolerable. But take away these whyning countenances, these petty furies, these mercenary weepers, who weep, not knowing why, nor for what they mourn.

As for that which toucheth the state of your body, it would be a goodly thing for you to bewail it, after you have had so many troubles in it. Go out of it like a Tennant from a ruinous house, go from it as from a prison of earth and morter: Go out of it as on the sea from a rotten leaky ship, to leap on the shore, and care not much what will become of it after death, so it be on holy land. Souls well mortified speak not of flesh, considering the state of sin, but with horrour. Yea, we find in the bequests of one of the sons of S. Lewis, Count of Alencon, these words: I will the Tomb that shall cover my stinking flesh, exceed not the charge of fiftie livres, and that which encloseth my evil evil heart paſs not thirty livres. Behold how the ſon of one of the greateſt Kings in the world ſpeaketh of his body, and would you idolatrize yours?

Modesty of a son of S. Lewis.

The third quality of a good death.

Laſtly, for the third condition of a good death, it muſt have union with God, whereof our Lady giveth us a perfect example. For it being well verified by Theologie, that there are three unions ſupernatural, and as it were wholly ineffable, the firſt whereof is the ſacred knot of the moſt holy Trinitie, which tieth three perſons in one ſame Eſſence, the ſecond, is the tie of the Word with humane nature, which ſubſiſteth by the hypoſtaſis of the ſame Word, and the third, the intimate conjunction of a Son-God with a Mother-Virgin; I affirm, the Virgin being a pure creature cannot equal either the union of the Trinity, or the hypoſtatical union, yet notwithſtanding hath the higheſt place of all created unions; as ſhe who was united to God when ſhe lived in the world, in the moſt ſublime and ſacred manner, the ſpirits of the moſt exalted Seraphins might imagine, which was moſt divinely expreſſed by S. Bernard: She entered into a deep abyſs of divine wiſdom, ſo that ſhe was united to light inacceſſible, ſo much as a creature might be permitted, not arriving to the perſonal union of God.

Profundiſſimam divinæ ſapientiæ penetravit abyſſum, & quantum ſine perſonali unione creaturæ conditio patitur, luci illi inacceſſibili videatur immerſa. D. Bernard. ſerm. in ſignum magnum.

But ſaying this, I not onely ſpeak of the union ſhe had in quality of the Mother of God, being one ſame fleſh, and one ſame ſubſtance with her Son, but of the union of contemplation, devotion, and ſubmiſſion to the will of God, which alone was the center of her felicity, as witneſſeth S. Auguſtine: My Mother whom you call happie, hath all her happineſs, not ſo much becauſe the Word was made man in her, as for that ſhe kept the Word of God, who made her, and who afterward allied himſelf to humane nature in her womb; as he would ſay, Our Lady was more happy to have conceived God in her heart, and continually kept ſpiritual union with him, than to have once brought him forth according to fleſh.

Mater mea quam appellatis felicem, inde felix, quia verbum Dei cuſtodit, non quia in illa Verbum caro factum eſt, &c. Aug. tract. 10 in Joan.

We cannot arrive at this ſublime union of the Mother of God: but howſoever at leaſt in the laſt period of thy life, having bid adieu to the world, and drawn the curtain between thee and creatures, endeavour to be united as perfectly as is poſſible, to thy Creatour. Firſt by good and perfect confeſſion of the principal actions of all thy life, Secondly by a moſt religious participation of thy viaticum in preſence of thy friends, in a manner the moſt ſober, well ordered, & edificative thou maiſt. In the third place ſeaſonably receiving extream unction, thy ſelf anſwering if it be poſſible, to the prayers of the Church, and cauſing to be read in the approches of this laſt combate ſome part of the paſſion. Laſtly, by the acts of faith, hope, charity, and contrition.

I approve not the manner of ſome, who make ſtudied remonſtrances to dying men, as if they were in a pulpit, nor of thoſe who blow inceſſantly in their ears unſeaſonable words, and make as much noiſe with the tongue, as heretofore Pagans with their kettles in the eclipſe of the Moon. We muſt let thoſe good ſouls depart without any diſturbance in the ſhades of death. S. Auguſtine would die in great ſilence, deſiring not to be troubled with lamentations nor viſits, for ten days together, where having hanged ſome verſicles of Pſalms about his bed, he fixed his dying eyes upon them with a ſweetneſs moſt peacefull, and ſo gave up the ghoſt. It is good to ſay:

My God I believe, aſſiſt my incredulitie. I know my Redeemer is living, and that I ſhall ſee him in the ſame fleſh, which I at this preſent diſarray. Though I muſt walk into the ſhades of death, I will fear nothing, becauſe (Oh my God) thou art with me. What have I to deſire in heaven, and what would I of thee on earth? My fleſh and my heart are entranced in thee, O the God of my heart, and my portion for all eternitie. Wherefore art thou ſo ſad (O my ſoul) and why doſt thou trouble me? Turn now to thy reſt, becauſe God hath afforded thee mercie.

Credo Domine, adjuva incredulitatem meam. Marc. 9. Scio quod Redemptor meus vivit, &c. Job 9. Si ambulavero in medio umbræ mortis non timebo mala, quoniam tu mecum es. Pſal. 22. Quid mihi eſt in cælo, &c. Pſal. 72. Quare triſtis es anima mea, &c. Pſal. 83.

Behold how the Virgin, our Ladie died, behold how Saint Lewis died, behold how Saint Paula departed, of whom Saint Hierom (a) ſaid: The holy Lady rendering up her life, put her finger on her mouth, as deſirous to imprint the ſign of the Croſs upon it, turning the gaſps of death, and laſt breath of the ſoul, into the praiſes of God, whom ſhe ſo faithfully had ſerved.

(a) Hier. ep. 27. ad Euſtoc. Digitum ad os tenens crucis ſignum pingebat in labiis. Anima erumpere geſtiens ipſum ſtridorem quo mortalis vita finitur in laudes convertebat.

XVI. MAXIM.

of the Immortalitie of the SOUL.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

Little care is to be had of the Soul after death, ſo all be well with it in this life.

1. A Man who doubteth and queſtions the immortalitie of the Soul, ſheweth in the very beginning, that he almoſt hath no ſoul, & that retaining nought but the ſubſtance of it to ſuffer, he hath loſt the lights and goodneſs which might crown it. Never enter theſe thoughts into any man without making a tomb of fleſh for his reaſon, whileſt he ſo flattering his body, forgets all the excellencies of his ſoul.

We muſt here follow the counſel of ancient Sages; when a Libertine will impugn a verity known by the onely light of nature, it is not needfull to anſwer his abſurdities, but to lead him directly into the ſtall, and to ſhut him up with beaſts, ſpeaking unto him the ſentence which the Prophet Daniel pronounced againſt

THE HOLY COURT.

That we have an immortal Soul, capable of happineſs or unhappineſs eternal.

Nebuchadnezzar: Thou ſhalt hereafter be baniſhed from the companie of men, and thy abode ſhall be with beaſts and ſavage creatures.

Sentence againſt the wicked. Ejicient te ab hominibus, & cum beſtiis feriſque erit habitatio tua. Daniel 4.

All ſpeak, and all diſpute for the Maxim of the Holy Court, and although we ought to have full obligation to faith, which manifeſtly hath ſet this truth before us, thereunto affixing all the order of our life, and the principal felicity we hope for, yet are we not a little enlightened with ſo many excellent conceits which learning furniſheth us withal upon it, and which I will endeavour to abbreviate, comprehending much in few words.

2. I will then ſay for your comfort, that it hath happened that an Heretick loſt both of underſtanding and conſcience, having oppoſed the belief of Purgatory (hereſie being a beaten path to infidelity) came to this this point of folly, as throughly to perſwade himſelf that death ended all things, and that theſe endeavours of prayers and ceremonies which we afford to the memory of the deceaſed, were given to ſhadows. He did all a wicked man might to tear himſelf from himſelf, and belie that which God made him: but it was impoſſible for him, as you ſhall ſee in conſidering the three chambers of juſtice wherein he was condemned. Firſt, he entered into the Court before the tribunal of Nature, and thought he ſaw a huge troup of all the learned men of the earth, and all Nations of the univerſe, who came to fall upon as a mighty cloud, armed with fire and lightening.

The belief of the immortalitie of the ſoul invincible.

Condemnation of impiety in the tribunal of nature.

My God, (ſaid he) what is this? The great Tertullian ſaid, and it is true, that verities which fall into the general underſtandings of all men, as acknowledged, avowed, and confeſſed by all ſorts of nations, ought to be believed as by a decree of Nature. The example thereof is evident. For all men in the world believe, that the whole is greater than a part, that the ſuperiour number exceedeth the inferiour. That the father and mother ſhould be honoured, as the Authours of life: That one muſt not do to another what he would not be done to himſelf. And becauſe every one underſtands and averreth this by the light of nature, he would be thought a beaſt or a mad man who ſhould contradict it. Now from whence proceedeth it, that the belief of the ſouls immortality, holds the ſame place with theſe general Maxims, although it be otherwiſe much tranſcendent above our ſenſe? If I regard the courſe of time, and revolution of Ages, from the beginning of the world, one cannot aſſign any one wherein this faith hath not been publiſhed by words or actions, correſpondent to the life of the other world. And if ſome depraved ſpirits have doubted it, they were gain-ſaid by publick voice, by laws, ceremonies, cuſtoms, proteſtations of Common-wealths, of Empires and Kingdoms where they took beginning. If I look upon all the Nations of the earth ſo far diſtant in climates, ſo divided in commerce, ſo different in diſpoſitions, ſo contrary in opinions, they all agree in this ray of the light of nature, that there is a life of ſeparated ſouls, that there are puniſhments and rewards at the going out of the body.

Quod apud multos commune invenitur, non eſt erratum ſed traditum. Tertul.

Tertul. de teſtimonio animæ.

It is the belief of Hebrews, Chaldeans, Perſians, Medes, Babylonians, Ægyptians, Arabians, Ethiopians, Scythians, Grecians, ancient Gauls, Romans, and that which is moſt admirable, after one hath roamed over Europe, Africk, Aſia, let him enter into the new worlds, which nature hath divided from us by ſo mighty a maſs of ſeas, ſhelves, rocks, and monſters, he findeth the faith of the ſouls immortality began there, ſo ſoon as men. It is obſerved to have been ſo publick with the ancient, that they carried the marks thereof on their garments, and inſcribed it on their tombs.

Plutar. probl. 71.

Men of the beſt quality of Rome, had little croiſſants on their ſhoes (ſaith Caſtor) to ſignifie their ſouls came from Heaven, and were to return to Heaven after the death of the body, and therefore there was not any thing in them which ought not to be celeſtial. The like alſo is found of tombs, where open gates were engraven on them, to ſhew that after death all was not ſhut up from the ſoul, but that it had paſſages into eternity.

Camerar.

All the moſt eminent Philoſophers, following the bright ſplendour of natural light, although diſtant by the courſe of Ages, parted into ſects, divided into ſo many different Maxims, agreed in this; as Mercurie Triſmegiſtus, Pythagoras, Plato, Ariſtotle, Xenocrates, Seneca, Plutarch, Maximus Tyrienſis, Jamblicus, Themiſtius, Epictetus and Cicero, as may be ſeen in ſo many excellent Treatiſes, which I might mention at large were they well enough known. But if ſometimes doubtfull paſſages occurre in Ariſtotle and Seneca hereupon, were it not much better to judge them by ſo many perſpicuous and illuſtrious ſentences, which they have upon the life of the other world, than to cenſure them by ſome words inſenſibly eſcaped in diſcourſe? In which if ſome thing repugnant to our doctrine may be diſcovered, it is to be underſtood of the ſenſitive and vegetative ſoul, not the reaſonable and intelligent, which theſe Authours ever ſet aſide, as being celeſtial and divine.

3. Never (ſaith Plotinus) was there a man of good underſtanding amongſt ſo many Writers, who ſtrove not for the immortality of the ſoul. But if any one among them hath impugned it, even in the darkneſs of Gentiliſm, it hath been obſerved, there ever was ſome diſorder and impurity in his life, which made him controvert his opinion, to divert the apprehenſion of puniſhments due to his crimes. That was it, which Minutius Felix ſaid: I well know many preſſed with a conſcience guiltie of crimes, rather deſire to be nothing after their death, than to be perſwaded of it, for they wiſh rather wholly to periſh, than to be reſerved for their puniſhment.

Enu. l. 7. c. 10. Nec vult improbus animam immortalem eſſe, ne ad conſpectum Judicis æqui torqueatur veniat.

Malunt enim extingui penitus, quam ad ſupplicia reſervari.

He ſhould make an annotation, not a diſcourſe, who would here alledge all the authorities of the ancients, which are very ordinary. I ſatisfie my ſelf with a moſt excellent paſſage of wiſe Quintilian, who in the caſe of an enchanted ſepulcher, comprized all the doctrine of Gentiles upon this Article, when he ſaid:

Our Soul came from the ſame place from whence proceeded the Eternal Spirit, Authour, and Father of all things, to wit, the true God, and that this ſoul could neither be corrupted, die, nay, nor feel the leaſt touch of mortalitie common to corruptible things. But at the paſſage out of the priſon of bodie, it was purged by fire, and after this purgation it aſcended to Heaven, there to live happie. Which is to be underſtood of good ſouls: for polluted and impious, are delivered to eternal torments, by the conſent of the wiſeſt Gentiles.

Animam inde venire, unde rerum omnium authorem, parentem, ſpiritum ducimus, nec interire, nec ſolvi, nec ullo mortalitatis effici fato; ſed quotiès humani corporis carcerem effregerit, & exonerata membris mortalibus levi ſe igne luſtraverit, petere ſedem inter aſtra.

Behold a man, who in few words heaped together the belief of more than fourty Ages which preceded him, touching the immortality of the ſoul. Paradiſe, Purgatory, hell, and that within the limits of the light of nature. (a) Plato ſaith the ſame:

(a) Plato 12 de Legib. ὑφῆσθαι ἀθανάτου.

That our ſoul wears the liveries of the eternal Father which make it incorruptible.

Algazel in the book of nature:

That our ſoul being ſeparated from the body, ſhall ſubſiſt with the firſt Intelligence.

Maximus Tyrienſis:

That that which we call death, was the beginning of immortalitie.

Dionyſius the Geographer forgat not in the worlds deſcription, the White Iſland, whereinto it was held the ſouls of Heroes were carried. πύρος λευκή.

Lawyers were not ignorant of it, for when there is any ſpeech of legacies to be diſtributed on the birth-day of the Teſtatour, they avouch them to be legacies which muſt be given in perpetuity, every year on the birth-day, by reaſon, that by death we enter into another nativitie, which is that of glory. To the very ſame, the law of ſepulchers hath relation, which ſaith: We know, and our faith is not in vain, that ſouls diſcharged from bodies have underſtanding, and that the ſpirit which is celeſtial, returneth to its original.

Marcel. in l. cum quidam. l. 23. de annuis legatis. Theodoſii, & valent. Novella de ſepulchris tit. 5.

From whence comes this conſent ſo great, ſo univerſal, ſo authentical, in a thing ſo ſublime, ſo alienated from ſenſe, ſo eminent, but from the ſpirit of God? Let us ſay with Tertullian in the book of the ſouls teſtimonie: From whence proceeds it, that thoſe who will neither ſee nor hear Chriſtians, have the language of Chriſtians? I much ſuſpect the conſent of words in ſo great a diſagreement of converſation.

Scimus nec vana fides eſt, ſolutas membris animas habere ſenſum, & in originem ſuam ſpiritum redire cæleſtem. Tertul. de teſtim. animæ.

4. I am condemned in this firſt Court of juſtice, (ſaid the Libertine.) But let us go along to the Tribunal of ſupernatural light, and ſee what the divine Wiſdom will affirm: Let us follow the counſel of Sentence of God upon the immortalitie of the ſoul.

S. Am-

Ambros. in Symmachus. Culi mysterium docent nos Deum ipse qui condidit. Cui magis de Deo, quam Deo credam? Vide Augus. ep. 4. ad Vincent. Cui veritas comperta sine Deo cui Deus cognitus sine Christo? 3 Reg. 17. Revertatur anima pueri ejus in viscera ejus. Eccles. 26. 23. Exultavit vocem ejus de terra in prophetia. Tob. 4. 11.

S. Ambrose: He who made heaven, teacheth us the mysteries of heaven: Whom shall I believe touching the verities of God, but God himself? And verily, behold the advise God giveth us, to resolve us in doubtful cases, which is, to follow some great and powerfull authority, that may draw our spirits with a strong hand out of so many labyrinths. Without it (saith S. Augustine) there would neither be world, rest, light, wisdom, nor religion. And if a decisive authority must be chosen, where shall we find one more certain than that of a Man-God, whose words were prophesies, life sanctity, actions miracles, who by ways secret and incomprehensible, advanced the Cross on Capitols, and gave a new face to the whole world?

Now without speaking at this time of the Pentateuc, where the Word with his own mouth drew reasons for the immortalitie of the soul, against the Sadduces, I might alledge the book of Kings, where the soul of a little infant returneth into its body, at the words of Elias. I could produce the true soul of Samuel, which returneth from Limbo, and speaks to King Saul, as the Wiseman rendereth this apparition undoubted, which I will shew. I might mention the book of Tobias, which distinguisheth two places for souls in the other world, one of darknes, and the other of lights. But let us hear Ecclesiastes, since Infidels will make an arrow of it against us, where after the propositions of the wicked rehearsed in this book to be refuted (which must be well observed) the Wiseman decideth and concludes, That the body returneth into the earth from whence it came, and the spirit to God who gave it. Let us hear Wisdom where it is written: That the soul of the Just are in the hands of God, and shall not be touched with the torment of death.

Eccles. 12. 7.

Sap. 3. 1.

Daniel 12. 3.

Let us hear the Prophet Daniel, who saith: The true Sages shall shine as the brightnes of the firmament, and that such as instruct many to justice, shall be as stars for ever.

Last, let us hear our Saviour, who speaketh to us clearly and intelligibly in the bloud of all Martyrs: Fear not those who kill the bodie, and cannot kill the soul.

Mat. 10. 28.

Here will we hold this doctrine of the immortality from his own mouth, more than from any other reason: he caused us to make it an Article of faith, he establisheth upon it all our beatitude, why should we then argue and trie new conclusions after the decision of Gods Word?

Proofs drawn out of reason

5. I knew well (said the wicked man) this second Court would condemn me, but I am not yet satisfied. After nature and faith, I appeal to reason, I will enter into the bottom of my self, to know some news of my self. What a madnes is it to appeal from the decrees of God, to reason? And yet was this wretch condemned likewise by this tribunal. For asking his soul, whither wilt thou go? What will become of thee after the death of thy body? Wilt thou not accompany it in death, as thou didst during life? I die (replieth the soul) It is as impossible the light of the Sun become night, and fire ice, as the soul of man, which is the source of life and understanding, should be subject to death.

S. Thom. l. 2. contra Gentes, c. 79.

For from whence should this death and corruption proceed? If thou hast never so little reason, thou well seest what the great S. Thomas, and all the Sages of the world said: A thing cannot die, and be corrupted. but by one of three ways, either by action of its contrary; so heat, cold, moisture, and drougth corrupt our bodies, by their mutual counter-buffs and continual combates: or by the want of subject, which serves as a basis or foundation to it; so the eye dieth, when its organ is corrupted: or by defect of the assistance of the cause which hath influence into it; so the light faileth in the air, when the Sun retireth. In which of these three kinds wouldest thou corrupt me? Should it be by the action of the contrary. I am not subject to bodily impressions, but to those onely of the mind, which are rather to perfect than corrupt me. I am not composed of elements, I am not hot, cold, moist, nor drie, I admit no contrariety. But when I (a) comprehend in my understanding, white, black, water, fire, life, and death, I accord all contraries. Death (saith (b) Lucretius) is onely made for the things which have a collection of parts, and I am most simple.

Subsistentia intellectualis patitur tantum intelligibiliter, qui motus potius est perfectivus quam corruptivus. S. Thom. l. 2. contra Gentes. c. 55.

(a) Anima parvo continetur corpore continetq; res maximas. Ænesius platonicus.

(b) Lucr. l. 1. Mors eatum dissipat ollis.

Wilt thou ruin me by defect of the body? I am of a nature different from body. It was sometime without me, and I shall be a long time without it, for I depend not on it, but by accident and chance, I take somewhat of it as an hostess in this life, but I govern it as a mistress for eternity. I make use of the organs of senses, but I correct senses, and when they tell me the Sun is but a foot broad, I prove to them by lively reasons, it is much greater than the globe of the earth. If I borrow fantasies from imagination, I make truths of them: and in matter of understanding, willing, and judging, which is my proper profession. I have properly nothing to do with bodies, as the Philosopher Aristotle hath well observed, saying, I could not be before body, but I might remain after the death of body, and be separated from it, as things eternal from corruptible, because I have an action disentangled from body, which is contemplation. All that which is idle perisheth in nature: but I have no death, because not idle. I make it my profession to understand, to will, and to love, which I now exercise in a body, but which doth not absolutely depend on body. I make use of my senses, as of my windows: when they shall be no more, and that the panes of my prison shall be broken, I shall not for all that loose sight, but shall see the more easily. Behold you not how even at this present, I never am more knowing, than when I sink into the bottom of my self, and separate my self from commerce of sense. For I am a Mistress (said S. Augustine) who see better by my own eyes, than by those of my servant. Wouldest thou destroy me by the want of an influent cause? Needs must God fail, if I should be so defective on that part, since God having created a thing, never reduceth the same to nothing. Material creatures are corrupted by changing themselves into another nature, and return into elements, but I who have no matter, subsist by necessity, absolutely entire, and wholly incorruptible, without suffering these changes.

Aristt. l. 2. de anima l. 2. text. 21.

Ask likewise thy understanding, and it will repeat the philosophical Axiom: The workman is known by the work; by the operation of every thing its nature is discovered: from whence ensueth, that if the manner which thy soul useth in its functions and operations be wholly spiritual, we may truly say, it is all spirit, all indivisible and wholly incorruptible. Now where is it, that it worketh not with a tenderness and admirable spirituality? First, in the separations it maketh of universal natures, in numbers, relations, proportions, orders, correspondencies, harmonies, in things eternal and divine. Secondly, in judgements, discourses, disputations, comparisons, applications, which it maketh on every thing. Thirdly, in the considerations and reflections it hath on it self, yea, over all its actions, almost in infinitum. If it did not work spiritually, how could it harbour in the memory, so many seas, rivers, mountains, valleys, cities and castles? How could it put so many places into one place, not holding any place? If it operated not spiritually and indivisibly, how could it be whole in each of its actions? The body, because it is body and quantitative, and divisible, what it doth with one part, it doth not necessarily with another, what it toucheth with the hand, it doth not necessarily touch with the foot; but the soul is all in its action. If the soul understand, all the soul understandeth. If the soul will, all the soul willeth. If the soul suffer, all the Radix intellectualitatis est immaterialitas. Avicenna apud Capreol. Modus operandi sequitur modum essendi. The operations of the soul are admirable.

August. l. de spiritu & anima c. 19. Anima in quibuscunque sub motibus sui est.

the soul suffereth. For it is in an indivisible. That was it, which S. Augustine judiciously spake: The soul is all in each of its motions.

Manilius l. 4. Astron. Iam naturam naturæ luter, pervidimus omnem.

Mortal things can do nothing immortal. But our soul, to teach us its immortality, doth wonderfull works, which fear not the sithe of time, the wheel of inconstancy, nor power of death; it out-lives stones, mettals, Egyptian Pyramids, and the worlds seven wonders. It is a strange thing to see a humane spirit, which taketh away the veil from nature, and looketh into the bottom, and penetrateth into the very marrow. It entereth into these great labyrinths of essences, it defineth, divideth, distinguisheth, severeth, it appropriateth, maketh marvellous dissections, mounteth above the tracts of the Sun and time, scoreth out the course of the Heavens, the periods of the Stars. It deciphereth eclipses to an instant, and foregoeth by understanding those great celestial bodies, whose motions are more swift than wind or thunder. From thence it expatiateth into the air, there to hear the winds blow, rain pour down, tempests roar, lightnings to flash, rain-bowes and crowns arise. It descendeth into the deep caverns of the earth, there to medicate on the mettals. It floateth on the sea, it reckoneth the veins of the abyss, it keeps a register of so many birds and fishes, so many terrestrial creatures, so many worms and serpents, so many hearbs and plants. All this great frame of nature passeth through its consideration, from the cedars of Lybanus, to the hyssop. It createth sciences, it inventeth arts, it findeth out an infinite number of devices. It governeth the great bodies of Kingdoms and Common-wealths with passages of incomparable prudence. Arms and laws, cures of maladies, commerce, navigations, industries of mechanicks, and finally, a million of rarities are produced from the sources of the wit of man, who cannot yet understand his own worth.

Besides, what is more spiritual, more independent on matter, than the action of the will, than free-will, which beareth the beginning of its motion and elevation within it self, not borrowing it from any? What is more divine, than to see a heart more capable than abysses, which cannot be satiated with all the things in the world? The plant is contented with a little dew, the horse with a few oats and hay, because animal, and vegetative nature is limited to certain small quantities. But the immaterial soul, as it is in some sort infinite, bendeth to infinitie. (a) It speaketh of Heaven as of its mansion, and of God, as of the object of its felicity. It desireth to live ever, it taketh incomparable care for posteritie, it interesseth it self in the future, which it would never do, were it not its hereditary possession.

(a) Omnibus fere ingenita est sume post mortem cupido. Et unde animus affectaret aliquid quod velit post mortem, si nihil de posteritate sciret. Tertul. de testim. animæ.

Sleep, which tameth Lions, cannot overcome it. It learns its immortality even in the image of death, there it is where it incessantly worketh, travelleth by sea and land, negotiateth, converseth, sporteth, rejoyceth, suffereth, hunteth after a thousand objects both good and bad, and knoweth (says Eusebius) that having no end in its motion, it hath none in its life.

And to conclude in a word, what is there more admirable for the proof of our immortality, than this synderesis, this conscience, which is in the body, contrary to the body, and a perpetual enemy of sensual nature, which pleadeth, which questioneth, which strikes us with remorse upon the remembrance of sin? What is there less corporal than a soul, which can see its body burned, flesh pulled off with pincers, and members torn piece-meal one after another, to maintain and preserve a belief, which it judgeth to be true, as did the Martyrs? Never should we behold such a combat between the soul & body, were they not two pieces quite different, the one whereof is sublime, spiritual, immortal, the other low, frail, and mortal?

We likewise daily see, how the soul wholly retired within it self (as it happeneth in apprehensive speculations and raptures) is more strong and knowing than ever, being touched by some ray from commerce with Intelligencies, to which it hath so much relation. We find by experience, that upon the declining age when the body shrinketh, it hath much more vigour in counsels and judgements, which giveth us assurance it cannot any way participate of the corruption of the flesh. Who will consider the effects of the soul in three principal things, which are, Intelligence, Sanctitie, and Courage, shall find all therein is divine. And if the wicked, smothering these gifts of God, will put themselves willingly into the rank of bruit beasts, do they not well deserve the place of devils?

Eam decrescente corpore augeri maxime videmus Ennius. Ille sane hoc vitii melius, hoc sine istaque pejus. Claudius Marcus l. 2. de statu animæ. c. 2. Manifest conviction.

6. Finally, we say we have a soul immortal, because God both can and will make it such. He can, for he is Omnipotent, and it is not a harder matter for him to preserve souls he created, than to derive them from nothing: He will, because he engageth his Eternal word to give us this assurance; yea, he will, because it is manifested to us by the light of nature. One cannot believe a God, unless he believe him just: and it is impossible to think him just, without the belief of an immortal soul, as S. Clement reasoneth after his Master, the great S. Peter. For what a stupidity is it to imagine this father of spirits, who accommodated the most silly creatures with all the conveniencies of nature, hath neglected man so far, as to afford him a most lively knowledge, and a most ardent thirst of immortality, which principally appeareth in the most holy and worthy souls, to hold a heart in torment, never affording it any means to be satisfied, since in all nature, he never grants any inclination to any creature whatsoever, but that he provideth for its accomplishment?

Clemens. 3. Recogn.

But which is more, into what mind of a Tartarian can this imagination fall, that a sovereign Cause most intelligent, very good, and Omnipotent, should be pleased to burn virtue here with a slow fire, to tear it among thorns, to tie it on wheels, afterward to equal the soul of the most virtuous man of the earth, with that of murderers, Sardanapalus and Cyclopes: Never should these base thoughts take possession of the heart of man, if he had not villified his reason with great sins, and drowned his soul in the confusion of bodie?

Put these prophane spirits a little upon the proof of their opinion, and let them consider the reasons of Plinie, of Lucretius, of Paterus, and Sorianus; they are not men who speak, but hogs that grunt. They tell you, the soul is not seen at its passage out of the body, as if the corporal eye were made to see a soul spiritual. Doth one see the air, the winds, odours, and the sphere of fire, which our soul incomparably surpasseth in subtilitie? They ask, what doth this soul separated, where is its sight, its hearing, pleasure, taste, touching, and what good can it have without the help of sense? Spirits dulled with matter, which never gave themselves leisure to find out the curious operations of the soul in the understanding and love, whereupon it lives of its own wealth. They curiously enquire where so many souls may abide, as if hell were not big enough to contain all the Atheists.

Plin. l. 7. c. 55. Ubi cogitatio illi? Quomodo visus, auditus aut quod sine his bonum? Quæ deinde sedes? Quæ malum ista dementia iterari vitam morte?

Lastly they adde, it is to tyrannize over a soul, to make it survive after death. Who sees not it is the fear they have of God's judgement, causeth them to speak in this manner? And are not they well worthy of all unhappiness, since they so readily become the enemies of an eternal happiness?

Let us cut off the stream of so many other reasons, and say at this present, This should teach us to treat with the dead by way of much respect, and most tender charity, as with the living. It should teach us to use our soul as an eternal substance.

What

The care to be had of the soul.

What would it avail us to gain all the world, and looſe that which God deigned to redeem by his death? Let us forſake all theſe inferiour and frivolous thoughts, which nail us to the earth, and ſo baſely faſten us to the inordinate care for our bodies. Let us manure our ſoul, let us trim it up as a plot fit to receive impreſſions of the divinity. Let us prepare it for the great day of God, which muſt make the ſeparation of a part ſo divine from theſe mortal members. Let all that die, which may yield to death. Let the contexture of humours and elements diſſolve, as weak works of nature.

But let us regard this victorious ſpirit, which hath eſcaped the chains of time, and laws of death. Let us contemn the remainders of an age, already ſo much tainted by corruption. Let us enter into this univerſality of times, and into the poſſeſſion of eternity. This day, which we apprehend as the laſt of our life, is the firſt of our felicities. It is the birth of another eternal day, which muſt draw aſide the curtain, and diſcover to us the ſecrets of nature. It is the day, that muſt produce us to theſe great and divine lights, which we behold with the eye of faith in this vale of tears and miſeries. It is the day, which muſt put us between the arms of the father, after the courſe of a profuſe life, turmoyled with ſuch ſtorms, and ſo many diſturbances.

Dies iſte quem tanquam extremum reformidas, æterni natalis eſt. Sen. ep. 102.

Let us daily diſpoſe us to this paſſage, as to the entrance into our happineſs. Let us not betray its honour. Let us not wither up its glory. Let us not deface the character which God hath given it. We are at this preſent in the world, as in the belly of nature: little infants deſtitute of air and light, which look towards, and contemplate the bleſſed ſouls. What a pleaſure is it to go out of a dungeon ſo dark, a priſon ſo ſtreight, from ſuch ordures and miſeries, to enter into thoſe ſpacious Temples of eternal ſplendour's, where our being never ſhall have end, our knowledge admit ignorance, nor love ſuffer change.

The ſixteenth EXAMPLE, upon the ſixteenth MAXIM.

Of the return of Souls.

GOd, who boundeth Heaven, and limiteth earth, ordaineth alſo its place to each creature, ſuitable to the nature and qualities thereof. The body after death is committed to the earth from whence it came, and the ſoul goes to the place appointed it, according to its merit or demerit. And as it is not lawful for the dead body to forſake the tomb to converſe with the living, ſo the ſoul is not permitted to go out of the liſts Gods juſtice ordained for it, to entermeddle in worldly affairs. Notwithſtanding as the divine power often cauſeth the reſurrection of the dead for the confirmation of our faith, ſo it appointeth ſometimes the return of ſouls, for proof of their immortality.

I would not any wiſe in this point favour all the ſhallow imaginations, which entitle ſottiſh apprehenſions of the mind with the name of viſions, but it is undoubted, there is no Country in the world, nor time throughout Ages, which hath not afforded ſome great example of apparition of ſpirits, by known witneſſes, and the judgements of moſt eminent perſonages. S. Auguſtine holds, it is a doctrine grounded on Scripture, experience, and reaſon, which cannot be gain-ſaid, without ſome note of impudence, (although he much deny, that all the dreams we have of the dead, are ever their ſouls which return again.) Such was the belief of the Apoſtles in S. Luke, it not being corrected by our Saviour, who was the rule of their faith. Such the truth of the apparition of the ſoul of Moſes upon Mount Thabor. I inſiſt not now upon proof, but example, contenting my ſelf to produce one or two out of a great multitude recounted by Authours. Math. 17

Mitte quoque ad vivos alii-quos ex mortuis Scriptura teſtatur. De cura pro mortuis, c. 15. &c. 10. Luc 14.

As for the firſt, I hold the apparition of the ſoul of Samuel is moſt formal in Scripture for any one, who will conſider the whole progreſs of the narration. The hiſtory telleth us, that King Saul, after the death of Samuel, was upon the point of giving battel to the Philiſtines, and that having firſt addreſſed himſelf to God by ordinarie means, to learn the way he ſhould obſerve therein, ſeeing he had no anſwer either by dream, or the lively voice of Prophets, he did what infidels, and men deſperate do, who ſeek to get that from the devil, they cannot obtain of God. He commanded his ſervants to ſeek him out a ſorcereſs, although himſelf had baniſhed them by his Edicts out of his Kingdom. The ſervants ever ready to obſerve their Maſters in ill offices, when their own intereſt concurreth, found a famous Magician, whom the Hebrews affirm to have been a woman of good place, but out of a deteſtable curioſity, had put her ſelf into this profeſſion. Saul to cover his purpoſe, and not to amaze her; went thither by night in a diſguized habit, onely accompanied with two gentlemen, where having ſaluted her, he demanded the exerciſe of her profeſſion. But ſhe being crafty, and careful to keep her ſelf from ſurprizes, anſwered: Sir, go you about to undo me, & your ſelf alſo? Know you not the Edicts of King Saul? Saul replied, he knew all had paſſed, but ſhe might confidently proceed, aſſuring her of his warranty, and whereas ſhe propoſed puniſhments to her ſelf, ſhe ſhould meet with rewards. But ſhe ſtill doubting, and ſticking on diſtruſt, uſual in all miſchiefs, he engaged his word with great oaths, proteſting no ill ſhould befal her for any thing might paſs at that time between them. Thereupon reſolved to give him ſatisfaction, ſhe asked if it were not his deſire to ſpeak to the ſoul of a dead man, as alſo whoſe it was. Apparition of the ſoul of Samuel. 1. Reg. 28.

It was very ordinary with theſe Negromancers, to raiſe illuſions and fantaſms, inſtead of true ſpirits of the dead. S Apollonius made Achilles to be ſeen, appearing on his tomb as a giant of twelve cubits high; ſo Santaberemus ſhewed to the Emperour Baſilius the ſoul of his ſon Conſtantine; ſo Jamblicus made to appear in certain baths of Syria two figures of little children like Cupids. All this (to ſpeak properly) had nothing real in it, and it is no wonder, if thoſe who thought Samuel had been raiſed by a ſorcereſs, believed it was a ſpecter. But he who well will weigh the phraſe of Scripture, and conſider, that this ſpirit of Samuel ſuddenly appeared before the ſorcereſs had uſed her ordinary ſpells, plainly ſhewing, he came meerly by the commandment of God, and not by the charms of the Magician, will eaſily change opinion. Philoſtr. in Apoll. Zonaras. Eunapius Sardianus.

Verily the Sorcereſs was much aſtoniſhed, ſeeing the dead came contrary to the manner of other, and cried out aloud as one diſtracted: Sir, you have deceived me, you are Saul, much doubting, it was to him Samuel came. The miſerable King, who endeavoured by all means to aſſure her, fear not ſaith he, I will keep my promiſe, what have you ſeen? She anſwered: DEOS VIDI ASCENDENTES DE TERRA; as who ſhould ſay, according to the Hebrews phraſe, ſhe had ſeen a venerable perſon like an Angel, or a God, raiſed out of the earth. In what ſhape? replies the King; It is an venerable old man, ſaith ſhe, covered with the mantle of a Prophet. Then Saul with much reverence proſtrated on the ground, and made a low obeyſance to Samuel, who ſpake to him, and ſaid: QUARE ME INQUIETASTI, UT SUSCITARER? Why haſt thou diſquieted me, to make me return into the world? Neceſſitie hath conſtrained me, anſwereth Saul; I am plunged in a perplexity of affairs, and cannot get any anſwer from heaven. O man abandoned by God, why doeſt thou ask of me that, which I have foretold ſhall happen? Thy army ſhall be defeated by the Philiſtins, and thou with thy children ſhalt be to morrow with me, that is to ſay, among the dead as I am now: which ſo fell out. Now the Scripture upon this praiſeth Samuel to have prophetized after his death: if it were not the true Samuel but a ſpecter, who ſees not it were to tell a lie, and to applaud the work of the divel?

Eccl. 46.

But to the end you may ſee this belief was held by Nations, as by a decree of nature, Joſephus in the ſeventeenth book of his Judaical antiquities, relateth the apparition of the ſpirit of Alexander, ſon of the great Herod and Mariamne, who was ſeen to his wife Glapphyra, when ſhe re-married again to the King of Mauritania, to reproch her ingratitude and forgetfulneſs of her firſt husband, which having amply deduced in the firſt Tome of the holy Court, in the tenth edition upon an Inſtruction directed to widdows, I forbear here to repeat it.

Philoſtratus, in the eigth book of the life of Apollonius, maketh likewiſe mention of a young man much troubled in mind concerning the ſtate of ſouls in the other life, and ſaith Apollonius appeared unto him, aſſuring him the ſoul was immortal, and he need not to be troubled at all, ſince it was rather the work of the Divine providence, than of it.

Ἀθάνατον ψυχὴ καὶ σῶμα οὐχ, ἁπλῶς πρόνοιας.

I willingly paſſe over many other examples, to tell you that Phlegon a good Authour, who flouriſhed about an hundred years after the nativity of our Saviour, and was not of our religion, to favour our opinions, (although honourably cited by Origen, Euſebius, and S. Hierom) writeth a ſtrange hiſtorie, witneſſed by the teſtimonie of a whole Citie, wherein he then governed. He ſaith, that at Trayls a Citie in Phrygia, there was a young maid named Philenion, daughter of Democrates and Chariton, who as her ſtorie well declareth, was an amorous piece, became court-like, loved bravery, delighted in too free converſation, and followed the fooliſh pleaſures of the world, true gardens of Adonis, which in the beginning make ſhew of ſilly flowers, and in concluſion afford nought but thorns.

ἁπλῶς ἁπλῶς.

God, who followeth the voluptuous by the track, even into the ſhades of death, ſent her a ſickneſs, which having cropped the flower of her beauty, left her almoſt nothing but a living carcaſs, to deliver her over as a prey to death. The miſerable maid ſuffered the boiling fervours of the feaver through all her bodie, not looſing the flames of love, which ſhe cheriſhed in her heart. She burnt with two fires, not being able either to quench the one or other, and having but a little breath of life left on her lips, ſhe gave to love what already was wholly acquired to death, ſighing after a young Gentleman then abſent, and not daring fully to manifeſt her paſſion.

In the end, death took away the ſpoils of her life, with her pretences. The father and mother bewailed her with inconſolable tears, furniſhing out very honourable obſequies. And whereas ſhe moſt ardently affected her dreſſings and little cabinet, they buried with her all whatſoever ſhe held moſt precious. Six moneths were now paſt ſince her burial, when the Gentleman ſhe loved, named Machates, arriving at Trayls came to lodge in the houſe of his friend her father. The ſpirit of the maid, which was of the condition of thoſe whom Plato called body-lovers; retaining ſtill the affections with which ſhe went out of her bodie, appeared one evening to this Machates with words of affection, embraces, and dalliances, which plainly diſcovered it was a damned ſpirit, and an inſtrument of the divel, that tormented the one to burn the other. The young man at the firſt was much affrighted with theſe proceedings: notwithſtanding becoming tractable by little and little, he ſoon made this ſpecter very familiar. It happened during this time, that an old ſervant ſent by her Miſtreſs, to ſee what their gueſt did, found Philenion ſitting neer unto him with the ſame countenance, and the ſame garments ſhe ware in her life time; whereat much amazed, ſhe ran to the father and the mother to tell them their daughter was alive. They ſharply reprehended her for a diſtracted and wicked woman, as going about again to open their wound which ſtill bled. The ſervant juſtified her ſelf, and anſwered ſhe had not loſt her wits, nor ſpake ought but truth. Hereupon ſhe ſo enkindled the curioſitie of her Miſtreſs, that ſhe ſecretly conveyed her ſelf by night into the chamber, yet perceived nothing at all able to reſolve her.

The next day being vehemently excited with the curioſitie of knowing what to believe of this apparition, ſhe threw her ſelf at the feet of Machates, and conjured him to tell her the name of the young maid who converſed with him. The Gentleman in the beginning was much ſurprized, and ſought evaſions to divert her, but in concluſion either through compaſſion of the mother, whom he ſaw in the poſture of a ſuppliant, or by vanity of his paſſion, which eaſily unlooſned his tongue, he confeſſed he was married to Philenion, that it was a buſineſs accompliſhed by the will of the Gods, wherein nothing muſt be altered; and ſpeaking this, he drew forth a little caſket, wherein he ſhewed her a gold ring her daughter had given him, with a piece of linnen ſhe ware about her neck, proteſting ſhe was his wife: ſo much was he ſeduced by the ſubtile practizes of the evil ſpirit.

The mother having acknowledged the tokens of the deceaſed, fell down with aſtoniſhment, and coming again to her ſelf, ſhe a thouſand times kiſſed, one while the ring, another while the linnen, moiſtning them with her tears, and moving the whole family to ſorrow, which ran to ſee this ſpectacle. Then again embracing Machates, ſhe ſignified it would be an infinite favour from heaven to have him for a ſon in law, but that ſhe entreated as a courteſie one comfort he could not deny an afflicted mother, which was, once again to ſee her daughter, whom ſhe accounted dead.

The other promiſed to give her all ſatisfaction, and as Phelenion came ſecretly according to cuſtom to converſe with him, he cloſely ſent his lackey to the mother, who advertiſed her husband of it, and both of them came into Machates his chamber, where they ſurprized their daughter, at which they were ſo rapt, that being not able to utter a word, they caſt themſelves about her neck, ſtraightly embracing and with tears bedewing her, which fell from their eyes. But the daughter with a ſad and dejected countenance, fetching a deep ſigh out of her breaſt: Alas (ſaith ſhe) loving father and mother, your curioſity will coſt you dear, for you will lament me the ſecond time. Thereupon ſhe fell down dead, leaving a horrible ſtinck in the chamber, which filled the whole houſe with terrour, groans, and out-cries, in ſuch ſort, that the neighbours came in upon the noiſe, and conſequently the whole Citie ran thither to behold the corps.

The magiſtrates wondering at an accident ſo frightfull, deputed ſome Cittizens neereſt of kin to open the tomb, where the body of Philenion could not be found, but a cup & a ring ſhe had received from this Gentleman. The carrion lying in the fathers chamber, was by decree of the Senate thrown on the dunghil, dunghil, the Citie purged, and as for Macbates, he was ſo overwhelmed with ſhame and confuſion, that he ſlew himſelf with his own hands. Behold what an Authour recounteth onely illuminated by the light of nature, who wrote this hiſtorie after he had been a ſpectatour of it, of purpoſe to ſend a man immediately to the Emperour Hadrian to make a recital thereof unto him, as he ſaith in a letter he directed to a friend of his. I might have many things to ſay upon all circumſtances, which are not repugnant to that, which Eccleſiaſtical Authours relate concerning other apparitions of the damned. But I will not exceed the laws of Hiſtorians, and it is enough for me here to let you ſee the belief of the Ancients, and the puniſhment of God upon ſouls reſigned to ſin.

XVIII. MAXIM.

Of Purgatorie.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That death is the remedy of all evils, and that the ſoul ſeparated from the body hath no more to ſuffer.

Genes. 2. HAve you well conſidered in Geneſis an Angel of fire, who with a flaming ſword keepeth the gate of terreſtrial Paradiſe, placed as an uſher of the enterance into the delicious hall, which prepared by God to entertain the firſt man of the world, after it had been the theater of his glorie, became the ſcaffold of his puniſhments? Procopius obſerveth, that poor Adam at the time of his baniſhment was placed juſt over againſt this Cherubin, and that this centinel of the God of hoſts no ſooner lifted up his curtelaxe, but he made a terrour and icie horrour creep into his bones, and in that proportion the ſparkles flew from the ſword of juſtice, fears and affrightments invaded the heart of this offender, who being a murderer of his race before he was a progenitour, had brought forth a thouſand deaths by the ſole bite of an apple. Alas, if the miſerable Adam was ſo aſtoniſhed at the ſteel of the Cherubin, which dazled his eyes, what ought our repreſentments to be, what our apprehenſions, when we think on the flames of purgatory, enkindled by the breath of the love and wrath of God? So many ſouls lie there now plunged, having heretofore converſed amongſt us in mortal abode, and we muſt there perhaps long time remain to burn, and wear off ſo many ordures, as our ſoul contracted in worldly affections, if we make account to decline the eternity of torments.

Purgatorie compared to the Cherubins fiery ſword.

I am amazed when I reflect on the remiſneſs of Catholicks, as well in the proviſion for their own ſafety, as the comfort of their bretherens ſouls. And when I have well weighed the courſe and progreſs of this great neglect, I find it hath two ſources. The firſt is called infidelity, the ſecond ſtupidity, which I reſolve to convince in two paſſages of this diſcourſe.

It is true, that after this direfull hereſie, blown by the breath of the infernal ſerpent, hath for this laſt Age oppoſed the verities of our faith, beſides the loſt ſouls it daily takes away in the torrent of corruption, it hath deſtilled into the minds of Catholicks faintneſs and infidelities, which now adays turmoyl irreſolute wits upon many articles, and namely that which is now our preſent object. Purgatorie, will ſome Libertine ſay amidſt the fumes of wine and good cheer, is not ſo hot as folk talk. Who ever came back to tell us news of it? God is mercifull; think you he takes delight to burn his children, and to cut off the price of his Sons paſſion who ſatisfied for our ſins? Young ſouls hear this, and ſuck in poiſon by the ear, which choaks their belief, and killeth the exerciſe of good works. What ſhall I ſay againſt theſe infidelities, and floating opinions of feeble Catholicks? It is not my purpoſe to caſt my ſelf upon a ſubtile controverſie, which doth nothing but hale truth hither and thither. I will looſe no time to touch at many paſſages, I onely to the matter expreſs two reaſons drawn from two

THE HOLY COURT.

That the ſoul, which hath not in this world ſatisfied Gods juſtice, muſt paſs in the other life through Purgatorie.

Ne dogmata de Purgatorio pro ſanâ eccleſiæ doctrinâ nobis obtrudant Pontificii, cavendum eſt.

lights, that of nature, and the other of faith, which are able to evict confeſſion of truth from a man, who hath never ſo little ſhame or brain.

Purgatorie proved by the light of nature.

2. It is a ſtrange thing to ſee the great conſent of all Ages, which agree in a pretention of purgations of the ſoul, ſo ſtrong & powerfull, that thoſe lights of nature ſpeak as underſtandingly, as if they were written with the rays of the Sun. All the Gentiles, who lived out of the law, knew not how to gainſay this doctrine. For they were ſenſible of the noble extraction of their ſoul, and knew it was defiled by the body, and by ſenſual works. Behold the cauſe why they tied themſelves to feeble elements to purifie it; one while waſhing themſelves in the ſtreams of fountains, another while paſſing through flames, and ſometimes ſeeking other ways to cleanſe themſelves from pollutions of the fleſh. But it was a pitifull thing they found prophanation even in ſacrifice. They were not content to purge themſelves in this life, but extend it to the ſouls of the dead, conſtantly believing they ſtood in need of remedies, to free themſelves from bodily ſtains.

The opinion of the Ancients concerning the purgation of ſouls.

Theophilus Patriark of Antioch, in the book he directed to one named Antiochus, ſaith, the Gentiles took out of the Scripture all they wrote of puniſhments in the other life. And S. Auguſtine obſerveth, that having this idea, that all ſtains of the ſoul proceeded from the earth, they employed the other three elements to purge them, as he proveth by texts of the Ancients. Syneſius likewiſe thought there remained certain viſible ſpots in the ſoul, which made it appear they were the crimes wherewith it was contaminated in the body, which notwithſtanding agrees not very well with the truth we hold of the ſpirituality of the ſame ſoul. And I find he ſpake in this text more like a Platoniſt than a Chriſtian. The Hebrews, the Ægyptians, Grecians, and Romanes all contended for prayers for the dead, and the truth of purgatorie. The Hebrews three times in the year celebrated the feaſt of the dead, and their Prieſt mounting up into a chair made expreſly and ceremoniouſly four-ſquare, to repreſent the Citie of the bleſſed according to S. John, rehearſed aloud, and audibly the names of the dead, to recommend them to the prayers of ſuch as were preſent; prayers ſo familiar amongſt them, that they wrote them upon tombs inſtead of Epitaphs, in theſe terms: SIT ANIMA EIUS COLLIGATA IN FASCICULO VIVENTIUM, let his ſoul be bound up in the poſey of the living: As one would ſay; all the ſouls of Saints were as an odoriferous poſey, whereof every elect conſtituted a flower. What is this but to make ſtones ſpeak againſt impietie?

Auguſt. 21. de civitate Dei. c. 13.

Syneſius epiſt. ad Joan. τὴν ἐνσώματον τῆς ψυχῆς ἐμπάλωσιν.

Morus de Miſſa.

An excellent obſervation upon the belief of Purgatorie among the Hebrews.

Apoc. 21. 16. Civitas in quadro poſita eſt.

What ſhall I ſay of the Ægyptians, that were ſo impreſſed with the opinion that ſouls muſt be purged in the other life, in ſo much as they had been drenched in voluptuous pleaſures of the fleſh, that in the funerals of the dead having opened the bodie, they took the heart out of the breaſt and put it into a little casket, then on the bank of Nilus, where ordinarily tombs were erected, a herald holding the casket, and shewing it to the eyes of heaven, protested before all there present, the deceased now in question had lived piously, and according to the laws of his Ancestours; that if he had offended through bodily pleasures, they wished his soul might be as well cleansed, as they went about to purge the stomack, the instrument of the lusts of the living, thereupon they threw it into Nilus. Behold these poor Pagans how they were moved with a touch from God, (which cannot lye) who says unto them, the dead must be purged, but as for the rest they know not how?

Notable purgation of Ægyptians. τὸν νέκυον ἀναπτύσσουσι Μοῖραν τῶν νόσων.

Plutarch in convivio septem Sapientum.

Shall I speak of the Grecians? And know we not that Plato the prime man of their Nation in his Phedon, spake so perspicuously for purgatory, that he seemed to have been bred in the Christian schools? I will conclude with the Romans. And can we be ignorant how in the beginning of the Church under the Emperour Domitian, when as yet some Apostles lived, Quintilian, a most renowned Oratour, making an oration in the City of Rome, in a certain pleading concerning a sepulcher which had been enchanted by magick, protested in terms most expres the truth of purgatory saying: The soul being purged of fire, went to take place in heaven, as we shewed also in the sixteenth maxim: If you also require authorities of Pagans, who have seen what Christians practised; adde to all this, that Julius a very ancient Authour, speaking of the death of a Lady named Podon, observed in plain terms, that her husband, who was one of the most ancient Christians, made offerings for her, which he called δῶρα ψυχῆς ἄφεσια, Gifts for ransom of the soul, answerable to what Tertullian writeth, that it was the custom of the ancient Church to pray for the souls of the dead, yea, and to make annual offerings for them.

Quintil. Declam. 10.

Julius Florileg. l. 3.

Tertul. in exhort. ad castitat. Jam repete apud Deum pro cujus spiritu postules, pro quâ oblationes annuas reddas.

We must no longer say for evasion, it is Plato, it is Quintilian who speaketh, but confess with Aristotle, when we see an universal agreement in a proposition, it is not one man speaks, but the mouth of heaven which uttereth this verity. When S. James telleth us, God must be feared, and proves it by example of the divels themselves, he saith not, we must fear God, because the divels do so, but if any despise him, he is therein worse than divels. Likewise when the holy Fathers produce an example of Pagans, it is not to instruct us by the Pagans, but to shew, that to waver in the belief of things they generally held by the sentence of nature, is to be worse than a Pagan.

Dæmones credunt, & contremiscunt.

Second proof drawn from the light of faith. Unde hæc, quia ita facienda sunt, disputare insolentissimæ insaniæ est.

3. I say for the second argument, that so often as a truth is proved to Catholicks by the universal consent of the Church, and of all Ages, if any one chance to make doubt of it, it is an evident sign, either that he hath a giddy spirit, or is malicious in religion. This proposition is grounded upon the axiom of S. Augustine, who in his Epistle written to Januarius, assureth us, that when we find the tracks of a custom generally observed throughout the whole Church, it is evident that it cometh from the Apostles, or those, to whom God hath given full Authority in the Church, and that to go about to bely or question it, is to pass from folly to insolency.

Now so it is, the truth of purgatorie is established by the opinion, practice, sentence and decisions of all the Church, in such sort, that there is not any verity of our faith more fortified. How is that? Begin with our France: Behold the Councel of Chalons upon Saone for prayers for the dead, and the truth of purgatorie. Go into Spain, behold that of Braga; into Germany, behold that of Wormes; into Italy, behold the sixth Councel held at Rome under Pope Symmachus; into Greece, behold a number of Synods collected by Martius; into Affrick, behold the third of Carthage. Lastly behold the three Oecumenical of Lateran, Florence, and Trent, which say the same. Doth not this suffice to establish a truth in the wit of a man, who hath never so little understanding?

Our adversaries, who still bark against this verity, as dogs at the moons brightness, when they have said Jesus made purgation of sins, and that it was said to the good thief, thou shalt to day be with me in Paradise, or produced some other frivolous objections, have shewed all their ability.

I leave you a little to ponder the goodly consequences: Jesus purged sins, there is then no purgatorie? Should not we have cause to say in the same fashion, Jesus prayed for remission of our sins, then we no longer stand in need of prayer or pennance: and in vain is that S. Luke saith, that Jesus must suffer, and that pennance was preached in his name. As the prayers of our Saviour destroy not our prayers, so his satisfaction overthroweth not ours. He prayed that we might pray; he satisfied, to give strength and merit to our satisfaction, which would be dead and unprofitable, were they not quickened by his bloud. To what purpose is it to say the good thief went directly to Paradise, without feeling purgatorie? As if we should say, it was necessarie for all the world to pass that way. Make your self a great Saint, and you shall have nothing to do with it. Purge all your sins by a love so fervent, that the purifying flames may not find any thing to cleanse. He who hath payed, ows nothing, and who hath satisfied in this world, shall find unrestrained freedom in the other.

Luc. 24. 47.

But think you, in a life which contracteth so many stains, a soul may be raised in an instant above the celestial orbs to the sight of God, before it have passed by those purgations, which the Divine justice ordaineth to every one according to his demerits? Endeavour is used to deafen your ears with piety, wranglings, and unprofitable disputations, to make you believe purgatory is an invention of interessed Priests; it seems this doctrine came into the world but within these two dayes. But read the Scripture, and see the Fathers who interpret it, you shall find proofs to fall upon you like a cloud for confirmation of this verity.

When S. Paul in the first to the Corinthians third Chapter said, that the day of God, to wit the day of judgement be it general or particular, shall be manifested by fire, which shall put every ones works upon trial; and that he who upon the foundations of Jesus shall build with wood, straw, or hay, to wit with vain and sleight works, shall be saved as by fire, he clearly declared the doctrine of purgatorie, unless you be more illuminated than S. Basil and S. Ambrose, who have judged it so: for the first saith he threateneth the soul, not with destruction, but purgation; and the other plainly expresseth, he speaks of the pains of fire, which God hath appointed to purify souls. And it is a poor resistance to object, he said, as by fire, and not by fire: For it is a manner of expression in Scripture, which nothing diminisheth the reality of things, otherwise we should say when S. John wrote in the first Chapter of his Gospel, that men saw Jesus as the onely Son of God, that he were onely a figure of it, not a truth. And when S. Paul to the Philippians second Chapter witnesseth, he was found as a man, we might infer he were not man. See you not how these silly curiosities of words directly invade the truth? When S. Matthew in the twelfth Chapter makes mention of one sin which shall never be remitted, either in this world or in the other; S. Bernard in his three-score & sixth homily upon the Canticles mainly insisteth upon this passage, and takes it as an infallible proof of our doctrine. When the Evangelist himself toucheth the discourse of the prisoner, which shall be put into a place from whence he shall not come, until he have paid the last penny; Saint Cyprian says plainly: It is one thing to be a long time purged for sins by the torment of fire, another by the purgation, which is made by the passion of Jesus Christ. When in the same Authour it is spoken of divers punishments of choller handled in the fift Chapter, S. Auguſtine in the firſt book of the ſermon made on the mountain, interpreteth all that of puniſhments in the other life. When in the fourth Chapter of Tobie, it is written of bread to be put upon the graves of the dead, S. Chryſoſtom, Homily thirty two upon S. Matheu referreth this paſſage to the cuſtom of the ancient Church, which called both the Prieſts and the poor purpoſely to pray for the dead. When mention is made in the fourth of Kings of a ſolemn faſt made for Saul, Bede makes no queſtion but it was for the quiet of his ſoul: For S. Paul ſheweth in the firſt to the Corinthians fifteenth Chapter that it was the cuſtom to mortifie and macerate ones ſelf for the dead, and the ſecond of Machabees ſaith, it is a holy and a wholeſome thing to pray for them. Who knew more, and who ſaw more in all this than the great S. Auguſtine, who on the thirty ſeventh Pſalm hath theſe words: My God make me ſuch in my life, that I may not need the fire of Purgatorie after my death. Hath the Roman Church hired all theſe ſo ancient Fathers to write ſuch texts in its behalf? Is it not a ſhame that a brainleſs Libertine with the eyes of a bat ſhould mock at all theſe lights?

Basil. in Isa. c. 1. Non exterminium minatur, sed purgationem infert. Ambros. Hic ostendit pœnas ignis passurum.

Cyprian. l. 4. ep. 2.

ments

Aug. in Pſal. 37. Talem me redde, cui emendatorio igne non ſit opus.

4. Doubtleſs, will ſome ſay, theſe reaſons are forcible; but I underſtand not where this purgatorie is, and how ſouls are there tormented. To that I anſwer, the Church which walketh reſervedly in its ordinances, ever grounded on the word of God, onely obligeth us to hold as an article of faith, a third place for the purgation of ſouls, which is neither Paradiſe nor hel. As for circumſtances of the place and manner of ſenſible torments, it hath decryed nothing thereof as an article of our belief. School Divines ordinarily ſet purgatorie in a ſubterranean place, which is very probable. It may alſo be, that ſouls may be purged in the air, in the ſphear of fire, and in divers parts of the elementary world, according to the opinion of S. Gregory Nyſſen, S. Chryſoſtom, and S. Gregory the great. It dependeth on the prerogative of Gods power, and the miniſtery of Angels.

The manner of Purgatory.

Nyſſ. de anima & reſurrectione. Chryſoſt. homil. de Beatorum premiis. Bede l. 3. hiſt. Angl. 29.

As for puniſhments, it is moſt certain the firſt conſiſteth in ſuſpenſion from the ſight of God, a matter very dolorous to a ſoul, which being out of the body, & far abſented from its ſource, is, as would the globe of the earth be, were it out of its place, or like unto fire ſhut up in the bowels of mount Ætna. It naturally deſireth to rejoyn it ſelf to God, and the leaſt retardation it feels from ſuch felicitie is moſt ſenſible unto it. It mourneth to be deprived from an infinite comfort, when the thirſt is moſt ardent, and to ſee it ſelf bereaved by its own fault; yea, ſuch an one as might eaſily have been avoided. The ſecond is the pain of ſenſe which is exerciſed by fire (the great executioner of Gods juſtice) and ſometimes alſo by other wayes, known to his providence, as S. Bonaventure and holy Bede teach us. If you ſay you cannot comprehend how a material thing worketh on a ſpiritual: I ask of you again, this ſoul which is in your bodie, is it of any other kind than thoſe in purgatorie? And yet ſee you not how it daily ſuffereth in the bodie? See you not how all the dolours of mortal fleſh rebound back again by an amorous ſimpathy, and a counter-buff wholly neceſſarie, to the bottom of our ſoul? And yet you ask how it can ſuffer? Is it not true, our ſoul containeth in it the root of underſtanding, & all ſenſible knowledge, framed and accompliſhed by the help of the bodies organs? Is it not true, that being in the bodie it underſtandeth and feeleth with dependance on the bodie? But ſeparated, doth it looſe this root of underſtanding and knowledge? Verily no: For it then underſtandeth with independence on the body. To ſpeak alſo according to the opinion of ſome, it may feel out of the body not onely by a knowledge naked and intellectual, but experimental in ſome ſort, not unlike the underſtanding exerciſed in the bodie. But there is no more corporal organ, which is as the chariot of feeling. What importeth it? God by his power cannot he ſupply the organ of bodie, and neceſſitate the ſoul immediately to feel the ſharpneſs of fire, as if it were ſtill in the bodie? And which is more, ſome Divines think there would be no inconvenience to ſay, the ſoul were reveſted by God with a bodie of air, as in a ſheath, wherewith it ſhould have the ſame ſympathy it had before with the bodie it informed: and this bodie being incorruptibly burnt, as that of the damned, ſhould cauſe a painful quality to ariſe to torment it: which I notwithſtanding think not ſo probable. But I rather believe, the fire not being contrarie of its nature to the ſpirit, might for all that be choſen and appointed by the ſingular diſpoſition of providence to be unto the ſoul an afflicting ſign, in that it repreſenteth to it in its flames the anger of an offended God, as it ſhall be ſaid in the ſubſequent Maxim.

Mirùm, ſed veri modis. Auguſt.

Corink. de purgatorio. p. 529.

Alas! O Chriſtians, God grant we may be ignorant of this eternal and temporal fire, and may rather be purged in this life, than expect it in the other.

Againſt the dulneſs of thoſe who underſtand it not.

5. When I come to the ſecond point of this diſcourſe, I cannot wonder enough at our ſtupidity & lethargy: we believe purgatorie and bely our belief by our works. What may we hope in the other life, living ſo negligently and remiſſely? God is mercifull: Behold our ordinarie ſaying. But ſee we not in Scriptures the hand of God armed with fiery tempeſts over the infamous Cities of Sodom and Gomorrha, and the bodies which ſacrificed themſelves in the flames of prodigious luxurie roaſted and broyled under the breath of the anger of the Omnipotent? See we not a whole world buried in the waters of a deluge, waves of the Ocean ruſhing, as in a citie ſacked, on the heads of offenders, the ſea becoming altogether the executioner and tomb of ſinners? See we not thoſe beautifull Angels ſo beloved of God, and ſo worthy of favour, which alſo came moſt reſplendent out of his hands, loſt by one thought of pride, ſcorched and precipitated into dungeons of eternal flames?

Think we to be more to God, than thoſe cities repleniſhed with an infinite number of ſouls, than a whole world, than legions of Angels? Let us not flatter our ſelves by a preſumptuous confidence of a mercy, not due to a negligence ſo faint and diſſolute.

The truth is, no uncleanneſs enetreth into Paradiſe: The truth is, the eyes of the ſupream Judge cannot endure pollution. For if there be any, it muſt infallibly be taken off with the file of juſtice. The torment of purgatorie is executed with ſharp & transfixing pains, ſince that imperious element, which raiſeth ſo many terrours in our world, hath there the place of an officer. The continuance thereof is long, by certain revelations that ſome ſouls have been there many years: its perſeverance & activity dreadful, ſince the ſoul is immortal, and incorruptible to its torments. This made the hair ſtand an end on the heads of all Saints. And when the great man Job, all compoſed of innocency & ſanctity, thought on this juſtice of God, he conceived himſelf to be as a little fiſh crouch'd in the water, that heareth all the ſtorms touling over its head. S. Auguſtine grown hoary in a thouſand valourous battails for defence of the Church, apprehendeth purgatory; & the elect ſouls, who build all in gold and ſilver, and pretious ſtones, fear the trial of fire, and we with our edifices of ſtubble, ſtraw, and hay, walk with exalted creſts, as if we had all the aſſurances of our ſalvation.

Job 11. Semper enim quaſi tumentes ſuper me fluctus timui Deum, & pondus ejus ferre non potui.

Where are we, if this torch of juſtice awaken us not? Perhaps we have made a bargain with this fire, and theſe puniſhments, or that we are torment-proof not to feel them. Is there any man who hath learned to abide among burning coals? We are ſo tender, ſo nice, ſo impatient, ſo the lovers of our ſelves, that one ounce weigheth a pound with us. O worldlings! who ſhall weep over you, ſince you know not how to bewail your ſelves? Your bodies are dainty both by nature and education; yea, your ſouls much more: you cannot endure the ſtinging of a bee; the very ſight of a Surgeons lancet affrights you, and yet you daily entangle your ſelves in a thouſand vanities, a thouſand courtſhips, and a thouſand worldly loves, which defile your ſoul, and muſt at a dear rate be diſcharged in the other world. We know the Chriſtians of the Indies newly converted, when they felt ſome temptations contrary to the law of God, ran to their chimney hearths, and thruſt their hands into the flames, ſaying: Sin ſoul, if thou canſt abide fire, if not, go no further. Do the like, touch, if not in effect, at leaſt by conſideration, the devouring flames of Gods Juſtice. And if they ſeem ſtrange unto you, engage not your ſelf in them by your ſenſualities.

Quis poterit habitare de vobis cum igne devorante?

Rigour of the living againſt the ſouls in Purgatory.

6. From the ſlight apprehenſion we have of Purgatory, proceedeth another ſtupidity very unreaſonable, which is, that we are very little careful of the ſouls of the dead; a matter very worthy of blame for two principal reaſons. The firſt is, that the providence of God which diſpoſeth all with ſo great ſweetneſs, hath as it were tied the ſalvation of theſe good ſouls to the fervour of our prayers, and would have us to be as mediatours and interceſſours of their felicity, which is verily one of the greateſt titles of honour we can receive. It is a note of Divinity to have power to oblige men, ſaith an Ancient, and there is no ſhorter way to eternal glory. Now God gives us the means to oblige, not mortals, but immortal ſouls, and to oblige them in a cauſe ſo great and eminent, that if all the treaſures and lives of the world were diſſolved into one maſs, they could not reach to the leaſt degree of the felicity you may procure to theſe faithfull ſouls.

Plin. l. 2. c. 7. Deum eſt mortali benefacere mortalem, & hac ad æternam gloriam via.

By obliging them in this kind, you gain eternal friends, who will entertain no thoughts, but ſuch as may tend to render you the like, and to bear you into the boſom of beatitude, and yet this being moſt eaſie for you (as a matter which conſiſteth in ſome prayers, alms deeds, and good works) you neglect it: Is not this a prodigious careleſneſs?

The ſecond reaſon is, that by ſuch negligence we betray our ſoul, which enclineth out of a natural propenſion to the ſweetneſs and mercy we exerciſe even towards beaſts. It is the argument which the Son of God made uſe of: If a horſe, an Ox, a ſheep fall into a ditch, there is neither feſtival nor ſabbath withholds; every one who is able, ſtretcheth out a hand and draws it forth: And behold here not a beaſt, but a ſoul created to the image of God, irradiated with the moſt excellent lineaments of his beauty, which is, to live with Angels eternally, fallen into a ditch, fallen into a boyling furnace, who is afflicted, tormented, imploreth the help of all the world, and whileſt we ſlacken to ſuccour it, hath theſe mournful words of Jeremie:

Math. 12. 11. Quis erit ex vobis homo, qui habeat ovem unam, & ſi ceciderit hæc ſabbatho in foveam, manum tentabit & levabit eam. Her. Thren. De excelſo miſit ignem in oſſibus meis, & erudivit me, &c. Vigilavit jugum iniquitatum mearum, &c.

Alas! God the juſt avenger of crimes committed againſt his divine Majeſty, hath poured fire into my bones to chaſtiſe me. Behold me in the nets of juſtice, behold me now deſolate, penſive, and diſconſolate both night and day. All afflicteth me in this ſaid abode, but nothing is ſo irkſom, as the burden of mine iniquities and ingratitudes. It is a yoke which ſurchargeth my neck like lead, and pulls me down into the torments, from whence I cannot go without your charities. O you, my dear kindred, friends, and allies, who paſs through the Church-yard, made the depoſitary of my bones, conſider and ſee with the eyes of faith, whether there be any dolour comparable to mine: ſince God hath cut me off on the day of his indignation, with a ſtrong and inevitable arm. O ingrateful and diſloyal ſon, it is the ſoul of thy father which ſpeaketh unto thee in this manner, and ſays unto thee: Son, I have paſſed my life as the ſpider, ſtil ſpinning, ever ſeeking after worldly wealth, perpetually exhauſting my proper ſubſtance to enrich thee, I lived on gall and cares, that thou mighteſt ſwim in roſe-water; I travelled over lands and ſeas, to build a ſilver bridge for thy fortune, to ſet thee on flower-de-luces and employments of a Kingdom, where is thy retribution?

O vos omnes qui tranſitis per viam attendite, & videte ſi eſt dolor ſicut dolor meus. Quoniam vindemiavit me, ut locutus eſt Dominus in die furoris ſui.

My ſon, I complain not, my eye being ſhut, my body was troubleſom to thee in thy houſe, and thou couldſt not endure it; it was a dung-hil muſt be yielded up to the earth: but I complain, that thou being well informed thy father had an immortal ſoul, which thou mighteſt comfort by thy good works, thou trayterouſly employedſt the money, whereof the poor have too much been fruſtrated, to eſtabliſh thy vanities, and fatten thee in pleaſures. Where is thy liberality? Where are thy alms toward miſerable creatures, who die in affliction in the ſtreets? Obſerve juſtice, and take example by my diſaſters.

Husband, it is thy wife ſo beloved, that ſpeaks to thee, ſaying: Ah my deareſt friends, where is the faith plighted in the face of the Church? Where are the faithful loves which ſhould have no limit but eternity? Death no ſooner abſented me from thy eyes, but forgetfulneſs drew me out of thy heart. I complain not thou liveſt happy and fortunate in thy new affections, for I am in a condition wherein I can neither envy nor malice any; but I complain, that not onely after my death the children, which are pledges of our love, were diſtaſtful to thee, but thou haſt wholly loſt the memory of one who was ſo precious to thee, and whom thou as a Chriſtian oughteſt to love beyond a tomb. Open yet once unto her the bowels of thy charity, and comfort by thy alms and good works, a ſoul which muſt expect that help from thee, or ſome other.

The ſeventeenth EXAMPLE upon the ſeventeenth MAXIM.

Apparition of Souls in Purgatorie.

HIſtories tell us, the apparation of ſouls in Purgatory are ſo frequent, that he who would keep an account, may as ſoon number the ſtars in the ſky, or leaves on the trees. But as it is not fit to be too credulous in all may be ſaid thereupon, ſo a man muſt be very impudent to deny all is ſpoken of it, and to oppoſe as well the authority of ſo many great perſonages, as the memory of all Ages.

He who believes nothing above nature, will not believe a God of nature. How many extraordinary things are there, the experience whereof teacheth us the effects, and of which God hideth the reaſons from us? The Philoſopher Democritus diſputing with the Sages of his time concerning the ſecret power of nature, held commonly in his hand, the ſtone called cathocita, which inſenſibly ſticketh to ſuch as touch it, and they being unable to give a reaſon of it, he inferred there were many ſecrets which are rather to humble our ſpirits, than to ſatisfie our curioſity. Who can tell why the theamede, which is a kind of adamant, draweth iron on one ſide, and repelleth it on the other? Why do the forked branches of the nut-tree, turn towards mines of gold and ſilver? Why do bees often die in the hives, after the death of the Maſter of the family, unleſs they be elſe-where tranſported? Why doth a dead body caſt forth bloud in the preſence of the murderer? Why do certain fountains in the current of their waters, and in their colour, carry preſages of ſeaſons, as that of Blomuza, which waxeth red when the countrey is menaced with war? Why have so many noble families certain signs, which never fail to happen when some one of the family is to die? The commerce of the living with spirits of the dead, is a matter very extraordinarie, but not impossible to the Father of spirits, who holdeth total nature between his hands.

Solinus Polyhiſtor.

Jul. Scal. A Porta. Camerar.

Dimarus Petrus Albinus.

Peter of Clugny, surnamed the Venerable, and esteemed in his time as the oracle of France, was a man who proceeded in these affairs with much consideration, not countenancing any thing either frivolous or light. Behold the cause, wherefore I willingly make use of his authority. He telleth, that in a village of Spain named the Star, there was a man of quality called Peter of Engelbert, much esteemed in the world for his excellent parts and abundant riches.

Notwithstanding, the spirit of God having made him understand the vanity of all humane things, being now far stepped into years, he went into a Monastery of the Order of Clugny, there the more piously to pass the remnant of his dayes, as it is said, the best incense cometh from old trees. He often spake amongst the holy Fryers of a vision which he saw, when he as yet was in the world, and which he acknowledged to be no small motive to work his conversion. This bruit came to the ears of Venerable Peter, who was his General, and who for the affairs of his Order, was then gone into Spain. Behold the cause why he, never admitting any discourses to be entertained, if they were not well verified, took the pains to go into a little Monastery of Nazare, where Engelbert was, & to question him upon it in the presence of the Bishops of Oleron and Osma, conjuring him in the virtue of holy obedience, to tell him punctually the truth touching the vision he had seen, whilest he led a secular life. This man being very grave, and very circumspect in all he said, spake the words which the Authour of the historie hath couched in his proper terms:

In the time that Alphonsus the younger, heir of the great Alphonsus, warred in Castile against certain factious dis-united from his obedience, he made an Edict, that every family in his Kingdom should be bound to furnish him with a souldier: which was the cause that for obedience to the Kings commands, I sent into his army one of my household-servants, named Sancius. The wars being ended, and the troups discharged, he returned to my house, where having some time sojourned, he was seized by a sickness, which in few dayes took him away into the other world. We performed the obsequies usually observed towards the dead, and four moneths were already past, we hearing nought at all of the state of his soul, when behold upon a winters night being in my bed, throughly awake, I perceived a man, who stirring up the ashes of my hearth, opened the burning coals, which made him the more easily to be seen. Although I found my self much terrified with the sight of this ghost, God gave me courage to ask him who he was, and for what purpose he came thither to lay my hearth abroad. But he in a very low voice answered: Master, fear nothing, I am your poor servant Sancius; I go into Castile in the company of many souldiers to expiate my sins in the same place where I committed them.

I stoutly replied, If the commandment of God call you thither, to what purpose come you hither? Sir, saith he, take it not amiss, for it is not without the Divine permission. I am in a state not desperate, and wherein I may be helped by you, if you bear any good will towards me. Hereupon I required what his necessity was, and what succour he expected from me. You know Master, said he, that a little before my death, you sent me into a place where ordinarily men are not sanctified. Liberty, ill example, youth, and temerity, all conspire against the soul of a poor souldier, who hath no government. I committed many out-rages during the late war, robbing and pillaging even to the goods of the Church, for which I am at this present grievously tormented. But, good Master, if you loved me alive as one of yours, forget me not after death. I ask no part of your great riches, but onely your prayers, and some alms for my sake, which will much assist to mitigate my pains. My Mistress oweth me about eight franks upon a reckoning between her and me, let her bestow it, not for my body, which hath no need of it, but the comfort of my soul, which expecteth it from your charities.

I know not how I found my self emboldened by these speeches, but I had more desire to enterain it, than fear of the apparition. I demanded whether it could tell me news of one of my countrey-men, named Peter Dejaca, who died a while since. To which he made answer, I need not trouble my self with it, for he was already in the number of the blessed, since the great alms he gave in the last famine, had purchased heaven for him. From thence I fell upon another question, and was curious to know what had happened to a certain Judge, whom I very well knew, and who lately passed into the other life. To which he replied: Sir, speak not of that miserable man, for hell possesseth him through the corruption of justice which he by damnable practice exercised, having an honour and soul saleable to the prejudice of his conscience. My curiosity carried me higher, to enquire what became of King Alphonsus the Great, at which time I heard another voice that came from a window behind me, saying very distinctly: It is not of Sancius you must demand that, because he as yet can say nothing to the state of that Prince, but I may have more experience thereof, than he; I deceasing five years ago, and being present in an accident which gave me some light of it. I was much surprized, unexpectedly hearing this other voice, and turning, saw by the help of the Moons brightness which reflected into my chamber, a man leaning on my window, whom I intreated to tell me where then King Alphonsus was. Whereto he replied, he well knew, that passing out of this life, he had been much tormented, and that the prayers of good religious men much helped him: but he could not at this present say in what state he was. Having spoken thus much, he turned towards Sancius, sitting neer the fire, and said, Let us go, it is time we depart. At which Sancius making no other answer, speedily rose up, and redoubled his complaints with a lamentable voice, saying: Sir, I intreat you once again remember me, and that my Mistress perform the request I made you.

The next day Engelbert understood from his wife what the spirit told him, and with all observation disposed himself speedily and charitably, to satisfie all was required. What may we infer upon this, but S. Augustine's conclusion which he left in a book of care for the dead, fifteenth Chapter?

Holy Scriptures witness, that the dead are sometimes sent to living men, as on the contrarie, S. Paul amongst the living was lifted up to heaven. As we ordinarily know not what becomes of the persons of the dead, so we must confess, the dead know not all is done in the world at the time it is done, but they afterwards learn it from those, who pass out of this life into the other, and converse with them. Yet they understand not all sorts of affairs, but those which may be told them, and such as are permitted to remain in their memories, that recount them to souls who must know them. Angels who are present to actions here beneath, may also discover to the dead what the Sovereign Arbiter, to whom all things are subjected, shall appoint to come to the knowledge of the one or other.

XVIII. MAXIM.

Of Eternal unhappineſs.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That we cannot be miſerable when we are no more.

Belief of a judgement moſt general.

THat there is an inevitable judgement of God for the damned, fire, darkneſs, eternal priſons, (O Libertine and prophane ſoul) is not a propoſition needs to be proved by many reaſons and arguments. It is the ſubject of all books, the diſcourſe of all tongues, the confeſſion of all people, the great voice of nature, which forgetfulneſs cannot obliterate, impiety extinguiſh, not an evil conſcience take away. The Hebrews, Grecians, Latins, Chaldeans, Perſians, Arabians, Abiſſines, Affricans, Indians, and not ſpeaking of others, all Nations moſt remote from our region, moſt ſavage in manners, moſt ſtrange in cuſtoms have believed, proclaimed, proteſted, do believe, proclaim, and proteſt this through all Ages; and although different in condition, all notwithſtanding agree in the faith of a living God, who knoweth, ſeeth, judgeth of the good and bad deeds of this life, ordaineth rewards for virtue, and puniſhments for vice.

Naturâ plerâque ſuggerunt̃ur quaſi de publico ſenſu. Tertul. de animâ.

The order of God.

It is the order of God, who governeth the world with two hands, which are juſtice and mercie. If you take away one of them, you maim him. It is the condition of humane and Divine things, where contraries are ever counter-ballanced by contraries, ſay Philoſophers. If there be a Paradiſe for virtues, there muſt be a hell for crimes. No leſs doth hell contribute to publiſh Gods omnipotencie, than Paradiſe. As heaven is furniſhed with ſtars, hell ſhall be with the damned, and the juſtice of the Sovereign will no leſs appear in the condemnation of the culpable, than in the defence of innocents. I knew not what made Doctour Toſtatus ſay, that Plato placed hell in the ſphere of Mars, ſince he very well mentions it in the concave of abyſſes in his Phedon. Triſmegiſtus in Pymander omitted not to ſpeak of avenging flames due to impiety. The Stoicks treat among their ſecrets of the general fiering of the world, as witneſſeth Clemens Alexandrinus in his ſtromata. And other Philoſophers according to Tertullian ſpeak of ſecret fire, which muſt ſerve as an inſtrument of Gods vengeance. The moſt ſtupid have ſeen it, the moſt inſolent have frowned at it, and the moſt forlorn are aſtoniſhed with it.

Notable ſpeech of S. Thomas. S. Thom. opuſ. 63. Non eſt infernus peior cælo. Sicut cælum ſyderibus, ſic infernus damnatis ornabitur.

The opinion of Philoſophers. Φλὸγες τιμωρὸι χαὶ. Triſmegiſt. in Pimandro. Cle. Alex. ſtrom. 5.

And verily it is a hydeous thing to behold onely on paper, what the Authour of the cardinal works of Jeſus Chriſt writeth: To burn in flames which waſt not, nor ſhall ever be conſumed, to be ſcorched through the whole body with remedileſs fires, to be broiled alive in his own greaſe, and broiled with ſtains of his impurities not to be taken off. To ſee nothing but pits of fire, and flaming furnaces without eaſe, relaxation, remedy, change, or diminution of ſentence.

Inconſumptibilibus flammis corpus allambentibus ardere, in proprio adipe frixum libidines bullire, &c.

How the fire of hell burneth.

Notwithſtanding (O Libertine) thou doſt ask, how this material fire burneth ſpiritual ſouls? It is one of the moſt unfortunate ſciences not to underſtand hell, but by proper experience, to diſpute the activity of a fire as true as the mouth of God, and unfaithfully deny on earth, what muſt everlaſtingly be learned under earth. Algazel the Arabian & Avicen ſaid, a damned ſoul ſuffers no other pain but the object of its eternal perdition. Algazel and Avicen: behold two goodly Authours to oppoſe the wiſdom of the eternal word. I am of opinion, we learn from devils how to believe in God, and derive our Theology from the lips of the wicked, and our belief from infidelity, as if one ſhould proſtitute a Veſtal to a loſt man. Alas wretched ſpirit! how worthy art thou of compaſſion, when not ſatisfied to play the Epicure in thy manners, thou wilt divide thy Libertiniſm with Philoſophy. If this diſcourſe, which ought to be dedicated to holy horrour of Gods judgements, did permit farther queſtion, one might ſhew with the great Biſhop of Paris, that a damned ſoul kept in a priſon of fire, retains all the ſame ſenſes, as if it were with the bodie in the middeſt of flames, ſince we feel in this life, ſuch vivacity onely from the imagination, that it in us produceth the ſame effects which the preſence of objects doth. And this Doctour witneſſeth he hath ſeen and known men, who needed no other purgation but the ſight of a medecine. But if the ſole idea do thus, what will the real impreſſion of fire work upon a ſoul, which raiſed by the Divine power above its ordinarie force, leaves a form and a character, as if a hot-iron were ſtamped on the fleſh. We might deduce with S. Thomas, Turrecremata, Cajetan, Iſolam, and Ocham, all the exquiſite dolours of a ſoul, that feeleth it ſelf impriſoned as in a cage of fire; and ſtormeth, ſeeing it ſelf not onely deprived of ſweet liberty, but tormented by an imperious element, deſtined by God for its puniſhment by extraordinary ways, by a ſuppliment of the antipathy of ſenſes, and which ſhamefully wrack it, as if a perſon of eminent quality were inſolently abuſed by ſome ſlave come from the Moors or Arabia.

Gulielm. Pariſ. de univerſo.

We ſhould likewiſe ſet before you with other Divines the quality of a prodigious deformity, cauſed by fire raiſed above its condition, which extreamly afflicteth an immortal ſpirit, then eſpecially, when it underſtands the excellent gifts wherewith God had endowed it, the favours and glories it might pretend unto this moſt bleſſed eternity. One might ſay with many other modern Doctours, that the ſoul being the root of ſenſitive qualities, is no leſs tormented by objects diſſenting from ſenſe, than as if ſenſe were preſent, and hath a ſpiritual ſenſe, by the help of which, it trieth and feeleth the fire with an experimental knowledge, wholly like the action of ſenſe. All theſe opinions might be argued with many inſtancies and reaſons, but it being not according to the ſcope of this deſign, I ſay in one word with S. Gregory the Great: There is made in the ſoul, from a viſible fire, a heat and an inviſible pain. It is true, the ſoul ſeparated from the body hath not a natural antipathy and diſagreement from fire, but what this imperious element cannot have, remaining within the limits of nature, it obtaineth by a particular ordinance and diſpoſition of God, who chooſeth and expreſly deputeth it to ſerve him, as an inſtrument and a ſign in this action, and to be as an eternal meſſenger of his anger againſt a damned ſoul. Now as the Sovereign Judge of the world gave life to Cain for a puniſhment, ſo (ac-

See S. Auguſt. 21. Citie of God. S. Gregory in the 4. of his dialogues. S. Thomas contra Gentes l. 4. c. 90. Suar. part. 3. and the R. P. Theophilus Raynaud in his natural Theology, where this queſtion is excellently handled.

THE HOLY COURT.

That the wicked being no more for this preſent life, are everlaſting for the pains of the damned.

(according to S. Ambroſe,) he engraved by the ſame means a diſaſtrous mark on his perſon, which continually ſet before the eyes of this fratricide the image of his crime, and the Divine juſtice. In ſuch manner, that oftentimes turmoyled during life in the miſeries and confuſions of his bruiciſh ſpirit, ſo ſoon as he repreſented to himſelf this ſign, he acknowledged the decree of God, who prolonged his life to lengthen his calamities: So this Divine hand, Omnipotent in its effects, imprinteth fire on a damned ſoul, as the true token of his juſtice, the character of his anger, the centinel and executioner of his eternal will, who beareth the face of an incenſed God with all his decrees in his own flames, who preſſeth and lieth heavy on this miſerable thing, ſeparated from the ſight of God, and reſigned through an eternal malediction to the life of divels.

Foundation of the eternity of the pains of the damned.

2. Thou muſt here underſtand, O Reader, this truth touching the eternity of the pains of the damned, confirmed by expreſs texts of holy Scripture, and the deciſion of the univerſal Church, and by all Ages, is grounded upon the juſtice of God, ever to be adored by our wills, although impenetrable to the weakneſs of our underſtanding: and for confirmation hereof, I think we ſhould not omit the reaſons of S. Gregory, S. Bernard and S. Thomas, before we produce that, which to me ſeems the moſt formal; for although they are not all neceſſarie in their concluſions, yet they fail not to furniſh us with much light, and to give matter of true piety, which is the butt whereat we aim in this diſcourſe. You (O ſinner) demand, why is a deadly ſin ſtrucken and puniſhed with an eternal pain? I anſwer you firſt with S. Gregory the Great, that if an eternal malice be proved in ſin, juſtice by all reaſonable ways requireth the chaſtizement of it to be eternal: for an eternity of crimes muſt be counterballanced with an eternity of miſeries. Now ſin in ſome ſort is eternal, and in ſome manner extends beyond our life, which alone is capable of merit or demerit. For tell me, thoſe ſtones and kernels of pomegranades, and apple-trees, and all other trees created in the firſt week of the world, were they temporary or eternal? Temporary, you will ſay, for they fell before the tree. And yet behold they propagate to our time, and live in as many trees as there are of their kind on earth, for theſe five thouſand years or thereabouts. The like is it with the actions you do at this preſent: For they ſeem to paſs in a moment, yet are they ſo many ſeeds of eternity. Reader, underſtand well what I ſay, behold here a ſecret, wherewith daily to acquire a rich treaſure of merits: make me all your virtues as eternal by the ſincerity of your intentions, as they in effect are ſuch in their conſequence. When you do a good work, be it prayer, alms, or other act of charity, do it ſtoutly, in ſuch manner and diſpoſition, that were you eternal on earth, you would eternally renounce evil, and embrace good. So do all the Juſt, and ſo do they eternize all good and laudable actions. But ſinners, who paſs out of this life in mortal ſin, are ſo framed, that might you enter into their hearts, you there ſhould find ſuch marks of malice, ſuch characters of ſin imprinted, as with a hot iron, that they wiſh to live eternally, to ſin everlaſtingly. Their life is mortal, but the affections they have towards ſin are immortal, for which cauſe Gods juſtice requires they never be without torment, who would never live without ſin.

1. Reaſon of S. Gregory.

Non tranſeunt opera noſtra ut videantur, ſed temporalia quæque velut æternitatis ſemina jaciuntur.

Vellent ſine fine vivere, ut poſſint ſine fine peccare. Diſcretus autem judex corda penſat & affectus, non facta.

Ad magnam juſtitiam judicantis pertinet, ut nunquam careant ſupplicio, qui in hac vita nunquam carere voluit peccato.

And ſay not to me, behold that miſerable ſinner ſeized on by the Divine Juſtice in the heat of his crime, it is not likely he would ſtill perſiſt in his enormous tranſgreſſion, the boyling of his paſſion would vapour away, and his ſpirit be reſtored to the calm, and reaſon to its throne. Nay much otherwiſe, a ſinner, who dieth in ſin hath the root of affections, which is the heart, ſo envenomed, that all the ſprouts are nought but abomination. And although he were to live an hundred thouſand years, ſhould not ſome ſervile fear ſtop the torrent of his corruption, he would ſpend them in theſe exorbitancies.

2. Reaſon. S. Thom. 1. 2. q. 87.

3. The ſecond reaſon is drawn from S. Thomas, who ſaith, the nature of mortal ſin is a privation of ſpiritual life, as death is a privation of corporal. Behold a tree which was heretofore thick ſpread with boughs and flouriſhing, is now parched and drie, without force, and life. Let it be in this ſtate, ſo will it remain ſtill, never returning to its firſt vigour. Behold a man likewiſe, who hath killed charity in his heart, which is the root of ſpiritual life, by ſome moſt grievous ſin, to die in this ſtate. It is the impoſſibility of impoſſibilities, that in the other world not capable of merit or demerit, he may change himſelf. Death ever reigns there where is treſpaſs, and treſpaſs ſtill reigning there, deſerves to be puniſhed without intermiſſion. It is alwayes chaſtiſed and never expiated, ſaith S. Bernard.

Semper puniri poteſt, nunquam poteſt expiari. S. Bernard. de conſid. l. 5.

And that you may well underſtand this, repreſent unto your ſelf an excellent conceit of one of the greateſt wits which ever flouriſhed, Picus Mirandula, in the book he compoſed of the dignity of man. We are in this world as in the ſhop of a Sculptour, who laboureth on ſtatues of mettal. Behold the burning furnace, behold the mettal all boiling, behold many moulds ready at hand. Say you unto him, Sir, make us ſome curious piece worthy of you, make us a generous Lion, make an Eagle, make a triumphant King, it is now in your power. But if the workman through malice or incivility ſhould ſay, I will make nothing of it, I am about to make of all this melted mettal veſſels of ignominy, and ſo he doth, had not you cauſe to ſay unto him, what haſt thou done; all is marr'd, there is no time given for you to repent it, the mettal is caſt. I ſay the like after this great man: Behold us in this world as in the houſe of a plummer or graver; our underſtanding is the enginer, who laboureth upon the ſearch of a thouſand inventions; our will is the Miſtreſs who keeps the mettal ſtill boyling, and the mettal is our life, and our ſoul indeterminate. God ſaith unto us, up friend, be couragious, thou may'ſt make thy ſelf a little God, perfectly framed to my likeneſs: Behold, take the mould, caſt it confidently. I will make nothing of it, ſaith the ſinner, I am about to make a hog, an owl, a ſerpent, a hydeous monſter, and behold in effect all ſo made at the hour of death. The mettall is caſt, repentance is unprofitable, ſince hell vomiteth up good deſires, and affordeth no felicities: thou haſt made a monſter, and thou ſhalt remain a monſter whileſt thou art in this eſtate, which is immoveable, fire likewiſe ſhall be annexed to thee to gnaw thee, which is the worm in the rotten wood.

An excellent conceit of Picus Mirandula.

Tui ipſius quaſi arbitrarius honorariuſque plaſtes & fictor, quam malueris tu tibi formam effinge, poteris in inferiora quæ ſunt bruta degenerare, poteris in ſuperiora, quæ ſunt divina ex animi tui ſententiâ regenerari. Picus Mirand. de dignitate hom. p. 208.

Adde for a third inſtance, that God who is wholly infinite, hath right in him to oblige us to the keeping of the law, under an infinite penalty, conſidering the greatneſs of his perfection and benefits. The continuance of the pain is not meaſured by the laſting of actions. A man is hanged, who ſtill ſo remaineth, for a theft done in a moment. If this be done daily for the reparation of the honour and goods of another man who is offended, although he be a captive and a miſerable creature, what ſhall we think of offences committed againſt the Divinity? Muſt we not confeſs, that ſin of its own nature, and by the onely conſideration of its proper malice, deſerveth infinite puniſhment, ſince it hath miſchief in it, reſpectively infinite? And as it needed the Incarnation, death, and paſſion of a Word infinite to waſh it on earth, ſo it muſt have an eternal puniſhment to expiate it under earth. What can you find ſtrange in this proceeding?

3. Reaſon drawn from the right of God, and from the nature of ſin.

I ſay it is not hell that ſhould put theſe quaking and icie fear into our bones: It is not pain ſhould be ſtrange

Puniri non eſt malum, ſed fieri pœna dignum. Peccatum non potest residere ad perpetuum nisi in inferno. Dionys. c. 4. de divin. nom. Solidissimi quasi are fusi sunt. Job. 37.

The grievousness of sin. Num. 16.

strange unto us, but sin It is not an evil to be punished, but to be worthy of punishment. You complain sin is lodged in hell, where would you place it? In heaven? Is it a fit thing, I pray you, to carry dirt into a Kings Palace? The heavens according to Job are stronger than iron or brass, and yet you see these celestial bodies able to carry all the glory of God, cannot bear one single sinner, so heavy, so insupportable he is. So soon as the rebellious Angels conceived a sin of pride, heaven cried out murder, and could not endure them; behold them fall from the Palace of glory more thick than flakes of snow or hail on a winters day. Where would you lodge this mortal sin? On the earth? See you not in the book of Numbers, how after the rebellion of Core, Dathan, and Abiram this earth, which is the foundation and basis of the universe, changed its nature, shook with frightful tremblings, & opened its wide and gaping bosom to swallow these disastrous creatures? Where shall we lodge this sin? On the waters? Behold the waters could not endure one sole disobedience of Jonas? All the air is on fire, all the winds in blusters, all the sea in rage and fury, whilest it is under the weight of this poor sinner. He must be cast into the belly of a whale, although unable to digest, she vomit him up. God himself, God Omnipotent, in whose hands all this great world is but a drop of dew, complains he cannot endure sin. Where shall we place it then but in the pit of hell?

Laboravi sustinens. Job. 1.

But if at least this pain had some end. And see you not, sin hath neither end nor limits in its eternity?

Ducunt in bonis dies suos, & in punctu ad inferna descendunt. Job. 21. 13.

Alas, he who would understand this, who would open his eyes to behold what I am about to say, and what I conceal, had rather put himself into the arms of hell being in innocency, than among imaginary felicities in crime and sin. If you know it not, O Christians, it is an infinite evil, because it striketh at the head of an infinite divinity, and it is an horrible thing to think on, for that as much as is possible, it annihilateth God and the whole fountain of essences, Enormity of a sinner.

felicities, and mercies. Do you not consider a transgression increaseth according as the person interessed is of great and eminent quality? It is one thing to offend a peasant, another thing a Merchant, another thing a Judge, another a King. But he who offends all Kings, and all Judges of the earth, or should thrust a knife into the throat of a million of men, would he not seem very criminal? Nay, were all the greatness, grace, and majesty of a hundred thousand worlds poured and quintessenced in one body, what would it be in comparison of God, but one grain of sand? And then to invade God, in his will to infringe and annul the Divinity, O abyss of confusion! To say unto God Omnipotent, all good, and all holy, You will give me a law and I will play the unbridled colt, I will take it of my self, I will admit no Law-maker: you created me for your self, and I will live for my self, and be the sovereign good of my self; you created a world for my use, and I will people it with monsters, which shall be my sins. You redeemed and reconciled me by the bloud of your Son, and I will contemn and trample it under-foot. I should not presume to use these words, had not S. Paul prevented me. You will be a Judge to chastise me, and I make as much account of all your thunder-stroaks, as of broken rushes. To despise God as a Law-maker, as a Creatour, as a Father, as a Redeemer, as a Judge, as God, as all, and then say, God did you wrong in making a hell!

Irritam quis facions legem Moysi sine ulla miseratione moritur, quanto magis putatis deteriora mereri supplicia qui Filium Dei conculcaverit, & sanguinem Testamenti pollutum duxerit. Heb. 10

5. Behold there his justice purged, now see its effects in the quality and condition of pains of the damned. What is Hell? It is called Silence, to shew we cannot speak of it but by silence. All is said of hell is less than hell. The holy history of Ægyptian Anchorites written by Palladius, recounteth an accident very prodigious happened to the great Macharius, which is, that one day this admirable man, commonly called the God of Monks (for his speech was an oracle, and his life a perpetual miracle) this excellent man, I say, travelling through the hideous and savage desarts of Ægypt, alwaies fixed and bent both with eye & heart upon the contemplation of a future life, met with the head of a dead man by the way, and ere he was aware, set a palmers staff which he had in his hand upright upon it, and behold at the same instant (as it happened in other occasions) he heard to come from the head of this dead man a sad and frightful voice, able to have astonished the most courageous. But the holy Saint being wholly made for these apparitions of spirits, and armed to the proof against all illusions of Sathan, stood still and asked, Whose art thou? It answered, I am the head of one damned. He replied, What threw thee head-long into this wretched miserie? Two things, said the dead; misbelief, and vice. Then being demanded concerning the torments he endured, he replied: The soul makes hell, the soul suffers hell, and the soul cannot well comprehend what hell is. What have you on the earth, more odious than horrible darkness? and not to speak of our coals, nor of any of the rest of our greatest calamities, behold our greatest ease. The unhappy spirit cutting off his words, held his peace, and the holy man lifting the head up from the ground, took it in his hand, then deeply sighing with sobs of lively and penetrating grief, he said: O what ease! O what ease! what eternal darkness! blind world, prostituted world, desperate world, oh wouldest thou know, wouldest thou know, but thine unhappiness hath put a scarf before thine eyes.

Strange narration of Palladius.

I would here conclude this discourse, and substitute in my place this blessed old man, the eye and honour of these desarts, holding this dead mans head between his hands: I would intreat him to ask of it again, what have availed the damned their honours, reputation, riches, riots, pleasures, delights; those wretched lime-twigs, which entangled the wings of the soul, and plunged it into an abyss of infelicities. I would intreat it to tell us what a monster mortal sin is, since to punish it such dreadful dungeons must be built, such racks and tortures. It would tell this with a voice of thunder accompanied with flouds of tears, and you would be appalled, tremble, and weep at it with all the just, who never think of hell but with terrour and tears.

Definition of hell.

O bruitish and sensual men, who live in a continual contempt of Gods anger! Ask the great Tertullian what hell is? And he will answer, hell is a treasury of fire, enkindled by the breath of God for punishment of the damned: hell is an ugly and deep sink, and a sewer, wherein all the ordures of Ages are thrown. Ask of Hugo of S. Victor (a) what hell is, and he wil reply, a bottom without bottom, which shutteth the gate against all hopes, and opens it to all despairs. Ask of S. John (b) what hell is, & he will tell you aloud and plainly, hell is the great lake of Gods anger: It is a great pool of fire and brimstone perpetually inflamed with strong and vigorous breaths of the Omnipotent. And what do the damned there? (c) They burn and smoak. On what live they? On the gall of dragons. What air breath they? That of burning coals. What stars and lights have they? The fire of their torments. What nights? Of palpable darkness. What beds? The couches of aspicks and basilisks. What language speak they? Blasphemies. What order have they amongst them? Confusion. What hope? Despair. What patience? Rage. O hell, O hell! Avant, O gnawing worm, avant O living death, avant death which never dies, avant life which daily, not dying dies.

Arcani ignis subterraneum ad panam thesaurus. Absconsus in visceribus terræ profunditas, &c. Tertul. de anim.

(a) Profundum sine fundo, ubi nulla spes boni, & nulla desperatio mali. Hugo victorius. l. de anima.

(b) Lacus ardens Dei magni, stagnum ignis. Apoc. 14. & 20.

(c) Life of the damned. Horreo eorum mordacem, & mortem vivacem: horreo incidere in manus mortis viventis, & vitæ morientis.

Quality and condition of the pains of the damned.

I speak not here of the pain of sense, exercised by this pittiless element, which worketh upon souls as I have shewed you in the beginning of this discourse, Guliehm. Paris. de univ. p. 1. c. 55.

Locus purae felicitatis nihil habet quod non addat felicitati: locus purae miseriae nihil habet quod non addat calamitati.

course. I let pass this world of punishments figured by vultures, gibbets, tortures, snakes, burning pincers, and all the instruments of terrours, I onely speak of the pain which tormenteth the damned by privation from the sight of God. Imagine within your self a sublime conceit of the great Prelate of France William of Paris, who in a Treatise he made of the universe, pertinently sheweth, that as Paradise is the house of all felicity, so hell must be the receptacle of all miserie and calamity. Now the blessed, besides beauty of the glory of their bodies, the contentment to enjoy so excellent and triumphant company, have a happiness totally infinite in the sight of God, which is the period of their essential felicitie: So likewise in the same measure the damned shall have some object sad and mournfull, incomparably dolorous, and according to its nature infinite, which collecteth as into one sum all their calamities. And what is this object? Some will imagine it is the aspect of the great lake of fire, and horrid legions of divels. That truly is horrible, but that is not yet the top of their supream miserie. What is it then? I do assure my self you will at first be astonished with what I shall say, and will hold it as a paradox, but it is undoubted. The darkness of hell is apprehended as a most intollerable evil, and that with just cause. Notwithstanding I affirm the greatest torment of the damned, and heigth of their notable calamities, is light. I say light of science and knowledge. To understand this, you must observe a passage of the Prophet Ezechiel in the first Chapter, where he describeth the majesty of the God of hosts, who prepareth to chastise the wicked: he representeth him unto us like a hydeous christal mirrour, that is to say, God planteth an idea of himself in the soul of a damned creature, as of a mirrour of Christal, and a terrible light, in which, and through which, it beholdeth most clearly and evidently the good it hath lost by forsaking God, and the evil incurred by drenching it self into the sad habitation of the reprobate. It seeth how in loosing God, it hath lost a good delicious, fruitfull, infinite, everlasting, incomprehensible, a good, for which it was created, and formed by the hands of God. A good, which is meerly and absolutely lost by its infidelity, ingratitude, wickedness, perverse obstinacy in sin. A good, which it might have repaired in a moment of the time it heretofore had, and behold it now irrecoverably for ever lost. Moreover it sees and feeleth by a disastrous experience, the evil whereunto it is fixed by pertinacitie. And that which is also more terrible, is, that as God is repleniſhed with a full and most plentifull felicitie, becauſe he hath all his contentments assembled together, so the damned soul, by a most lively and piercing apprehension of the eternity of its pains, beholdeth the evils it must endure beyond a hundred millions of years, and hath them all as present in thought. From these two lights, and two knowledges in the damned soul, spring as it were two snakes, fastened both to the one and other side of its heart, which incessantly and unconsumably suck all the juyce and marrow of its substance. The holy man Boetius (the eye of the Roman Senate and ornament of the Church) lets us understand what the punishment of the damned is, when he saith, there needeth neither wheels, tortures, nor gibbets to punish the wicked. He who might onely shew them the beauty of virtue in the form of a lightening-flash, and say unto them, behold wretched creatures, behold what you have lost by your folly, the sorrow they would conceive for their loss would be so sensible, that no keen raisour, devouring flames, gnawing vultures might put them to a more exquisite torment.

The souls of the damned tormented by their lights.

Aspectus Christi terribilis.

Quid demum stolidis me adibus imprecer, &c.

Now I leave you to think, if the wicked in this life for one sole idea of virtue, which passeth in a moment should conceive such a remorse, what may a damned soul that sees in this hydeous chrystal, not for a moment, but through all moments of eternity, the infinite good it hath lost, the infinite unhappiness wherein it for ever sees it self involved. Then is it, yea, perpetually gnawn, torn, and tumbled into a huge torrent of inexplicable dolours, which cause it to break into furies, and unprofitable frenzies.

O Palace of God, saith it, which I have lost! O ugly dens of dragons, whereinto I am head-long thrown! O brightness of Paradise, which shalt be nothing to me! O hydeous darkness, which shalt eternally be my inheritance! O goodly and triumphant company of elect souls, with whom I should eternally have lived, had not my wretchedness sealed up mine eyes! O infernal countenances of enraged divels, which shall hereafter be my objects and perpetual companions! O torrent of delights which poureſt thy self upon those blessed spirits, how have I turned thee into a lake filled with pitch, sulphur, and scortching flames, enkindled with the breath of the Omnipotents anger! O couch of King Solomon, how have I given thee away for a bed of coals! O God, O God, whom I have lost, and whom I cannot loose! I have lost him in the quality of a Sovereign Good, yet have him perpetually present as the object and cause of my pains. O eternity! It is then true, that ten millions of years hence my evils shall but begin. Curſed athiesm and infidelity of the world, thou wouldeſt rather feel these torments than believe them. Wert not thou mad? Cruel ambition, thou haſt given me the stroke of death. Disastrous riches, you have forged gyves, which now fetter me. Loves, (pettie vipers of inhumane hearts) you ceased not to breath and enkindle sparks, which made these fires for me. Wicked companies, charming companies, traiterous companies, you were the chains of my ruin. O why was not the womb of my Mother, that served for the first bed of my conception, the Sepulcher of my birth! O why the stars, which predominated at my coming into the world, in lieu of their benign aspects, threw they not darts of poyson against me? Why did not the earth swallow me in my Cradle? Muſt I live one sole moment, to live an enemy of God eternally? O God, what an abyss is thy judgement! Let us draw, let us draw aside the curtain of silence, thy spirit can no longer endure me, nor my pen maintain the conceptions of my heart.

6. It seems enough is said to shew the horrour of mortal sin, which alone is the cause and procurer of Hell. Think seriously on all I have said, and all I have omitted, and if you desire to eschew the unhappiness of a reasonable creature, which I have expressed, observe I pray perpetually, and inviolably these things, which I would if I might inscribe on your hearts in unremoveable characters. The first is, that you must diligently seek to fore-arm your selves against a certain liberty of heart, which neither feareth sin, hell, nor evils of the other life; liberty of heart, which swayeth now adays throughout the world, of which Sathan makes use to blunt the darts of heaven, and all the incitements to the fear of God, as being the true way of athiesm, and an undoubted note of damnation. But contrariewise frame unto your self a conscience termed timorous, a conscience filially and lovingly fearfull, which layeth hold without scruple and disturbance, even of the least offences and imperfections. Fear is the mother of safety, and the means not to fear hell at all, is to fear it always. In the second place you must effectualy apprehend frequent relapse into mortal sins, which is the second note of reprobation. For when a creature suddenly returneth into enormous sins, and playeth as between Paradise and hell, it is a sign he harboureth in this evil heart a plain contempt of God, and an eternal root of sin, the sprout whereof is an everlasting punishment. In the third place you must still live in the state wherein you would die, and often to call your soul to an account of your actions. Ah my soul! If you were at this this preſent inſtant to diſlodge out of this world, are you in a ſtate to be preſented before the inevitable throne of the Sovereign Judge? Have you not ſome touch of mortal ſin? Is there not ſome reſtitution to make? ſome ſatisfaction not accompliſhed? Reſts there not in your heart ſome blemiſh of evil company, & worldly love, which ſlackeneth your purpoſes? Let us break, let us break theſe chains: there is neither pleaſure, money, nor honour can hold. You muſt ſeek ſalvation and ſay: O God of mercy; O moſt mild Saviour, I embrace thy Altars, and implore thy clemencie; deliver my poor ſoul from the ſnares of Sathan, and eternal death at the great day, when heaven and earth ſhall flie before thy Juſtice. I am neither greater than David, nor more holy than S. Paul, nor to think of Hell. All my members quake, and bloud waxeth cold in my veins, when I reflect on it. O Jeſus, O love of eternal mountains, deliver not a ſoul over to this infernal beaſt, which will have no lips, but to praiſe and confeſs thee, eyes, but to behold thee, feet, but to run after thy commandments, nor hands, but eternally to ſerve thee.

Nemo saepius opprimitur, quam qui nihil timet: frequentissimum calamitatis, initium securitas. Velleius.

The eighteenth EXAMPLE, upon the eighteenth MAXIM.

Of Judgement, and of the pains of Hell.

ALl affairs of the World end in one great affair of the other life, which is that of the judgement God will give upon our ſoul, at its paſſage out of the body. A heart, which hath no apprehenſion thereof, unleſs it have ſome extraordinarie revelation of its glorie, is faithleſs or ſtupid to extremity.

The ſimple idea's of this day make the moſt confident to quake: not ſo much as pictures but have given matter of fear, and if ſome ſparks of knowledge, touching that, which paſſeth at the tribunal of God, come unto us, it ever produceth good effects in ſouls, which had ſome diſpoſition to pietie.

Curopalates Scilizza.

Curopalates relateth, that whileſt Theodora poſſeſſed the Empire of Conſtantinople with her ſon, who was yet in minoritie, one named Methodius, an excellent Painter, an Italian by Nation, and religious by profeſſion, went to the Court of the Bulgarian King, named Bogoris, where he was entertained with much favour. This Prince was yet a Pagan, and though trial had been made to convert him to faith, it ſucceeded not, becauſe his mind employed on pleaſures and worldly affairs, gave very little acceſs to reaſon. He was exceſſively pleaſed with hunting, and as ſome delight in pictures to behold what they love, ſo he appointed Methodius to paint an excellent piece of hunting in a Palace, which he newly had built, and not to forget to pencil forth ſome hydeous monſters, and frightful ſhapes.

The Painter, ſeeing he had a fair occaſion to take his opportunity for the converſion of this infidel, inſtead of painting an hunting-piece for him, made an exquiſite table of the day of judgement. There upon one part was to be ſeen heaven in mourning, on the other the earth on fire, the Sea in bloud, the throne of God hanging in the clouds, environed with infinite ſtore of legions of Angels, with countleſs numbers of men raiſed again, fearfully expecting the decree of their happineſs, or lateſt miſery. Below were the devils in divers ſhapes of hydeous monſters, all ready to execute ſtrange puniſhments upon ſouls abandoned to their furie. The abyſs of Hell was open, and threw forth many flames with vapours, able to cover heaven, and infect the earth. This draught being in hand, the Painter ſtill held the King in expectation, ſaying, he wrought an excellent picture for him, and which perhaps might be the laſt maſterpiece of his hand.

In the end the day aſſigned being come, he drew aſide the curtain, and ſhewed his work. It is ſaid the King at firſt ſtood ſome while penſive, not being able to wonder enough at this ſight. Then turning towards Methodius, what is this? ſaid he. The religious man took occaſion thereupon to tell him of the judgements of God, of puniſhments and rewards in the other life, wherewith he was ſo moved, that in a ſhort time he yielded himſelf to God by a happy converſion.

If draughts and colours have this effect, what do not viſions, and undoubted revelations, which were communicated to many Saints concerning affairs of the other life? Every one knows the wiſdom and authority of S. Boniface the Martyr, who converted Germany, ſent thither by Gregory the ſecond, and who flouriſhed about nine hundred years ago. This great Apoſtle of the Northern parts left goodly writings to poſterity, being moſt learned, and we have to this day ſome Epiſtles of his taken out of good libraries.

In the one and twentieth of his letters, written to Aldeburgus, he makes mention of a man, who was raiſed again to life in his time, the miracle much known, and verified before all the world: for to prove he proceeded very far into knowledges of the other life, he advertiſed many men of note of moſt ſecret ſins, never opened to any living man, and exhorted them for Gods ſake to true pennance. He likewiſe foretold the death of Ceolredus King of Mercia, who reigned with much tyranny and rapine, whereof he received the reward. S. Bonifacius. ep. 21.

This great Prelate S. Boniface, then in Germany, ſought to inform himſelf particularly of this wonder, and afterward couched in the forementioned Epiſtle, the diſcourſe he had with this late raiſed man. How he asked many queſtions concerning events happened to him in this ſo dangerous paſſage: he tels the ſtorie, and relates it with tears in his eyes:

Alas! how much other are our knowledges at the ſeparation of the ſoul from the bodie, than they are in this preſent life. We here onely ſee through two little holes, which are our two eyes, the bark of objects, a very little diſtance; but the inſtant of death diſcovers unto us much other truths. Repreſent unto your ſelf, ſaid he, a blind man, who never ſaw any thing, if ſome one come and take away the film, giving him ſight, he would then behold things ſpoken of in a much other manner than he imagined. The like happened to me, for my ſoul leaving my body about midnight, I inſtantly ſaw the whole world with the extenſion of its lands and ſeas that water it, as if it had been abbreviated in a table, although to ſay truth, it was not the univerſe which was abbridged, but the ſight of the ſpirit dilated by diſengagement from the bodie.

The world was all encompaſſed with fire, which ſeemed to me of an exceſſive greatneſs, and ready to ſwallow all the elements, if its impetuous courſe had not been ſtayed by the meaſures of Gods hand. At the ſame time I perceived our Saviour in the quality of a Judge, environed with an infinite number of Angels, indued with marvellous brightneſs and excellent beautie: on the other ſide devils in dreadfull ſhapes, which I cannot now well deſcribe, ſince my ſoul is returned to my body. At the ſame inſtant, ſouls newly unlooſened from all parts in ſo prodigious numbers, that I could never believe there had been ſo many creatures in the world. Then was a rigorous examen made of crimes committed in the life paſt: And I ſaw very few ſouls who had holily lived, whileſt they were as yet in this mortal fleſh, to fly unto heaven with palms and Crowns. Others were reſerved to be purged, as gold in the furnace, and to follow the ſteps of thoſe happie warriours, who had gone before them.

As for thoſe who went from this life out of the ſtate of grace, and were in mortal ſin, it was a horrible ſible thing to ſee the tyrannie with which the devils uſed them For I perceived, in places under the earth, pits, which vomited fire and flames, on the brinks whereof I ſaw thoſe ſouls in ſuch manner, as we ſhall ſee ſome fatal birds, who bewailed & lamented their diſaſters with dreadful complaints, able to rent rocks and marbles aſunder. Then they were thrown into precipices of fire, bidding a long adieu to all pleaſures, without hope ever to behold the face of God, nor pleaſing light of the Sun, or to have fruition of any other reflection, but the flames of their torments.

I who ſaw theſe ſtrange paſſages, leave you to think with what terrour I expected the laſt ſentence of my judge. The evil ſpirits began to accuſe me with all violence: you would have ſaid they had reckoned all the ſteps of my life, ſo rigorouſly they muſtered up all the ſlighteſt actions. But nothing at that time was ſo inſupportable to me as mine own conſcience. For the ſins which I heretofore imagined to be light, were preſented unto me in ſpirit, as horrid phantaſms, which ſeemed to reproch me with mine ingratitude towards God, and to ſay: I am the pleaſure thou haſt obeyed, I am the ambition whoſe ſlave thou waſt, I am the avarice which was the aim of all thy actions. Behold ſo many ſins, which are thy children. Thou begateſt them: Thou ſo much didſt love them, as to prefer them before thy Saviour. It is an admirable thing that I likewiſe ſaw the ſpecter of a man, whom I had heretofore wounded though yet alive. He ſeemed to be preſent at this Judgement, and to require of me an account of his bloud.

All theſe horrours had already engulphed me into an inconſolable ſadneſs, expecting nought at all but the ſtroke of thunder and ſentence of my Judge, at which time my good Angel diſpoſed himſelf to produce ſome good works I had heretofore done.

One cannot ſay, nor believe the comfort a ſoul then feels in the remembrance of virtues it exerciſed in the bodie. Happy a thouſand-fold the hands, which ſow alms on earth, to reap them in heaven. It ſeemed to me I ſaw ſo many ſtars of a favourable influence, when I beheld this little good I had done with Gods grace.

Laſtly ſentence was pronounced, that for inſtruction of many, I ſhould again return into life. I muſt confeſs unto you, that amongſt ſo many troubles of mind, ſo many fears and frights, which I ſuffered before the deciſion of my affairs (except devils and hell) nothing ſo much ſtruck me with horrour, as to ſee my bodie, for which a burial was prepared. Is it poſſible (ſaid I to my ſelf) that to ſerve this carrion I ſo often have forſaken my God! Is it poſſible that to fatten this dunghil, I diſpiſed my ſoul! That I ſo adored my priſon and fetters, as to ballance them with the Croſs and nails of my Saviour Jeſus! For this cauſe I had ſome repugnance to reenter into this bodie, which ſeemed to me a little hell. But my ſoul coming back into it, I remained the ſpace of ſeven dayes quite ſtupid, and ſo laſtly ſtrove with my ſelf, till bloud guſhed from mine eyes, as not having tears ſufficient to bemoan my ſins. Behold me ready to declare and witneſs to all mortals by an authentike example the words of the Wiſeman, who ſaith: MEMORARE NOVISSIMA TUA, ET IN AETERNUM NON PECCABIS: REMEMBER ALL WILL PASSE AT THE LAST HOUR, AND THOU SHALT NEVER OFFEND. Eccl. 7.

I beſeech the Reader, who peruſeth theſe lines, to put the affairs of his conſcience in order, and if he love any thing in the world, to love it for life eternal.

XIX. MAXIM.

Of Sovereign Happineſs.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

It is a ſimplicity to forſake certain pleaſures for an uncertain beatitude.

Opinion concerning beatitude.

WE live here among the groans of creatures, every one well underſtands he is not in his right ſituation, and all the world turns from one ſide to another, like a ſick man in a bed, and if any one lie ſtill, it is rather through the impotencie of motion, than the happineſs of repoſe. Our ſoul well knows, it is the daughter of a good houſe, that there is another place which expecteth it, another life which inviteth it: It ſeeth ſome glimmers of felicity in the maſs of this bodie, but hath much ado to follow them, ſo many illuſions deceive it upon one ſide, and ſo many obſtacles oppoſe it on the other.

Diſturbances of life. Auguſt. l. 2. de Trinit. c. 12. Amor magis ſentitur cum prodit indigentia.

The great flood and ebbe of perpetual diſturbances, ſhew us we are made for ſome great matter, ſince among ſo many objects, there is none which either fully or long contenteth us. We underſtand our happineſs by the continual change of our miſeries, and our ſtrong appetite by diſtaſt of all things. Love, which according to Plato is the ſon of indigence, never is ſo ill as with its own mother, from whom it learns nothing but its poverty, which addeth a ſharp ſpur to direct it to riches.

Naz. de itineribus vitæ. The divers wayes of humane life, according to S. Gregory.

When I read S. Gregory Nazianzen, in the great work he compiled of ſundry courſes of life, it ſeems to me I behold a man in the enterance of a labyrinth,

THE HOLY COURT.

That the glorie of Paradiſe is moſt certain to good men.

much diſtracted, who will and will not, who deſires, waxeth drouthy, is intranced, and become pale, yea, in the height of his delights. It ſeems to me nature leadeth him through all the corners of her Kingdom, and ſayes unto him: O man, what wouldeſt thou do to become happie? Behold, I conduct thee through all the parts of my juriſdiction, of purpoſe to afford thee felicitie, which thou ſeekeſt. Wilt thou then marrie? fy no, ſaith he, for there is too much hazard in the adventure: ſingle life? it is painfull: would you have children? they cloy with too much care: barreneſs? it hath no ſupport: riches? they are treacherous to their Maſter, and many have been in danger to looſe life for having too much wherewith to live: charges and honours? they coſt overmuch, and are indeed dead trees, whereinto oſtriches flie as well as eagles: would you have favour? it is a ſquib which cracks in the air, and leaves nothing behind it but burnt paper and ſmoak: but if the Courts of Great-ones afford good fruit, there is ſtore many times of evil birds, which devour it. Thou wouldeſt then live in ſubjection (ſaith nature) ſince thou canſt not command? He replieth, he could not obey. I will make thee poor, ſaith ſhe, to teach thee humilitie: you were as good, quoth he, to put me on the wheel. Thou ſhalt have beautie; it is the ſnare of luſt: youth; youth; it is the bubling of time: ſtrength, it ſhall be inferiour to bulls: nobility; it is too full of liberty: eloquence, it is too vain: skill in pleading; it is nought but wrangling. Wouldeſt thou wear a ſword by thy ſide? it is to live either an homicide, or to become a victime of death: retire into ſome wilderneſs? it is to languiſh. Will you have title? it is to become captive: traffick? it hath too much hazard and pains: travel? it hath too much toil: ſail on the ſea? there are too many ſtorms: ſtay on the land? it is repleat with miſeries: learn ſome trade? all is full of craft, and I find none good: manure the earth? I am not able: live idlely? that is to rot alive.

Obteruntur humilitate depreſſa, nutant celſa faſtigio. S. Eucherius. Miſeries of this preſent life.

One knoweth not on what ſide to turn him in the world; poor ſtates are overwhelmed under their miſeries, great totter, born down with the weight of their own greatneſs. We find by experience, that we here lead a painfull bitter, and corruptible life, which is fruitfull in miſeries, knowing in all whereof it ſhould be ignorant, and many times impotent but to do ill. A life over which elements predominate, which heats burn, cold congeals, humours ſwell, maladies torment, the very air and viands wherewith it lives ceaſe not to corrupt. A life which loves tyrannize, hopes flatter, cares devour, anxieties oppreſs, joyes make profuſely diſſolute. A life which ignorance blindfolds, fleſh tempteth, the world deceives, ſin poiſoneth, the devil beguiles, inconſtancy turmoileth, time takes away, and death deſpoileth.

Neceſſary conſequence.

Now what ſpirit is ſo bruitiſh and unnatural, which conſidering upon one ſide how God accommodateth all creatures, even the leaſt flies, to the full latitude of that felicitie their nature admitteth, and on the other ſide ſeeing this great abyſs of miſeries, wherein we role in this life, doth not judge that God, who in his nature is moſt wiſe and benign, hath not ſo given the King of creatures over as prey to injuries and calamities, as not to have reſerved a life of ſpirits for him, ſince he is ſpirit, to pleaſe him by an intellectual felicitie.

Bonum omnes conjectant, maximè vero principaliſſimum. Ariſtot. politic. lib. 1. cap. 1.

Opinion of the wiſe. Summum hominis bonum eſt perfectio per ſua intellectiva.

2. The Sages of Gentiliſm have looked this verity in the face by the ſole ray of natural light. For if we conſult with Alpharabius the Arabian, he will tell us, that the Sovereign felicitie of man conſiſteth in a perfect diſpoſe of the functions of his ſoul, as well thoſe which concern the underſtanding, as ſuch as depend on the will. If we ask of the Philoſopher Heraclitus, what wiped his eyes ſo many times drenched in his tears? He will tell you, that it was the contemplation of a good not imaginable, which expected ſouls in the other life. If we deſire to underſtand the apprehenſions of Metrodorus, we ſhall learn the ſoul muſt aſcend until it behold time in its ſource, and the infinity of the firſt Being. If we covet to hear Plato upon it, doth not he diſcourſe in his Phedon, that the ſoul recollected within it ſelf, mounteth to the Divinity, whoſe image it carrieth, and that in the fruition thereof, it ſatisfieth all deſires? Is it not likewiſe the doctrine of Triſmegiſtus in his Pymander? Doth not he teach us, the ſoul after death of the bodie returns to its nature, as a troubled water which purifieth when it is ſetled. And doth not Plotinus triumph on this ſubject in publiſhing, that bleſſed ſouls at their paſſage out of bodies go to the firſt beautie, which hath power to make all its ſpectatours fair and amiable? There it is, (ſaith he) we ſhall live for ever in the palace of verity, which is the mother-nurce, nouriſhment, and eſſence of our ſoul. There it is, that all is all, and where each part becometh a whole. There it is, where happineſs is indefatigable, and plenitude never gives a loathing to him who poſſeſſeth it.

Aſcende donec ſæculum, & rerum videas infinitatem. Plato in Phædone. Mercur. Triſmeg. Pymander. cap. 1. Plotinus Ennead. 1. l. 6. & Ennead. 5. l. 8.

And who knoweth not the raptures of Seneca, when in the hundred and the ſecond Epiſtle he ſpeaks of the ſoul, which goeth out of the body, as from a wretched veſſell, to enter into theſe vaſt Temples of Intelligences and lights, deriving its nouriſhment and increaſe from the ſame place, whence it took its beginning? May we not ſay, this truth ſo loudly profeſſed by men, who lived in a belief different from ours, is a publick voice of humane nature, touched by the ray of its felicitie? Senec. ep. 102.

Infinity of our Appetites. Nubes ad alta levatur, denſata vento impellitur ut currat, calore diſſolvitur ut evaneſcat, &c. Greg. in Job. l. 8. c. 10. Eccl. 12. 7. A notable enigma of the Wiſeman.

Divines teach us our appetite is finite in its eſſence, infinite in its productions. It is a miracle to ſee a heart ſo little, big with ſo many deſires, and perpetually to go like a wheel enflamed with its ardours, or rather a fire which makes a prey of its own way, and is nouriſhed with proper hunger. It is a cloud (ſaith S. Gregory) ſwoln with vapours, toſſed with winds, ſcattered by heat. It daily makes abortion of a thouſand productions, and when it thinks to have all, embraceth nothing.

The wiſeman ſpeaking of death, ſaith, it is that which ſhall break the pitcher at the fountain, and the wheel upon the ciſtern. Some explicate this litterally of the veins and brain. But I had rather at this preſent ſay, this pitcher is the heart of man, which ceaſeth not to go to the water of the Samaritan, whereof our Saviour ſpake, when he ſaid: He who ſhall drink of this water, ſhall ever be thirſty. It is a water which never quencheth thirſt, and which ſometimes ſerves for an incentive to inſatiable deſires. And the pitcher ſo many times fruitleſly filled with this water, the heart ſo often drenched in theſe frail and momentarie pleaſures, ſhall ſplit againſt the rock of death, remaining ſtill at the fountain of concupiſcence. Omnis qui biberit ex aqua hac ſitiet iterum. Joan. 4.

Nay I will tell you, the heart is a wheel over the ciſtern of life, which ceaſeth not to draw up buckets filled with wind; one while running after one object, another time after another, not finding contentment, and at the laſt day the wheel ſhall be broken over the ciſtern, when man, if not warie, ſhall be ſurprized in the labyrinth of his deſigns, and confuſion of his hopes.

Providence of God in the limits of our appetites.

3. Now conſider the wiſdom of God, who having given us an infinite appetite, would not limit it but by himſelf: he would be our good, and being unable to be the end of himſelf, (becauſe he hath no end) he will be ours, to make us in ſome ſort infinite. He will not we put our felicities in commands and honours, becauſe they often reſemble the Idol Moloch, which was outwardly of gold, inwardly morter; and becauſe honour is rather in him who honoureth, than in the honoured. He will not we ground our ſelves upon riches; for either they be gems which are the ſcum of elements; or mettals which are the harbours of ruſt, and enkindlers of avarice; or garments the food of moaths; or houſes, which are mountains compoſed of the bones of the earth; or fruits, beaſts, and ſo many other productions of nature, which cannot make us happie, ſeeing they, beſides their frailty, are of a ſervile nature, being made for the ſervice of men, and not for their glorie. He will not we place our happineſs on pleaſures, becauſe all bleſſings of ſenſe go not beyond ſenſe, and for that their condition is either to ſtarve men by their barenneſs, or ſtrangle them with their ſuperfluities. The beſt part of our ſelves being the ſpirit, he will repleniſh us with himſelf, who is the chief of ſpirits. It is he (ſaid the Prophet Eſay) who is the Crown of true glorie, and the poſie of all comforts: the Crown, becauſe his felicitie is wholly circular, and fully repleniſhed as the circle without any defect; the poſie, inſomuch as in his ſole eſſence he comprehendeth all

God will repleniſh us with himſelf.

Greatneſs of God. Iſa. 28. 5. Corona gloriæ, & ſertum exultationis.

all the good of creatures, which are as petty flowers of this goodly garden.

In unum neceſſe eſt ſummitas magnitudinis eliquetur. Tertul. l. 1. adverſus Marcion. c. 2. Bernard. l. 5. de conſider. c. 5.

It is neceſſarie (ſaith Tertullian) that all greatneſs and beauties be extracted into one alone, which is the firſt greatneſs and prime beauty. He loves as charity, he knows as verity, he ſits as equitie, he ruleth as majeſty, he governeth as chief, he defends as ſafety, he operateth as virtue, he revealeth as light, he aſſiſteth as piety, he doth all in all things, and ſuch as he is, he giveth himſelf unto us. I demand of you, whether he deſerveth not to be eternally diſpleaſed, who cannot content himſelf with God?

Nay, that which here maketh his communication the more perfect and admirable, is, that Divines obſerve their be two felicities in heaven: The one of object, the other formal. That of object, is the good by which we become happy, and formal, is the poſſeſſion of the ſame good. Felicitie of object is that, which looketh towards God without any reflection upon us; formal felicitie is that, which reſpecteth our proper good. We might ſee God as a diſtant mirrour, which were not ours, and which had not the power to make us lovely. We might love him with a love of good will, by the ſole conſideration of his perfections. We might rejoyce at his good, without relation to our own benefit: But the goodneſs of God would not onely make us happie with the felicitie of our object, but by formal beatitude. He will not well behold him with a lazie and barren eye, but with a viſion, which rendereth us like to himſelf.

S. Thom. 2. 2. q. 3.

Similes ei erimus quoniam videbimus eum ſicuti eſt. Joan. 1. 3.

He will not we love him onely with a love of good will, but with a love of ardent deſire, as our good and repoſe. He will not we rejoyce onely becauſe he is God, but for that he is our God, our ſcope, and contentment.

The eſſential point of beatitude is union with God.

4. The point of this beatitude conſiſteth in a perfect union of our ſoul with God, who is the fountain of ſpirits, the object of all regular loves, and the circle of felicity. So long as we are in the world (ſaith the Apoſtle) we are as pilgrims in a forraign Nation, ſeparated from the ſweetneſs of our deareſt Country, and lovely viſion of the ſovereign cauſe. We are (ſaith Syneſius) as little veins of water wandered from their fountains, which deſire nothing but to be re-united to their ſource: ſhould you afford them veſſels of amber or chryſtal to contain them, they are never ſo well as in their origen. We have a ſtrong inclination that diſpoſeth us to know, love, and admire this ſoveriegn Being, which makes the world bring forth his great ide'as with more eaſe, than the Sun could produce a ray.

ἱκέσιος μεν. Syneſius hymn.

σαγῆνες δι- δὸν ἐξο- χῆϑεν.

Diverſity of unions.

Now here we muſt obſerve, there are many ſorts of union: The one of dependence, which cauſeth the creature to depend on the Creatour, as light on his ſtar, and heat on the fire, which produced it: The other of preſence and moſt inward penetration, by which God penetrateth all creatures by his admirable infuſions, by reaſon of his immenſity and ſubtility: The third of grace, by which we are ſanctified, and in a ſort made participant of Divine nature: The fourth of glorie, properly that, which accompliſheth what grace had begun, and ſetteth a ſeal upon the plenitude of all our felicities. This being ſo divided, it is evident, that the union, whereof we here ſpeak, is the glorified and ineffable union, which diſpoſeth the reaſonable creature to the higheſt point of the commerce it may have with the divinity.

It is very hard to explicate how that is in our ſoul, becauſe of the weakneſs of our ſpirits, which are now ſo tied to fleſh. Some Divines refuted by Chancellour Gerſon, and among others, Doctour Almaricus, and Henricus, took this in a very high ſtrain, when they imagined that God coming to fall as a lightening-flaſh upon the ſoul of a bleſſed one, filled it with his preſence, force, and love, and ſo poſſeſſed it, that he wholly converted it into himſelf, in ſuch manner, that from created Being, it paſſed to increated Being, returning to idea's of God, and into the ſtate it had before the worlds creation.

Anima perdit eſſe ſuum, & accipit eſſe divinum.

This opinion hath been rejected, and condemned as a chymera: for God will not beautifie us by ruining and deſtroying us, but he will our felicitie be ſo wholly of him, that it be notwithſtanding wholly to us, and there is no apparence our ſoul, which is immortal and incorruptible, ſhould be annihilated by the approch of God, from whom it muſt derive its being and conſervation.

Union of glorie what it is.

5. We muſt then conceive this much otherwiſe, and believe the union of glorie, that makes our beatitude, conſiſteth in the viſion, love, and joy of God, which is the fruition, termed by S. Thomas the ineffable kiſſes. Imagine you ſee a needle, which in preſence of a diamond runs not to the adamant, as being tied and fettered by the force of this obſtacle, but if you take away the diamond which captived it, it goes ſtoutly and impetuouſly to its adamant, which ſetteth it in the place of its repoſe by ordinarie charms. I find ſomething like in the ſtate wherein we are: Our poor ſpirit naturally tendeth to God, as to the firſt cauſe, and can take no contentment but in union with him; yet is it here arreſted by the poize of body, by the bait of concupiſcence, and tie of ſenſe: but ſo ſoon as theſe obſtacles are taken away, and that it feeleth the vigorous infuſions of this light of glorie, which giveth it wings to raiſe it ſelf to the Sovereign good above all the ways of nature, it ſoareth as a feathered arrow unto the butt of its deſires, it fincks and plungeth it ſelf into the boſom of God, and there abideth contented with three acts, which eſſentially compoſe its beatitude. The firſt is viſion, the root of this ſo Sovereign happineſs, which cauſeth us to ſee with the eyes of a moſt purified underſtanding, through the rayes of the light of glorie, the great God, face to face, with all the immenſity of his eſſence, the length of his eternity, the height of his majeſty, the extent of all his excellencies, and with the fecundity of his eternal emanations, the productions of total nature, and ſecrets of higheſt myſteries. We ſhall ſee him (ſaith S. John) as he is and thereupon S. Auguſtine addeth, we ſhall neceſſarily derive a reſemblance of God, becauſe knowledge here principally rendereth him who knoweth like to the thing known.

The three acts of beatitude.

Joan. 1. 3. Auguſt. l. 9. de Trin. c. 10. Omnis ſecundum ſpiritum notitia ſimilis eſt rei quam novit.

Of this viſion neceſſarily is formed a great fire of love divinized, when God like to a burning mirrour oppoſed to a glorified ſoul, replenilheth it with his ardours, ever by us to be adored. And from this love proceedeth that exceſſive joy, which is called the joy of God. Viſion cauſeth in us an expreſſion of God; love an inclination delicately violent to the preſence of this Sovereign good; joy, a profound repoſe, which ſeems to ſpread over our hearts a great river of peace, benedictions, and felicities. Then this beatified ſoul not being able to be what God is by nature, in ſome ſort becometh ſuch by favour. So that S. Gregory durſt boldly ſay, our ſoul makes it ſelf a little God, which eternally triumphs in the boſom of the great God. It is properly then, when man by an amorous conſumption wholly diſſolves into his beginning, and not looſing what he is, becometh one ſame ſpirit with him, not by nature, but by apprehenſion and affection. He not onely will what God willeth, but he cannot will any thing but what God will. He takes part in all his intereſt, all his greatneſs, and all his joys, being ſo divinely incorporated into the family & boſom of this Father of eſſences. He rejoyceth at the beatitude of all the elect, as of his own;

Θεὸς ἐν θεῷ χορευεῖ. Naz. Hymn.

he is rapt with admiration, ſometimes at the beauty of the place, ſometimes at the delicious correſpondence of that great company, ſometimes at the unchangeable continuance of his moſt bleſſed eternity, ſometimes at the garments of glorie his body muſt put on, and he every where beholdeth ſources of comfort to ſpring, which can never drie.

Three great effects of beatitude.

6. From this favour, beſides ſo many other wonders, I ſee three excellent effects ſucceed. The firſt is, impeccability: The ſecond, verity of our knowledges, which ſhall admit no errour: The third, tranquillity of our love, which ſhall not know what wound or interruption is. And firſt conſider what a good it is to be impeccable, ſince we not onely ſhall be without ſin, but out of all danger of ſinning. All that which here afflicteth the moſt purified ſouls, is not to be expoſed to ſo many miſeries and perſecutions, for they know good men are here on earth like flower-deluces, begotten by their own tears, and that in the ſame manner they are produced to beatitude by their proper afflictions; but it is to ſee themſelves in a ſtate of power to looſe the grace of God, and to be able to be ſeparated from the firſt of lives, by an action of death. That is it which made Job, being on the dunghil like to the dunghil it ſelf, as on the throne of patience, to deplore his condition and ſay: Why haſt thou made me, ſeeing I am contrary to thy divine Majeſty? That is it which renders me inſupportable to my ſelf.

The great happineſs to be impeccable.

Plin. 21. 5. Lilium lachrymâ ſuâ ſcribitur.

Quare me poſuiſti contrarium tibi, & ſum mihimetipſi gravis?

Now there ſhall be in beatitude an impotencie of ſin, becauſe in full ſight of Sovereign good it will be impoſſible to propend to the leaſt evil, or leaſt diſorder, without which there can be no ſin.

Excellency of beatifick ſcience.

Moreover, as our knowledges are here wretched and ſtarven, there is not a man ſo knowing in the world, who for one drop of knowledge hath not a tun of ignorance, and who in the little he knoweth, hath not ever many errours, which ſtick to ſcience as the worm to the tree, or the moath to the cloath. Now there above, the ray of increated light, which ſhall appear in full luſtre, will diſſipate all the weakneſs of underſtanding, all inconſiderations, all faults, and ſhall fill us with a moſt reſplendent verity. So that our ſoul ſhall be like to that Ægyptian pyramid, which perpendicularly reflected on by the Sun, caſt no ſhadow.

In lumine tuo videbimus lumen.

Beauty of beatifick love compared to the weakneſs of wordly love.

Laſtly we ſee our love is ill guided in this way-faring life, it ſticks upon ſo many frivolous objects, which are fooliſh fires, that often lead it into precipices. It is taken by the eys with bleſſings, which have nothing more certain in them than their loſs, bleſſings which we ever ſhall leave by death, if they forſake not us by misfortune. Being ſurprized it tumbleth therein, and perpetually bendeth to all which feedeth its dolours, and drives away content. All it leaſt can do, is that thing it moſt deſires; all it ſeeks, is many times the good it eſcheweth: It looſeth labour to run after a flitting phantaſm, and if it ſtay, it is not but through deſpair not to overtake all which kils it. But if it come to poſſeſs what it loves, it is inſtantly turmoiled with its happineſs, and not having need to labour any more in deſires, it grows mouldly in proper fruition. It is willing to be reſiſted, to enkindle its flame, and reſiſtance thruſts it into rage, as poſſeſſion into diſtaſt. That is it which maketh me ſay, the earth being made for us, we are not made for the earth, and that we ſhould ſeek the place where love ſuffers neither offence nor interruption. I ſay offence; for it hath an object which contents all the world, and offendeth none. I ſay interruption, for if we ceaſe to love in Paradiſe, it muſt proceed from God, or from our ſelves: If it be by the commandment of God, we ceaſe to love, we ſhall ceaſe in loving, and in ceaſing we ſhall inceſſantly love, ſince we ſhall ceaſe through love. This ceſſation cannot come from us, for we ſhall love without obſtacle and of neceſſitie that Sovereign good, which for its infinities will not be beloved but in infinitum.

O what pleaſure, to have but one pleaſure, and what joy to derive all joys from their ſource! Why ſay we not with S. Auguſtine: O fountain of life, O vein of living waters, when ſhall I come to thy delights, and eternal ſweetneſs! I here on earth ſigh after thy beauties (O holy Hieruſalem) in a land ſcorched with ſervours of ſenſuality. O when will it be, that I ſhall come before the face of my God! Think you I ſhall ſee that fortunate day, that day of comfort, and triumphs, that day which God hath made, and which takes its eaſtern riſe from his eys? O bright day, which hath no evening, nor knows what the ſetting Sun is! When do you think I ſhall hear that word, Enter into the joys of thy Maſter; enter into a joy inacceſſible to ſorrow, wherein is all good, with an eternal baniſhment of all evil? There it is, where youth waxed not old, where life hath no limits, where beauty decays not, where love knoweth not what it is to be cold, nor health to impair.

O dear Citie! With weeping eys we behold thee afar off, we thy poor exiles, but yet thy children, redeemed with his bloud, who makes thee happie by his aſpects. Stretch out thy arms unto us, O mild Saviour, caſt an eye on us from the haven in theſe ſtorms of life, and give us leave to walk in ſo undoubted paths, that we may come to the place where thou liveſt and reigneſt for ever.

The nineteenth EXAMPLE, upon the nineteenth MAXIM.

Of the Pleaſures of beatitude.

THE joys of Paradiſe are without example, and as they are here above our experience, ſo they paſs beyond our imagination. Yet well may we conceive, raiſed bodies ſhall have ſome manner of contentment, in the perfect uſe of their ſenſes and beauty of objects, which ſhall ſatiate them with everlaſting delights.

When after a long winter, which covered us in darkneſs, and buried us in ſnow, we behold a new world ariſe under the benign favour of the ſpring, and conſequently the golden days of ſummer, we feel our heart dilate, ſeaſonably taking in ſome antipaſt of the repoſe of the bleſſed. What ſweetneſs is it to enjoy delights in a body ſound, and a ſpirit well purified? What contentment to behold thoſe goodly Palaces, where is ſeen an admirable conſort of art and nature, ſo many Hals ſo well furniſhed within, ſuch rich hangings, ſuch moſt exquiſite pictures, ſuch marbles, ſuch gildings; and without, mountains which make a natural theater, tapiſtred without art to ſurpaſs all workmanſhip, forreſts, which ſeem born with the world, hedges, and knots curiouſly cut, alleys and mazes, where both eys and feet are loſt, rivers which creep along with ſilver purlings about gardens enameled with moſt fragant flowers, cavernes repleniſhed with a ſacred horrour, grots and fountains which gently gliding contend with the warble of birds, and ſo many other ſpectacles, which at firſt ſight aſtoniſh ſpirits and never ſatiate. All this is but a little atome; I do not ſay of the eſſential pleaſure of the bleſſed which is ineffable, but of the ſole content of the ſenſes of a glorious bodie, which may in ſome ſort be expreſſed.

S. John to accommodate himſelf to the weakneſs of our underſtanding, hath made a deſcription of it in the Apocalyps, where he depainteth this goodly Cittie of the bleſſed with ſingular curioſity. It is a pretty thing to conſider how Lucian, an excellent wit though a bad man, intruding into our myſteries hath ſet out in his idea's to the imitation of it the life of the fortunate Iland, wherein he ſayes all he can Apoc. 21. and 22.

to

to repreſent unto us unſpeakable delights: but it is ſo far from what we would, but cannot ſay, as Heaven from earth.

Lucian. l. 2. verar. hiſt.

"When you approach (ſaith he) to this place, you diſcover the walls, extended in length, all built with emeralds, the luſtre whereof is extreamly reſplendent and pleaſing. The gates are of a precious and odoriferous wood, which caſteth forth at the enterance moſt delicious ſavours. When you paſs in, you behold a pavement all of ivorie, and houſes all of gold, ſet out with coſtly workmanſhips. The Temples there are made of huge Berils, precious ſtones, of the colour of the ſea, and Altars of Amethiſt. The whole Citie is environed with a goodly river, which ſtreameth all in balm, three hundred cubits broad, and as deep as is neceſſary to bathe in. There are on either ſide ſtoves, which are great houſes of glaſs, wherein are exquiſite baths: They never burn any other wood in them but cynnamon, and in ſtead of water, a certain dew is preſerved, ſovereign for bodily health.

It is a pleaſant thing to ſee the inhabitants of this fortunate Citie, for you would ſay, their bodies are no bodies, but naked ſouls, ſeen by the help of ſome thin veil. Yet they ſtand upright, and ſit, walk, ſee, hearken, talk and anſwer, but have nothing groſs or terreſtrial in them, as we. Their garments are of purple colour, and of a ſilk as tranſparent as ſpiders webs. No man complaineth there either of poverty, maladies, paſſions of the mind, or miſeries of the world: no man waxeth old, and all ſuch as have the favour to enter into it, remain there incorruptible. They never have either winter or night, but a temperate ſeaſon, and day which ſeems to go on with a perpetual morning. There is no asking, whether there be orchards, gardens, flowers, or fruits: for never were the like pleaſures ſeen. Their vines bear twelve times a year, and ſome fruit-trees to thirteen. Their corn is very fair, and hath on the top of the ear, little loaves of bread, ready made, very taſtful.

I told in the Citie three hundred three-ſcore and five fountains with chryſtaline water, as many with honey, five hundred with ſweet water, ſeven rivers of milk, and eight of moſt exquiſite wine. They make many feaſts out of the Citie, in a beautifull meadow, properly called Elyſium, wholly repleniſhed with the choiceſt beauties of nature, and all round about it is crowned with a great wood which plentifully affordeth ſhadow. They ſit upon couches all compoſed of flowers, which never wither, and when they are at table, the winds take care to bring them all the moſt precious viands, except wine, whereof they have no need; for there are trees of Chryſtal which bear fruits made as glaſſes, and ſuch cups as we uſe, and ſo often as they gather them, they find them filled with a pleſant liquour.

Mean while Nightingales, Linnets, Gold-finches and Buntings flie over their heads, and having wantonly thrown flowers on the table, which they had gathered in the next meadows, make them admirable muſick. The clouds alſo ſwoln with vapours, drawn from thoſe fragrant fountains, afford a little dew for them to bathe in and recreate themſelves. Laſtly, that which is very commendable among them, is, they have two fountains, one of joy, the other of laughter, which being once taſted, they become impenetrable to all ſorrow.

Behold all a curious wit may do to deſcribe a life truly contented. We know there is nothing of all this in Paradiſe, but we are not likewiſe ignorant there is more than all this, and that whoſoever might have the favour onely one hour to be with the ſun and ſtars, ſhould there find ſo brave ſights, that all theſe dalliances of wit ſo gaily ſet out by this man, would ſeem to him no better than the ſlight verdure of cottage land-skips, hanged out of the windows in compariſon of the tuilleries.

The bleſſed ſhall have the pleaſure of eyes in the aſpect of the humanity of our Saviour, of the moſt holy Virgin, of ſo many bodies more luſtrous than the ſun, of ſo many beauties which ſhall never ceaſe to be beauties. The recreation of ears in the mottets and canticles of triumph, which ſhall be ſung to the praiſe of the ever to be adored Trinity. The contentment of ſmell in the good odour which ſhall proceed from glorified fleſh. The exerciſe of taſt, not in wine or viands, but in a ſubtile humour wherewith the pallate ſhall be perpetually moiſtened, by reaſon of the noble temperature of body. The ſatisfaction of touch in converſation with celeſtial bodies. All this may in ſome ſort be conceived by the figure we have here preſented. But the joy of God, and the eſſential beatitude, whereof I ſpeak in the diſcourſe, cannot fall under our ſenſe. Yet we may imagine the ſenſe of joy a man hath, who unexpectedly goeth out of a tedious and painfull impriſonment, or he who prevails in a great and deſperate ſuit, or who enjoys a love infinitely affected, and ſees himſelf tied by chaſt mariage to a wife a thouſand times deſired; or who is raiſed to ſome great office and eminent dignity, which may advance him to ſome high eſteem, and bring him ſtore of wealth; or who ſuddenly, and after many years, meeteth a dear friend whom he thought long ſince dead: The ſoul ſometimes is ſo ſeized with joy, that the bodie is no longer able to bear it, and remains overwhelmed as it were under roſes.

We know what happened to the good old man Diagoras, ſo famous in hiſtories, which tell us, that in an aſſembly of Olympike games (the Theater of all Greece) he having ſeen three of his ſons publickly crowned by the Magiſtrate, took at firſt great comfort therein, which multiplied in his heart, as light by the break of day. But ſo ſoon as theſe three young men came near to embrace him, and had all joyntly put their Crowns on his head, the good man ſhedding tears for joy, ſaid: Gell. l. 9.

Children, I am not to flie to heaven, yet have concluded all my joys on earth, ſeeing you to day all three together crowned in the boſom of glorie, and the full accompliſhment of my wiſhes. It is time to die, ſince life can adde nothing to my happineſs.

And ſaying theſe or the like words, he was ſo intranced with the conſideration of good fortune, that he died in the place.

An honourable Ladie of the Iſland of Naxos, named Polycrite, was touched with the like paſſion which took away her life, not bereaving her of glorie. For the hiſtorie ſaith, Her Citie being beſieged by the Eythreens, and menaced with all the calamities might be expected from a ſiege, ſhe was intreated by the prime men thereof, to undertake an Embaſſage for the pacifying of troubles, which ſhe willingly did, and being one of the moſt beautifull women of her time, and a very good Oratreſs, ſhe had ſo much power upon the Prince Diognetes, the General in this ſiege, that ſhe diſpoſed his heart to what ſhe pleaſed. In ſuch ſort, that going forth in the fear and confuſion of all the people, ſhe returned with peace and aſſurance of quiet, which made them all to come out to receive her at the Citie gates with loud acclamations, ſome throwing flowers, other Crowns, and all rendering thanks to her as their Sovereign Preſervereſs. She apprehended ſo much joy therewith, that in the very inſtant, ſhe expired in her honours at the Citie gate, and in ſtead of being carried to the throne, was brought to her tomb with the infinite ſorrow of all her countrey. I leave you to think if humane comforts have ſuch force, what will the great joy of God be for theſe unheard-of ſpectacles, theſe continual triumphs and inexhauſtible ſources. Muſt we not ſay, we ſhould there every moment leave our ſouls in the height of pleaſure, were not the happineſs of it conjoyned to immortality? Plutarch. de clar. mulieribus.

XX. MAXIM.

of RESURRECTION.

THE PROPHANE COURT.

That we must not deny our bodies the benefit of time, since they must perish.

The resurrection proved more than any other mysterie.

WE may truly say, there is not any mysterie in all our faith, which God hath pleased to teach and prove unto us more effectually, than the resurrection. For it being sufficiently averred, that our salvation consisteth in the knowledge of three principal Articles, which are, that of the Trinity, of the incarnation with its extension made to the Sacrament of the Altar, and of the Resurrection; although they be all of like necessity, yet it seems God disposing himself more to our ends than his own, hath more abundantly explaned himself in this last mysterie, which most concerneth our peculiar profit. It is very true, that for the doctrine of the Trinity, the Incarnation, and the Sacrament of the Altar, he was contented to give us some figures of them in the old Testament, not fully shewing the effects: but for the Resurrection, he was pleased to establish it, even before his coming into the world, really and actually, by raising many dead by the merits of Elias and Elizeus, as we learn in the history of Kings. It is well enough known, that having afforded to the Ancients very obscure knowledges of the Trinity, and Incarnation, for the Resurrection alone he made the law, of nature, the Mosaical, the order of the world, the form of Common-wealths, and the Evangelical law to speak so intelligibly, that he could speak nothing more perspicuously.

Scio quod Redemptor meus vivit & in novissimo die de terra resurrecturus sum, &c. Job 19.

In the law of nature I understand the chief Secretary of the world, Job, who crieth out on the dunghil: I know my Redeemer liveth, and that at the last day of the world I must rise again from the earth, and shall see God in mine own flesh; that I shall see my self in person, and that my eyes shall behold him, and no other: this hope I keep as a pledge in my bosom. A man who lived about three thousand years ago, before all books, all Doctours, and all schools, to speak in so clear terms, so pressing, so peremptory, is it not a prodigie?

Ecce ego aperiam tumulos vestros & educam vos de sepulchris vestris. Ezech. 35. Macch. 2. Math. 22. D. Tho. art. 1. ad 2. supplem. q. 75.

In the Mosaical law, besides formal passages in the prophet Ezechiel: I will open your tombs, and will take you from your sepulchers; besides the generous confession of the Macchabees, we have in the Pentateuch a passage alledged for proof of the resurrection by the Son of God himself, which for this purpose ought to be held, as an argument necessary and invincible. It is so many times said, The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: Now he is not the God of the dead, but of the living, and therefore needs must these Patriarchs be living, not onely in the immortality of their souls, for the soul makes not a man entire, but in future resurrection.

Tertul. l. de Resur. c. 12. and 13. Greg. Mag. 14. mor. c. 10. Cyril. Catech. 18. Macar. hom. 5. de Resur. Nil. Ora. 2. de Pasca. Theod. serm. de Provid.

In the order of the world, we have the new birth of stars, dayes, seasons, planets, of birds, who make a perpetual image of the Resurrection in the world, on which the holy Fathers enlarge with much eloquence. In the form of Common-wealths and policie of the universe, we observe the great care all Nations, the most barbarous, have had of the burial of bodies, not to have been but through an instinct and estimation of the resurrection. Which the chief men in Gentilism have publickly and notably professed.

THE HOLY COURT.

That we must use our bodies as the Temples of God, since they must rise again.

And although they had very weak knowledge of other mysteries of our faith, and spake of it with much obscurity, in the point of resurrection, they unfolded themselves most distinctly and expresly.

Mercurius Trismegistus, in the first chapter of Pymander assureth us of the resurrection of bodies, as a thing infallible. The great Athenagoras sheweth, it was the doctrine of Pythagoras and Plato, the two first lights of Philosophy. And verily we have also the writings of Plato, which witness, the wicked shall be judged, and condemned to hell in bodie and soul; a passage alledged by S. Justine in the tenth of his Common-wealth, and which is more, this singular man to win us to this belief, hath couched a very notable axiom in his Phedon, where he saith, that all, which is living in the world, comes from some thing dead. Democritus, who was (as Hippocrates affirmeth) one of the wisest men in the world, wished the bodies of the dead should be honourably used in respect of resurrection, which Pliny could not dissemble. Phocyllides said the same in verses, written as with the rayes of the Sun. Nay if we would consult with the tombs of the dead, we shall find, there hath not been any but some wicked and irregular spirits, who have renounced the blessings of the other life, as by publick professiion causing it to be engraven on their tombs. So did Sardanapalus the most infamous of men, whose epitaph Aristotle having read, said, It was more fit for a hog, than a King.

ἐκ τῶν τεθνεώτων ζῶντα τὰ νῦν ὄντα. Plato in Phædon. Plin. l. 7. c. 55.

So did that wretched woman of Bresse, whose monument is yet to be seen in antiquities, causing to be set over her ashes: That after the death of her husband she had been neither widdow nor wife: and that her house served onely for a snare to loves: Otherwise that during life, she never believed any thing but life. So did one Julia, who caused also to be inscribed over her bones: That she had lived seven and twenty years without committing any sin, but by resigning her self to death.

Vixi, & ultra vitam nihil credidi. Nihil unquam peccavit, nisi quod mortua est. Brisson. formul.

But on the contrarie, you observe some of the Gentiles, who professed the happiness of the soul in the other life, and the resurrection even on their tombs. We at this day read in Rome the Epitaph of Lucius and Flavius, two friends, who witnessed, They would have but one grave on earth, since their souls make but one in Heaven. And that of Aulus Egnatius who maketh mention, That all his life-time he learned nothing, but to live and die, from whence he now deriveth the joys of beatitude. And that of Felicianus, who having led a solitarie life, saith, He did so to rise again with the more facility, being freed from trouble at the day of Judgement. Where the Interpreters under this word Trouble, understand his wife. What voice of nature is this? What touch of God? What impression of verity?

In cœlo spiritus unus adest. Ut in die consorio sine impedimento facilius resurgam. Brisson.

In the Evangelical law, besides the passages of S. Matthew 22. of S. John 5. of S. Paul 1. to the Corinthians 15. the Saviour of the world remained fourty days upon earth after his resurrection, that he might be seen, reviewed, touched, handled, and manifested to more than five hundred people assembled together, as writeth S. Paul in the fore-alledged place, of purpose most deeply to engraft the mysterie of resurrection in the hearts of the faithfull.

of

2. And as for that which concerneth reason, this belief was acknowledged to be so plausible and conform to humane understanding, that never hath there been any who doubted it, were it not some hereticks, furious, infamous and devillish, as the Gnosticks, Carpocratians, Priscillianists, Bardesanites, Albigenses, and such like enemies of God and nature, or Epicures and Libertines, who finding themselves guilty of many crimes, have rather desired not to be perswaded of the end of souls and bodies, to burie their punishments with their life. For which cause, they framed gross and sensual reasons touching this truth, unworthily blaspheming that which their carnal spirit could not comprehend.

Reason of possibility.

What impossibility should there be in resurrection to an Omnipotent hand? We must necessarily say, it comes either from matter, or form, the final or efficient cause. It cannot come from matter, since our bodies being consumed by death, the first matter still remaineth, and after a thing is once created, never is it meerly reduced into nothing. Shall it be said that God, who made thee of nothing, cannot make thee again of the remainders of matter, and that he hath less power over dust, than over nothing?

The Philosopher Heraclitus saith, birth is a river, which never dries up, because nature is in the world as a workman in his shop, who with soft clay makes and unmakes what he list. Think we the God of nature cannot have the like power over our flesh, that nature hath over the worlds?

Proceeds the impediment from form? It cannot, since the soul, which is the form of bodie, remaineth incorruptible, and hath a very strong inclination to its re-union. Proceeds it from the end? No, since Resurrection is so the end of man, that without it he cannot obtain beatitude, for which he is created, perfect felicitie being not onely the good of the soul, but of the whole man.

Lessius. l. 2. de mirac. c. 52.

Wonders of nature.

Will then impediment arise from the efficient cause? And is it not an indignity to deny to the Sovereign power of God the restauration of a body he made, being we daily see so many wonders in nature, whereof we can yield no reason?

Why doth a liquor, extracted from herbs by a certain distillation, never corrupt? Why is water seven times purged not subject to corruption? Why doth amber draw a straw along, which other mettals repel? Why do the lees of wine poured to the root of vines make them fruitfull? How with so base ingredients are so goodly and admirable glasses made? Why do men by the help of a fornace and a limbeck, daily make of dead and putrified things so wonderous essences? What prostitution of understanding, to think that the great Architect, having made our bodies to pass through this great fornace of the world, and through all the searces his divine providence ordaineth, cannot render them more beautifull and resplendent than ever? What should hinder him? Length of time? There is no prescription for him? Multitude of men? That no more troubles him than millions of waves do the Ocean, since all Nations before him are but one drop of dew.

The condition of glorious bodies.

CONsider, I pray, the state of glorified bodies, and observe, that there commonly are four things irksom to a mortal bodie; sorrow, weight, weakness, and deformity. These four scourges of our mortality shall cease in the Resurrection, being banished by gifts quite contrarie to their defects. We may truly say, among the miseries of bodie, there is not almost any comparable to pains and maladies, which are in number so divers, in their continuance so tedious, in their impressions so sharp, that it is not without reason an Ancient said, health was the chief of Divinities, and an incomparable blessing. For what is a soul, inforced perpetually to inhabit a sickly bodie, but a Queen in a tottering and ruinous house, but a bird of Paradise in an evil cage, and an Intelligence tied to attend on a sick man? As the bodie very sound serves the soul for a house of pleasure, so that which is continually crazy, is a perpetual prison.

Now observe, that against the encounters of all sorts of pains and maladies, God communicateth to glorified bodies the chief gift, which is impassibility, wherewith they shall be exempt, not onely from death, but from hunger, thirst, infirmities, and all the diseases of this frail and momentarie life. O God, what a favour is the banishment from so many stones, gravels, gouts, nephreticks collicks, sciaticks, from so many pains of teeth, head, heart, so many plagues, and sundry symptoms of malladies, which afflict a humane body.

Apoc. 21. Absterget Deus omnem lachrymam ab oculis eorum, &c. Isai 49. Non esurient, neque sitient neque percutiet eos æstus.

This good, if maturely weighed, will be thought very great, by such as have some experience of the incommodities of this life. Adde also thereunto a singular Theological reason, that this gift shall not be in us by a simple privation, as the non-essence which the Epicureans imagined, but by a flourishing quality communicated by God to our bodies, and which shall have the force to exclude all whatsoever is contrarie and painful, onely admitting the sweet impressions of light, colours, melodies, odours, and other things pleasing to sense. Note I say, quality, for I am not ignorant. Divines dispute concerning the true cause of the impassibility of a glorified bodie, and that some place it in a virtue and external protection, which God will give them to stay the effect of hurtfull causes. In such wise, that according to the opinion of those Doctours, glorious bodies shall be impassible as were the three Children in the fornace of Babylon, not that their bodies were impenetrable to fire, but because God hindered the action of flames on their bodies. But I had rather say with S. Thomas, it is done by a quality internal and adherent to the bodies of the blessed. Because this manner, besides that it is sweet, easie, and suitable to the magnificence of God, is more noble, more natural, and nearer approching to the condition of celestial bodies.

Scot. in 4. distinct. 49. q. 13. Durand. d. 15. 44. q. 4. num. 13.

1. part. q. 97. art. 1. and 5. q. 82. art. 1.

Against the second incommodity of mortal body, which is terrestrial weight, we shall have subtility; a gift much to be desired, and which also opposeth the beastlines and stupidity, that insensibly cause aversion in reasonable and intellectual nature. We cannot be ignorant, that many Divines place this subtility of glorious bodies in a virtue they shall have, to penetrate the most massy objects, not bruising or breaking them, like a spirit, and that it were an errour either to say it were impossible to the divine power, or was not done by our Saviour when he came out of his mothers womb, or when he entered into the chamber. Notwithstanding, I think this penetration of bodies should be judged as extraordinarie to a blessed bodie, without having any necessarie dependance of its condition. But I had rather believe with S. Thomas, Doctour Durandus, & the Roman Catechism, that this gift of subtility, whereof question is here made, consisteth in a great vigour of sense, proceeding from a perfect disposition of organs, and a tenderness of spirits, and besides in an entire subjection and admirable pliantness of the body to the soul, and of appetites to reason; a matter which I esteem more than the penetration of Semiramis wals.

Damascen. l. 4. de fide. c. ult. and Ambros. l. 10. in Luc. cap. ult.

Durand. in 4. d. 44. q. 5. D. Thom. in 4. l. 4. q. 2. art. 2. and 5. q. 83. a. 2.

The third blemish of our bodies, which is weakness and infirmity, shall be excluded by the grace, force, and agility, which will bring to pass that the blessed may go from one place to another, not by a simple ability and equality of the motion of steps & going forward, but an impetuousness, as would be that of an eagle, who should fall upon her prey, or of an arrow shot by a strong hand, according to S. Augustines opinion. Doctour Scotus thinks this agility will proceed from the force of the soul, with substraction of weight, which shall at that time be taken away from the body in this state of immortality. Others think, this weight shall onely be suspended, and interdicted in its effect, not for ever, but for the space the blessed shall desire, who besides this admirable lightness, shall have great and sprightly forces.

Auguſt. l. 22. de Civit. c. ult.

Ubi volet ſpiritus, ibi protinus erit & corpus.

Iſaiah. 40. Qui ſperant in Domino mutabunt fortitudinem.

Lastly, the fourth accident of this mortal and corruptible state, is deformity, which hath sometimes been so troublesom to many souls little couragious, & greatly faithless, that there have been such found in Pagan antiquity, who voluntarily deprived themselves of life, to be delivered from the shame and grief they conceived to be born in a body notably deformed.

Of beauty.

Beauty, although it be often decried, since it began to serve for a bait and to be an instrument to sin, yet it must be confessed, when it contracteth good alliance with the spirit and virtue, namely, that of chastity, it hath qualities so lovely, and excellencies so noble, that without arms or guards it exerciseth power, even over the hearts of Monarchs. Zeno said, grace of body was a Voice of flower, & a flower of voice; voice of flower, because it draweth amity to it, as the flower of a garden, not crying out nor tormenting it self; a flower of voice, because it is one of the most flowery eloquences among the attractives of nature. Earthly sovereignties often employ the whole extent of their power, to make themselves beloved, yet never attain it, but this as the rayes of the sun, not breaking either gate or window, gets enterance for it self in humane heart, and not alledging any other reason, nor affording patience of resolution, transporteth a soul, which lives more in that it loveth, than in that it animateth. And yet what is temporal beauty but a transitory charm, an illusion of senses, a voluntarie imposture, a slave of pleasure, a flower which hath but a moment of life, a dyal on which we never look, but whilest the sun shines on it? What is humane beauty but a dunghil covered with snow, a glass painted with false colours, a prey pursued by many dogs, a dangerous Hostess in a frail house, a sugered fruit in a feast which some dare not touch, for respect, and others gourmandize through sensuality? Go, trust so fading a good: Go, betake you to so unhappy a snare: Go, tie your contentments to so slippery a knot. What else will happen unto you but to court a fantasie, which loosening your hold, will leave you nothing but the sorrow of your illusions?

Θωὴ ἀνθους, καὶ ἡδοφωνίας.

If beauties must be loved, let us love them in the state wherein they shall never cease to be beauties: let us love them in the glory of their resurrection, where they shall be placed as Queens in their thrones.

Durand. in 4. dc. 44 q. 8.

The beauty of glorified bodies (saith Durandus the Divine) consisteth in three things. First, in a pure and resplendent colour, conjoyned to a most perfect and distinct proportion of all members, without the least blemish or defect, able to give the least aversion. Secondly, in a singular smoothness, as would be that of a mirrour, receiving the Sun beams directly. Thirdly, in an interiour light, which, as other Doctours with a general consent do adde, will diffuse it self over the body with an incomparable lustre, if it happen not that the blessed, to manifest themselves to feeble, and mortal eyes stay the course of the rays of glory, as did our Saviour in the conference he had with the two pilgrims of Emaus.

Daniel 12. Qui docti fuerint fulgebunt

O Beauties which never tarnish! O lights which know not what it is to be eclipsed! O house of God! O Temple of peace! When will the great day come, which shall devest us from all we have mortal, to put us into the bosom of immortality? But we must confess, that among all the considerations may be had upon this subject, we have not any more pleasant or effectual, than the triumphant Resurrection of our Saviour, which is the root and hope of ours. If we desire to sweeten the acerbities of life, and to replenish our hearts with the antipast of our immortality, let us make a perpetual Pasch in our souls, and reflect on our Jesus, our Phenix, who goeth out of his sepulcher on the day of his triumphs.

tanquam ſplendor firmamenti &c. Math. 13. Fulgebunt juſti ſicut ſol in regno Patris eorum.

That the resurrection of Jesus Christ, is the foundation of ours, and we must behold his sweetness and glories as the sources of our eternity.

NAture, which is an expression of Divine understanding, is never so great and admirable, as in contrarieties, and it seems she takes delight to derive the goodliest harmonies of the world from certain disagreeing accords. We admire contrarie motions in the heavens, which compose an eternal peace: In the air, a bird which takes life from death, and the beauty of her plumage from a tomb of ashes: On earth, bees bred in the throat of a dead Lion, that find life in a savour able to kill them: In the sea, a fish named the holy fish, which as histories say, taking its original in the Kingdom of tempests, fails not to create, a calm by its presence: And among fountains, we cannot sufficiently wonder at the water of Dodone, into which a torch falling, is put out, and coming forth, is lighted.

Nature delighteth in contrarieties. Discordant accords of the world.

Æl. l. 8. de animal.

S. Iſidor. de fonte Epiri, and Solinus.

Jesus, Authour of nature, beareth all these miracles in his own Person, to make a miracle in our hearts, and to draw them out of the dust and darkness from which he freed our bodies. He is the great heaven, which by motions of his life holily contrary, unanimously divers, and harmoniously disagreeing, hath made the accords of the Church militant and triumphant. He is the bird of the East, whereof Isaiah speaketh, which glorifieth his tomb, and quickneth his death, to slay ours. He is the Bee of the Celestial Father, which from all Eternity having his hive in the heart of his Father, soareth into the region of death, to sit upon dying flowers which took away his life, and put him into the throat of a lionness, of a death which devouring all, is devoured it self, as saith the Apostle: and from this gulf which yielded nothing, issueth a life to be the seed of all lives. It is the Divine fish of the Sybilles, sacred by so many titles, to consecrate all intelligent nature, which after the rage of so turbulent a passion, makes a great calm in the world, which he establisheth by his fall, quickeneth by his death, washeth by his bloud, and glorifieth by his torments. He is the torch which entered dead into the river of Cocytus, whereof holy Job speaketh, and came out lighted and all environed with flames of a triumphant glorie.

Miracles of the person of Jesus. Iſa. 46. 11.

1. Cor. 15.

Job 21. 33.

Let us then say that God, who by his providence and by a singular predestination, governeth the state of intellectual creatures, in all perfect height and accomplishment of beatitude, hath so tied glory to merit, and merit to glory, that he would not glorifie the Angels, without giving them some moment of a wayfaring life, and some exercise of meritorious actions, to obtain the crown and consummation of felicity. And consequently to the same purpose, it is very true, the most holy humanity of the worlds Saviour from the first instant of his beginning, was inseparably united to the Divinity, but not to be the lights and actual splendours which were incessantly to spring from this ineffable union of the Word to the flesh. The Father ordained, and the Son for our love received and freely accepted a suspension of the light of glory, for the space of three and thirty years. And although he had the foundation and root in himself, the exercise of it was staid, and proposed Jesus entereth into his glory by his merit.

Suspension of actual glory in the body of our Saviour.

to

to him in the end of his race, as the recompence of his painful life, and unſpeakable dolours of his death.

He naturally deſired the glory of his body, as our ſoul ſticking in fleſh and bloud, vehemently covets a full liberty of its intellectual functions; and behold here in this myſterie, his deſire is accompliſhed, and this humanity darkened by the ſpace of a long night of life, hidden and buried in the obſcurity of an ignominious death, cometh from it as the Sun out of a cloud, and makes a transfuſion of himſelf into the boſom of ineffable lights, which iſſue from the Sanctuary of the moſt holy Trinity. In ſuch ſort, that it is as a ſecond birth of the moſt ſacred humanity, which being born to the communication of divine ſubſiſtence, is here born to glory.

Three properties of ſplendour in the reſurrection of our Saviour.

5. Now obſerve, if you pleaſe, that as the lightening-flaſh, which appeared in the face of the Angel, meſſenger of the reſurrection, hath three properties; the firſt is, that it is a ſubtile part of enflamed elements, the ſecond, that it is endowed with a ſplendour and ſparkling, which dazeleth humane eyes, the third, that it goes from one pole to another with an extream vivacity, & a ſhril ſound; So three things are obſervable in the glory, which our Saviour entertained in his Reſurrection: firſt, that this body taken from the clay of Adam and matter of elements, became in an inſtant wholly inveſted in ſweet and honourable flames of divinity; ſecondly, that he appeared with an admirable beauty, which made, that S. Auguſtine gave him this title: The flower of pleaſures, and the moſt purified pleaſure of all delights, the root of holy loves; the third, conſiſteth in the luſtre of this great name, which went from the Eaſt to the Weſt, from the South to the North, filling the world with his wonders.

Flos delectationum, amœnitas deliciarum & veri amoris initium. Auguſt. homil. in exurg. Mariæ.

A Remarkeable Pſalm.

Pſalmus David quando ei terra reſtituta eſt. Alii, quando fundata eſt terra. Dominus regnavit decorem indutus eſt, &c.

It ſeems, this was divinely propheſied in the 29. Pſalm, which beareth a title very remarkeabe. It is a Pſalm ſung by David to the Meſſias, on the day when his land was reſtored to him, to wit, his body was rejoyned to his ſoul in the poſſeſſion of glory, and therefore he ſaith according to the paraphraſe: It is verily on this day our Saviour beginneth an eternal Empire, and a ſupream Monarchy in his militant and triumphant Church: It is on this day he cloathed himſelf with a body, endowed with a flouriſhing beauty, with beauty he took an invincible force which hath penetrated even into hell, as divinely ſaith (a) Euſebius Emiſſenus. The eternal nights of hell have been viſited by the rays of God, plaints and clamours ceaſed, direful chains fell off, executioners were amazed and the whole habitation condemned to eternal pains, ſhook under the feet of this admirable Conquerour. The Prophet purſueth (b) The ſeat of glory, (O Saviour) was prepared for thee from all eternity, and thereinto thou makeſt a victorious triumphant entry, after ſo great an inundation of ſufferings. All the waves of perſecutions have roared over thy head, and have buried thee in the acerbities of death. How much the more this ſea of paſſions immeaſurably ſwelled, ſo much the more thou appeareſt reſplendent in the ſupream eminency of thy glory and triumphs.

The triumphant glory of the Reſurrection.

Emiſſ. hom. 1. in diem Paſchæ.

(a) Æterna nox inferorum Chriſto deſcendente reſplenduit, ſilluit ſtridor ille lugentium, & catenarum diſrupta acciderunt vincula damnatorum, &c.

(b) Parata ſedes tua, &c. Elevaverunt flumina, &c. Mirabiles elationes maris.

6. (b) Transfer your conſideration from thence to the effect of our Saviours glorification, which conſiſteth in repoſe and ſtability, repreſented by the Angel, which appeared at the reſurrection, ſitting on a ſolid ſtone. This verily is the great day, which we may call the myſtical Sabbaoth, and the eternal repoſe of Jeſus. It is ſaid in the myſtery of the creation, (c) that God reſted on the ſeaventh day, and caſting his eye on all theſe great works, which he drew out of nothing, he thereupon took ſatisfaction in his ſpirit, and impreſſed them all as with the ſeal of his approbation. To ſpeak according to our underſtanding, it was an incomparable comfort to the heart of the Sovereign Creatour, to behold in ſix days ſo goodly a world, where before that time reigned an huge imaginary vacuum, accompanied with a ſad horrour of darkneſs: And to conſider how a Nothing, in the hands of a great work-man was a mighty thing, having been as the ground of the greatneſs, & beauty of the univerſe.

(b) The ſweetneſs of the repoſe of Jeſus, and all the elect, in the ſtate of the reſurrection.

(c) Complevitque Deus die ſeptimo opus ſuum quod fecerat, & requievit die ſeptimo ab univerſo opere quod patrarat, & benedixit diei ſeptimo, & ſanctificavit illum. Geneſ. 2. 1.

The relation of the reſurrection to the creation.

What contentment to ſee a heaven diſtended as a Pavilion over all creatures, which already circumvolved with ſo much impetuouſneſs, and beſides to ſee it enameled with ſo great a number of ſtars in the peaceable ſilence of the night, and in the day to ſee it enlightened with a ſun, which is the viſible Image of God inviſible, the eye of the world, the heart of nature, the treaſury of heat, light, and influences, that animate, illuſtrate, and quicken all the parts of this great work. To ſee a moon to ſerve for a ſun by night, ſo conſtant in her inconſtancy, ſo regular in her increaſings and waynings ſo meaſured in all her courſe, ſo effectual and fruitfull in the impreſſions ſhe maketh on nature. To ſee days and nights return into our hemiſphere at a time prefixed, to agree as brothers & ſiſters, to afford time one to another, and to yield it, one in winter, another in ſummer, with ſo much integrity, that all therein goes in compaſs. To ſee the order of ſeaſons, a delicious ſpring-tide ſtrewed all over with flouriſhing beauties, a ſummer with harveſts, an Autumn with its fruits, and a winter, which is as the depoſitory of nature, dies to live again with the firſt rays of renovation: To ſee the Sea ſo ſpacious in its extents, ſo fertile in its productions, ſo concluded in its limits; to ſee the floud and ebbe of the Ocean the tomb of curioſity, the impetuous ſtream of rivers, the eternal veins of fountains, the height of mountains, the depth of valleys, the winding of hillocks, the wideneſs of fields: To ſee ſo prodigious a quantity of trees, herbs, flowers, ſo curious in beauty, ſo wholſom in their utility, and ſo divers in their multiplicity: To ſee ſo many ſpeckled birds flying in the air, which they fill with their natural muſick, ſo many fiſhes to ſwim in the chryſtal of waters, ſo ſtrange a variety of beaſts, armed ſome with horns, ſome with teeth, ſome with ſpurs, other with ſaws, many with paws: And laſtly man, who contracteth in himſelf all the draughts and works of the divine hand, and epitomizeth the whole world in his perfections, and beareth the moſt animated character of the living God. Is it not true that God, caſting his eye on this, had a certain delight therein, as the Maſter of a family, when he ſees a houſe, which he had long time deſigned to be raiſed in one night entirely perfect, throughly furniſhed, and in all kinds accommodated with whatſoever concerns neceſſity and beauty?

The joys of the heart of Ieſus in the firſt inſtant of the reſurrection.

Here raiſe your thoughts above all that is mortal and momentary: Imagine with your ſelf the ineffable joy of the heart of Jeſus, and the profound repoſe of his ſpirit, when at the firſt inſtant of his reſurrection, he repreſented unto himſelf not creatures, elements, plants, and a corruptible world, but a world of wiſdom, underſtanding, love, beauty, force, and felicity. A Church which was to take birth from his bloud, life from his death, and ſpirit from the moſt ſubtile ſpirits of his heart. He then ſaw this Church as a great Temple divided into two parts, whereof one made the Quire, another the body; In the Quire he beheld an infinite number of Angels, who chanted a ſong of triumph in honour of his victories. He ſaw in his idea the number of the elect, who ſhould accompany the magnificent legions of Intelligences. He ſaw about him thoſe ſacred firſt-fruits of immortals, whom he very lately had taken out of Limbo, and himſelf he beheld in the front of ſo many clean and purified ſouls, rejoycing to buſie the earth in the memory of his triumphs, and to make heaven happy by his ſweet aſpects.

The goodly world he beheld in his Idæa's at the day of his reſurrection.

Ecce equum album, & qui ſedebat ſuper eum vocabatur fidelis, & verax. In capite ejus diademata multa, veſtitus

He beheld himſelf as in a picture in that manner wherein S. John preſenteth him in his Apocalyps, all laden with crowns, clad in a white garment imbroidered with precious drops of his bloud, which gave him a luſtre a thouſand times more honourable, than that of diamonds and rubies; and after him an infinite

erat veste aspersa sanguine, &c. Apoc. 19.

infinite number of celestial Courtiers who waited on the triumph of his resurrection. He heard acclamations, which gave him the title of True and Faithful, voices of trumpets, of water, and thunder, which ceased not to resound Alleluja. O what a source of joy did then over-flow the breast of God, that treasury of chast delights.

From the Quire he cast his eyes on the body of his great Temple, and saw in magnificent idea's all the state of the Church militant, which is compared to the body of it, to wit to a ship, because it is still in the waves of this tempestuous sea. He beheld it with an eye of love and compassion, seeing by his example it increased by its losses, rose in its ruins, and was glorified by persecutions: and considered this little handful of Christians, which multiplying, Age after Age peopled Asia, Europe, and Affrica, and spred through the world known and unknown, taking for habitation the same limits the Sun hath in his course: he perceived Nations drenched in the darkness of ignorance, which having no more of man than shape, were transformed at the first light of the Gospel into a life wholy celestial: prophane Temples thrown down on their Gods, Idols broken in a thousand peices, dens of theeves, full of horrour, bloud and darkness purified by his doctrine, and the very instruments of his dolours honoured, and advanced on the top of Capitols. He beheld Churches erected on all sides to his honour, Monarchs and Queens, who laid their Crowns and diadems at his feet, withp rayses, sacrifices, and eternal feasts.

On the other side, he represented to himself so many Doctours, knowing as Oracles, and pure as Angles, who were to be the trumpets of his glory: so many innocent Virgins, who should with an immortal character inscribe on their bodies the resemblance of his own most sacred purity: so many Confessours, who hastened to engrave on the most hydeous rocks of the desert, the omnipotency of his name, the imitation of his fasts, watchings, abstinencies, the image of his deifying conversation. And lastly, more than eleaven millions of Martyrs, who defied all torments, affronted executioners, braved death, and scored out with their bloud the holy paths of their glory.

Cruciate, damnate, atterite, patientia nostræ probatio iniquitas vestra, crudelitas illecebra est sectæ, plures efficimur quoties metimur a vobis: sanguis Martyrum semen est Christianorum. Tertul Apoll. 50.

7. I leave you to ponder that, which never can enough be thought on, the repose and comfort of the soul of Jesus, when he beheld in his idea's the great Kingdom, which was to be brought forth in his bloud, and established in his Resurrection. And moreover that his Kingdom should be an eternal Empire, never admitting end, death, nor darkness. Humane wisdom, being desirous to be established in Empires by vice, policy, and tyranny, found every where scepters of glass, crowns of vapours, and thrones of ice, which are broken, scattered and dissolved into nothing under the progress of time, and eye of the divine providence: But the Empire of Jesus, which taketh its beginning on earth, and beareth its conquests into heaven, hath recommended his Scepter to the bosom of eternity.

Kingdom of Jesus.

O what a torrent of pleasures flowed over the fair soul of our Saviour in these considerations! Painters naturally love their own workmanships learned men their writings, Law-makers their politick Institutions military men their victories and trophies. All men in the world have a sensible joy to see their designs brought to perfection. Solomon, even melted with comfort in consideration of the accomplishment of the Temple of Hierusalem. Justinian, could not behold but with much transportation of joy the Church of S. Sophy he had built, Constantine had most pleasing dreams concerning the City of Constantinople, which was as his creature. And what is all this, but chymera's in comparison of the great work of the Church, performed by the resurrection of the worlds Saviour. Have not we cause to say, It is to thee, O Jesus, it is to thee, the joys of the holy Spirit do appertain: Joys pure, celestial, divine, distilled from the heart of God, who is the heart of eternal amities. Enter into thy repose after so great a tumult of wars and battels. It is time (saith the Spirit of God) thou rest thy Ark under the pavilion of the eternal Majesty, after so many travels and effusion both of sweat and bloud.

Luc. 10. 21. In ipsa hora exultavit Iesus Spiritu sancto. Psal. 131. Ingredere in requiem tu & arca sanctificationis tuæ. Amodò jam dicit spiritus ut requiescant a laboribus suis. Apo. 14. 13.

8. Let us more and more settle our selves in this noble belief, which charmeth all anxieties of this life, sweeteneth all rigours, purifieth all intentions, animateth all virtues, and crowneth all merits. Courage (O Christians,) an immortality, a resurrection, an eternal life, a life of God is gained for thee by the pains, sweats, and bloud of Jesus, and he now inviteth thee into the society and communion of this glory. What resolution wilt thou take (O man of mud and morter?) why doest thou still bow down to the earth, the back whereof thou hast bristled with so many thorns by thy sins? It is not now said unto thee: Thou art dust, and shalt return into dust; but thou art put in mind of immortality. The tombs of Alexanders and Cæsars, all sprinckled over with lyes and gildings, bear a HERE LYETH, but the glorious sepulcher of our Saviour, HE IS NOT HERE.

The comfort and fruit we should derive from the Resurrection to the imitation of our Saviour. Pulvis es, & in pulverem reverteris.

Surrexit non est hic.

9. O Christian, thou becomest the child of a good house, if thou canst understand thy nobility. How magnificent, how happy art thou to enter into a glory, which is common unto thee with God? Thy country is no longer on earth; forsake, forsake the love of these sleight cottages, these poor ant-hills, which enthral so many spirits devested of those divine seeds, which bud under generous breasts. Behold the great globe all repleniished with stars and lights, which encloseth within its extent all lands and seas; the great house of God, where are so many brave Intelligences, part of which are busie in the praises of the Omnipotent, others circumvolve stars, remaining infatigably disposed to their imployments. This is the Palace which God hath conquered for thee. A goodly and flourishing company, laden with crowns, stretch out arms to thee, thou still hast thine eye upon the petty trifles of this terrestrial abode, thereon to settle thy affections. Enter, enter (O faithful soul) into the folds and circuits of eternity, all years are for thee, all Ages are open to thee, all the greatness of heaven (if thou wilt be loyal to thy Master) is in thine own hand.

Si consurrexisti cum Christo, quæ sursum sunt sapite, non quæ super terram.

O! when will that goodly day come, which shall restore thee thy body to render it to God, thy body, no longer a mass of frail, ponderous, and perishable earth, but an immortal, agile, and incorruptible body, priviledged with favours, and gilded with bright splendours of the body of Jesus. Raise thy self, (faithful soul) in the sufferings and travels of this life, yield not to temptations and persecutions, which will snatch out of thy hand so advantagious a crown: All the pomp of this world, all this life, yea all which here pleaseth and distracteth hearts, is but a poor præludium of the great act of the inexplicable contentment which passeth in eternity.

O man, thou hast heretofore been a little infant in thy mothers womb, amongst bloud and ordure, involved in thin skins, swadled in clouts and swathbands which nature gave thee, thou wast held in them to prepare for this world, for this life, where thou now breathest air with all liberty; know, this world is a second womb in comparison of heaven. Thou art yet in prison, in obscurity, in fetters, till the coming of the great day, wherein God shall give thee a new body, a glorious body, a spirituall body.

With these hopes the mother of the young Machabees saw saw the members of her children hewed, and cut in pieces under the bloudy sword of persecution. With this hope holy Anchorites filled the desarts with their tears, walked on scorching sands, trampled dragons under foot, stifled the concupiscences of flesh in snows and thorns; with this hope Martyrs sacrificed themselves in as many torments as they had members. They preached on crosses, sang in flames, triumphed on wheels, and to merit this glory, thou wilt not resolve to forsake that company, which hath robbed thee of thy heart, and dishonoured the character of thy profession. Thou wilt not resolve to suffer a little injury, a slight persecution. Thou wilt not accomplish thy vows, discharge thy obligations, put thy self into some course of a regular piety. And what may we think of thee (O soul, so many times ungratefull and disloyal) if Heaven, open in rewards, cannot yet dilate thy heart to his love, who readily offers them?

The twentieth EXAMPLE upon the twentieth MAXIM.

Divers observations upon the length of life, and desire of the state of Resurrection.

IT is not my purpose to enlarge hereupon narration of many Resurrections, whereof we have sundry notable examples both in the old and new Testament, and in the lives of Saints, in which kind, there is not an Age which doth not furnish us with store. I onely rest upon some observations, which evidently shew the passionate desires humane nature hath to the most blessed state proposed us in the Resurrection.

August. l. 22. de Civitate Dei. c. 11. Omne corpus fugiendum ex Platonicis.

The Platonists said, The presence of felicity was the absence of body, and that we must flie from it as from a prison, to enter into the liberty of beatitude. But the Apostle hath much better said, That we groan in this tabernacle, and are in great pain, not that we desire to be despoiled, but to be better clothed, that all which is mortal in us, may be as swallowed up by life. Verily we have a tender love of our bodies, and even those who do most torment them, do it for no other purpose but to place them one day in ease. We live not without thinking on this Resurrection and immortality, the fruition whereof we shall never find but in Heaven. God hath given us this desire, to teach us we are created for it; but he doth not afford us the performance of it here, to tell us we must seek for it else where. We desire to live long and commodiously; shortness of life taketh away the one, and continual sicknesses bereaves us of the other. So many men have sought for their resurrection here on earth, and have found nought but their destruction. Our body in the declining of age, is not like Vestal fires, to be everlastingly repaired. All in it is lost, all is dissolved, but if any thing therein be re-established, it is not to the proportion of its primitive vigour. Spirits, without which we cannot live, cease not to alter our life, and the very air we breath, drieth and devoureth us.

2 Cor. 5.4. Qui sumus in hoc tabernaculo ingemiscimus gravati: eo quod nolumus exspoliari, sed supervestiri, ut absorbeatur quod mortale est a vita.

There have been men in the world, who have in this life made boast of great age, as if they had already some scantling of the condition of Resurrection, but they have been very rare, and to speak truly, they have continued long, and lived but a while, since there is nothing long in a happiness, whereof we find an end. It is a remarkable thing, that the eldest of all the Patriarchs in Genesis, who was Methusalem, arrived not to the time which S. Peter calleth a day of God. A thousand years (saith the great Apostle) are before God but one day: And not any one of the first men of the world, with his so many years, mounted to the thousand year of his age. Yea, it is a thing very well to be observed, that in the account the Scripture maketh of the years of Patriarchs, the age of women is not considered. And Baronius findeth the Bible never reckoned the days and years of women, but of Sara, Judith, and Anne the daughter of Phanuel, to teach us our lives are short, since those of Eve, the mother of the living, and of so many other mothers from whom men issued, entered not into the line of account in Gods Chronicle. We know not how long the first woman of the world lived, but we understand she returned into dust, and that we must tread the like path.

Pet. 2. 3.5. Unus dies apud Dominum, sicut mille anni, & mille anni, sicut dies unus.

Greece, the mother of fables, sought to use posterity as they do children: it hath pleased it self to scare us with strange tales of huge bodies, and long lives, but we have more difficulty to believe them, than it facility to invent them. Phlegon a rare Authour says, he read in Appollonius the Grammarian, that the Athenians desirous to fortifie the long Island, which was near to their Citie, laying the foundation of their fortresses, found a sepulcher one hundred cubits long with this Epitaph, which said: Macrosiris is here interred in the long Island, after he had lived five thousand years compleat. These are impostures and Rhodomontades, which seek to brave Ages, and cannot affront worms, nor be defended from corruption.

Phlegon. de rebus mirabil. c. 17.

All about us is sufficient to give us a lesson of the shortness of our life. The corn, on which we live, dies every year to the root. The Vine feels as many deaths as winters, and although it renew every year, it cannot attain to the reasonable age of some drunkards: Fifty or three-score years make up its age, as also of Apple-trees, Pear-trees, Plumb-trees, Cherie-trees, and other such like, whereof eating the fruits, we should think the wood which bears them, liveth no longer than we. Tame creatures, which are perpetually among us, live but a while. The age of a horse ends at twenty years. It is a great chance if a dog arrive to that number. The ox will be well contented with sixteen, sheep with ten, cats are between ten and six, pigeons, and so many flying fowl live not long, for we daily eat them soon enough; as if all this should say unto us: What do we so long in the world, since all things that must serve our use last so little. Gold and silver continue long, but last very little in our hands, and though one keep them as well as he can, they keep not ever one Master. If there be creatures which live much longer, they flie from us, as Harts, Crows, and Swans: you might say, they are ashamed to participate in our frailty.

Great-ones of the earth have in all times done what they could, with a purpose to prolong their days, so naturally are we desirous of the state of Resurrection, but they have many times abridged them, seeking to lengthen them. Garcias telleth us, that a King of Zeilam having learned the adamant had the virtue to preserve life, would neither eat nor drink, but in a dish which he caused to be made of adamant, through a strange giddiness of spirit; but he failed not to find death in these imaginary vessels of immortality. We make a great matter of it to see men very old; they are beheld with admiration: But if some desire to come to their age, there is not any would have the miseries and troubles of it. This Phlegon, of whom we now speak, who had been one of the most curious Authours of his Age, made a book of long liv'd men, wherein he confesseth he hath exactly looked into the Registers of the Roman Empire, there to find old men and women of an hundred years, and scarcely could he meet with a sufficient numbet of them to fill up a whole leaf of paper. But if he would take the number of such as died before fifty, which the Ancients called the exterminating death, he had filled many huge volumes. Pompey took pleasure at the dedication of his Theater, to see a Comedianes act, named Galeria

Bero. in historia vitæ & mortis.

Capiola,

Capiola, who reckoned ninety nine years since her first enterance into a Theater. It was a goodly play of life in a woman, who danced on the brink of her grave: But how many such like have there been? people go into the tomb as drops of water into the sea, not thinking on it. Nay, do but observe all which is Sovereign, & you will find among all the Emperours, which were through so many ages, there is not one to be found, who attained to the age of a hundred years; and four alone arrived to four-score, or much thereabouts. Gordian the elder came to this point, but scarcely had he tasted of Empire, but was overwhelmed with a violent death. Valerian, at the age of seventy six years was taken by Sapor King of Persia, and lived seven years in a shamefull captivity, his enemy making use of his back as a foot-stool, when he would mount on horse-back. He was at first much greater in the estimation of men than he deserved, and every one would have thought him worthy of Empire, had he not been Emperour. Anastasius, a man of little worth and less courage, who had more superstition than religion, arrived to the age of four-score and eight years, when he was blasted with lightening from heaven. Justini in reckoned four-score and three, which made him wax white in a vehement desire of glorie, although being some-what contemptible in his person, he was fortunate in Captains. They speak of a King called Arganthon, who heretofore reigned in Spain the space of four-score years, and lived an hundred and fourty: But this is rather in fables than authentical histories. Of so many Popes as have been since S. Peter, not any one hath possessed the See twenty five years, & scarcely find you four or five four-score years of age. John the two and twentieth, an unquiet and treasure-heaping spirit, was about ninety years, when death took off his triple Crown. So many had Gregory the twelfth, who was created before the schism, but his papacy was as short, as his life was long. Paul the third attained to one above four-score, and was otherwise a man as peaceable of spirit as prudent in counsel. Paul the fourth, severe, imperious, and eloquent, came to four-score and three. Gregory the thirteenth lived as many; a Prelate wise, courteous, prudent, liberal, who lived too little a while for the Churches good, for which he could not end but too soon. If we speak of the blessed S. John, S. Luke, S. Polycarp, S. Denys, S. Paul the Hermit, S. Anthony, S. Romuald, & so many other religious men, they lived long: And it seems there are many things in religion, which further long life, as contemplation of things Divine, joys not sensual, noble hopes, wholesome fears, sweet sadness, repose, sobriety, and regularity in the order of all actions. But all this is little in comparison of the Divine state wherein bodies shall not onely never end, but live eternally, impassible as Angels, subtile as rayes of light, quick as thought, and bright as stars.

Conclusion of the MAXIMS, by an advice against Libertinism, where all men are exhorted to zeal of true Religion, and the love of things eternal.

Of the obscurity and persecution of TRUTH.

INcredulity is an immortal disease, which hath reigned from the beginning of the world, and which will never end but with the worlds dissolution. Dreams and lies are many times believed, because they insinuate themselves into the heart by charms; but truth, which will never bely her self, hath much ado to make her self understood, and if she be once known, she is beloved when she smiles, and feared when she frowneth.

Four things much unknown.

There are four things have ever been much unknown in the world, time, wind, terrestrial Paradise, and truth. Time is a marvellous creature, which perpetually passeth over our heads, which numbereth all our steps, which measureth all our actions, which inseparably runs along with our life, and we have much business to know it as well in its nature as progression. It is a very strange thing that there are such as promise themselves to reckon up the years of the world, as of an old man of three-score, and yet we know by the experience of so many ages, it is a great labyrinth wherein we still begin, never to end.

Hadrianus Junius.

It was for this cause the Ancients placed the figures of Trytons on high Towrs with tails crookedly winding, to represent unto us the intrication of the foulds and compasses of time. And for this also in the Prophet Esai, the Seraphins covered the face and feet of God with their wings, to teach us (saith S. Hierome) that we are very ignorant in things done before the world, and in those which shall happen to the end of it.

Isa. 6. Hieron. in Isa.

Non est vestrum nosse tempora & momenta quæ Pater posuit in sua potestate. Actor. 1.

If we on the other side consider the wind, we cannot but sufficiently understand the commodities and discommodities of it, which have made the wise to doubt, whether it were expedient there should be winds in nature, because if their influences be good in some things, their furies are extreamly dreadfull in other. We see how upon one part the winds drench huge vessels laden with men and riches on the other, they tear up trees, they ruin and overthrow houses: We likewise find, they favourably carrie the clouds to impart showers to all the world, they purge the air, they cause a good temperature in the elements, they are the occasion of commerce and navigations, to make the riches of the world common. We cannot be ignorant of their effects. But as for their causes some commix atomes, other attribute the production of it to the Sun which rarifieth the air, other to vapours and exhalations: Others say they are the sneesing of this vast creature called the world, others think the element of the air is moved of it self. And indeed we can say nothing more certainly of it, than what the Prophet did, That God produceth the winds out of his treasures.

Senec. nat. q. l. 5.

Qui producit ventos de thesauris suis. Psal. 134. 7.

As for terrestrial Paradise, it is a question among Divines never to be ended, and which ministreth perpetual busines to all Interpreters upon Genesis. Elias Thesbites durst boldly say, that not onely the garden of pleasure was still in being, but that doubtlesly many went thither, and the passage into it lay open to them, but that charmed with the beauties and contentments of this place they never returned. Which may be refuted with as much ease as it was invented. Origen and Philo following their allegories made a mystical Paradise and true idea's of Plato, wherein they were imitated by Psellus, who saith, that Caldean Paradise, so calleth he it, was nothing else but a Quire of celestial virtues, which environed the heavenly Father, and beauties of fire issuing from fountains of the first workman.

Elias Thesbites in Verbo. Ἐμπύρια κατὰ τῶν ἀμιλλητικῶν σοφῶν.

Some

Some place it in Indie, others in Meſopotamia, where there would be much ado well to accord theſe four rivers, but that recourſe is had to the violence of the deluge. We muſt confeſs there are many things unknown, wherein God will exerciſe our faith, but not ſatisfie our curioſitie. But nothing through al ages hath been ſo hidden and unknown, as truth. The Philoſopher Heraclitus ſaid, That its Altar was in a cloudy cavern, all covered with ſhades and darkneſs, whereinto ſeldom any came. And verily we ſee, that ſince ſciences were invented, for the ſpace of ſo many Ages, we have beheld nothing but wranglings and wars among Philoſophers, who ſeeking to make diſſection of the great body of this Univerſe, have all mutually contended for the defence of truth, as they ſay: but many defending it, have ſo ill handled it, that they almoſt have diſ-membered it, and for a ſolid body, have in the end retained nought in their hands but a fantaſm. It onely appertaineth to God to produce it, and to make it known to mortals, which he out of his infinite goodneſs hath at ſundry times done: But men blinded, like unto Gyants, have ever perſecuted poor truth out of a certain ſpirit of incredulity and contradiction, the plague and poiſon of wiſdom. After the Eternal Wiſdom took lips of fleſh, to reveal the ſecrets of Heaven unto us, four ſquadrons have furiouſly aſſaulted it: The one, of Jews, the other, of Gentiles, the third, of Mahumetans, the fourth, of Hereticks. And now adays after Hereticks, we muſt adde a fifth thereto, which is that of Libertines.

Non credent mihi, neque audient vocem meam.

The Definition of Libertiniſm, the Deſcription, Diviſion, and divers effects of Libertines.

2. LIbertiniſm is nothing elſe but a falſe liberty of belief and manners, which will have no other dependence, but on peculiar fancie and paſſion. It is verily a ſtrange monſter, whereof it ſeems Job made deſcription under the figure of Behemoth, as much to ſay, as a creature compoſed of all ſorts of beaſts, of which it beareth the name. Libertiniſm likewiſe is a ſin framed out of all manner of ſins, whoſe effects it hath, to poſſeſs the miſeries. Behemoth (ſaith he) eateth hay as an Ox; and the Libertine from the table of Angels, is brought back to the ſtall of beaſts, having no other care but to ſtuff his guts with corruptible meats, having deſpiſed the immortal Manna. The one hath his ſtrength in his reins, the parts dedicated to luſt, and the other is onely vigorous for impurity. The one hath bones of braſs, and the other a heart of copper. The one makes ſhew of ſome griſtles framed of iron, the other of ſome falſe moral virtues, really nothing but iniquity. Mountains bear graſs to feed the one, and the tables of great men plenty, to entertain the other. The one ſleepeth in moiſt places under the ſhadow of reeds, and the other in victualing-houſes and idleneſs. The one threateneth to ſwallow Jordan, the river of the holy Land, and Libertiniſm will annihilate the moſt ſincere part of Chriſtianity.

Job. 40.

We may ſay of all theſe impious, what S. Cyprian did of devils: Theſe are impure and wandering ſpirits, which plunged in ſenſuality, and having loſt the happineſs of Heaven, through the contagion of earth, forlorn and corrupt, ceaſe not to ruin and corrupt.

Spiritus inſinceri & vagi non deſinunt perditi perdere, & depravati errorem pravitatis infundere. Cyprian. l. de Idol. vanitat.

Now obſerve they are not equal in malice or quality: But when I ſomewhat nearer conſider their ſtate, I find they are divided into ſix orders. The firſt comprehendeth many ſpirits, who are not of the worſt, being ſomewhat reaſonably grounded upon the principal points of Religion, but as much as they fail in all concerneth ſubmiſſion of ſpirit, ſo much are they enamoured of their own wit, and become laviſh of tongue.

Diviſion.

This often proceedeth either from birth, education, too free converſation, ſome paſſion, or from opinion of proper abilitie, which is the cauſe they cut and mangle many things very confidently, concerning the honour of the Church, and oeconomie of Religion. One while they ſtrike at the Pope's authority, another while they deſperately throw themſelves upon the multiplication of Religious Orders, ſometimes they cenſure all Eccleſiaſtical perſons, ſparing none: mean while they ſee not the ſubverſion of Religion, always began by the contempt of Prieſts. Sometimes they ſcoff at Confeſſions and frequent Communions, another time argue againſt the doctrine of Purgatorie, then they ſlight Indulgences, contemn Saints, Images, and Reliques, ſometimes declaim againſt other Ceremonies and Cuſtoms of the Church. They ordinarily ſay, Jeſus Chriſt ſufficeth them, and that beſides the bleſſed Sacrament, there is no need to take pains in other devotions.

Nay, that which more provokes and ſtrengtheneth them in their beliefs, is what they obſerve in others, who not inſiſting in the more perfect ways of the univerſal Church, create devotions to themſelves, which much incline to ſuperſtition: for neglecting the great and eſſential Maxims of our faith, they adhere to ſilly inventions of their own ſpirit: and you would almoſt ſay, the Father, the Holy Ghoſt, and the Word of God it ſelf, were nothing with them in compariſon of particular devotions of ſome Saints, or ſome ſlight obſervances, which they practiſe according to their own fancie. But if one happen to reprove them upon it, they are uncivilly offended therewith, and think ſuch as ſpeak with reaſon, are not within the compaſs of the upright judgement of faith. I affirm theſe kind of proceedings are not according to the order of the Church, the which honoureth all Saints, yea, and the bleſſed Virgin, in a degree infinitely beneath the Divine Majeſty, nor doth it honour them, but to honour God in them and by them.

But if ſome abuſe myſteries, muſt we therefore overthrow Altars? If ſome popular ſpirits ill inſtructed grow ſuperſtitious, muſt one therefore become a Libertine? Muſt innocency be forſaken the more to hate the guilty? It is a pittifull thing to ſee good ſpirits, who make profeſſion of Catholick Religion, and have in ſome things good apprehenſions of piety, to take ſuch liberty of words to themſelves, that we know not what to make of them. Ought not they to conſider, that a popular errour is one thing, and a poſition of the Church another? If ſome particulars introduce exorbitant devotions, let them reject, blame, and condemn them. We neither undertake to defend nor juſtifie them. But when we ſpeak of the invocation of Saints, of their Reliques, Canonizations, Indulgences, of the authority of our Holy Father, of the Inſtitution of Religious Orders, and ſo many ſuch like, which are authorized by general Councels and by the belief of all antiquity, doth not a good judgement ſee, that to go about to oppoſe theſe Maxims, is to do that which S. Auguſtine ſpeaketh, To ſuffer ones ſelf to run into a folly, which haſtneth to the height of inſolencie? He, who admitteth a leak in a ſhip drowns it, who divideth Religion hath none at all, who reſolves to believe this and reject that, believes nothing. All that which cometh from one ſame authority, ought to be believed with like equality. Our faith is not grounded upon natural judgement, upon wit and diſcourſe, but on the ſubmiſſion we ow to God and the Church, which is the Interpreteſs of his counſels. He who abideth therein, abides in true wiſedom, who goeth out of it, ſhall find nothing but an Ocean of diſturbances, and the ſhipwrack of his faith.

The second order of Libertines is of Neuters, wavering and distrustfull, who are almost upon the indifferencie of Religions, and hold their faith as a hawk without leashes: It quickly flies away and leaveth them, to replenish more setled brains and more capable souls. In this number you have many squeazy stomachs, who affect to be Masters in matter of Religion, and are extream greedy of all sorts of innovations. And if there be some bold spirit, who with sensual reason censureth the mysteries of our Religion, that man is according to their taste a brave fellow, and his books deserve to be bound up in gold and purple. The Bible is not wise enough for them, their spirit of rebellion findeth faults and contradictions therein. They are in search of hidden mysteries, as were the Argonautes, who went out to win the golden fleece: And could they lay hold on Mahomets Alcoran, they will not spare to read it, the more to confound themselves in the labyrinth of their errours. After they have run all over, sounded all, quoted all, they find themselves empty, and have nothing so assured as incertainty, nothing so undoubted as the loss of their faith, which they have almost wholly transformed into a cursed Neutrality, the head-long descent of a horrible precipice.

The third order comprehendeth idle loyterers, and people of the throat and kitchen, who bear in their ensign for devise, that which is said to have been inscribed on Sardanapalus his tomb: Drink, eat, fill thy self in the ordures of flesh, and think thou hast nothing but that which thou affordest to thy sensualitie. They all say with Epicurus, As for my self I cannot understand any felicitie, unless it be in palates, in lips, in ears, in the belly, and all that which is common to us with beasts. These kind of men have not so much to do as other, they are not sollicitous concerning the secrets of nature, curious books, mystical Cabals, the Gospel, not Turkish Alcoran: they have found their God in themselves, and indeed will acknowledge no other but the belly. Their continual employment is to furnish out tables for it, which are its Altars, and to offer unto it dishes and sauces in sacrifice.

Ἴστε οἷν ἐφοδιασάμενοι τὰ ἁμὰ ἡδέα. Ἀθ.

The fourth region containeth the malign, covert, and narrow observers, who yet still retain some fear of the smoke of the faggot: behold the cause, why they dare not declare themselves in open manner. They enter into the fold as wolves clothed in a sheeps skin, and tell the sheep they are much affected to their conservation, but that the dogs must be taken away, which do nothing but deafen their ears with barking both day and night. These are such as sow propositions with a double meaning, and have ever a backshop to hide themselves in; such as say, Catholick religion is good, if it were purged from so many superstitions, such as deceive young men under colour of doctrine, and when they have hit upon a curious spirit, whom they esteem retentive of a secret recommended, they draw the curtain aside, and reveal the mysteries of iniquity to him. They are such as make disguises and differences, which no man imagined, and make truth combat against Atheism with so feeble arms, that it were much better defended, to be left to its own nakedness; such as have a store-house of evil books, more impure than the stable of Augeus, out of which they derive all their profanations, cloying the ears of the simple with a thousand objections, ever made in the name of a third person, who never dreamt of them: Lastly, such as silently build the Babylon of execrable confusions.

The fifth rank comprehendeth all those, who have sold their souls to ambition, and particular interest, and have nothing of religion, but seeming and ceremonies. They are such as would make no scruple to set a foot upon the throat of their best friends, to raise their own fortune higher: Such as live fattened up with the Altar, being many times enemies of the Altar: Such as lift their children aloft with an arm of silver, through all the ways of injustice, above the heads of men, and make the Church a prey to their ambition: Such as are present at Divine Service with postures of a puppet-player: Such as go to Gods word as to a Comedy, to see and to be seen, more for Adonis than Jesus; and who in conclusion turn all piety into scoffs, retaining nothing of it, but a fantasm to serve their own ends. The sixth manner, is of such as are utterly impudent in words, and Libertines in actions, of whom the great S. Jude made a lively description: Certain men are crept in among us, reprobate and impious spirits, who apply all talents of grace and nature to lust, and to deny him that made them, to wit, our Lord Jesus Christ, Master and sole Monarch of the whole world. Then he addeth, they are such as defile their flesh, and revolt against lawfull powers; such as blaspheme the Divine Majesty. They are gluttenous, cruel, and arrogant, who onely think to satiate themselves by others hunger; clouds without water, tossed with turbulent winds; autumn-trees, barren trees, trees twice dead, trees rooted out of the territory of the Church. They are waves of an enraged sea, which foam nothing but confusions; wandering comets, to which God reserveth a tempest of darkness.

Ut introierunt quidam homines, &c. Et hi carnem quidem maculant, dominationem autem spernunt, majestatem autem blasphemant. Hi sunt in epulis suis maculæ, &c.

The Causes of Libertinism well observed by the Apostle S. Jude.

3. NOte, that this great Apostle doth here touch four sources of infidelity, which are in this very considerable. The chief and original of this corruption, is a bruitish lust, which with much infamie overfloweth as well in pleasures of the throat as sensuality, which he was willing to express by these words, when he said: The impious not onely act impurities, but are the impurities themselves. For the Libertines are true Borborites, (so were certain hereticks called) as one would say, bemired, because they naturally delighted in uncleanness; they are dissolute people, who have no other God but their belly, good cheer, and unbridled lust; from whence it cometh, their understandings clouded with bodily pleasures, thicken, and become wholly unable for things divine. The people heretofore beloved, is puffed up with fat, hath kicked against, and forsaken its Creatour, said Moses.

Jud. Epist. Job 20.

Hi sunt in epulis suis maculæ.

Incrassatus est dilectus & recalcitravit, dereliquit Deum factorem suum. Deut. 31.

Tertullian very well termeth gourmandize the palsey of the understanding: for as a body is deprived of sense and motion, by the corporal palsey, which obstructeth the nerves, so the spirit oppressed by sensuality, is wholly darkened, without any feeling of Religion, or any motion to works which concern salvation. To live in fat, is to shut up the gate of wisdom. There is a palsey of corporal pleasures, which wasteth the spirit, and a ptisick which preserves it.

Opimitas sapientiam impedit, exilitas expedit, paralysis mentem prodigit, pinguis servat. Tertul. de anim. c. 20.

Nay Oecumenius discovereth somewhat more mysterious unto us, when interpreting the word maculæ, according to the Greek σπιλάδες he saith, They are certain rocks hidden under the waves, which surprize Saylours, and cause hydeous shipwracks. This very well agreeth to Libertines, and one may call them, according to another translation; rough rocks, hollow stones, and shelves, which are the causes of so many falls. They are in feasts as gulphs in the Ocean, and overtake ere aware, spirits already possessed with the vapours of wine and meats, at which time they are most open to sottish mirth. Ah how many young men deceived by these impostures, after they have made shipwrack of reason in a tavern, have thereunto added the shipwrack of their faith! He was led as an ox to the slaughter, or as a skipping lamb, not foreseeing his captivitie, before the mortal arrow had transfixed his entrails, saith the Wiseman.

Confragosa in mari saxa, & verno sæu rupti, & tenia.

Bos ductus ad victimam, & stans lasciviens, & ignorans quod ad vincula stultus trahatur, donec transfigat sagitta guttur ejus. Prov. 7. 23

The

The second cause of infidelity, is a certain barrenness of wit, of judgement, discretion, of Christian virtues, and namely of humility, of good works, and worthy employments, and consequently a swelling of presumption, of imaginaty ability, of vanitie, of idleness, which is much supported by wicked nature, effeminate education, too free conversation, access of evil company, which render a man absolutely barren. A matter excellently well signified by these words: They are clouds without water, such kind of trees as we see in Judea, unfurnished of fruits in Autumn, and despoiled of leaves; twice dead, that is to say, quite rotten. Faith will be manured by the exercises of piety, by presence at Divine Service, by keeping of fasts, by alms, and frequentation of Sacraments: Now these wicked ones, employed in sensual pleasures and evil company, forsake all the characters of their Christianity, which maketh them by little and little fall into a great forgetfulness of God, into disdainfull pride, insupportable neglects, and into the maledictions uttered by our Saviours lips against the unfruitfull tree. Of these is understood the decree of Heaven: Earth, earth, earth, hearken to the word of God. Our Lord hath said, Write down this man as a man barren, who shall never prosper during his life.

Nubes sine aqua.

Jer. 22.29. Terra, terra, terra, audi sermonem Domini. Hæc dicit Dominus: Scribe virum istum sterilem, virum, qui in diebus suis non proſperabitur. Fluctus feri maris despumantes confusiones suas.

The third source is a tumult of enraged passions, which are waves of the sea, that vomit up their confusions; for these kind of spirits are in perpetual disturbances, nor hath the sea so many waves, as they anxieties, pride puffeth them, ambition precipitateth them, hatred gnaweth them, delights conquer them, choller burneth them, fury transporteth them, hardness of heart makes them untractable, and impudence insupportable. And being unable to restrain their passions within themselves, they throw them abroad as the froath of waves, and scum of confusions. That is it which Saint Ambrose said, interpreting a passage of Jeremie: Then is it thy ignominie, thy adulterie, thy neighing, and strangeness of thy fornication shall be seen to all the world on the mountains.

Tunc videbitur ignominia tua, & adulterium, & hinnitus, & alienatio fornicationis tuæ supra colles. Ambr. l. de Abra.

Lastly, the fourth root which rendereth their evil very desperate, is, a perpetual inconstancy, excellently compared in the passage of the Apostle to flying fires, formed in the air from exhalations of the earth. This sort of men perhaps may have qualities, which may give them some lustre according to the world, and make them appear as stars in the firmament of worldly honour, causing some to reflect on them with admiration of their wit, their eloquence, and behaviour. But they are (to speak properly) stars of earth and smoke, like unto that S. John calleth the star of worm-wood, which being not of the stars, enchased by the hand of God in celestial globes, but flying flames enkindled by some gross exhalations, proceeding perhaps from a dung-hill, fall back again on earth from whence they came. If they sometimes take certain semblances of virtue and pennance, they have no solidity in their good purposes: If they be touched and raised by some good inspiration, they are not constant, but having sowed certain rays of hope, fall back again into their mire, and falling, throw plague and poison among company.

Apoc. 8.

Crinemque volantia sydera ducunt.

Adde also to this discourse of the Apostle, two essential causes of our evils. One whereof is, that the disorder and impurity of manners being very ordinary among young men, who are children of the rich best qualified; parents, in stead of repressing of exorbitancy, by the cutting off of excess and superfluity, which is the nurse of impiety, take no other care, but to put them into abundance over head and ears, and thrust them into dignities, in the weakness of ability, and greatest strength of passions. From thence proceedeth they behold one another like little Gods, and having shaken off the yoke of obedience to men, free themselves, what they may, from the commands of the supream Master, having no other guid but temerity, nor other law, but the liberty of doing all. Blasphemies, which in the mouthes of mean ones, would be esteemed monsters, pass from their lips for braveries, and such as come to adore their fortune, are constrained for worldly respect, to offer incense to their vices. Herein it is, parents make themselves guilty of high treason to the Divine Majesty, having so ill employed their travels and watchings, as day and night to have amassed riches, which serve for sinews to impiety, and scandal to the publick.

The other cause, which much fomenteth blasphemies and irreverencies against Religion, is, that as ears are supple to hear them, so laws are greatly unprovided to punish them. Every man is pleased to revenge his particular injuries, and to reserve unto God the revenge of his own. Profane speeches, which heretofore made the faithfull tear their garments, such horrour they had to hear them, being now at this time uttered with some witty jests, flatter spirits, and being unable to gain the approbation of truth, they take it from the courtesies of men. It is to be feared, God permitteth this for vengeance of some sin, and wholly withdraws faith from these forlorn spirits, to place it among souls more purified.

Of the Ignorance and Nullitie of Libertinism.

4. I Find not any thing more intolerable, than to see impiety flatter it self with the pretext of ability, learning, and goodness of wit, since it is ever accompanied by two evil conditions, ignorance and bruitishness. What light of understanding can there be in a Libertine, who makes profession to spit against the source of light? God (saith the Scripture) is the Lord of sciences, and on him depends the good order of all our thoughts. How much the more commerce one hath with the Essence Divine, so much the more splendour he enjoyeth, as the Ancient Philosophers do assure us. We resemble those statues, which spake in that proportion as the beams of the Sun reflected into their mouthes. We cannot so much as open our lips to speak worthily of God, unless God, who made them, unloose them for his greater glory.

Ignorance and bruitishness of Libertines. Reg. 1.2.

Unumquodque tantum habes de luce, quantum retinet Esse divini. In memor. rer. difficil.

I much esteem the sentence of S. Diadocus, who saith, There is nothing more miserable, or more ignorant, than a spirit which will speak of God out of God, that is to say, who being out of the limits of faith and innocency, dares undertake to touch so high a point, as that of divinity. Now we know by expetience, the wicked are alienated both in thoughts and manners from this sovereign sanctity, and therefore we may undoubtedly resolve, they are most uncapable of sciences, and especially those which are divine, being sworn enemies of the God of sciences.

Diado. de perfect. spirit. c. 7 Nihil egentius ea mente quæ de Deo extra Deum philosophatur.

Moreover, if that be true which Avicen the Philosopher said, That immateriality is the root of spirituality, and that by how much the more a thing is discharged of matter, so much the more it is capable of intelligence, what reasonable discourse of man can one derive from a spirit, which is perpetually clouded with vapours of lust? Heraclitus in the secrets of his doctrine, required a drie soul, to render it capable of the most purified meditations of Philosophie: and can we think a spirit, which hath made a prison of its body, by pampering the flesh with all possible tenderness, will declare us the mysteries of hidden sciences? Is it not to go about to gather grapes from thorns, figs from bushes, and golden grains out of straw? And say there were some apparance of sobriety and modesty, know we not, pride is a formal obstacle to the purity of great and noble sciences, becauſe it inſtantly blind-foldeth men with the preſumption of their ability? Are we ignorant many would have become greatly knowing, had they not thought they were abſolutely perfect? Now who is more haughty or more arrogant, than a Libertine, who if peradventure he have ſome ſmattering of letters, is ſo puffed up with the opinion of his capacity, that he ſeems to himſelf to have ſlept in Sybilla's cave, to pronounce oracles, and judge all other men conſiſt of ſuperſtitions, and ideots.

A notable saying of Avicen. Immaterialitas radix spiritualitatis. Avicen. apud Capreol.

Great wits modeſt.

Great wits, who have raviſhed the world with admiration, reſemble thoſe rivers, which glide along with a peacefull majeſty, not troubling any body with their waves. But theſe pettie ſhufflers murmure like unto brooks, and vex the whole world with their tattle. If it happen they arrive to ſome perfection in humane ſciences (which is very ſeldom) they cannot command their ſpirit, which admits no other path than precipices. So that in the ſame things, wherein they take themſelves to be wiſer than other, they commit errours, and make moſt ſhamefull lapſes.

Arrogancy of Libertiniſm.

It is truly the diſgrace and tomb of humane judgement, to ſee the barbarous cenſure, which reigneth among thoſe who pretend acuteneſs; for they think ſo many worthy men, who have penetrated into the abyſs of the moſt ſublime ſciences, are ignorant of the Latin tongue: nay, if S. Auguſtine and S. Thomas might return into the world, they would be entertained in theſe quaint Academies as grooms. But if there be ſome one can make an ode, a ſonnet, a letter, can play the gentile wittie-one in company, and utter blaſphemies with philoſophie and affectation, he is the God of learning, and the Monarch of eloquence. But let a capable man ſound theſe curious fellows, good God, what empty chambers in theſe great brain-pans! What darkneſs, and what confuſions! It is ſoon found they underſtand not one ſole principle of true ſcience, and that all their learning is like a houſe, that hath guilded gates, and chambers peſtered with ſpiders. Think then what a ſhame it is, when men of quality, who affect the reputation of being judicious, proſtitute their wits to theſe gods of ſtraw and dung, and for the tuneable cadence of a rime, looſe all harmonies of faith and conſcience.

Their ignorance.

All hereticks, who make boaſt to aſſail the Church for ſo many Ages, have likewiſe made a ſhew to bring with them into this combat, ſome recommendable qualities. Some came with points of logick, other with knowledge of things natural, other with eloquence, ſome vaunted profoundneſs in Scriptures, the reſt to be verſed in the reading of Councels and holy Fathers. They who have had no excellent thing in them, have brought an auſtere countenance, and ſemblance of moral virtues. But ſuch kind of men have nothing but ignorance with bruitiſhneſs, but ſcoffing ſycophancy, but language, and the wind of infamous words. How can it then become them to talk of the Bible, and to argue upon holy Scripture, and the myſteries of our Religion? Shut up your ears againſt theſe Queſtions, if you be unable to ſtop their mouthes.

Tertul. l. 2. adverſ. Marcio. 2 Cenſores divinitatis dicentes: ſic non debuit Deus, & ſic magis debuit, &c.

Is it handſom, think you, to ſee a wretched and infamous fellow to make himſelf the cenſurer of Divinity and corrector of Scripture? God ſhould have done this and that, in ſuch and ſuch a faſhion, (ſay they:) as if any one knew what is in God, but the ſpirit of God himſelf, who is never ſo great, as when he appeareth little to humane underſtanding.

Tert. de præſcript. contra hæreſ. l. 1.

There is but one word (ſaith Tertullian) to determine all diſputations with ſuch kind of men: do but ask them whether they be Chriſtians, whether they renounce their Baptiſm and Chriſtianitie. If ſo, let them wear the turbant, or go into the Countrey of God-makers and Gentiles. But if they make profeſſion of one ſame Chriſt, and one ſame Religion with us, why do they bely their profeſſion, by the impudence of their unbridled ſpeeches.

S. Zeno ſerm. de fide. Non eſt fides ubi quæritur fides.

Faith (ſaith S. Zeno) is not faith, when it is ſought. We ſtand not in need of curioſity after Jeſus Chriſt, nor to ſearch for the Goſpel, ſaid S. Cyprians great Maſter. Should an Angel from Heaven ſpeak unto us, we are to change nothing in our belief. We have betaken us to the ſide of truth, we have a law which the Word declared unto us, which ten millions of Martyrs have ſigned with their bloud, which the beſt part of mankind profeſſeth, the wiſeſt heads of the world have illuſtrated by the light of their writings. To whom would we abandon it? To a captive ſpirit, which hath nothing great in it but ſin, nothing ſpecious but illuſion, nothing undoubted but the loſs of ſalvation.

Tertul. Nobis curioſitate opus non eſt poſt Chriſtum, nec inquiſitione poſt Evangelium.

Effects of Libertiniſm, and puniſhment of the Impious.

5. THE neglect of God, is the root of all wickedneſs, nor can there be any thing entire in a ſoul deſpoiled of the fear of God. Impiety cauſeth moſt pernicious effects in States. Firſt, for that it maketh havock of all good manners, leaving not one ſpark of virtue. Secondly, in that it draweth on the inevitable vengeance of God upon Kingdoms and Common-wealths, which ſuffer this monſter to ſtrengthen it ſelf to their prejudice.

The table of Philo of the manners of Liberines.

Philo in the Book he made, that no ſalary of an unchaſt woman ſhould be received in the Sanctuary, very wiſely concluded, when he ſhewed, that he who is a Libertine and voluptuous, having no other aim in the world, but the contentments of nature, is unavoidably engaged to all manner of vice: He becomes (ſaith he) bold, deceitfull, irregular, unſociable, troubleſom, chollerick, opiniative, diſobedient, malicious, unjuſt, ungratefull, ignorant, treacherous, giddie, inconſtant, ſcornfull, diſhoneſt, cruel, infamous, arrogant, inſatiable, wiſe in his own judgement, lives for himſelf, and is unwilling to pleaſe any but himſelf; one while profuſe, preſently covetous, a calumniatour, an impoſtour, inſenſible, rebellious, gailfull, pernicious, froward, unmannerly, uncivil, a great talker, loud, vaunter, inſolent, diſdainfull, proud, quarrelſom, bitter, ſeditious, refractory, effeminate, and above all, a great lover of himſelf.

Nay, he goes further upon the like epithets very judiciouſly, and ſheweth us the ſeeds of all evils ſpring from this curſed liberty.

Puniſhments of God upon Libertiniſm.

Now I leave you to judge, if according to the ſaying of Machiavel himſelf, the means quickly to ruin an eſtate, be to fill it with evil manners; who ſees not that Libertiniſm, drawing along with it all this great train of vices of corruptions, tendeth directly unto the utter deſolation of Empires? But beſide, there have been obſerved in all Ages hydeous puniſhments from God, cauſed by impiety over Cities, Provinces, Kingdoms, and Common-wealths, which have bred theſe diſorders.

And that you may be the better ſatisfied upon this point, I have at this time onely two conſiderations to preſent unto you, drawn from two models. In the firſt you ſhall ſee God's juſtice exerciſed before the Incarnation, upon the ſins of infidelity and irreverence towards ſacred things. In the ſecond, you ſhall behold the rough chaſtiſements of thoſe, who after the Incarnation lifted themſelves up againſt the worlds Saviour. When God was pleaſed to correct the infamous Balaam, who was a Patriarch of atheiſts and wicked ones, he commanded not an Angel to ſpeak unto him, becauſe he was a Doctour, much unſuitable to a carnal ſpirit, but he raiſed a aſs to inſtruct him, in ſo much as he was become worſe than a beaſt. It is likewiſe loſs of time to deal with Libertines by proofs derived from Schools, or from the invention of ſciences. Men as bruitiſh as themſelves ſelves muſt be made to ſpeak to them, who will put them in mind of the way they have held, and the ſalary they have received of their impieties. Firſt, I eſtabliſh this Maxim, for ſuch either, who are not yet hardened, or are too yielding and conſenting to evil company, that there are not any ſins which God hath ſo ſuddenly, and more exemplary puniſhed, than ſuch as were committed againſt Religion. The Prophet Ezechiel, a captive in Babylon under King Nebuchadnezzar, diſcovered among tempeſts and flames, that marvellous chariot, which hath ſerved for matter of queſtion to all curious digladiation for the learned, and admiration for all Ages. I ſay, the great S. Juſtine Martyr, touched the ſenſe very near, when he ſaid, that in four figures, whereof the one was of an ox, the other of a man, the third of an Eagle, the fourth of a Lion, God ſignified the divers chaſtiſements he would exerciſe upon King Nebuchadnezzar, in that from a reaſonable man he ſhould become bruitiſh, eating graſs as an ox, and that his hair ſhould grow as the ſhag of a Lion, and his body be hoary like the feathers of an eagle, worn with old age. I adde alſo to his conceit, that God by theſe repreſentations of four living creatures, ſeemed to ſay to him: O Nebuchadnezzar, whileſt thou didſt ſin onely againſt men, I came with the ſlow pace of an ox, to puniſh thy offences, I ſuffered thee with much ſweetneſs, as a man: but when thou greweſt proud, impious, atheiſtical, and tottering in the knowledge of the Divinity, I fell upon thy crowned head as the eagle upon her prey, reducing thee to a bruitiſh life; and if thou goeſt forward, I will pull thee in pieces, as if thou hadſt paſſed through the teeth of a Lion.

S. Iuſtin. in Epiſt. ad Orthodox. q. 44. An obſervation upon the chariot of Ezechiel.

This makes me ſay, that God tolerateth ſins for ſome time, which are of their own nature very enormous; but as for impieties, either he ſpeedily chaſtiſeth them in the heat of crime, or reſerveth them to unſpeakable avengements. See you not in the hiſtory of Kings, how he tolerated David, defiled with murder & adultery, nine whole months without taking notice of his fault: But ſo ſoon as Ozias took the incenſory to do an act of ſacriledge and impiety, behold him inſtantly ſtrucken with leaproſie in the moſt eminent part of his body. Why ſo? Becauſe other ſins are many times committed through infirmity, incitement, or frailty; but this which ſtrikes at Gods juriſdiction, proceeds from an adviſed and deliberate malice. Behold the cauſe wherefore God maketh arrows of all wood, and vengeance of all creatures, to puniſh it according to its demerit. Adde alſo hereunto a very remarkable proof, which is, that the Sovereign Judge, though oftentimes ſending his Prophets to ſtay the crimes of adultery, of oppreſſion, of injuſtice, and other like, ſuffered them to paſs on in an ordinary way, yet when he diſpatched meſſengers to confound idolatry and impiety, which was raiſed in Bethel by Jeroboam, he made them flie like eagles and impetuous ſtorms. This is verified in Jeroboam King of Iſrael, who began to offer incenſe to Idols, when a Prophet came out of Jeruſalem, and arrived (as the Interpreters obſerve) in Bethel before the incenſing was finiſhed, which happened in a very ſhort time. If one ask how this man of God, in leſs than the ſpace of a ſacrifice, performed about ſix leagues, (for it was as far diſtant from Bethel to Jeruſalem) it is anſwered, God bare him on the wings of winds, becauſe he went of purpoſe to deſtroy atheiſm and impiety, which was hatched among the Iſraelites. And verily being come before this ſacrilegious Altar, he cried out aloud to Jeroboam's face: O Altar, Altar, liſten; for much better is it to ſpeak to theſe ſtones, than to an Atheiſt: God hath ſaid, and it ſhall happen; an infant ſhall be born of the houſe of David, called Joſias, who ſhall ſacrifice the prieſts, which now incenſe to Idols on their own Altars, and there ſhall he turn their bones into duſt. Which was afterward performed.

2 Par. p. 26. 18

Obſervation upon the chaſtiſement of impiety.

Reg. 3. 13.

Altare, Altare, hæc dicit Dominus, &c.

I now demand, if the celeſtial Father proceeded with ſuch rigour againſt thoſe, who altered ſome ceremony of the ancient Law, that he was not contented to fall ſpeedily upon them, more ſwift than eagles and tempeſts, but cauſed bones of the dead to be taken out of ſepulchers, whereunto the right of nature had confined them, to burn and conſume them on the Altar, which they had profaned; what will become of thoſe, who ſince the venerable myſtery of the Incarnation of the Son of God, run into horrible ſins of infidelity, and trample under foot the bloud of the Teſtament? Perhaps you yet conceive not ſufficiently the greatnes of this crime, but I will make it appear unto you by a powerfull reaſon. S. Denys the Areopagite ſaith, that Being is the moſt intimate, moſt neceſſarie, moſt univerſal, and moſt perfect of all things, becauſe it containeth in eminency all perfections, which are not but participation of Being. And if this eſſence be ſtrongly rooted in all creatures, ſo that there is none but God who can annihilate it, what ſhall we ſay of the eſſence of the Sovereign Creatour, which originally containeth all eſſences; God, to ſpeak properly, being nothing but his own eſſence? There is no doubt, but it is an excellency wholly incomprehenſible. Now we muſt neceſſarily infer, that by how much the more a thing is excellent, ſo much the more the crimes which aſſail it, are puniſhable. Behold the cauſe why one cannot almoſt find pains ſuitable to Atheiſm and impiety, which reſiſt the eſſence of God.

Dionyſ. c. 1. de divin. nomin.

The horrible puniſhments of the wicked for the ſin of Impietie.

I Moreover affirm, if in a time when the Divinity was not yet fully publiſhed, it notwithſtanding inflicted fearfull puniſhments, both on the living and dead, who had before-time offended, what will become of it after the publication of the Goſpel, and the coming of the Word Incarnate, who maketh ſpeak unto us, for the confirmation of his law and word, the bloud of ſo many millions of Martyrs, who died for defence of the truth, who hath opened to us on earth ſo many mouthes of Apoſtles, Evangeliſts, Doctours, ſingular in wiſdom and ſanctity, as there are ſtars in heaven; who likewiſe gave ſpeech to ſtones and marbles of thoſe ancient Churches, to inſtruct us in our Religion? The ſtone ſhall crie out in the midſt of walls, ſaith the Prophet Habacuc.

Habac. 2. 11. Lapis de pariete clamabit.

Nay, I demand, which is the more tolerable, either to deſpiſe Joſeph in the fetters of bondage, or to offer him an affront on Pharaoh's royal chariot? Every man of judgement will tell me there is no compariſon, and that he who yielded not honour to Joſeph, being a captive, ſeemed not worthy puniſhment: but to deny him honour, when Pharaoh having placed him in a chariot of glory, cauſed to be proclaimed by a Herauld of arms, Abrec, Abrec, Let all the world bow the knee before Joſeph, was a crime of treaſon. We then inferre, if the Jews for having neglected Jeſus Chriſt in bonds, in opprobries, in torments, and the pains of the Croſs, were chaſtiſed with hydeous puniſhments to all poſterity, what may we expect for ſuch as revile heaven, and diſhonour Jeſus Chriſt in the chariot of his triumph, after they had ſeen and manifeſtly known, as by ways more than humane, that he put all the glory, power, wiſdom and ſanctity of the whole univerſe under his feet, and having now alſo after ſixteen hundred years and more, through all the parts of the habitable world, both Altars and Sacrifices, where he hath received ſervices and homages of ſo many Myters, Scepters, and Crowns, from wiſe and holy men, that it would be eaſier to number the ſands of the ſea, than to keep an account of them? But if you ſtill doubt the puniſhment of the Jews for the ſin of impietie, do but read Hiſtories both divine and humane, to be therein ſufficiently informed.

The Jews were heretofore the choſen people, and are become the reptobate. God for them drave back the waves of the read ſea, and ſuffered them to walk drie-foot between two waters, as between two chryſtal vaults, and afterward, why did he drown them ſo many times in rivers of their bloud, with ſo horrible ſlaughters, that in the whole ſiege of Jeruſalem under Titus and Veſpaſian, were reckoned according to Joſephus his calculation, eleven hundred thouſand dead? God opened to them the ſides of rocks to quench their thirſt, and afterward, why dried he up the dugs of women, who ſaw their little ones die between their arms, they unable to give them one drop of milk? God for them made Manna and clouds of Quails to ſhowr, and why afterward did he ſo afflict them with ſuch cruel and enraged a famine, that the hands of mercifull mothers ſlew and roaſted on coals their own proper children, and eat them to ſatisfie their hunger? God carried them through deſerts as upon eagles wings, and wherefore afterward did he abandon them to eagles and vultures, which ſo many times made carrion of the bodies of his children? God had given them a land ſo fat and fruitful, that it ſtreamed altogether milk and honey, and wherefore afterward had it entrails of iron, denying food to the living, yea, burial to the dead? God gave them ſtrength as a devouring fire, before which all Nations were but as ſtraw, and why afterwards became it the ſhuttle-cock of the arms of Infidels? God gave them liberty for an inheritance, and why afterward obtained they not ſo much as an honourable ſervitude? Why at the ſiege of Jeruſalem among ſo many thouſand priſoners, did they ſo much diſdain to make uſe of a Jew, that there being never a a Croſs to crucifie them, they were reſerved for beaſts to devour them, rather than derive any ſervice from them? God gave them knowledge, and wherefore afterwards became they blockiſh, idle, and ſtupid in all learning? God ordained for them the aſſiſtance and protection of Angels, and why afterward forſook they their Temple, crying out aloud: Let us depart, let us depart from hence? God deſtined to them Royalty and Empire over neighbouring Nations, and why afterward had they not one inch of land at their own diſpoſe, and eſpecially of land, where formerly Jeruſalem was built, unleſs they purchaſed it with money, onely to enjoy it one hour or two in the year, and weep over it, and bedew it with the water of their eyes, after they had ſo often moiſtened it with their bloud? God eſtabliſhed prieſt-hood to them, and afterwards what became of Jeruſalem the Holy? What became of Solomon's Temple, the miracle of the world? Where is the Propitiatory? the Table of Propoſition-bread? the Rational, which was before the peoples oracle? Where is the majeſty of High-prieſts, the comelineſs of Prelates, the perpetuity of Sacrifices? From whence comes it, that it is above fifteen hundred years ago, ſince this miſerable Nation goes wandering through the Regions of the earth, as abandoned into an eternal exile without Prieſts, without Temple, without Sacrifice, without Prince, King, or government? O eternal God, how haſt thou thrown down thy foot-ſtool! O God of juſtice, how haſt thou made deſolate thy royal Prieſthood! O God of vengeance, how haſt thou ſuffered thy Sanctuary to be profaned! Who hath ever heard ſpeech of ſuch a puniſhment? There have been adulteries, rapines, concuſſions, gluttonies, yea, and idolatries, which God hath not revenged in this manner? A captivity of three-ſcore and ten years expiated all theſe ſins, but this after fifteen hundred years, to what ſin may we attribute it, but to the neglect of the eſſence of the Word Incarnate? After the time that the Son of God ſhut his eyes, ſteeped in tears and bloud, over the miſerable Jeruſalem, he never hath opened them to afford them mercy. A Lord ſo ſweet, ſo mild, ſo clement, as that he raiſed thieves almoſt from bloud and robbery, in an inſtant to thrones of glory, for having acknowledged and confeſſed his name, ſo roughly to chaſtiſe the neglect of his authority, for the ſpace of ſo many Ages; what meaneth this, but to prove the oppoſing of the divine Eſſence of God, is a crime of all, the moſt hydeous and unſpeakable?

Vide Joſephum, & Hegeſippum, & Threnos.

Run over the Hiſtories of antiquity as long as you pleaſe, revolve in your memory all the experiences, which your Age may afford, and if you ſee the impious come to a good end, ſay, There is no cauſe of fear. Cain, their Patriarch, baniſhed from the ſight of God, lived long like a melancholy ſpirit among forreſts, with a perpetual affrightment, until Lamech took away his life: The Cainiſts were all drenched in the waters of the deluge: Pharaoh drowned in the Red-ſea: Nebuchadnezzar turned into a beaſt: Holofernes ſlain in his bed by the hand of a woman: Senacherib loſt one hundred four-ſcore and five thouſand men for a blaſphemy: Antiochus ſtrucken with a horrible maladie: Birds did eat the tongue of Nicanor, and his hand was hanged up over againſt the Temple: Heliodorus was viſibly chaſtiſed by Angels: Herodes Agrippa born from the Theater to the bed of death: The Preſident Saturninus ſtrucken blind: Hermianus eaten by worms in his Pretourſhip: Leo the fourth, all covered over with botches and carbuncles: Bamba crowned with a diadem of pitch, after his eyes were pulled out: Julian the Apoſtate ſtrucken with a dart from Heaven: Michael the Emperour, who had in his train a heap of young ſcoffers, that in ſcorn counterfeited the ceremonies of the Church, was torn in pieces as a victim, by his own ſervants: Olympius ſtrucken with thunder in a bath. And if we obſerve times more near: Rogero dragged to a lay-ſtall: Vanin burnt at Tholouſe: Alſan Calefat divided between fire and water, and ſlain by his own hand.

Tragical events of the wicked.

Great eye of God, which art ever open upon the ſins of the earth, who can ſteal himſelf from the lightning-flaſhes? Great hand of God, who thundereſt and lighteneſt perpetually over rebellious heads, who is able to reſiſt thy juſtice?

Advice to Youth, and ſuch as too eaſily give way to impietie.

O Unfortunate youth, who having received the firſt tincture of good inſtruction, after thou wert bred with ſo much care and honour by thoſe to whom thou owedſt thy birth, betrayeſt the tears of thy parents, the travels of thy teachers, and the whole hopes of the publick! How canſt thou embark thy ſelf among theſe treacherous and ignominious aſſociates? How canſt thou walk among ſo many ſhelves and precipices, not ſo much as once opening thy eyes, to behold the abyſs thou haſt under thy feet? So many heads cruſhed in pieces under the Divine vengeance, are as broken maſts and ſhivers of a ſhipwrack, advanced on the promontory of rocks, to give notice of the deplorable events they have found, whoſe examples thou ſtill purſueſt, yet thou lookeſt on them with arms acroſs, and dallyeſt in danger like a wanton victim, which leaps and skips between the ax and the knife.

God is my witneſs, I write theſe lines with a ſpirit of compaſſion, for ſo many who diſſolutely abuſe the gifts of Heaven, and if any one happen upon the reading of this, I beſeech him by the love of his ſalvation not to deſpiſe a pen, which tendereth ſo ſincere affection for the good of his ſoul.

A man who hath never ſo little reaſon, ſhould he not argue within himſelf, and ſay, Verily the harmonious monious conſent of ſo many Ages, which have upheld and reverenced a Religion innocent, pure, and holy, is not a matter of ſport. The horrible puniſhments of ſuch as ſought to diſengage themſelves from the homage due to the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt, are no fables, ſince we ſtill behold the foot-ſteps of their ruins. The lights and reflections of the Divinity, which beſet me on every ſide, are ſpeaking tongues, the conſent of ſo many Ages and holy perſonages yet alive on the earth, are no ſmall teſtimony. Theſe kind of men, who ſeek to ſow dangerous maxims in our minds, are creatures of little authority, evil manners, and of a converſation either inſolent or covert. They are neither Apoſtles nor Prophets: It is not credible, truth ſhould ſo long be hidden, to be diſcovered to them amidſt their abomination: They have neither ſanctity, miracles, nor reaſon: They are not rich but in libertinous words and blaſphemies. All they can promiſe me, is nothing elſe but a ſlight contentment of nature in this life, yet cannot they give it me: For amidſt theſe unlawfull pleaſures, I feel my conſcience much diſturbed and perplexed with remorſe: If I feared God, I ſhould find this fear would baniſh all other affrightments from my heart. Now have I that, both of men and laws, yea even of beaſt: It ſeemeth at every accident which happeneth to me, each creature becomes a ſword and an arrow of God to puniſh my evil thoughts and inordinate actions: If that be not true, which theſe men promiſe (as they make no clear proof of what they ſay) behold me then convinced of the moſt horrible crime which hath ever been; behold me the object of all the execrations that have fallen on their heads, who bent themſelves againſt God: Behold me fettered in eternal and inexplicable pains, which I ſhall eſcape neither alive nor dead. Every underſtanding man always inclineth to the ſureſt way: I ſee, that following the opinion my Anceſtours had in matter of Religion, there can happen no other evil unto me, but to be an honeſt man, to repleniſh my heart with good deſires, my thoughts with pleaſing hopes, my hands with works of juſtice, and to waſte my ſelf like a torch of aromatick wood in a life, ſatisfied with it ſelf, and laudable to poſterity: whereas going along with theſe, I walk on thorns and ice in the depth of night, not knowing who purſues me behind. Avaunt novelties, avaunt curſed impieties, farewel infamous atheiſms, adieu execrable liberty; you ſhall never be ought with me. O youth, if thou didſt well taſt theſe words, what repoſe, what contentment, what glory ſhouldſt thou acquire? O unhappy youth, which adhereſt to theſe impious and licentious companies, what wilt thou ſay, when time ſhall have taken from thee the ſcarf which now veileth thine eyes, and that thou ſhalt ſee the chaſtiſement of God, which ſhall follow thee in all thy undertakings, miſery by thy ſides, torments and pains before thee, and peoples execration over thy head? But you meek ones, and you men to halves, who endure with ſoft and flexible ears, unworthy blaſphemies againſt God, under the ſhadow of wit and pleaſant entertainment, if you have yet any vein of Chriſtianity in all your body, ought it not to bownd and leap againſt theſe criminals, who in the heat of wine and banquets, flout in your preſences at the truth of a Religion, which your Anceſtours left you with ſo much ſweat, ſuch virtues, and ſo many good examples? If you, who be men of quality and authority, perſecute even to the gates of hell, ſuch as once have offended you, when you do negligently ſuffer them to diſhonour him, who hath imprinted the ray of majeſty with his finger on your faces, do you not render your ſelves guilty of all the crimes committed through your coldneſs and neglects? God hath preſerved ſince ſo many Ages, doth, and will preſerve this Kingdom by the piety of our great King, by the zeal of his Clergie, by the prudence of his Councel and good Officers, and by the devotion of people, which are as ſincere in France as in any place of the world, enlightened with the rays of faith: But it is for impiety, that Crowns are broken, that Scepters flie in pieces, and Empires have in all times paſſed from Nation to Nation. It is I (ſaith the great God) who make Councellours fools, and Judges ſtupid; I who change the golden girdle of Kings into a coard; I who throw confuſion on the brow of Priests; I who ſupplant the greateſt, when they ſeek to overthrow true pietie. Adducet Conſilarios in ſtultum finem.

The Edict of Darius a Pagan King, which he made in favour of the Hebrews Temple, hath aſtoniſhing words, when he ſaith: What man ſoever ſhall be ſo hardie, as to change and alter my commandment for the building of the Temple of God, let a gibbet be erected for him of the ſame wood, of which his houſe is built, let it be raiſed in the ſtreet, let him be affixed thereunto, and his houſe confiſcated. This teacheth you, it is a great unhappineſs to build your houſe at the expence of Gods houſes: Rafters and beams of ſuch edifices, have many times ſerved for inſtruments of puniſhment to ſuch as raiſed them. The favours of great men, fortunes of ice, inexhauſtible riches, reputation, friends, companions, factours, lackeys, buffons, all have forſaken them as butter-flies, which eſcape the hand of a child; they are fallen through the ſin of impiety, which hath made an eclipſe of their fortune and life, in the brighteſt luſtre of their greatneſs. Omnis homo qui hanc mutaverit juſſionem tollatur lignum de domo ipſius & erigatur, & configatur in eo, & domus ejus publicetur. Eſdras.

That the Remedie of our evil conſiſteth in the, Zeal of our Faith.

6. THe Remedie of evils which turmoyl us, is wholly in our own hands, and the cure of our wounds dependeth on our own wills. Good examples and ſtrong laws may do all on ſpirits, which have not yet totally renounced their own good, nor is there any one ſo deſperate, who is not taken either by the hands of virtue, wholly made of adamant, or feareth not to fall into the chains of juſtice. Let Eccleſiaſticks, whom God hath entruſted with his bloud, his word, and his Sacraments, begin firſt of all to dart rays of ſanctity in the firmament of honour, where God hath placed them: Let ſecular men in dignities and eminent fortunes, affect zeal in Religion: Let ſuch as are ſtept far into age, bear the torch before youth: Let women endeavour to eſtabliſh piety, which is the ornament of their ſex: Let children be well bred, and trained within the laws of modeſty: Let the doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt be ſealed with the ſeal of good manners; there is no Libertine, but will be daunted at the ſight of a life led according to the laws of Chriſtianity: For it is a mirrour, which killeth baſilisks by reverberation of their proper poiſon. But if blaſphemers continue ſtill ſo impudent, as to vomit forth unclean and injurious words againſt the Religion we profeſs, have not laws, which are in the power of the Sovereign Princes on earth, and of their Miniſters of State, iron hands able to ſtay their moſt daring impudencies?

Againſt toleration.

I call you hither, O holy Prelates, O Monarchs, Princes and Potentates, who are in the world as the great Intelligences, who make the Heavens move, and who by diverſity of your aſpects, cauſe calms and ſtorms in this inferiour region wherein we live: I pray tell me, where do you think hath glory, which you naturally love, placed its throne and ſtate, if not in the boſom of true piety, By what degrees are thoſe immortal ſpirits of your Anceſtours mounted up to the joys and delights of God, having repleniſhed the earth with the veneration of their memory, if it were not by making the honour of the Sovereign

To the great-ones of all Chriſtendom.

Maſter march in the front of all their deſigns, and thinking nought theirs own, but what was acquired for God?

Apoc. 10. Remember, you are not altogether like the Angel of the Apocalyps, which beareth the Sun, and Rainbow, and all the garniſhments of glory on feet of braſs: you enjoy dignities and ſupereminencies that draw the Great-ones into admiration, aſtoniſh inferiours, attract people, evict honour and wonder from all the world: But conſider (if ſo you pleaſe) that all this is onely ſupported on feet of clay and morter. Time changeth you, cares conſume you, maladies aſſail you, death takes and deſpoileth you. They who adored you in thrones, may one day trample on you in ſepulchers.

Alas! if it happen you carry all your own intereſts with violence of paſſion to the height of your pretenſions, and that you hold Religion, and the glory of Jeſus in a perpetual contempt, what will your ſoul one day anſwer; when it leaves the body, unto the thundering voice of a living God, ſaying to you, as he did to Cyrus, in Iſaiah, Aſſimilavi te, & non cognoviſti me: I called thee by thy name, I created thee like unto my ſelf; I made thee a little God on earth, and thou haſt forgotten me. I ſo many times marched before thy ſtandards, many times have I humbled the moſt glorious of the earth for thee. I brake brazen gates, pulled down iron bars to afford thee hidden treaſures, and the wealth of Ages, which nature for thee preſerved in her boſom. The Sun ſeemed not to ſhine in the world, but to enlighten thy greatneſs, the ſeas ſurged for thee, and for thee the earth was wholly bent to honour and obedience.

Iſaiah 45.

Admirer of thy ſelf, and ignorant of Gods works, thou haſt ſo ill husbanded my goods, that thou haſt changed them all into evils; I gave thee rays, and thou haſt made arrows of them to ſhoot againſt me. Did I ſeat thee on thrones, that there thy paſſions might ſway? Did I imprint on thy forehead the character of my greatneſs, that thou mighteſt authorize crimes? Thou hadſt a feeble pretext of Religion, and haſt neglected the effects: Thy intereſts reigned, and my honour ſuffered in thy houſe. At what aimed thy ambition ſo ſtrong of wing, and ſo weak of brain, which onely thought how to envy what was above, the more to oppreſs any thing below it? What did that burning avarice, that profuſe riot, that ſpirit of bloud and fleſh, employed in the advancement of thine own houſe, to the contempt of mine? For an inch of land, a wretched matter of profit, the fantaſie of an affront, jealouſie onely ſubſiſting in a body of ſmoke, all the elements muſt be troubled, men and ſwords drawn forth for revenge, and bloud of ſo many mortals ſhed: but for my Name, which is blaſphemed, it is ſufficient to wag the finger, to ſhew onely a cold countenance, a ſlight touch of that great authority, whilſt I was neglected, having done no other fault, but to have paid ingratitudes with benefits.

O you Great-ones, who ſit at the ſtern of Churches and temporal Eſtates, how far will you become accountable to Gods juſtice, if you place not his honour in the firſt rank of all your intentions? Alas! Ought not you to entertain an ardent zeal towards the Religion which our Anceſtours conſigned unto us, with ſo many examples of piety, that Heaven hath not more ſtars, than we lights before our eyes? Can we well endure that the verities and maxims of God, which the Prophets foretold us, the Apoſtles pronounced, the Confeſſours profeſſed, the Martyrs defended in the piece-meal mangling of their bodies, amidſt combs and iron hooks, burning cauldrons, wheels armed with keen razours, ſhould now adays be the ſport of certain giddy ſpirits, and the aim of profane lips, who void of wit or ſhame, dare invade holy things? Is it not for this, O France, the beloved of God, and orient pearl of the world, thou haſt ſeen in thy boſom ſo many hoſtilities, ſuch contagions, famines, monſters, and devaſtations, that had not the arm of God ſupported thee, thou wouldſt have been long ſince drenched in irrecoverable confuſions? O you, who bear the ſword of juſtice, and have authority in your hands, will you not one day ſay: All they who have the zeal of the law, and the pietie of our Anceſtours, follow us courageouſly, for behold we are readie to revenge the quarrels of God, and to account his glorie on earth, in the ſame degree the Angels hold it in Heaven. This was the conceit of the valiant Machabee, the Prince of Gods people, who having ſeen an Apoſtate of his Nation offer incenſe to an Idol, ſlew him with his own hand on the very ſame Altar, ſaying aloud: He who hath the zeal of the law, let him follow me. Wo to me, ſince I am born to behold the deſolation of my people! Holy things are in the hands of ſtrangers: The Temple hath been handled as the moſt wicked man on earth: Our myſteries, our beauties, our glories are deſolated: To what purpoſe do I ſtill lead a miſerable life? Fathers of families, will you not ſay to your children what he did to his: Children, be ye emulatours of the law, and yield your ſouls up for the teſtament of your Anceſtours. Children, will you not anſwer what the holy Machabees did, by the lips of their elder brother: Let us die in virtue for our brethren, and not defile our glory by any crime, which may be objected againſt us.

Omnis qui zelum habet legis, ſtatuens teſtamentum ſuum, exeat poſt me.

Va mihi quia natus ſum videre contritionem populi mei! Sanctia in manu extraneorum facta ſunt, &c.

Nunc ergo filii emulatores eſtote legis, & date animas veſtras pro teſtamento Patrum.

Moriamur in virtute propter fratres noſtros, & non inferamus crimen gloriæ noſtræ.

Let war be proclaimed againſt Libertines and blaſphemers, who will ſtill perſevere with deliberate malice in their impiety: Let theſe infernal mouthes be ſtopped, and condemned to an eternal ſilence: Let the ſtandard of the Croſs be adored by all Nations, and the enemies of Jeſus diſſolved, as wax melted on the flames of burning coals, as ſmoke ſcattered in the air: Let a chaſt and ſincere worſhip of God flouriſh every where, and ſacrifices of praiſe mount to Heaven, to obtain benedictions on earth.

But you, SIR, who moſt near approch to the Kings perſon, having given ſo many teſtimonies of your prudence, your courage, and fidelity, ſeem to ſpeak unto him with the ſame tongue, which holdeth ears enchained by the charms of your eloquence, and ſay, what France pronounceth:

An Apoſtrophe of France to the King.

7. GReat King, for whom our Altars daily ſmoke in Sacrifices, and for whom our lips ceaſe not to ſend forth thankſgivings of proſperitie to Heaven. The monſters are not all as yet vanquiſhed: Behold the laſt head of Hydra, which God hath reſerved to this triumphant ſword, which the Croſs guideth, valour animateth, juſtice moderateth, and the ſtars crown. Needs muſt impietie be cruſhed under thoſe feet, which have already trampled on ſo many Dragons, and be fettered with an hundred iron chains, under the Altars we daily charge with our vows.

When Libra, the conſtellation of your birth, ariſeth, the Ram falleth. It is not time (O Monarch of flowerde-luces) that appearing on the throne of juſtice, with Ballance in hand, all ſparkling with the rays of glorie, which environ you after ſo many battels concluded by your victories, you humble the horns of this Ram of inſolent impiety, which dares ſo confidently oppoſe, both by words and actions, the Religion which crown you, the ſpirit which poſſeſſeth you, and the power which directeth you.

Alas, Alas, SIR, To what purpoſe were it to have walked on the ſmoking ruins of ſo many rebellious Cities? What would it avail to have thrown down in one Rochel, ſo many ſurly rocks with the help of ſo great, ſo faithfull, and happy counſel, and opening one gate there at your enterance, to have ſhut up a thouſand againſt factions and civil wars? What contentment could your Majeſty have by wiping away the ſweats on the Alps, you had gotten on the Ocean, and to have gathered palms palms perpetually verdant for you, as well in the frozen ice of winter, as the ſcorching heats of ſummer. If you muſt again behold at your return, that Religion you ſo often defended, trodden under the feet of impiety, wounded by ſlanderous tongues, outraged by blaſphemies, and contaminated by inſolent ſpirits, who know not God, but to diſhonour him? It now at this time preſenteth it ſelf to you with ſighs in the heart, and tears in the eyes: It ſheweth unto you the robe, which Clodovæus, Charlemaigne, and S. Lewis, your Predeceſſours, gave you with ſo much ſplendour, now torn in pieces with ſuch violence; it imploreth your aſſiſtance, it expecteth your power, it breaths an air much the more ſweet in the confidence conceived of your zeal and courage.

I call to witneſs that great Angel, which hath led you by the hand to ſo many conqueſts and triumphs, making you dreadfull to your enemies, helpfull to your Allies, awfull to your ſubjects, and amiable to all the world; it is not here where he will limit your actions, and fix the columns of your memorie. We ſtill hope quickly to ſee the day which ſhall drie up the tears of the poor, ſhall eaſe their burdens, ſhall ſweeten their pains, ſhall pour oyl on their yokes: And from whom ſhould we expect all this, but from a Prince ſo pious, ſo benign? We promiſe our ſelves to ſee a Clergie, which ſhall ſpeedily put it ſelf into ſo good a way under your favour, entirely purified from the dregs of ſimonie, ignorance, and the liberty of evil actions. Who can give us this happineſs, but a King, who hath under his heart a Temple for true piety? We ſigh for that great day, that day, which ſhall for ever waſh away the ſtains of bloud, impreſſed on the foreheads of French Nobilitie, which ſhall diſſipate diſorders, ſhall ſtop the current of ſo many diſſolutions; and what can aſſure us of it, but the certainty of your Edicts? We moſt earneſtly deſire to behold an abſolute regularitie in juſtice, and in all Officers, that a golden Age may ſhine again, which hath ſo often been varniſhed through the corruption of ſouls ſet at ſale. And who ſhall do it but a King, that from his moſt innocent years ſo much hath cheriſhed the title of Juſt, that he for it contemned the name of a Conquerour, which his valour preſented him, and of Moſt Sacred, which the veneration of his virtues afforded him. Impiety vanquiſhed, beareth the keys of all theſe hopes, nor ſhall we have any thing more to fear or deſire, when that ſhall be throughly ſuppreſſed throughout all the parts of the Kingdom.

Dear delight of Heaven, is it not for this God drew you the laſt year from the gates of a ſepulcher, and reſtored you to life, to render us all to our ſelves? Alas! Great God, what a ſtroke of thunder was the news of this maladie! What a terrour to all Cities! What aſtoniſhment in all Orders! What a wound in the heart of the whole Kingdom! Your poor France remembered the 27. day of September, made ſacred by your royal birth: It conſidered this nativitie had done to your ſtate, what the infuſion of the ſoul into a bodie; and ſaw you almoſt taken hence at the ſame time that your Majeſtie entered. It beheld all that greatneſs, and thoſe comforts readie to be ſhut up within your tomb. The Queens drenched in their deep ſorrow, could not ſpeak but by their tears and ſobs: Your good Officers diſſolved in lamentations at the foot of your bed, which was become the Altars of grief. All humane hopes were cut off by the violence of the maladie. Nothing was expected but the fatal blow, which all the world deplored, and which no man could divert.

But who knoweth not, SIR, God permitted it to let us ſee your virtues by their bright reflection. The luſtre of beautifull paintings muſt be ſuffered a little to mortifie, before we can judge of them. We could not ſufficiently know your Majeſtie in the bright ſplendours of fortune, and ſuch good ſucceſs of arms: Needs muſt we have a character from God of men afflicted, and a mark of the Croſs of Jeſus to conſummate ſo excellent qualities. And what heart was not then ſeized with admiration, when we ſaw a young King, ſo great, ſo flouriſhing, ſo awfull, to look death in the face with a confident eye, to expect it with a ſtable foot, to receive it willingly with a ſpirit infinitely peacefull: afterward to be fortified by Sacraments of the Church, with moſt exemplar devotion, and having given the laſt adieus to his good ſubjects, to go out of the world and all glorious honours, as joyfull as from a priſon? But God withdrew this ſtroke, when life held but by a ſlender threed, and heard the many prayers made throughout all France: He reſtored you to life at the ſame time he had given it you: He ſetled the pillars of this State, which then tottered over our heads: He raiſed our joys again, which were faded, and gave us that we would not looſe, to gain the whole world. It is, SIR, to tell you, you muſt perform all God requireth at your ſacred hands, and ſo to profit in ſanctitie, that the earth may one day give you in reward of piety, the Altars you have raiſed to Heaven, by the valour of your arms.

To the King of all Ages Immortal and Inviſible, to GOD alone be given honour and glory, for ever and ever.

A

THE

THE CHRISTIAN DIARY.

THE AUTHOURS DESIGN.

OF the practice of Virtues I have already ſpoken in my Book of the HOLY COURT. This is a ſmall Pattern thereof in every days action. It ſhould employ your heart, rather than your eyes or hand. It is ſhort to read, but if you practice it, you will in one day find years and ages of felicitie.

Indeed we have at this preſent many ſpiritual Books, which eccho one another. This Age is as fruitfull in words, as barren in works; Enclining to ſpeak much, to do nothing; evapourating the beſt part of wit, by pen or tongue.

Nevertheleſs, in matters of Devotion, it is apparent, that a man cannot ſay too much, that, which he can never do enough; and that in ſo great a penurie of worthy acts, we ſhould not be ſparing of good words.

I preſent you with this ſhort Treatiſe: carry it in your hand, as the clock which a great Prince wore in a Ring: it ſtriketh every hour of the day, and agreeth with Reaſon, as true dials with the Sun. If you read it with attention, you will find it great in its littleneſs, rich in its povertie, and large in its brevitie. Great books make men ſometimes more learned, ſeldom more innocent. This reduceth wiſdom to practice, and proſperity to devotion. By often reading it, and doing what it directeth, you ſhall know what it is; for it hath no other character of its worth, than that of your virtues.

THE CHRISTIAN DIARY.

The First PART.

The first SECTION.

The Importance of well ordering every Action of the day.

A Wiſe Hermit (as Pelagius a Greek Authour relates) being demanded, if the way to perfection were very long, ſaid: That the Virtues accompany one another, and if a man would himſelf, be might in one day attain to a proportionable meaſure of Divinitie. Indeed our Virtues are all conjoyned in our Actions, our Actions in the Hours, the Hours in the Day, the Days in the Moneth, the Moneths in the Year, and the Years in the Ages. Every day is a little map of our life; and the way to be ſoon perfect, is to uſe much conſideration and perfection in the performance of every days action. See here a draught thereof, the lineaments of which I have taken in part from one endued with much wiſdom, religion & integrity, whom I would willingly name, did I not fear to offend his humility, which can ſuffer all things but his own praiſes.

The ſecond SECTION.

At Waking.

THe Sun hath long ſince, for your benefit chaſed away the ſhades of night, to delight you with the ſight of the wonderfull works of God, and your curtains are yet undrawn, to entertain you with a ſhadow of death. Ariſe out of bed, and conſider, that this great ſtar, which makes you begin the courſe of this day, muſt this day run about ten or twelve millions of leagues; and you, how many ſteps will you proceed towards virtue? This unwearied Harbinger is gone to take you up a lodging in the grave; Each minute is ſo much deducted from your life. Will you not follow the counſel of the Son of God, and work while it is day? A long night will ſhortly cover you with its wings, in which you will not have the power to work.

Suppoſe every day a day in Harveſt, ſuppoſe it a Market-day; ſuppoſe it a day, wherein you are to work in a golden Mine; ſuppoſe it a ring, which you are to engrave and ennammel with your actions, to be at night preſented on Gods Altar.

Set before you the excellent conſideration of S. Bernard, That your actions in paſſing, paſs not away; for every good work is a grain of ſeed for eternal life. Say with the famous Painter Xeuxes, Æternitati pingo, I paint for eternity.

Follow the counſel of Thomas Aquinas, Do every action in the name of Jeſus Chriſt, deſiring to have the appro-approbation and good affections of all the Church, Militant and Triumphant. Do it as if the glory of God, the welfare of all the world, and your whole salvation depended on it, and as if that were to set the seal to all your works.

Contrive over night the good works you are to do the next day; on what points you are to meditate, what sin you are to vanquish, what virtue you are to practice, what business you are to do: that with a well-digested foresight, you may give birth to every thing in its own time. This is Ariadnes clew, which guides our actions in the great labyrinth of Time, without which all would go to confusion.

Be curious sometimes to know of what colour the dawning of the day is, prevent the light (as the Wiseman adviseth) to praise God. Take heed of imitating that Epicurean swine, who boasted, that he had grown old, without seeing the Sun either rise or set. It is a good custom to rise betimes, but hardly perswaded to Ladies, and those Antipodes to Nature, who change the night into day, and the day into night. The famous Apollonius being very early at Vespasian's gate, and finding him stirring, from thence conjectured, that he was worthy to govern an Empire, and said to his companion, Ἀνηρ ἄρξει, This man surely will be Emperour, he is so early.

That unto which you are to dispose the day, may be divided into four parts. Devotion, Practice of Virtues, Business, and Recreation. Devotion should bear the light, and open the door to all our actions.

As soon as you awake, make an account you are to give the first fruits of your reason, your sense, and faculties, to the Divine Majesty. Let the Memory immediately call to mind, that the works of God must be done. Let the Understanding cast an ejaculation upon its Creatour, like a flash of lightening. Let the Will enflame it self with love of him. Let the Heart let flie the burning shafts of desires and celestial affections. Let the Mouth and Tongue labour to pronounce some vocal prayer to the most blessed Trinitie. Let the Hands lift themselves up to Heaven. Let the Arms and Feet shake off the numbness of sleep, as S. Peter did his chains at the voice of the Angel. This were a beginning as it were of sacrificing our selves to God. They used to pluck the hair off the beast, and cast it into the fire, before they sacrificed it; so should we take these little actions from our uprising, as the beginning of our sacrifice.

The third SECTION.

Five good actions to begin the day.

THat Action, should be as a preparative to another more long and serious devotion, which you should perform in your Closet, as you come out of bed. If your attire be so curious, that it would require much time to dress you, it is a miserable slavery: Stay not till that be done, to give God your tribute; but clothe your self indifferently, so much as is necessary for decency and health: Then on bended knees do five things, Adoration, Thanksgiving, Oblation, Contrition, and Petition.

I will here shew you the way to frame these actions, which you may read at times: and I will adde examples and forms, taken partly out of Scripture, such as are fit to be repeated daily.

The fourth SECTION.

Of Adoration.

The first Act of Devotion.

YOu are to observe, that Praise is one thing, Honour another, Reverence another, Adoration another. Praise consists properly in words, Honour in outward signs, Reverence in inward respect; but Adoration (considered at large) comprehends all these acts with much eminence. For, Adoration is an act of Religion, whereby we do homage to the sovereignty of God with a lowly submission, which is not communicable to any creature.

This act is formed and composed of four things, which are as it were its four Elements. The first is a strong apprehension of the greatness and excellency of God. The second, a consideration of our own meanness, in comparison of that great Majesty. The third, a fervent act of the will, which at the thought hereof melts it self into respect. And the fourth, an outward expression both of the mouth and gestures of the body, testifying the resentment of our heart.

To discharge her self in this act of Adoration, the soul first conceives God, great, dreadfull, majestick; she conceives him as a sea, infinite in essence, goodness, beatitude, comprehending within himself all Being, all Good, all Truth; and not onely comprehending, but anticipating it to all eternity with an incomparable eminence.

She beholds the whole universe, in the immensity of God, like a spunge in the midst of the Ocean, an atome in the air, and a little diamond set in the highest Heaven. She acknowledgeth God to be the Foundation of all things possible, the Super-essential being of all things that are, and that are not, without whom nothing can subsist, neither actually nor potentially, and that he hath no hold which the understanding may take, to have knowledge of him. She represents God to her self, as the beginning and end of all things, the Creatour, the Founder, the Basis, the Support, the Place, the Continuation, the Bound, the Order, the Tie, the Concord, the Consummation of all creatures; who hath within himself all the good of Angels, of men, and universal Nature; who hath all glory, all dignities, all riches, all treasures, all pleasures, all comforts, all delights, all joys, all Beatitudes, as Lessius very well explains in his Treatise of Infinitie.

This soul unsatisfied, walks leisurely into these fourteen depths of greatness, which are in God; that is, Infinitie, Immensitie, Immutabilitie, Eternitie, Omnipotence, Wisdom, Perfection, Holiness, Bountie, Dominion, Providence, Mercie, Justice, and the End to which all things tend.

She considers every perfection, first absolutely, then by comparison and application, making return upon her self, and comparing this Infinitie of God with her nothing, this Immensitie with her smalness, this Immutabilitie with her inconstancy, this Eternitie with the shortness of this temporal life, this Omnipotence with her weakness, this Wisdom with her ignorance, this Perfection with her defects, this Holiness with her vice, this Bountie with her ingratitude, this Dominion with her povertie, this Providence with her stupiditie, this Mercie with her obduratenes, this Justice with her iniquity, this End to which all things tend, with the necessarie dependances which arise from her infirmities.

Here she is ravished in God, as a little pismire in the Sun, and like Aristotle, who (as it is said) being not able to comprehend the ebbe and flow of an arm of the Sea, threw himself into it: so she drowneth her self in such a multitude of wonders, not willing any longer to measure her love by the ell of her knowledge.

She is transported in this great labyrinth of miracles, otherwise than the Queen of Sheba at sight of the Palace of Solomon: and cannot at the last but break forth into an outward act, and say: My God, and my All, the God of my heart, my portion and my inheritance to all Eternitie!

The

The fifth Section.

Example of Adoration.

IN purſuit hereof you ſhall worſhip God proſtrate on the earth, ſounding like a ſmall ſtring of that great Harp, the world: offering to the Creatour the whole Univerſe, as a picture to hang up at his Altar, and reſigning your ſelf totally to his will: The Hymn of the three children in the fiery furnace, ſuiteth very well with this Act; who call all creatures (as by a catalogue) to praiſe God: or elſe take that form, which the Angels and Saints uſe in adoring this Sovereign Majeſtie.

Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almightie, which was, and is, and is to come; Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honour, and power: for thou haſt created all things, and for thy pleaſure they are and were created. Thou haſt made Heaven and earth, with all the ornaments thereof. Thou haſt compaſſed the ſea with bounds, by thy Almightie word. Thou haſt ſhut up the deep, and ſealed it by thy terrible and glorious Name. Thou makeſt the pillars of Heaven to tremble under thy feet. Thou ſtrikeſt terrour into all creatures, by the inſupportable brightneſs of thy Majeſty. Thou art in the Temple of thy holy glory; Thou beholdeſt the depths, and ſitteſt upon the Cherubims; I adore thee my God, from the center of my nothing, with all the creatures of the Univerſe; making an entire reſignation of all that I am, into thy hands; and deſiring now, and to all eternity, to depend on thy bleſſed will.

The ſixth Section.

Of Thanksgiving.

The ſecond Act of Devotion.

THis is an Act very neceſſary, conſidering the benefits that we receive continually from the hand of God: We ſhould not be like the clouds which obſcure the Sun that raiſed them; but let us rather imitate the Looking-glaſs, which returns the image ſo ſoon as the face is preſented to it.

We muſt not let ſlip any benefit proceeding from this ſovereign hand, without repreſenting to our ſelves the lively image of it in our acknowledgement. And if the Ancient Hebrews (as Joſephus relates) ſet marks and tokens, ſometimes on their arms, ſometimes at their gates, to publiſh to all the world the benefits that God hath conferred upon their families, is it not moſt fitting, that we endeavour to acknowledge in ſome manner the liberality of the Divine Majeſty.

This act conſiſteth in three things. Firſt, in the Memory, which repreſents to the Underſtanding, the benefit received; and this Underſtanding conſiders the hand that gives them, and to whom, and how, and wherefore, and by what ways, and in what meaſure. Thereupon an affectionate acknowledgement is framed in the Will, which not able to continue idle, ſpreads it ſelf into outward acts, to witneſs the fervour of its affection.

To practiſe this well, it is requiſite to make a catalogue of the benefits of God; which are contained in three kinds of goodneſs and mercy.

The firſt is, that whereby he drew this great Univerſe, out of the Chaos and darkneſs of nothing, to the light of being and life, for our ſakes creating a world of ſuch greatneſs, beauty, profit, meaſure, order, viciſſitude, continuance; and preſerving it as it were by the continual breathing of his ſpirit, affording to every thing its rank, form, propriety, appetite, inclination, ſcituation, limits, and accompliſhment. But above all, making man as a little miracle of Nature, with the adornments of ſo many pieces, ſo well ſet, to bear in his aſpect the beams of his own Majeſtie.

The ſecond bounty is, that whereby he hath decreed to raiſe in man all that is natural, to a ſupernatural eſtate.

The third, that whereby he hath raiſed the nature of man, being fallen into ſin, into miſerie, into the ſhadow of death, to innocence, bliſs, light, and eternal life.

This is the incomprehenſible myſtery of the Incarnation of the Word, which comprehends ſix other benefits; that is, the benefit of the doctrine and wiſdom of Heaven, conferred on us, the benefit of our Saviors good examples, the benefit of Redemption, the benefit of Adoption into the number of Gods children, the benefit of the treaſure of the merits of Jeſus Chriſt, the benefit of the bleſſed Euchariſt.

Beſides thoſe benefits, which are in the generality of Chriſtianity, we are to repreſent in all humility often to our ſelves, the particular favours received from God, in our birth, nouriſhment, education, inſtruction, in gifts of ſoul and body; in means and conveniences, in friends, allies, kinred; in vocation, eſtate, and profeſſion of life; in continued protection, in deliverance out of ſo many dangers, in viciſſitude of adverſities and proſperity, in guidance through the degrees of age; wherein every one in his own particular, may acknowledge infinite paſſages of the Divine Providence.

All this pouring it ſelf upon the ſoul, with conſideration of the circumſtances of each benefit, at laſt draws from the Will this act of acknowledgement, which maketh it to ſay with the Prophet David, Who am I? O Lord God, and what is my houſe, that thou haſt brought me hitherto? 2 Sam. 7. 18.

The ſeventh Section.

A Pattern of Thanksgiving.

HEreupon you ſhall give thanks for all benefits in general, and particularly for thoſe you have received at preſent, which at that time you are to ſet before you, that may ſeaſon this action with ſome new reliſh. The Church furniſheth us with an excellent form of Thanksgiving to God in the hymn Te Deum: or elſe ſay with the bleſſed ſpirits:

O God, power, and riches, and wiſdom, and ſtrength, and honour, and bleſſing, be unto thee for ever and ever.

O God, glory be to thee on high, and on earth peace, good will towards men: I bleſs thee, I worſhip thee, I give thanks to thee for thy great glory, and thy benefits, O Lord God, heavenly King, God the Father Almighty; and thou alſo O Lord Jeſus Chriſt my Saviour, onely Son of the Heavenly Father; perfect God and perfect man; Thou that takeſt away the ſins of the world, and ſitteſt at the right hand of God the Father; And thou, O Holy Ghoſt, conſubſtantial with the Father and the Son, moſt bleſſed Trinitie, receive my prayers in giving thanks.

The eighth Section.

Of Offering or Oblation.

The third Act of Devotion.

REligion and Sacrifice had their beginning in the worlds infancy, and ever ſince have been linked together by an indiſſoluble tie. God, who giveth all, will have us give to him, meaning we ſhould take out of his ſtore, that which our Nothing cannot afford. Obſerve here a thing remarkeable, That as in the Law of Moſes there were three kinds of of Sacrifice, that is, Immolations, Libations, and Victims: Immolations, which were made of the fruits of the earth; Libations, of liquours, as oyl and wine; Victims, of living creatures: so likewise God requires that we give him our actions for fruits, our affections for liquours, and our selves for victims. This is done by the act of Oblation or Offering, which is a way of sacrifice, by which we offer our selves, and all that belongeth to us, at the Altar of the Divine Majesty.

To perform this act well we must have first, a pure apprehension of the power and dominion, which God hath over us: secondly, an intimate knowledge of our own dependence upon him; considering, that we not onely have received being, and all things annexed to being, from his goodness; but that we are also sustained perpetually by his hand, as a stone in the air; and that if he should let go never so little, we should be dissolved into that Nothing, out of which we are extracted. From thence will arise an act of Justice in the will, ready to give to God that which is his: and as the Holocaust, (where the hoast was quite consumed in honour to the Divine Majestie) was heretofore the noblest of all Sacrifices; so will we imitate this excellent act of Religion, by consecrating not onely our actions and affections, but all that we are, unto God; wishing to be dissolved and annihilated for his sake, if it might be for the glory of his Divine Majestie. But if this annihilation cannot be real, we must at the least form it to our mind, in an extraordinary manner, acquiring to our selves (as much as is possible) twelve diss-engagements, wherein the perfection of the Holocaust consisteth.

The first, is a divesting our selves of all affection to temporal things, so that we no longer love any thing but for God, of God, and to God. The second, a diss-entangling from our own interest in all our actions. The third, an absolute mortifying of sensuality. The fourth, a separation from friendships sensual, natural, and acquired, that they have no longer hold on our heart, to the prejudice of virtue. The fifth, a banishing of worldly imaginations, in such a manner, that the meer representation of them, may beget aversion and horrour in us. The sixth, a discharge from worldly cares not necessary to salvation. The seventh, a deliverance from bitterness of heart and discontents which ordinarily arise from excessive love to creatures. The eighth, a valiant flight from all kind of vanity of spirit. The ninth, a contempt of sensible consolations, when God would have us to be weaned from them. The tenth, a renouncing of scruples of mind, and of our own fantasies, to follow the counsel and will of those that are superiour unto us. The eleventh, an insensibility of the troubles that happen in adversity. The twelfth, an entire mortification of judgement and will, that we follow all the inspirations of God, as true dials the Sun.

He who hath proceeded therein thus far, maketh a true annihilation of himself, and an excellent oblation of all that he is: But if you cannot give the whole tree with such perfection, yet give at least the fruits; desiring in conclusion, to offer up all your faculties, senses, functions, words, works, and all that you are; remembering that saying of S. Chrysostom, That it is the most wicked avarice, to defraud God of the oblation of our selves. Offer to the Father your memory, to fill it as a choice vessel with profitable things; to the Son your understanding, to enlighten it with eternal truth; to the Holy Ghost your will, to enkindle it with his holy flame; Say particularly to the Incarnate Word, with the devout virgin Gertrude.

The ninth Section.

The manner of offering our selves to God.

O My sweet Saviour, illuminate my intentions with thy light, and support my weakness by thy mercy: I recommend the small service which I shall do this day, to the unspeakable sweetness of thy heart; and set it from hence forward before thine eyes, to direct, correct, and perfect it. I offer it, and all that I am to thee, with my whole affection, both for my self and all the faithfull; and I offer it unto thee, in the union of that most perfect intention which thou hadst, when thou prayedst upon earth to thy Father in Heaven.

The tenth Section.

Of Contrition.

The fourth Act of Devotion.

THis is an Act exceeding necessary in so dangerous an estate, and so great frailty as we continually live in. Theodoret in his Questions upon the Scripture, saith, That there are three kinds of life, intimated by the three sorts of creatures mentioned in Abraham's sacrifice, Gen. 15. 9. There is a Natural life, represented by the four-footed beasts; a Mourning life, figured in the Turtle; a pure and innocent life, signified by the young pigeon. Natural lives are very frequent in the world; Dove-like, very rare, but there is no Dove so pure, but always needs the mourning of the Turtle.

This is the reason why we should not pray almost at no time, without stirring up some acts of Contrition. Every one knows, contrition is a detestation of sin, beyond all things most detestable, taking beginning from the love of God, and hope of his mercy, and ought always to be accompanied with a firm resolution of amendment. Its first foundation is the belief of a living God, of a God clear-sighted, of a God dreadfull in all his judgements, from whence a servile fear of the pains due to sin is begot, even in the most stupid hearts. Thunder causeth Doves to fawn, and raiseth tempests and earth-quakes in the soul. Then Hope ariseth above the horizon, scattering amorous beams, through the assured confidence we have to obtain pardon for our sins, by undergoing the yoke of Repentance. Then beginneth the love of God in the soul, to free and discharge it self of the interests of earth, that it may at last bring forth that heavenly grief, which is begot like pearls of the dew of heaven. Oh blessed a thousand-fold are they, that wash themselves with that snow water which holy Job mentioneth, Job 9. 30. and cleanse themselves in the wholesom pool of repentance!

Stir up acts of contrition often for all sins in general, and especially for those defects and imperfections, whereunto you are most subject, with a firm purpose to oppose them strongly, and by Gods help, to root them out. Say to that end, as followeth;

The eleventh Section.

A form of Contrition.

FAther, I have sinned against heaven and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son, having paid so great bountie with contempt, and so many benefits with ingratitude. I grieve not at the pains I suffer for my rebellion, but I grieve for having offended a God, who ought to be loved and honoured above all things. Where can I find punishment enough to be avenged on my self, and tears enough to wash away my offences? Father, from hence forward the face of sin shall be more hydeous to me than hell: Make me as one of thy hired servants. My God, thou art our Father, and we are nothing, but earth and dust in comparison of Thee! Thou art our Maker, and we are all but clay in thy hands. My God, be not incensed against so weak, so wicked an object. My God, have not the sins of my life past in remembrance.

The twelfth Section.

Of Petition or Requeſt.

The fifth Act of Devotion.

A Certain great Emperour coming into Ægypt, to ſhew the zeal he had to the publick good, ſaid to the Ægyptians, Draw from me as from your river Nilus; but what can be drawn from a man, but hopes, which ſwell like bubbles of water till they burſt. It is from God that we muſt draw, for he is a fountain which perpetually diſtilleth, who quenching the thirſt of all the world, hath himſelf but one, which is (ſaith Gregory Nazianzen) that all men ſhould thirſt his bounty.

We muſt neceſſarily beg of God, ſeeing our neceſſities conſtrain us, and his bounty invites us, we muſt beg of him, according as he himſelf hath taught us in the Lords Prayer, which is the ſum of all Divinity; we muſt ask in his Sons name, and with confidence to obtain. We muſt pray for the Church, for the Paſtours, for our King, for publick neceſſities, for our ſelves, for our neighbours: we muſt pray for ſpiritual and temporal bleſſings according to occaſion, as far as is lawfull. For which purpoſe it is good to have a collection of prayers for all occaſions, like a little Fort, furniſhed with all pieces of battery, to force even heaven it ſelf, with a religious fortitude, and a pious violence.

Deſire of God every morning at leaſt, That you may not offend him; That you may not want Grace, Light, and Courage to reſiſt thoſe ſins whereunto you are moſt enclined; That you may practiſe thoſe virtues that are moſt neceſſary for you: That you may be guided and governed this day by Gods providence, in all that concerns your ſoul, body, and outward things. That you may obtain new graces and aſſiſtance for the neceſſities of your neighbours, which you may then ſet before him. Say for your ſelf, and for all thoſe that concern you, this form of prayer, uſed by Thomas Aquinas.

The thirteenth Section.

A Form of Petition.

O God, give unto me, and to all thoſe whom I commend in my prayers, an Underſtanding to know thee, an affectionate Devotion to ſeek thee; a Wiſdom to find thee; a Converſation to pleaſe thee; a Perſeverance boldly to wait on thee; a Faith happily to embrace thee. My God, ſo order it, that I may be wounded with thy ſufferings in repentance, that in this life, I may uſe thy bleſſings in grace, and enjoy in the other, thy eternal joys in the boſom of Glorie. So be it.

The fourteenth Section.

Of the time proper for ſpiritual reading.

BElieve me, you ſhall do well at this time of the morning, when your mind is freeſt from earthly thoughts, to uſe ſome ſpiritual reading; ſometimes of the precepts, ſometimes of the lives of the Apoſtles and Saints, calling to mind that ſaying of Iſidore in his Book of Sentences: He that will live in the exerciſe of God's preſence, muſt pray and read frequently. When you pray, you ſpeak to God; and when you read, God ſpeaks to you; Good ſermons and good books are the ſinews of virtue.

Obſerve you not how colours (as Philoſophie teacheth) have a certain light, which in the night time is obſcured and buried (as it were) in matter: But as ſoon as the Sun riſeth, and diſplayeth his beams on ſo many beauties that languiſhed in darkneſs, he awakes them, and makes them appear in their true luſtre? So may we (truly) ſay, that we have all ſome ſeeds of knowledge, which would be quite choaked (as it were) with the vapours ariſing from our paſſions, did not the wiſdom of God (which ſpeaketh in the holy Scripture, and in good ſpiritual books) ſtir them up, and give them light and vigour to enflame the courſe of our actions to virtue. Always before you take a book in hand, invoke the Father of light to direct your reading. Read little if you have but little leiſure, but with attention: and make a pauſe at ſome ſentence, which all that day may come into your memory. You will find, that good books teach nothing but truth, command nothing but virtue, and promiſe nothing but happineſs.

The fifteenth Section.

An Abſtract of the doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt, to be uſed at the Communion.

JOhn 14.6. I am the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh to the Father, but by me.

Mark 1.15. The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: Repent ye, and believe the Goſpel.

Matth. 11.28. Come unto me all ye that labour, and are heavy laden, and I will give you reſt;

29. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me: for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye ſhall find reſt unto your ſouls.

30. For my yoke is eaſie, and my burden is light.

Matth. 7.12. All things whatſoever ye would that men ſhould do to you, do ye even ſo to them: for this is the Law and the Prophets.

John 15.12. This is my commandment, that ye love one another as I have loved you.

13. Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend.

14. Ye are my friends, if ye do whatſoever I command you.

Matth. 5.44. Love your enemies, bleſs them that curſe you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which deſpitefully uſe you, and perſecute you.

45. That you may be the children of your Father which is in Heaven: For he maketh his Sun to riſe on the evil and on the good, and ſendeth rain on the juſt, and on the unjuſt.

Luke 5.35. Be ye mercifull, as your Father alſo is mercifull.

23. Judge not, and ye ſhall not be judged: condemn not, and ye ſhall not be condemned: forgive, and it ſhall be forgiven.

30. Give, and it ſhall be given unto you.

Luke 12.15. Take heed and beware of covetouſneſs: for a mans life conſiſteth not in the abundance of the things which he poſſeſſeth.

Matth. 7.13. Enter ye in at the ſtrait-gate; for wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to deſtruction, and many there be which go in thereat.

14. Becauſe ſtrait is the gate, and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.

Matth. 10.38. He that taketh not his Croſs and followeth after me, is not worthy of me.

John 16.33. In the world ye ſhall have tribulation: but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world.

Matth. 28.20. Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world.

Matth.

Matth. 26. 41. Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation: the ſpirit indeed is willing, but the fleſh is weak.

Luke 12. 36. Let your loyns be girded about, and your lights burning.

37. And ye your ſelves like unto men, that wait for the Lord, when he will return from the wedding, that when he cometh and knocketh, they may open unto him immediately.

Luke 21. 34. Take heed to your ſelves, leſt at any time your hearts be overcharged with ſurfetting and drunkenneſs, and cares of this life.

John 5. 28. The hour is coming, in the which all that are in the grave, ſhall hear his voice,

29. And ſhall come forth, they that have done good, unto the reſurrection of life, and they that have done evil, unto the reſurrection of damnation.

The ſixteenth SECTION.

What is to be done at the Celebration of the Sacrament.

AT the Celebration of the Sacrament, you ſhall endeavour to ſtir up in your ſelf a great reverence of this incomparable Majeſtie, who cometh to fill the Sacrifice with his preſence, and ſay:

O God, diſpoſe me to offer unto Thee the merits of the life and paſſion of thy well-beloved Son. At this preſent I offer up to thee, in the union thereof, my underſtanding, my will, my memorie, my thoughts, my words, my works, my ſufferings, and conſolations, my good, my life, all that I have, and all that I can ever pretend unto.

Afterwards, at the Preface when the Prieſt inviteth all to lift up their hearts to God, or when the Angelical Hymn, called by the Ancients Triſagion, is pronounced, may be ſaid as followeth, being taken out of the Liturgies of S. James and S. Chryſoſtom.

TO thee the Creatour of all things viſible and inviſible: To thee the Treaſure of eternal bleſſings: To thee the Fountain of life and immortalitie: To thee the abſolute Lord of the whole world, be given, as is due, all praiſe, honour, and worſhip. Let the Sun, Moon, and Quires of Stars; the Air, Earth, Sea, and all that is in the Celeſtial Elementarie world, bleſs thee. Let thy Jeruſalem, thy Church, from the firſt-born thereof alreadie enrolled in Heaven, glorifie thee. Let the elect ſouls of Apoſtles, Martyrs, and Prophets; Let Angels, Arch-Angels, Thrones, Dominations, Principalities, Powers, and Virutes. Let the dreadfull Cherubims and Seraphins perpetually ſing the Hymn of thy triumphs.

Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hoſts, Heaven and Earth are full of thy glorie; Save us, O thou that dwelleſt in Heaven, the palace of thy Majeſtie.

O Lord Jeſus, thou art the everlaſting Son of the Father. When thou tookeſt upon thee to deliver man, thou clothedſt thy ſelf with fleſh in the Virgins womb. When thou hadſt overcome the ſharpneſs of death, thou didſt open unto us the Kingdom of Heaven. Thou ſitteſt at the right hand of God, in the glory of the Father, and ſhalt judge both the quick and the dead. O Lord, help thy ſervants, whom thou haſt redeemed with thy precious bloud.

As ſoon as you have received the Sacrament, ſay this prayer of S. Bernard in his Meditations upon the Paſſion.

O Heavenly Father, look down from thy Sanctuary, from the Throne of thy glory, upon the bleſſed ſacrifice, which our High Prieſt Jeſus, thy moſt innocent and ſacred Son, doth offer unto thee for the ſins of his Brethren. Pardon the multitude of our offences, and have compaſſion upon our miſeries. Hearken to the voice of the bloud of that immaculate Lamb, which crieth out to thee, and he himſelf ſtandeth before thee at the right hand of thy Majeſtie, crowned with honour and glory. Behold, O Lord, the face of thy Meſſias, who hath been obedient to thee, even unto death; and put not his bleſſed wounds out of thy ſight, nor the ſatisfaction he made for our ſins, out of thy remembrance. O let every tongue praiſe and bleſs thee in commemoration of thy infinite goodneſs, who didſt deliver thy onely Son over to death upon Earth, to make him our moſt prevalent Advocate in Heaven.

For Petition. Immediately after you have recited the Lords Prayer, ſay theſe words of the aforeſaid Liturgie.

O God, be mindfull of all Paſtours and faithfull people, dwelling in all parts of the habitable world, in the union of the Catholick Faith, and preſerve them in thy holy peace.

O God, bleſs our moſt gracious King; and his whole Kingdom; hear the prayers which we offer up at thy Altar.

O God, remember all thoſe that travel by ſea or land, and are expoſed to ſo many dreadfull dangers. Remember the many poor priſoners and exiles, who groan under the miſeries of the world.

O God, remember the ſick, and all ſuch as are in any diſcomfort of mind: Remember the many poor ſouls oppreſt with bitterneſs, who implore thy ſuccour. Remember alſo the converſion of ſo many Hereticks, Infidels, and ſinners, whom thou haſt created after thine own image.

O God, remember our Friends and Benefactours: Accept this ſacrifice for us ſinners, and let us all feel the effects of thy Mercy; drive away ſcandal, war, and hereſie; and grant us thy peace and love.

And at the end of the Communion;

O God, pour down thy graces upon us; direct our ſteps in thy ways, ſtrengthen us in thy fear, confirm us in thy love, and give us at laſt the inheritance of thy children.

It is very expedient alſo to have our devotions ordered for every day of the week.

The ſeventeenth SECTION.

Devotion ordered for the days of the Week.

WE may derive an excellent practiſe of Devotion for every day of the Week, from the Hymn of S. Ambroſe, uſed by the Church. For therein we learn to give God thanks for every work of the Creation, and to make the greater world correſpond with the leſſer.

Sunday, which is the day wherein the light was created, we ſhould render thanks to God for having produced this temporal light, which is the ſmile of Heaven, and joy of the world, ſpreading it like cloth of gold, over the face of the air and earth, and lighting it as a torch, by which we might behold his works. Then penetrating further, we will give him thanks for having afforded us his Son, called by the Fathers, The Day-bringer, to communicate unto us the great light of faith, which is (as ſaith S. Bernard) a Copy of Eternity; we will humbly beſeech him, that this light may never be eclipſed in our underſtandings, but may repleniſh us every day more and more, with the knowledge of his bleſſed will. And for this purpoſe, we muſt hear the word of God, and be preſent at Divine Service, with all fervour and purity. Take great heed that you ſtain not this day (which God hath ſet apart for himſelf) with any diſorder, nor give the firſt fruits of the week to Dagon, which you ſhould offer up at the feet of the Ark of the Covenant.

Munday, which is the day wherein the Firmanent was created, to ſeparate the celeſtial waters from the inferiour and terreſtrial; we will repreſent unto our ſelves, that God hath given us Reaſon, as a Firmament to ſeparate divine cogitations from animal; and we will pray unto him, to mortifie anger and concupiſcence in us, and to grant us abſolute ſway over all paſſions, which reſiſt the eternal Law.

Tueſday, the day wherein the waters (which before covered the whole element of Earth) were ranked in their place, and the earth appeared, to become the dwelling, nurſe, and grave of man; we will figure unto our ſelves the great work of the juſtification of the world, done by the Incarnate Word, who took away a great heap of obſtacles (as well of ignorance as of ſin) that covered the face of the whole world, and made a Church, which like a holy Land, appears laden with fruit and beauties, to raiſe us up in Faith, and to bury us in the hope of the Reſurrection, We will beſeech him, to take away all hinderances to our ſoul; (ſo many ignorances, ſins, imperfections, fears, ſorrows, cares, which detain it as in an abyſs,) and to repleniſh us with the fruits of juſtice.

Wedneſday, wherein the Sun, Moon, and Stars were created; we will propoſe unto our ſelves for object, the Beauty and Excellency of the Church of God, adorned with the preſence of the Saviour of the world as with a Sun, and with ſo many Saints, as with Stars of the Firmament; and we will humbly beſeech God to embelliſh our ſoul with light and virtue, ſuitable to its condition. Eſpecially, to give us the ſix qualities of the Sun, Greatneſs, Beauty, Meaſure, Fervour, Readineſs, and Fruitfulneſs. Greatneſs, in the elevation of our mind, above all created things, and in a capacity of heart, which can never be filled with any thing, but God: Beauty, in gifts of grace; Meaſure, to limit our paſſions; Fervour, in the exerciſe of charity; Readineſs, in the obedience we ow to his Law: Fruitfulneſs, in bringing forth good works.

Thurſday, the day wherein God (as S. Ambroſe ſaith) drew the birds and fiſhes out of the waters, the birds to flie in the air, and the fiſhes to dwell in this lower Element. We will imagine the great ſeparation which ſhall be made at the day of Gods judgement; when ſo vaſt a number of men, extracted from one and the ſame maſs, ſome ſhall be raiſed on high to people Heaven, and enjoy the ſight of God; others ſhall be made a prey to hell and everlaſting torments. And in this great abyſs and horrour of thought, we will beſeech God to hold us in the number of his elect, and to be pleaſed to mark out our predeſtination, in our good and commendable actions.

Friday, wherein the other creatures were brought forth, and man created, who was then appointed to them for a King and Governour, we will ſet before us the greatneſs, excellency, and beauty of this Man, in the Talents which God hath given him, as well of grace, as of nature. How much it coſt to make him, the hands of the Creatour being employed in his production: Hands (ſaith S. Baſil) which were to him as a womb; but how much more it coſt to make him anew, drawing forth ſo much labour, ſweat, and bloud from the Son of God, who annihilated himſelf for him, cheriſhing and foſtering him (ſaith Thomas Aquinas in his Treatiſe of Beatitude) in ſuch ſort, that one not well inſtructed by Faith, would ſay, Man were the God of God himſelf: Hereupon we will beg, that we may not fruſtrate the merit of the life of God, given to eternize ours, and we will practiſe ſome kind of mortification, to bear God in our fleſh, (as ſaith S. Paul) & to conform our ſelves to the ſufferings of the King of the afflicted.

Saturday, which is the day wherein God reſted from the Creation of the world; we will meditate upon the reſt the bleſſed enjoy in Heaven. There, is no more poverty, no ſickneſs, no grief, no care, no calumnie, no perſecution, no heat, no cold, no night, no alteration, no confuſion, no noiſe. The body reſteth five or ſix foot under ground, freed from the relapſing employments of a frail and dying life. It is in the grave, as in an impregnable fortreſs, where it no longer fears debts, ſerjeants, priſons, nor fetters. And the ſoul, when it is glorified, leadeth the life of God himſelf; a vital life, an amiable life, an inexhauſtible life, for which we muſt ſigh and labour, and beg it often of God, with the tears of our eyes, and the groans of our heart, as ſaith S. Auguſtine.

It is requiſite, the ſame day to make a review of the whole week, to examine the ſtate of your ſoul, your paſſions, affections, intentions, aims, proceedings, and progreſſions.

And eſpecially at the moneths end, to conſider diligently what God would have of us, what we of him, and what courſe we take to pleaſe both him and our ſelves: what deſire we have of perfection, what obſtacles, what defects, what reſiſtance, what means; and to mannage all our endeavours under the protection of our great Captain Jeſus Chriſt.

The eighteenth SECTION.

Devotion for the hours of the day.

THE Church likewiſe aſsigneth us a practice of Devotion for every hour of the day, if we will apply it right. For as if ſhe meant of a Chriſtian champion, to make a true Bird of the Sun, which ſaluteth that bright Star almoſt every hour, ſeeming to applaud by its ſongs, and the clapping of its wings; ſo ſhe requireth, that in imitation thereof, we looſe not God out of ſight all the day long, but keep perpetual centinel, to worſhip and pray to him.

At the break of day.

(Not to ſay any thing of our nightly exerciſe) The Church inviteth us, in the Hymn of S. Ambroſe, to ask five things: the protection of God for all that day, peace, government of the ſenſe, guard of the heart, and Mortification of the fleſh.

At the third

Hour, from the riſing of the Sun; the hour wherein the Holy Ghoſt deſcended in the likeneſs of fiery tongues upon the Apoſtles; we pray to the Holy Ghoſt ſo to repleniſh our underſtandings, our wills, our ſenſes, our hearts, our tongues, our mouthes, with vigour and flame, that we may by our good example enkindle our neighbours.

At the ſixth,

Which is noon; we look up to our Son of Juſtice, to intreat of him four things; that is, alienation from the heat of concupiſcence, mortification of anger, health of body, and peace of mind.

At the ninth,

Which is about three a clock; when the Sun is now declining towards the weſt, we caſt our eye upon our great Star, and deſire him, (as he is the immoveable Centre, about which the whole world is turned; and holdeth the beginning and continuance of light, in his hand:) firſt, to grant us a happy evening: ſecondly, a conſtancy in virtue: thirdly, a good end.

At evening.

When darkneſs draweth near, we beſeech the Divine Majeſty to gather unto him our hearts, oppreſſed with ſin, and diſtracted by ſo great diverſity of actions; to cleanſe them, and to direct them in the way of Eternity; that when we ſhall be deprived of this temporal light, we may make a ſweet retreat into into the bosom of God, who is the fountain of Intellectual light; and that having finished our life, as we have ended this present day, we may receive the prize of Beatitude.

At going to bed.

Now that darkness covereth the face of the earth, we will shelter our selves (like little birds) under Gods wing, beseeching him to keep us (according to his accustomed goodness) in his protection; to drive away evil dreams, and the illusions of night from our sleep; hindering the crafty surprizals of our adversary, who goeth up and down like a roaring Lion, besetting the sheep-fold.

These devotions are grave, authentick, and sufficient, throughly to instruct a soul that will practise them.

The nineteenth Section.

Of Confession, a very necessary Act of Devotion; and advice thereupon.

I Place Confession and Communion, amongst the weekly devotions, because for such as desire to lead a pure life, there is no excess, if at the weeks end, they acquit themselves of this duty. And although I have lately spoken enough, according to my scope, of the practise of these exercises, in Treatises upon this subject; and that to write more concerning them after so many books, were but to bring a drop of water to the river; yet am I obliged by the necessity of my design, to tell you in few words, that to make your Confession good, it ought to have the properties of a looking-glass. Solidity, lively representation, and clearness.

Solidity; 1. In going to it with much consideration of your own misery, sins and imperfections.

2. Much reverence towards the Majesty of God.

3. A reasonable examination of your conscience.

4. A dislike of your offences, more for Gods sake, than out of any other consideration.

Lively representation; 1. In avoiding confessions made by rote, which have always one and the same tune: or such as are over drie, and not sufficiently explained; or such as are too historical, and full of superfluitie.

2. In representing perspicuously the State of your soul, and succinctly discovering how you have behaved your self.

First, in those acts of devotion, which concern more particularly the Divine Service; accusing your self of impure intentions, negligences irreverences; voluntary distractions, contempt of holy things, coldness in Faith, and evil thoughts.

Secondly, towards your self; in the direction both of your interiour and exteriour, namely, in sins of vanity, pride, sensuality, intemperance, curiosity, impurity, idleness, pusillanimity, anger, envy, jealousie, quarrels, aversion, impatience, murmuring, lies, detraction, injuries, swearing, breach of promise, impertinent and idle discourse, flattery, scoffing, and mockery.

Thirdly, towards your neighbours, as well superiours and equals, as inferiours; unfolding the defects that may have happened in the duties, which Charity or Justice oblige you to render to every one according to his degree.

Here examine every word, and you shall find matter for accusation.

Clearness of Confession, consisteth in explaining your selves in simple, honest, and significant terms.

S. Bernard, in his book of the Interiour house, (which is the Conscience) hath composed a brief form of Confession, making the penitent say thus:

Father, I accuse my self, That I have been disquieted with anger, exasperated with envy, puffed up with pride, and have thereupon fallen into an inconstancy of mind, scoffings, slanders, and excesses of speech.

I accuse my self, That I have been more ready to judge my superiours, than to obey them: That being reprehended for my faults, I have murmured, and shewed my self refractory in matters of duty.

I accuse my self, That I have preferred my self before my betters; vaunting and boasting with much vanity and presumption, of all that belonged to me, and despising others with mockery and derision.

I accuse my self, That I have neglected the duty of my own charge, and ambitiously aimed at others.

I have neither had respect to obedience, nor modesty in my words, nor government in my carriage; but much self-opinion in my intentions, hardness in my heart, and vain-glory in my words.

I accuse my self, That I have been a Hypocrite, stiff in hatred and aversion from my neighbour, biting in speech; impatient of subjection, ambitious of honour, covetous of wealth, slothfull in works of Charity and Devotion, in conversation unsociable, and many times uncivil.

I accuse my self, That I have been ready to speak of the actions of others, rash in censuring, contentious in arguing, disdainful in hearing, presumptuous in informing others, dissolute in laughter, excessive in pleasures of tast, and in gaming, costly in apparel, burthensom to my friends, troublesom to the peacefull, ungratefull to those who have done me any good, harsh and imperious to such as were under my charge.

I have boasted to have done that which I did not, to have seen what I saw not, to have said what I said not, and on the contrary, have dissembled and denied to have seen what I have seen, to have said what I did say, and to have done what I did do.

I accuse my self of carnal thoughts, impure remembrances, dishonest motions, which I have not soon enough resisted.

They who live more dissolutely, shall find (as Hamartolus, a Greek Authour saith) that they have great accounts to cast up, at the audit of concupiscence: wherefore they may examine themselves concerning kisses, touchings, softness, pollutions, fornications, adulteries, abuse of marriage, and other sins called monstrous; adding also, impieties, sorceries, divinations, false oaths, perjuries, blasphemies, calumnies, contentions, disobediences, injustices, oppressions, falsehoods, thefts, usuries, sacriledges, and the like.

You must not think that there can be made a Form of Confession like a boot, fit for all legs; consciences are as faces, every one hath its diversity: what Saint Bernard hath said in general, may serve for a direction; yet must it be particularized with the circumstances, expressing the intention, quality, manner, and continuance of the vice.

The twentieth Section.

An excellent Prayer of S. Augustine, for this exercise, taken out of a Manuscript of Cardinal Seripandus.

O God, behold the stains and wounds of my sin, which I never can, nor will hide from the eyes of thy Majesty: I feel the smart of them already, in remorse of my conscience, and other sufferings ordained by thy providence for my correction; but all that I suffer, cannot equal my demerit. I onely wonder, that feeling the pain of sin so often, I still retain the malice and obstinacy of it. My weakness boweth under the burden; yet my iniquitie remaineth immoveable. My life groaneth in languishments, yet is not reformed in its works. If thou deferre the punishment, I deferre my amendment; and if thou chastise me, I can no longer endure. Whilest thou correcteſt; I confeſs my offence, but after thy viſitation I remember my ſorrows no more. As long as thou haſt the rod in hand to ſcourge me, I promiſe all; But if thou withdraw it, I perform nothing. If thou touch me, I crie out for mercy: and if thou pardon, I again provoke thee to ſtrike: O Lord God, I confeſs my miſeries, and implore thy clemency, without which there is no ſalvation for me. O God, give me what I ask of thee, though without any merit of mine, ſince without any merit of mine, thou haſt taken me out of nothing, to ask it of thee.

The one and twentieth Section.

Of Communion, the chiefeſt of all acts of Devotion; with a brief Advice concerning the practiſe of it.

AS for Receiving, remember the ſix leaves of the Lilly, which it ought to have; I mean deſire and purity, before you preſent your ſelf at it; Humility and Charity, in preſenting your ſelf; thanksgiving and newneſs of ſpirit after you have preſented your ſelf. And if you deſire to know the qualities, whereby you may diſcern a luke-warm Communion from a fervent, I ſay, that a good Communion ought to be light ſom, ſavoury, nouriſhing, & effectual. Light-ſom, in illuminating you ever more and more with the light and truth of faith, which begets in you an eſteem of divine things, and a contempt of the worldly, fading, and temporal. Savoury, in making you to reliſh in will and ſenſe, what you know by the light of underſtanding. Yet if you have not this laſt, in a tender and ſenſible devotion, be not diſcomforted at it; for ſenſible devotion will often happen to thoſe that have leaſt charity; as Richardus obſerves upon the Canticles: Affectuoſa dilectio interdum officit minùs diligentem. It is ſufficient that you have good habits of virtue in the upper region of your ſoul. Nouriſhing, in keeping your ſelf in a good ſpiritual eſtate, in good reſentments of Heavenly things, in good affections towards the ſervice of God, free from drineſs, leanneſs, and voluntary barrenneſs. Effectual, in applying your ſelf immediately to the exerciſe of ſolid virtues, humility, patience, charity, and the works of mercy; for that is the moſt undoubted mark of a good Communion.

It is good to preſent your ſelf with ſincere intentions, pondered and fitted to occurrences; communicating (as Bonaventure obſerves) ſometimes for remiſſion of ſins, ſometimes for remedy of infirmities, ſometimes for deliverance out of ſome affliction, ſometimes to obtain a benefit, ſometimes for thankſgiving; ſometimes alſo for the help of our neighbour: And laſtly, to offer up a perfect praiſe to the moſt bleſſed Trinitie, to commemorate the paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt, and to grow daily in love toward him. To this end, before you communicate, you may ſay this Prayer of Thomas Aquinas:

O Moſt ſweet Jeſus, My Lord and Maſter, O that the force of thy love, ſubtiler than fire, and ſweeter than honey, would engulf my ſoul in an Abyſs, drawing it from all inordinate affections to things beneath Heaven; that I might die with love of thee, ſince out of love thou didſt vouchſafe to die on the Croſs for me!

And after Communion, make theſe Petitions of S. Auguſtine.

O God, let me know thee; and let me alſo know my ſelf; Let the end of my deſires be ever where thou art: O God, let me bear no hatred, but to my ſelf; nor love, but to thee: and be thou the beginning, progreſs, and the end of all my actions. O God, let me humble my ſelf even to the deep, and exalt thee above the heavens; having my mind employed onely in thy praiſe. O God, let me die in my ſelf, and live in thy heart; and let me receive all that comes from thy providence, as gifts from Heaven. O God, let me perſecute my ſelf as an enemie, and follow thee as an onely friend. O God, let me have no aſſurance, but the fear of thy holy Name, nor confidence, but the diffidence of my ſelf. O God, when will the day come, when thou ſhalt take away the evil of the Temple, that I may behold thee face to face, to enjoy thee eternally?

THE SECOND PART of the CHRISTIAN DIARY.

The firſt Section.

Twelve fundamental Conſiderations of Virtue.

YOu muſt firmly believe, that the chiefeſt Devotion conſiſteth in practiſe of virtues, without which, there is neither ſolid piety, nor hope of ſalvation.

Paradiſe holds none but bleſſed ſouls, and hell the wretched; but the world, wherein we live, hath many kinds of merchants; ſome traffick with Babylon, others with Sion; ſome, through their ill trading and diſorderly carriage, go on inſenſibly to the laſt miſery, which is a baniſhment from the life of God, into an eternity of puniſhment: Others, go on in a ſtreight line, to the firſt and ſovereign happineſs, which is the viſion, fruition, and poſſeſſion of God, in an eternity of inexplicable joys. If you deſire to take this latter courſe, I would adviſe you, to ſet often before you theſe twelve Conſiderations, (which I have inſerted in my Book of the Holy Court) for in my opinion they are twelve great motives to all actions of virtue.

The firſt, is the nature and dignity of man, that is to ſay, the firſt and continual ſtudy of man ought to be man himſelf; to behold what he was, what he is, and what he ſhall be. What he was, nothing; what he is, a reaſonable creature; what he ſhall be, a gueſt either of Paradiſe, or of hell, of eternal happineſs, or of everlaſting miſery. What he is by Nature; a Maſter-piece, in which there are a thouſand ſeveral motions; a Body framed with admirable Architecture; a Soul endowed with Underſtanding, Reaſon, Wit, Judgement, Will, Memory, Imagination, and Opinion:

nion: a Soul, which in an inſtant flieth from one Pole to the other; deſcends to the centre, and mounts up to the top of the world; which in one inſtant is in a thouſand ſeveral places; which fathoms the Univerſe, without touching it; which goes, gliſters, ſparkles, which ranſacks all the treaſures and magazins of Nature, which finds out all ſorts of inventions, which frameth Arts, which governeth States, which ordereth worlds. This ſoul in the mean time ſeeth her paſſions about her, like an infinite company of dogs, barking at her happineſs, and offering on every ſide to ſeize upon her with their teeth.

Love fools her, Ambition racks her, Covetouſneſs ruſts her, Luſt enflames her, Hope tickles her, Pleaſure melts her, Deſpair depreſſes her, Anger burns her, Hatred ſowers her, Envy gnaws her, Jealouſies prick her, Revenge exaſperates her, Cruelty hardens her, Fears freeze her, and Sorrow conſumes her.

This poor ſoul (ſhut up in the body, like a bird of Paradiſe in a cage) is quite amazed to ſee her ſelf aſſailed by all this mutinous multitude: and although ſhe holds in her hand the ſcepter of government, yet ſhe often ſuffers her ſelf to be deceived, raviſhed, and dragged into a miſerable ſlavery.

Conſider alſo what man is by ſin, vanity, weakneſs, inconſtancy, miſery, and curſe. What he is made by Grace; a child of light, an earthly Angel, ſon by adoption to the heavenly Father, brother and coheir with Jeſus Chriſt, a veſſel of election, the temple of the Holy Ghoſt. What he may be by Glory; an inhabitant of Heaven, beholding then thoſe ſtars under his feet, which are now over his head; feaſted with the ſight of God, his beginning, his end, his true, onely, and original happineſs.

The ſecond, the benefits received from God, conſidered in general as thoſe of Creation, Converſation, Redemption, Vocation; and in particular, the gifts of the body, of the ſoul, of nature, of capacity, ability, induſtry, diſcretion, nobility, offices, authority, means, credit, reputation, good ſucceſs in buſineſs, and the like; which are given us from Heaven as inſtruments to work out our ſalvation. And ſometimes one of the greateſt benefits, is that which few account a benefit, to have none of all thoſe helps which lead a preſumptuous, weak, and worldly ſoul to ruin; but on the contrary, their better wants in the eſteem of the world, beget in him an eſteem of heavenly things; Man (ſeeing what he was, what he is, and what he muſt be, whence he cometh, whither he goeth, and that union with God, his beginning, is his ſcope, mark, and aim;) if he follow the dictates of his reaſon, preſently reſolveth, that no ſinew nor vein he hath, but ſhall tend to this end, to ſubdue his paſſions, and to ſerve creatures no further than he knows them available to attain to the Creatour. Serva commiſſum, expecta promiſſum, cave prohibitum. Every creature ſaith theſe three things to man: O man, preſerve that which is committed to thee, expect that which is promiſed thee, and eſchew that which is forbidden thee.

The third conſideration, is the Paſſion of the Son of God; an Abyſs of grief, reproches, annihilations, love, mercy, wiſdom, humility, patience, charity; the book of books, the ſcience of ſciences, the ſecret of ſecrets; the ſhop where all good reſolutions are forged, where all virtues are refined, where all knots of holy obligations are tied; the ſchool of all Martyrs, Confeſſours, and Saints. Our weakneſs and faintneſs proceeds onely from want of contemplating this infinite tablet. Who would once open his mouth to complain of doing too much, of ſuffering too much, of being thrown too low, too much deſpiſed, too much diſquieted, if he conſidered the life of God delivered over, and reſigned for his ſake to ſo painful labour, ſo horrible confuſions, ſo inſupportable torments? Nolo vivere ſine vulnere, cùm te video vulneratum: Oh my God! as long as I ſee thy wounds, I will never live without wound; ſaith Bonaventure.

The fourth: the examples of all the Saints who have followed the King in the high way of the Croſs. When we look upon the progreſs of Chriſtianity, and the ſucceſſion of ſo many Ages, whereſoever our conſideration ſetteth foot, it finds nothing but bloud of Martyrs, combats of Virgins, Prayers, Tears, Faſtings, Sack-cloth, Hair-cloth, Afflictions, Perſecutions of ſo many Saints, who have taken Heaven, as it were, by violence: Some there have been, who having filled graves with their limbs (torn off with engines and ſwords of perſecution) yet remained alive to endure and ſuffer in their bodies, which had more wounds than parts: Demorabantur in luce detenti, quorum membra pleni erant tumuli, ſaith Zeno. Is it not a ſhame to have the ſame name, the ſame Baptiſm, the ſame Profeſſion, and to deſire ever to tread on Roſes; to be embarqued in this great ſhip of Chriſtianity, with ſo many brave ſpirits, and to go under hatches, to ſleep, like the out-caſts and ſcorns of humane Nature?

The fifth: the peace of a good conſcience, the inſeparable companion of honeſt men; which ſugereth all their tears, which ſweeteneth all their ſharpneſs, which melteth all their bitterneſs; a continual feaſt, a portable theater, a delicious torrent of unſpeakable content, which beginneth in this world, and is often felt in this life, even in chains, priſons, perſecutions; what then will it be, when conſummated in the other life? when the curtain of the great Tabernacle ſhall be withdrawn; when we ſhall ſee God face to face; in a body impaſſible as an Angel, ſubtile as a beam of light, ſwift as the wings of thunder, bright as the Sun; and when we ſhall dwell among ſo goodly and flouriſhing a company, in a palace of ineſtimable glory; where we ſhall enjoy no life but the life of God, the knowledge of God, the love of God, as long as God ſhall be God. Neſcio quid erit, quod iſta vita non erit, ubi lucet quod non capiat locus, ubi ſonat quod non rapit tempus, ubi olet quod non ſpargit flatus, ubi ſapit quod non minuit edacitas, ubi hæret quod non divellit æternitas, ſaid S. Auguſtine. What will that life be, or rather, what will not that life be? Since all good, either is not at all, or is in ſuch a life: Light, which place cannot comprehend: Voices and muſick, which time cannot raviſh away: Odours, which are never diſſipated: a Feaſt, which is never conſumed: a Bleſſing, which Eternitie beſtoweth, but Eternity ſhall never ſee at an end.

The ſixth, is on the other ſide to conſider the ſtate of this preſent life: A true dream, which hath onely the diſturbances, but never the reſt of ſleep; a childiſh ſport, a toil of burthenſom and ever-relapſing actions; where for one roſe we meet with a thouſand thorns; for an ounce of hony a tun of gall, for apparent good, real evil: The happieſt here may number their years, but not their cares; The paths here to the higheſt honours, are all of ice, and often bordered onely by precipices. Its felicities are floating Iſlands, which always retire, when we but offer to touch them; they are the feaſt of Heliogabalus, where are many invitations, many ceremonies, many complements, many ſervices, and at the end of all this, we find a table & banquet of wax, which melts at the fire, whence we return more hungry than we came. It is the enchanted egg of Oromazes, in which that Impoſtour boaſted, that he had encloſed all the happines of the world: but broken, there was found nothing but wind. Omnia hæc conſpectui noſtro inſidioſis coloribus lenocinantur: vis illa oculorum attributa lumini, non applicetur errori, ſaith Eucherius. All theſe proſperities flatter our ſenſes with an impoſture of falſe colours: Why do we ſuffer thoſe eyes to be taken in the ſnares of errours, which are given us by Heaven to behold the light, and not to miniſter unto lying? Beſides, another thing which ſhould put us into an infinite diſlike of this preſent life, is, that we live in a time as full of diſeaſes, as old age of indiſ-positions; we live in a world extreamly corrupt, of which may be said, it is a monster, whose understanding, is a pit of darkness; his reason, a shop of malice; his will, a hell, where thousands of passions outragiously infest him; his eyes are two Conduit-pipes of fire, out of which flie sparkles of concupiscence; his tongue, an instrument of cursing; his face, a painted hypocrisie; his body, a spunge full of filth; his hands, harpies talons; and to conclude, he owns no faith, but infidelity; no Lord, but his passion; no God, but his belly; what content can there be in living with such a monster?

The seventh: If there are any pleasures in this life, they do nothing but overflow the heart slightly with a little superficial delectation. Sadness dives into the bottom of my soul, and when it is there, you would think it hath leaden feet, never to go thence; but pleasure doth onely tickle us in the outside of the skin, and then all those sweet waters run down with haste, to discharge themselves into the sea of bitterness. For this reason, Saint Augustine said, when any prosperity presented it self before his eyes, he durst not touch it; he beheld pleasure as a wandering bird, that would deceive him, and flie away as soon as he should offer to lay hold of it.

The eighth: Pleasures are begot in the sense, and like abortives die in their birth: their desires are full of disquiet; their access, of violent, forced and turbulent commotions; their satiety is seasoned with shame and repentance; they pass away as soon as they have wearied out the body, and leave it like a bunch of grapes, whose juice hath been pressed out as saith Saint Bernard. They stretch themselves out at full length, to much purpose, when they must end with this life; and it is a great chance, if even during life, they prove not executioner to him that entertains them. I see no greater pleasure in this world, than the contempt of pleasure: Nulla major voluptas, quàm voluptatis fastidium, saith Tertullian.

The ninth: He that consumeth his time in pleasures, when they slide away (like waters occasioned by a storm) findeth himself destitute and ashamed, like a Pilgrim despoiled by a Thief; so many golden harvests, which time presented to him, are passed away, and the rust of a heavy age furnished him with nothing, but sorrow for having done ill, and impotence to do well; what then remains, but to say with that miserable King, who gave away his scepter for a glass of water, Alas! Must I for so short a pleasure, loose so great a Kingdom?

The tenth: Sin always carrieth sorrow behind it, but not always true repentance: It is an extraordinary favour from God, to have time to bewail the offences of our life past, and to take that time by the foretop. Many are sent into the other world without once thinking of their departure; and some think of it at their death with many tears, but not one good act of repentance: they weep for the sins which forsake them, and not for God whom they have lost. True contrition is a hard work, how can he obtain it who hath ever falsified it? Facilius inveni, qui innocentiam servarent, quàm qui congruè pœnitentiam agerent, saith S. Ambrose.

The eleventh: Death all this while is coming on a great pace, he waits for you at all hours, in all places, and yet you cannot wait for him so much as one minute, so displeasing is this thought unto you; his sentence is more clear and perspicuous, than if it were written with the Suns beams, and yet cannot we read it; his trumpet soundeth perpetually, more audibly than thunder, and yet we hear it not. No wonder, that David, Psal. 49.4. calleth it (according to the Hebrew) a Riddle, every one beholds the Tablet, but few know the meaning: yet it is a granted truth, that we must bid a long farewel to all such things of life, as can extend no further than life it self; a granted truth, that we must inherit serpents and worms in a house of darkness: How excellent a lesson might be learned from hence! to know it once well, we must study it every day: Every where we see watches and clocks, some of gold, some of silver, others beset with precious stones; they give us notice of all hours except that which must be our last; and since they cannot strike that hour, we must make it sound in our conscience: The very instant that you are reading this, a thousand and perhaps a thousand souls, loos'd from their bodies, are presented before Gods tribunal; what would you do, if you were now to bear them company? Omnia ista contemnito quibus solutus corpore non indigebis, said Diodore: In a word, despise timely, whilest you are in the body, those things whereof you shall have no need, when you are out of the body.

The twelfth: your soul shall go forth, and of all her followers in life, shall onely be attended by good and evil: If she be surprized in sin, hell shall be her share; hell, the great lake of Gods wrath; hell, the common shore of all the filth of the world; hell, the store-house of eternal fire; hell, a bottomless depth, where there is no evil but must be expected, nor good that can be hoped.

These twelve considerations are very fit to be meditated upon monethly, at leisure.

The second Section.

Seven paths of Eternitie, which lead the soul to great Virtues.

THese twelve Considerations well weighed, make us take a serious resolution to proceed directly to good, whereof, if you desire further demonstration, Bonaventure points us out seven fair paths, and seven great gates, which lead us in a strait line to this blessed eternity: and I wish we had as much courage to follow them, as he grace to unfold them.

First, seeing the beginning of your virtue and felicity consisteth in the knowledge of God, and in the state of the next life, (of which we cannot, without some crime, be ignorant, and which we can never know, but with profit,) you must understand, that the first gate of eternity, is, To have good and sincere intentions in the performance of eternal things: To take a strong resolution to work out your salvatiõ, at what rate soever: To account all temporal things as wandering birds, which look upon us frõm a bough of some tree, make us a little chirping musick, and then flie away: To think, that to bear a vicious mind in a fair ornament of fortune, is to keep a leaden blade in an ivory sheath: To banish evil, hypocritical, impure, and mercenary intentions, throughout all the course of your life, and exercise of your charge: To go towards God: To do for God: To aim at the honour and glory of God above all things.

You are no little way on your journey, when you have gone this path. Thence you come to the second, which is, the Meditation of eternal things; wherein the Kingly Prophet exercised himself, like a stout Champion, when he said: I have considered the days of old, the years of ancient times, Psal. 77. 5. This good intention which you take to advance to Eternity, will imprint daily in your thoughts an eternal God, an eternal Paradise, an everlasting hell, an everlasting life: and as Iacobs flocks, by looking upõ the streaked rods, brought forth ring-streaked and spotted cattel, so all you do, in contemplating this eternity, will be coloured with eternity: And if any temporal pleasure, or opportunity to commit a sin, were offered, you would say as Demosthenes the Oratour, did of the beautiful Lais, when he was asked an excessive sum of money to behold her, I will not buy repentance so dear; I am not so ill a Merchant, as to sell the eternal for the temporal.

Having

Having passed through this gate, you will come to the third, which is the gate of Light, called Contemplation of Eternal things: Here is it that we see the divine things, not onely by form of argument and discourse, as if we cast up some account, but with the light of our illuminated understanding, as if we should behold with a glance of the eye, an excellent piece of some eminent Master, almost with an extasie of admiration. So Tiburtius saw Paradise, when he walked upon burning coals: so all the Saints beheld Beatitude, when amidst so many afflictions they remained immoveable, drowning the pain of their bodies, in the overflowing content of the minds.

From this step we necessarily light upon the fourth gate, which is, most fervent love of Eternal things; for as (saith Thomas Aquinas very well) the sight of temporal beauty begetteth temporal love, oftentimes filling the soul with fire and flame; so the contemplation of eternity, begetteth eternal love, which is an ardent affection towards God, and all that appertaineth to his glory; as was that of S. Mary Magdalen, who saith in Origen, That Heaven and the Angels are a burthen to her, and that she could live no longer, except she beheld him who made both Heaven and the Angels: She had crossed seas armed with monsters and tempests, without any sails, but those of her desires, to reach her Beloved: She had past through flames, and grapled a thousand times with lances and swords, to cast her self at his feet. The perfect love of God is a wonderfull Alchimie, when we have attained it, it changeth iron to Gold, ignominies to Crowns, and all sufferings to delights.

At the fifth gate, which is called the Revelation of Eternal things, God speaketh in the ear of the heart, and repleniſheth the soul with extraordinary light and knowledge, darting even here upon it (as saith Gerson) some lightening flashes of Paradise, as when a torch casteth some beams through the chinks of a door or window.

And as the knowledge of the understanding is nothing without the fervour of the will, from this gate we go on to the sixth, called the Tast of Experience, by which we begin to relish the joys of Paradise in this life, and contentments which cannot be expressed. A hundred thousand tongues may discourse to you the sweetness of honey, but you can never have such knowledge of it, as by tast; so a world full of books may tell you wonders of the science of God, but you can never understand it exactly, but by the tast of experience. True science (as Thomas Aquinas saith upon the Canticles) consisteth more in relish, than in knowledge; In sapore, non in sapere. I had rather have the feeling which a simple soul hath with God, than all the definition of Philosophers.

Lastly, the seventh gate of Eternity, is called The deifying, or divinized operation, which S. Dionysius termeth θεοειδῆ, is, when a soul worketh all its actions by eternal principles, in imitation of the Incarnate Word, and a perfect union with God. Clemens Alexandrinus called him that hath arrived at this degree, δεὸν ἐν σαρκὶ περιπολοῦντα, a little Deitie conversing in mortal flesh: and addeth, That as all good Oratours endeavour to be like Demosthenes, so our whole employment in this life must be to beget in our selves a resemblance to God; it is that wherein lies all our perfection.

The third SECTION.

Perfection, and wherein it consisteth.

NOw lest this Doctrine (which is something too sublime) should dazle your sight, and not enflame your courage, I will lay before you a more familiar Divinity, which is, that there are two kinds of Perfection, the one, of Glory, the other, of Pilgrimage. That of Glory is reserved for the next life, that of Pilgrimage is our chiefest affair in this: It is divided ordinarily into perfection of state, and perfection of operation; Perfection of state is as that of Ecclesiastical degrees and Magistrates, who are obliged by the duty of their profession, not onely to the common virtues, but also to others more eminent. Perfection of operation is that, which consisteth in good habits. Never trouble your self with the perfection of state, but live contented with that condition wherein Gods Providence hath placed you, assuring your self, that the best philosophie is to discharge your office well. It imports not upon what stuff you work, so you work well; for it is the manner, and not the matter which shall bear the prize. Great dignities are oftentimes great vizards, behind which lies no brain; and small fortunes may with little noise do such things, as are of no small value with God.

Apply your self earnestly to the perfection of operation, which consisteth in guiding the Heart, Tongue, and Hands in perfect charity. Addict your self to the practise of good and solid virtues, which produce all wonders on earth, and receive all Crowns in Heaven.

The fourth SECTION.

Virtues, and their degrees.

IF you desire to know their names, qualities, and degrees, I will tell you a wise saying of Plato: There are four kinds of Virtues; the first Purgative, the second Illuminative, the third Civil, the fourth Exemplary. The Purgative serve to cleanse our hearts of vices and imperfections, to which our depraved nature is subject. The Illuminative settle the soul in a calm, resulting from the victory we have gained over passions. The Civil encline a man to the duty he oweth his neighbour, every one according to his degree, and to a good conversation amongst men. The Exemplary are those which make the furthest progress into perfection, and may be looked upon as models, whereof the beholders are to take copy.

So order it, that your virtues may arrive at such a height, as that they may not onely purge your heart, enlighten your soul, and dispose you to good conversation, but may be as a light also to others to manifest you in them, by imitation of your good example.

I adde here in few words, the definitions and acts of virtue, by which you may direct your practise.

Prudence.

Prudence (according to Aristotle) is a virtue, which ordereth and prepareth all things that concern the ordering of our life.

Richardus de Sancto Victore assigneth to it five parts, that is, Judgement, Deliberation, Disposition, Discretion, and Moderation. Judgement discerneth the good from the bad; Deliberation teacheth how to do all things advisedly; Disposition sheweth what order we must observe; Discretion instructeth how to give way sometimes to occasions, and yield to humane infirmities, not adhering obstinately to our own opinions; Moderation holdeth the scales and measure of every affair.

The effects hereof (according to Albertus Magnus) are these; To proceed to the knowledge of God, by the knowledge of your self; to see in every thing what is best, and to embrace that; to weigh the beginnings, proceedings, and events of affairs; to take care your thoughts go not out of God, your affections be not too much employed upon creatures, your intentions tentions be without mixture; your judgement diverted from evil, and applied to good; your words polished, your actions measured, all the motions of your body well ordered: To avoid the four rocks that molest all good affairs, which are Passion, Precipitation, Vanity, and Self-opinion; To keep secrets carefully, to know, to choose, to execute.

Devotion.

Devotion, is a readiness of mind to those things which concern the service of God: the parts of it are, Adoration, Thanksgiving, Oblation, Repentance, Prayer, Mortification, Union with God by contemplation, Frequentation of the Sacrament, Conformity of will to the Divine Providence, and the zeal of souls.

Humilitie.

Humilitie, (according to Saint Bernard) is a virtue which maketh a man disesteem himself, out of a deep knowledge of himself; the chief points thereof are, To know our selves well, to prize our selves little, to flie humane applause, to preserve our senses free from itch of honour, to despise bravely all worldly things, to affect a retired life, to acknowledge and confess freely our faults, to hearken willingly to advice, to yield to others, to submit your will and judgement to obedience, to shun splendour and pomp in such things as concern our selves, to converse freely with the poor.

Povertie.

Povertie, is the moderation of covetousness, respecting temporal things, the parts whereof are, To cut off superfluities, to have no inordinate care of worldly things, to bear the want of necessities patiently, to enter into an absolute nakedness of spirit.

Obedience.

Obedience, according to Bonaventure, is a reasonable sacrifice of our own will; and according to Climachus, a life without curiositie, a voluntary death, a secure danger. The points thereof are, To perform what you are commanded readily, stoutly, humbly, indefatigably, though it be contrary to your own inclination, to make an entire resignation of your own judgement, opinion, and will; to be sent imperiously upon hard and troublesom employments, and to undergo them chearfully, without delay, excuse, or reply; to be indifferent in all things; to covet nothing, nor refuse any thing; to do nothing of your self, nor to presume; to have a greater inclination to such things as are mean and laborious, than to such as are more splendid, and less burdensom.

Chastitie.

Chastitie, is an abstinence from impure pleasures: Its parts are, purity of mind and body, vigilant guard of the senses, shunning of occasions, honesty of speech, mortification of Curiositie, exact decencie, care of our self.

Modestie.

Modestie, is a composure of your self, consisting in government of the whole body, gesture, attire, play, recreation, but especially of the tongue, which is to be restrained from detraction, contention, boasting, disclosing of secrets, idleness, imprudence, importunitie, irreverence, affected silence.

Abstinence.

Abstinence, is a virtue which moderates the concupiscence that relateth to delectation of sense: The parts thereof are, To have no rule but necessity, in all which concerneth the pleasures of the body; to fear the very least stains of all those things, which reason counteth dishonest, and to preserve your self in a holy bashfulness; to observe the Fasts commanded, and to adde some out of private devotion; to put far from you all curiosity of diet, apparel, and sensual pleasures.

Fortitude.

Fortitude, is a virtue which confirms us against the pusillanimity that may hinder good actions: It hath two arms, one to undertake, the other to suffer: Aristotle assigneth it four parts, that is, confidence, patience, love of labour, and valour, Patience.

Patience, is an honest suffering of evils incident to nature: The points thereof are, To bear the loss of goods, sickness, sorrows, injuries, and other accidents with courage; neither to complain, nor to groan, but discreetly to conceal your grief; to be afflicted in innocency for justice sake, and sometimes, even by those that are good, to covet and embrace persecutions, out of a generous desire to be conformable to the patience of the Saviour of the world.

Justice.

Justice, is a virtue which giveth to every one that which is his due; and all the acts of it are included in this sentence, You must measure others by the same measure wherewith you desire to be measured your self.

Magnanimitie.

Magnanimitie, according to Thomas Aquinas, is a virtue which aimeth at great things, by the direct means of reason: The acts thereof are, To frame your self to an honest confidence, by purity of heart and manners; to expose your self reasonably to difficult and dreadfull exploits for Gods honour; neither to be bewitched with prosperitie, nor dejected at adversitie; not to yield to opposition; not to make a stay at mean virtues; to despise complacence and threats for love of virtue; to have regard onely to God, and for his sake to disesteem all frail and perishable things: to keep your self from presumption, which often ruins high spirits, under colour of Magnanimitie.

Gratitude.

Gratitude, is the acknowledgement and recompence (as far as lies in our power) of benefits received. The acts thereof are, To preserve the benefit in our memory, to profess and publish it, to return the like without any hope of requital.

Amitie.

Amitie, is a mutual good will, grounded upon virtue and communitie of goods: The acts thereof are, To choose friends by reason for virtues sake, communicating of secrets, bearing with imperfections, consent of wills, a life serviceable and officious, protection in adversities, observance of honesty in every thing, care of spiritual profit, accompanied with necessary advice, in all love and respect.

Simplicitie.

Simplicitie, is nothing but union of the outward man with the inward: The acts thereof are, To be free from all false colour, never to lie, never to dissemble, ſemble, or counterfeit, never to preſume, to ſhun equivocation and double ſpeech, to interpret all things to the beſt, to perform buſineſs ſincerely, to forgo multiplicity of employments and enterprizes.

Perſeverance.

Perſeverance, is a conſtancy in good works to the end, through an affection to purſue goodneſs and virtue. The acts thereof are, firmneſs in good, quietneſs in ſervices, offices, and ordinary employments, conſtancy in good undertakings, flight from innovations, to walk with God, to fix your thoughts and deſires upon him; neither to give way to bitterneſs, nor to ſweetneſs, that may divert us from our good purpoſes.

Charitie toward God and our neighbour.

Charitie, the true Queen of virtues, conſiſteth in love of God and our Neighbour; the love of God appeareth much, in the zeal we have of his Glory; the acts thereof are, to embrace mean and painfull things, ſo they conduce to our Neighbours benefit; To offer the cares of your mind, and the prayers of your heart unto God for him; To make no exceptions againſt any in exerciſe of your charge; to make your virtues a pattern for others; To give you what you have, and what you are, for the good of ſouls, and the glory of God; to bear incommodities and diſturbances, which happen in the execution of your dutie, with patience; Not to be diſcouraged in ſucceſsleſs labours; To pray fervently for the ſalvation of ſouls; to aſſiſt them to your power, both in ſpiritual and temporal things; to root out vice, and to plant virtue and good manners in all who have dependence on you.

Charitie in Converſation.

Charitie in the ordinary courſe of life, conſiſteth in taking the opinions, words and actions of our equals in good part; To ſpeak ill of no man, to deſpiſe none, to honour every one according to his degree, to be affable to all, to be helpfull, to compaſſionate the afflicted, to ſhare in the good ſucceſs of the proſperous, to bear the hearts of others in your own breaſt; to glory in good deeds, rather than ſpecious complements, to addict your ſelf diligently to works of mercy.

Degrees of Virtues.

Bonaventure deciphers unto us certain degrees of Virtue, very conſiderable for practiſe; his words are theſe:

It is a high degree in the virtue of Religion, continually to extirpate ſome imperfection; a higher than that, to encreaſe always in Faith; and higheſt of all, to be inſatiable for matter of good works, and to think you have never done any thing.

In the virtue of Truth, it is a high degree to be true in all your words; a higher, to defend Truth ſtoutly; and higheſt, to defend it to the prejudice of thoſe things which are deareſt to you in the world.

In the virtue of Prudence, it is a high degree, to know God by his creatures; a higher, to know him by the Scriptures; but higheſt of all, to behold him with the eye of Faith.

It is a high degree to know your ſelf well; a higher, to govern your ſelf well, and to be able to make good choice in all enterprizes: and the higheſt, to order readily the ſalvation of your ſoul.

In the virtue of Humilitie, it is a high degree to acknowledge your faults freely; a higher, to bow with the weight, like a tree laden with fruit: the higheſt, to ſeek out couragiouſly humiliations and abaſements, thereby to conform your ſelf to our Saviours life.

It is a high degree (according to the old Axiom) to deſpiſe the world: a higher, to deſpiſe no man: yet a higher, to deſpiſe our ſelves: but higheſt of all, to deſpiſe deſpiſal. In theſe four words you have the full extent of Humility.

In Povertie, it is a high degree to forſake temporal goods: a higher, to forſake ſenſual amities: and higheſt, to be divorced from your ſelf.

In Chaſtitie, reſtraint of the tongue, is a high degree: guard of all the ſenſes, a higher: undefiledneſs of body, a higher than that: puritie of heart, yet a higher: and baniſhment of pride and anger, which have ſome affinity with uncleanneſs, the higheſt.

In Obedience, it is a high degree to obey the Law of God: a higher, to ſubject your ſelf to the commands of a man, for the honour you bear your Sovereign Lord: yet a higher, to ſubmit your ſelf, with an entire reſignation of your opinion, judgement, affection, will; but higheſt of all, to obey in difficult matters, gladly, couragiouſly, and conſtantly even to death.

In Patience, it is a high degree to ſuffer willingly, in your goods, in your friends, in your good name, in your perſon: a higher, to bear, being innocent, the exaſperations of an enemy, or an ungratefull man: a higher yet, to ſuffer much and repine at nothing: but higheſt of all, to go to meet croſſes and afflictions, and to embrace them as liveries of Jeſus Chriſt.

In Mercy, it is a high degree, to give away temporal things: a higher, to forgive injuries: the higheſt, to oblige them who perſecute us.

It is a high degree to pitie all bodily afflictions; a higher, to be zealous for ſouls: and higheſt to compaſſionate the torments of our Saviour, in remembering his Paſſion.

In the virtue of Fortitude, it is a high degree, to overcome the world: a higher, to ſubdue the fleſh: the higheſt, to vanquiſh your ſelf.

In Temperance, it is a high degree to moderate your eating, drinking, ſleeping, watching, gaming, recreation, your tongue, words, and all geſtures of your body; a higher, to regulate your affections; and higheſt, to purifie throughly your thoughts and imaginations.

In Juſtice, it is a high degree, to give unto your Neighbour that which belongeth to him; a higher, to exact an account of your ſelf: and higheſt, to offer up to God all ſatisfaction, which is his due.

In the virtue of Faith, it is a high degree to be well inſtructed in all that you are to believe: a higher, to make profeſſion of it in your good works: and higheſt, to ratifie (when there is neceſſitie) with the loſs of goods and life.

In the virtue of Hope, it is a high degree, to have good apprehenſions of Gods power: a higher, to repoſe all your affairs upon his holy providence: a higher than that, to pray to him and ſerve him inceſſantly, with fervour and purity: but higheſt of all, to truſt in him, in our moſt deſperate affairs.

Laſtly, for the virtue of Charitie, which is the accompliſhment of all the others, you muſt know, there are three kinds of it: The firſt the beginning Charitie. The ſecond, the proficient. The third, the perfect.

Beginning Charitie, hath five degrees. 1. Diſlike of offences paſt. 2. Good reſolution of amendment. 3. Reliſh of Gods Word. 4. Readineſs to good works. 5. Compaſſion of the ill, and joy at the proſperity of others.

Proficient Charity, hath five degrees more. 1. An extraordinary puritie of Conſcience, which is cleanſed by very frequent examination. 2. Weakneſs of concupiſcence. 3. Vigorous exerciſe of the faculties of the inward man. For, as good operations of the exteriour ſenſes are ſigns of bodily health; ſo holy occupations of the underſtanding, memory, and will, are ſigns

ſigns of a ſpiritual life. 4. Ready obſervance of Gods law. 5. Reliſhing knowledge of Heavenly Truth, and Maxims.

Perfect Charity, reckoneth alſo five other degrees. 1. To love your enemies. 2. To receive contentedly, and to ſuffer all adverſities couragiouſly. 3. Not to have any worldly ends, but to meaſure all things by the fear of God. 4. To be diſ-entangled from all love to creatures. 5. To reſign your own life, to ſave your neighbours.

The fifth Section.

Of four Orders of thoſe who aſpire to Perfection.

NOw conſider what virtues, and in what degree you would practiſe; for there are four ſorts of thoſe who aſpire to perfection.

The firſt are very innocent, but little valiant in exerciſe of virtues. The ſecond have beſides innocency, courage enough to employ themſelves in worldly actions, but they are very ſparing towards God, and do meaſure their perfections by a certain Ell, which they will upon no terms exceed; like the ox of Suſis, that drew his uſual number of buckets of water out of the Well very willingly, but could by no means be brought to go beyond his ordinary proportion. The third order is of the Fervent, who are innocent, couragious, and virtuous, without reſtriction, but they will not take charge of others, ſuppoſing they are troubled enough with their own bodies; wherein they may be often deceived. The fourth rank comprehends thoſe, who having with much care profited themſelves, do charitably refreſh the neceſſities of their neighbour, when they are called to his aid; thinking, that to be good onely to ones ſelf, is to be in ſome ſort evil.

Obſerve what God requires of you, and emulate the moſt abundant graces. But if the multiplicity of theſe degrees of virtue perplex your mind, I will ſhew you a ſhorter and eaſier way to perfection.

The ſixth Section.

A ſhort way to Perfection, uſed by the Ancients.

THe Ancients were accuſtomed to reduce all virtue to certain heads; and ſome addicted themſelves with ſo much fervour, and perfection, to the exerciſe of one ſingle virtue, as poſſeſſing that in a ſupream degree, by one link onely they drew inſenſibly the whole chain of great actions. One dedicated all his lifes ſtudy to government of the tongue, another to abſtinence, another to meekneſs, another to obedience. So that at the death of a holy man, named Orus (as Pelagius relates) it was found, he had never lied, never ſworn, never ſlandered, never (but upon neceſſity) ſpoken. So Phaſius (in Caſſian) ſaid upon his death-bed, that the Sun had never ſeen him take his refection; for he faſted every day until ſun ſet. So John the Abbot profeſſeth, that the Sun had never ſeen him angry, that he had never done his own will, nor ever had taught others any thing, which he had not firſt practiſed himſelf. To arrive at this, requires much fortitude of ſpirit. If you deſire things more imitable, be aſſured you ſhall lead a good life, if you endeavour continually to practiſe theſe three words, To abſtain, To ſuffer, To go forward in well doing, as S. Luke ſaith, in the Acts of the Apoſtles of the Son of God. To abſtain. 1. By refraining from all unlawful things, and ſometimes even from lawful pleaſures, through virtue. 2. By mortifying concupiſcence, anger, deſire of eſteem and wealth. 3. By well ordering your ſenſes, your will, your judgement, and obtaining always ſome victory over your ſelf, by the maſtery of your paſſions. To ſuffer. 1. By enduring the burdens of life with patience, eſteeming your ſelf happy to partake of our Saviours ſufferings, which are the nobleſt marks of your Chriſtianity. 2. By endeavouring to uſe a ſingular meekneſs in bearing with the oppreſſions and imperfections of others. 3. By undergoing (with advice) ſome bodily auſterities. 4. By keeping your foot firm in the good you have already begun; For, (as old Marcus the Hermit ſaid) The wolf and ſheep never couple together, nor did change and diſlike ever make up a good virtue. To go forward in well-doing. By becoming ſerviceable and obliging to all the world, every one according to his degree: but above all, having a catalogue of the works of mercy, as well ſpiritual as temporal, continually before your eye; as a leſſon, wherein you muſt be ſeriouſly examined, either for life or death eternal. And for this purpoſe ſome Saints had theſe words (in ſtead of all books) in their Libraries.

Viſito, Poto, Cibo, Redimo, Tego, Colligo, Condo, Conſule, Caſtiga, Solare, Remitte, Fer, Ora.

To	Viſit	To	Teach
	Quench thirſt		Counſel
	Feed		Correct
	Redeem		Comfort
	Cloath		Pardon
	Lodge		Suffer
	Bury		Pray.

Mans beſt knowledge is how to oblige man; the time will come when death ſhall ſtrip us to the very bones, and leave us nothing but that, which we have given for God.

The ſeventh Section.

The way to become perfect.

TO this end you muſt keep a perpetual watch over your actions, and be like a Seraphim, beſet all over with eyes, and lights, as Baſſarion ſaid: you ſhall perceive your progreſſion in virtue, when you begin, purged from greater ſins, to be fearfull of the leaſt; when you feel your ſelf looſed from ardent deſires of intereſt and honour; when your tongue is reſtrained from ſlander and vanity; when your heart is more purified in its affections, and that you draw near to indifferency.

The means to make your ſelf thus perfect, is, firſt, to be enflamed with a fervent deſire of perfection; ſecondly, not to neglect the extirpation, even of the ſlighteſt imperfections; thirdly, to have a good directour, who may be to you as the Angel Raphael was to young Tobias, and withal, to confer very often with ſpiritual men, and to be warned by their good example; fourthly, to make, as it were, a noſe-gay of flowers out of the lives of Saints, to take from it, odour and imitation; fifthly, to become conſtant in good purpoſes, and to offer them up to God, as by the hands of our Saviour, Jeſus Chriſt.

The eighth Section.

How we muſt govern our ſelves againſt temptations, tribulations and Obſtacles occurring in the way of virtue.

FInally, ſeeing in the practiſe of virtue we muſt ever be ready armed to overthrow the power of our our adversary, and to further our own affairs of salvation, call to mind these twelve maxims, which I propose against such obstacles as may happen.

The way to resist temptation, is, not to frame your self to a spiritual insensibility, unmoved with any thing; that is hard to attain, so sensible is self-love, and to have it, were to be stone, not man; it is not to expel one temptation by another, and to do one evil, to be delivered from another: for to take that course were to wash your self in ink. It is not to hide your self upon all occasions, and never to do good, for fear of fighting with evil, but to resist stoutly as I shall shew you. The great Scholar, Joannes Picus Mirandula, hath collected twelve remarkble Maxims, the practise whereof is exceeding profitable, when we address our selves to spiritual combat against weakness.

The first Maxim. That you must be tempted on what side soever it happen: In hoc positi sumus: It is our profession, our trade and continual exercise. The eagle complaineth not of her wings, neither the Nightingale of her voice, nor the Peacock of his train, because these are natural to them; and it is as natural to a man to be tempted, as to a bird to flie, to sing, to prune her feathers. If you desert the course of spiritual life through fear of being tempted, and turn about to worldly delights, assure your self you will be much more engaged; and which is worse, without comfort, honour, or recompence; you forsake a cross of paper, which if you knew well how to carrie, would be no heavier burthen than feathers to a bird; you forsake it I say, to take up another which is hard, toilsome, and bloudy, and will make you of one confraternity with the bad thief. Sidonius Apollinaris relateth, how a certain man named Maximus, arriving by unlawfull and indirect means at the top of honour, was the very first day much wearied, and fetching a deep sigh, said thus, Fœlicem, te Damocle, qui non longius uno prandio regni necessitatem toleraſti. O Damocles, how happy do I esteem thee for having been a King but the space of a dinner! I have been one a whole day, and can bear it no longer.

The second. Remember, that in the affairs of the world, we fight longest, we work hardest, and reap least; the end of one labour is the beginning of another; in pains taking the onely hope is ever to take pains; and temporal labour doth many times pull after it eternal punishment.

The third. Is it not direct folly to believe there is a Paradise, an eternal life, and a Jesus Christ, who, of the Cross, made a ladder, to get up to his throne of glory, and yet to desire to live here with folded arms? to see the master open the way to heaven through so many thorns, and the servant unwilling to tread on any thing but flowers? to see a fresh and tender limb, to a head worn away with sufferings, like a brazen Colossus with feet of flax?

The fourth. Were there no other fruit in tribulation but conformity with Jesus Christ, who is the Sovereign wisdom, yet were it a high recompence. A famous captain said to a souldier dying with him, hadst thou been obscure all thy life, yet art thou not a little honoured to day, in dying with thy master; and who would not glory, to have the Son of God for his leader, his companion, his spectatour, his theatre, his reward in all afflictions and Tribulations? who would not account it a great honour, to be crucified daily with him? to stretch his hands and arms upon the Cross, by restraining them from violence, rapine, and ruin, whereunto we are carried away by the spirit of lying? to fetter his feet, by hindering them from running after the unbridled desires of his heart? to embitter his tongue, by overcoming the pleasures of the taste? to annihilate himself, by despising honour after his example, who when he might have walked upon the wings of the Cherubims, would rather creep amongst us like a little worm of the earth? what a glorie were it, to say with S. Paul, I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus, Gal. 6. 17.

The fifth. Not to put any trust in humane means, when you undertake to subdue a temptation; It is not a thing depending wholly upon us; God must go before, and we contribute our will; for if he watch not over us, to much purpose is it for us to keep centinel. None is so weak as he that thinks himself strong. Multa in homine bona fiunt, quæ non facit homo. Nulla verò facit homo bona quæ non Deus præstet ut faciat homo saith the councel of Orange. Many good things are done in man, which man doth not; But man doth not any good which God doth not. He that thinks to resist temptations without his aid, is like one that would go to the wars, and stumbles at his own threshold. And therefore an effectual means in this combat, is to insist much on prayer, especially at the first assault of a temptation.

The sixth. When you have overcome a temptation, take heed of unbending and softening your courage, as if you had no more enemies to encounter. As distrust is the mother of safety, so security is the gate of danger. If the enemy goeth up and down continually like a roaring Lion, be you on the other side a watchfull Lion in the centinels of the Lord of hoasts; and take for your word, super speculam Domini ego sto; I stand upon the watch-tower of the Lord.

The seventh. Rest not satisfied onely with not being beaten your self, but beat your enemy: when Satan layes a snare to entrap you, make it an instrument of virtue; if he present a good work, which glisters in the sight of the world, thereby to tempt you to pride, do the work, and let alone the vanity; referring all to the greater honour of God.

The eighth. When you are in combate, fight chearfully, as if you were already assured of the victory. Turn away the eye of your consideration from what you suffer, and keep it continually fixt upon the reward. One great misfortune, which causeth many to fall when they are tempted is, that their mind is set and bent so wholly upon the pain, that no room in it is left to contemplate the reward which waits for them. When the fourty Martyrs were in the frozen lake, thirty nine looked upon their future Crowns, but one of them thought of nothing but his pain; all were victorious, except this wretch, who sullying the glorie of patience, came out of the pool, to die presently after in infidelity. Do you not think, the glorious mirrour, wherein he beheld all his sufferings Crowned, was that which comforted our Saviour on the Cross in that Abyss of reproch and torment. This is the course you must take; to insist little on the present, and to have a lively imagination of the future, bearing these words of S. Paul always in mind, Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, 2. Cor. 4. 17. Fight then valiently, as if this were the last temptation which should assail you; and perswade your self, that herein consisteth the evidence of your predestination. When you have overcome it, behave your self like one always ready to re-enter the list, and to make one victory the step to another.

The ninth. Though you are never so valiant, do not provoke danger; tempt not temptation, by thrusting your self into occasions, through presumption of heart: he that loveth danger, shall instead of finding glory, mark out his grave in it.

The tenth. A Sovereign means to overcome temptation, is to discover the Mine betimes; to open your heart freely to your spiritual counsellour, to disclose your thoughts, to know them well, to consider their nature, and to seek what power they have upon your soul. It happens commonly as Epictetus saith; It is not the things themselves, that trouble us, but our own fancies. How many temptations might be vanquiſhed by ſlighting them; if we took but a little leiſure to laugh at them? We make elephants of flies, and of little pigmies, which pinch us by ſtealth, ſtrange giants. We are like young children, who frighted with a vizard, hide their heads in their nurſes boſom, crying; but take off the vizard, and give it them in their hand, they will make ſport with it. How many things ſeem terrible and impoſſible, which we find ridiculous, and eaſie to be overcome, if we touch them never ſo little with our finger? In temptations of puſillanimity, it is good to conceive theſe counterfeit giants, as pigmies; but in thoſe of concupiſcence, we muſt not deſpiſe any thing, but rather lay hold of ſmall threads, as if they might grow to huge cables. In the one and the other, there is nothing like daſhing theſe children of Babylon againſt the ſtones; to withſtand beginnings, and not to ſuffer our enemies to fortifie themſelves to our diſadvantage. The eleventh. A ſtumbling block to many is, that they repreſent the ſweetneſs of ſin to the like in their imagination, and never conſider the pleaſure which follows victory over ſin. A man is no ſooner plunged in the puddle, but his aſhamed ſoul is immerſed in penſiveneſs, melancholly, and deſpair by a loathſom pleaſure, which paſſeth away like the dream of a dream, furniſhed with a huge heap of ſcorn, ſorrow, and confuſion. Whereas on the contrary, the ſoul which hath held out, remains contented, ſprightly, elevated, and fed with divine comforts, coming from Gods paradiſe. On this thought (which S. Cyprian highly commendeth) few reflect, which is the reaſon why the number of the reprobates is ſo great: And do you not yet think it very fitting, that one who hath fallen a thouſand times under temptation, ſhould once in his life taſte the ſweetneſs which is in victory over temptation, to rejoyce at it for ever? Many have been put by from ſteep and evident precipices, by pondering theſe words, Well then, to covenant with ſin, what will be the event? To purchaſe repentance ſo dear? To give up the credit of ſo many years, a prey to one unhappy minute of pleaſure? Where is the Faith thou haſt promiſed to God? Let us at leaſt ſeek out ſome place where he is not: and where is he not? So many ſtars, ſo many intelligences, wherewith the world is repleniſhed, are ſo many eyes of God which behold thee: He himſelf ſeeth into thee, even to the bottom of thy conſcience, if thou wilt ſin, get leave of him; but how wilt thou beg it of him, and how obtain? Patience a while: This temptation is a cloud which will paſs away. Thou art going to commit a ſin, whoſe pardon is very uncertain; but it is certain that when thou haſt done it, God himſelf cannot in all eternity make it not to have been done.

The twelfth. Think not you are the leſs in Gods favour becauſe he ſuffers you to be tempted, though with diſhoneſt thoughts, which are extreamly odious to chaſt ſouls; Why ſo? If S. Paul, that Cherubim, ſcorched with celeſtial heat, who ſet his foot upon the ſtars, (according to the opinion of S. Ambroſe, Theophylact, and Oecumenius) felt the ſtings of concupiſcence in a body that had been taken up to the third heaven; do you think, that becauſe you have ſome good diſpoſitions to do well, you muſt be freed from the wars of nature, which preſerve your mind, being to indulgent to its ſelf always in humility?

To conclude, follow the counſell of Caſſian, conſider daily the paſſions which are bred in your heart, as a fiſherman beholds the fiſhes ſwimming in the water, on purpoſe to catch them: Look on that which is moſt predominant within you, from what root it ſpringeth, when it began, what progreſs it hath made, what rule it uſurpeth ordinarily over your ſoul, what effects it produceth, whether it be more ſpirituall or temporall, what things uſe to foment it, what remedies you have taken to divert it; provide counſell and means to root it out; proceed to this with courage and fervour, as to the acquiſition of an incomparable good.

The nineth SECTION.

Remedies againſt paſsions, and temptations proceeding from every vice.

FIrſt, to conſider, That paſſion is a motion of the ſenſual appetite, ariſing from the imagination of good or ill, with ſome commotion of the body.

2. That there are eleven paſſions; ſix in the concupiſcible appetite, which are Love, Hatred, Deſire, Loathing, Joy, Sadneſs: five in the iraſcible, that is, Hope, Deſpair, Confidence, Fear, and Anger.

3. That there are two ways to overcome all paſſions; the firſt is a precaution of mind againſt the occaſions, and vain appearances of all worldly things. The ſecond, a ſerious diverſion to better things, as prayer, ſtudy, labour, and buſineſs; But above all, you muſt pray to God for the light and ſtrength of his holy grace, which infinitely tranſcends all humane remedies.

Againſt Gluttony.

1. REpreſent unto your ſelf the miſerable ſtate of a ſoul polluted and plunged in the fleſh. 2. The hardneſs of heart. 3. The dulneſs of underſtanding. 4. The infirmities of body. 5. The loſs of goods. 6. The diſparagement of Reputation. 7. The horrour, of the members of Jeſus Chriſt, to make members of an unclean creature. 8. The indignity to worſhip and ſerve the belly, as a bruitiſh and vile God. 9. The great inundation of ſins flowing from this ſpring. 10. The puniſhments of God upon the voluptuous.

Againſt ſloth.

1. The ceaſeleſs travell of all creatures in the world, naturall and civil. 2. The eaſineſs of good works, after grace given by Jeſus Chriſt. 3. The anxiety of a wavering and uncertain mind. 4. The ſhame and contempt. 5. The confuſion at the day of judgement. 6. The irreparable loſs of time.

Againſt Covetouſneſs.

1. The diſquiet of a greedy mind. 2. The inſatiability of deſire. 3. The many wars and battels which we muſt run through, to ſatisfie one ſingle deſire. 4. The diſhonour of denial, inſupportable to a generous ſoul. 5. The dependance and ſervitude we muſt undergo, to comply with thoſe from whom we expect the accompliſhment of our wiſhes. 6. The eaſineſs of offending God, through exceſſive greedineſs of temporall things. 7. The tranſitory and fleeting pleaſure of thoſe things which we moſt ardently deſire. 8. That God many times allows us the fulfilling of our deſires, as a puniſhment for our faults.

Againſt carnall love.

1. To conſider the barrenneſs of worldly loves, which are true gardens of Adonis, where we can gather nothing but triviall flowers, ſurrounded with many bryars. 2. To ſet a value on things, and not to be deceived with ſhows. 3. To guard your ſenſes, to ſhun accidents and occaſions of ſinning; and above all, to have a particular recourſe to God upon the firſt impreſſion of thoughts. 4. To pull your ſelf away by main force from preſented objects, and to direct your ſelf by ſerious deſigns, and good employments. 5. To ſet often before you the imperfection, the ingratitude, the levity, the inconſtancy, the perfidiouſneſs of thoſe creatures we moſt ſervilely affect.

Againſt

Against Sadneſs.

THere is a holy ſadneſs: as when we are moved at our Saviours Paſſion, or for our own ſins: which is the gift of God, not a puniſhment.

There is one furious, which hath no ears, and is rather cured by miracle than precept.

There is another natural, ariſing from our diſpoſition: and another vicious, which is nouriſhed by ill habits, and neglect of our own ſalvation.

1. Againſt this laſt we muſt conſider, That our deſires and love, cauſe, for the moſt part, our ſadneſs: and that the true way to diminiſh the cares that conſume us, is, to ſweeten the ſharp and ardent Affection we bear to worldly things.

2. The little eſteem we have of God, is the cauſe that we are often troubled at frivolous things, whether they threaten or happen. He that would truly love this great God, which deſerveth to poſſeſs all love of heaven and earth, ſhould not entertain fear or ſadneſs for any thing, but for the loſs of God; & no man can looſe him, but he that purpoſely forſakes him.

3. There is nothing beyond remedy, but the tears of the damned: A man who may perſiſt in the way to paradiſe, ſhould not place himſelf in the condition of a little hell: and he, who can hope for that great All, ought not to be ſad for any thing.

Againſt Envy.

1. THe way not to envy any thing, is to account nothing in this life great. 2. To covet onely the inheritance of the land of the living, which is never leſſened by the multitude or ſhares of the poſſeſſours. 3. To conſider ſeriouſly the motives which induce us to love our neighbour, as participation of the ſame nature.

THE THIRD PART OF THE CHRISTIAN DIARY.

The firſt SECTION.

BUSINESSE, Of what importance.

THe third employment of the day is buſineſs, whether Publick or Private; the government of your Family, or diſcharge of ſome Office, Good devotion is a good employment, and nothing is more to be avoided than idleneſs, which is the very ſource of ſin. He that labours (ſaid the old Hermite) is tempted but by one devil; he that is idle, is aſſaulted by all. No man is too Noble to have an occupation; If iron had reaſon, it would chooſe rather to be uſed in labour, than to grow ruſty in a corner.

The ſecond SECTION.

Two Heads, to which all Buſineſs is reduced.

IN Buſineſs we muſt conſider the Subſtance, and the Form. The Subſtance; for it is great wiſdom to make good choice herein, to take in hand good employments; and to leave the bad, the dangerous, and burthenſom, which do nothing but ſtop up the mind, and choke all feeling of devotion; eſpecially, when there is no obligation to undertake them. They are truly ſick even in health, who interpoſe out of curioſity, to know, to do, and ſolicite the buſineſs of others. It is ſufficient (ſaid the Emperour Antonius) that every one in this life do that well which belongs to his calling. The Sun doth not the office of the rain, nor the rain that of the Sun. Is it not abſolute madneſs of ſome in the world, whoſe onely employment is to attempt all things, but perform none?

As for the Form, in the exerciſe of charge, offices, and buſineſs, there is required knowledge, conſcience, induſtry, and diligence. Knowledge, 1. In learning that which is requiſite to be known for the diſcharge of your duty. 2. In informing your ſelf of that which of your ſelf you cannot apprehend. 3. In hearkening very willingly to adviſe, examining and weighing it with prudence and governing your ſelf altogether by counſel. Conſcience, in performing every thing with good intention, and great integrity, according to the Divine and Humane laws. Induſtry, in doing all diſcreetly and peaceably, with more fruit than noiſe: ſo that we expreſs no anxiety in buſineſs; like that Prince of whom it was ſaid, That he ſeemed always vacant in his moſt ſerious employments. Diligence, in ſpying out occaſions, and doing every thing in due time and place, without diſorder, confuſion, paſſion, haſte, irreſolution, precipitation: For theſe are the faults which commonly deſtroy good government. He that hath never ſo little wit & good inclination, ſhall ever find wherein to buſie himſelf, eſpecially in works of mercy, amongſt ſo many objects of the miſeries of his neighbour.

The third SECTION.

Of the government of a Family.

THat man hath no little buſineſs, who hath a Family to govern; a good Father who breedeth his Children well, that they may one day ſerve the Common-wealth, is employed in an important affair for the publick. A Mother, who bringeth up a little Samuel for the ſervice of the tabernacle, (as S. Monica did her ſon Auguſtine) obliged all poſterity. A Maſter & Miſtreſs, who keep their ſervants in good order, pleaſe both God and men. Four things very conſiderable are here required; Choiſe, Diſcretion, Example. Entertainment. Choiſe, in conſidering the Quantity, Quality, Capacity, Faithfulneſs, of thoſe you take into your ſervice. For the Quantity, it is evident that it ought to be proportionable to your eſtate and revenues. It is a great folly to make oſtentation of many ſervants merely through vanity. As Herod the ſophiſt did, according to the relation of Philoſtratus, who allowed his ſon four and twenty pages, every one of them bearing the name of ſome letter in the Alphabet; for ſo blockiſh was the child, that he could not any way elſe learn the firſt rudiments. Stars which have leaſt circuit are neareſt the Pole; and men who are leaſt perplexed with buſineſs, are commonly neareſt to God. A great retinue is a mark of a great want. Were there ſuch a beaſt as the Hebrew fables have feigned, that muſt have the graſs of a thouſand mountains for his daily allowance, would you account him happier than a Nightingale, which is ſatisfied with a few ſeeds, or a Bee, which liveth on dew? The rich need many pounds, the poor a little bread; both are indigent, but the one not ſo much as the other, for his want is the leſſer. A great number of ſervants make not a man happy; for none is a greater Master, or better obeyed, than he that serves himself.

For Quality, take heed of resembling witches, who care not to give the devil wages, so they may make use of his service for their own ends: you must either take good servants, or make them such; In the one, there is good luck, & in the other, for the most part, difficulty. For many are like the ass of Vincent Ferrerius, that did more for a Carter, who swore by the devil, than for his Master who led him in the name of God; which the holy man seeing, turned him off, not able to endure such bruitishnesh in a beast; and can you think, that for the necessities of your business, it may be lawfull for you to maintain one, who hath neither God nor conscience; that your children may at the very first be corrupted by his poisonous conversation?

For Capacity, it is necessary, that besides honesty, there must be an ability to discharge his office: and though we say the saints are good at all things, yet God doth not ever give them either desire or means to undergo all kinds of business. Our abilities are limited, as well as our minds; and every one hath his particular talent, which must be known by those that will make use of him.

For Faithfulness, it is one of the qualities, which the Gospel gives a good servant; you have reason to require it, and discreetly to make trial of it, not by suspicions & jealousies, which onely serve to provoke such as have a disposition to do well: A man is oftentimes made faithfull, by being thought faithfull; and many through continual fear to be cozened, have taught others to cozen; justifying their deceit by their own distrust, as the Romane Philosopher saith: you must allow your officers, what command and freedom their charges require, not quarreling with them every minute for trifles; notwithstanding you must carefully reserve the state of your affairs, for your own private knowledge: For it is an equal fault indifferently to trust all, or to distrust all.

The fourth Section.

Of Government in spiritual things.

When you have met with a good choice, the government is not hard: For S. Augustine saith, nothing is so easie as to perswade those to good, who have a great desire to put it in practice. Govern your family proportionably as the good Eleazar did his, which Binet hath so lively designed. First banish vice & scandal from your house; let wanton love and impurity never come near it, no more than the serpent to the flower of the vine; Let not surfetting, drunkenness or excess know so much as the gate; let neither unclean speech nor blasphemy be heard in it. For, as Nebuchadnezzar made the pages that attend on him learn his language, so the devil teacheth those of his acquaintance, his Dialect.

Having exiled vice, accustom your Family to some devotion, causing them to hear diligently the word of God, especially on Sundays and Holydays; inviting them to frequent the Sacrament according to their condition, assembling them as Charles Boromeus did, at evening or some time of the day, to say certain prayers together, if convenience of place permit, and to see how they are instructed in the Articles of Faith.

Your example will do more than all your words: For the life of a Good Master and Mistress is a perpetual monitour in a house. Those that seek to gain their good opinion, study to be like them, and in endeavouring to be beloved, become good. We live in an age, where we have more need of patterns than precepts, servants adhere to the pillars of a house, as Ivie to great trees; & in a word, to the commands of great ones, all affections are of wax, they become so pliable.

It is fitting likewise that to preserve this opinion you be liberal, according to your means, in ordering your Family, honourable in such expences as are requisite both for necessity and decorum. For we make use of nets, to take fishes, and of liberality, as a golden hook to take men.

Remember besides, in mannaging your business, more peculiarly to invoke Gods assistance; saying often unto him these words of Solomon. Wisd. 9. O God, give me wisdom that sitteth by thy Throne; & send her out of thy holy Heavens, and from the Throne of thy glorie, that being present, she may labour with me, that I may know what is pleasing unto thee, to put it in execution.

Take heed of indiscreet precipitation in the beginning of an enterprize, of anxiety in the progression, and of despair in the conclusion. If your project have good issue, give the praise to God, and an example of modesty to your neighbour; but if business keep not time to your will, learn you to keep time to the Divine providence, which maketh all harmony in the world; you have power over your own designs, but not over their events; you are not to pray, that things may prove as you desire, but to desire them as they prove. Accustom your self not to be grieved at worldly accidents, no more than for an ill dream: For all things here below, pass away like a dream; and we do much, if in losing all, we retain that belief: But by long soothing our own wils, we have forsaken (as Cassian saith) the very shadow of patience.

The fifth Section.

Advice for such as are in office and government.

Bonaventure hath made an excellent Treatise, which he calleth The wings of the Seraphin, wherein he giveth very wise instructions to those that are in office and government; whereof in part I present you here with the quintessence and marrow, desiring you to tast of it. He gives his Seraphin six wings. The first is Zeal of Gods honour; which you shall exercise in observing four things; that is,

1. Neither to do; nor shew to those under you, the least shadow of evil or sin.

2. Not to give way to it in any kind, notwithstanding allurements on one side, and importunities on the other.

3. Never to be pleased that an evil act be done, though without your knowledge; for that were to betray your own conscience.

4. To correct, and take away disorders, as much as possibly you can.

The second wing, which you must have is, The spirit of compassion, to help the sick, the aged, the weak, the faint-hearted, the afflicted; for these are poor Porcupines laden with prickles and acerbities, to whom you must be a Sanctuary and Rock of refuge: Petra refugium Herinaceis.

The third, Patience in the many labours and cares, as are (in a manner) inseparable from offices and governments. Patience, in ill success of business, which doth not always answer our endeavours and wishes. Patience, in bearing with the ungratefull, who often throw stones at those that give them honey; like the Atlantes, who shot arrows at the Sun. Patience, in occasions of speech and dealing with such as easily take distast, and are galled with their own harness. It is a great virtue, to soften them with a peacefull, still, and charitable sweetness, as if we cast oyl into the raging sea. It was said long since, He that can bear an injury, is worthy an Empire. His very silence will disarm the passionate man, and lay him prostrate at his feet, who seemed to thunder over his head.

The Fourth wing is, Example; which is observed in three things. 1. In putting in practice the good councounſel and precepts which we give others. 2. In managing your dignity in ſuch a way, as is neither harſh, imperious, nor arrogant; but mild, affable, and communicative. 3. In retaining withall a decent and moderate gravity, that the ſtamp which God ſets on thoſe he calleth to offices and commands, may not be debaſed.

The Fifth and principal Wing, is called Diſcretion, without which all virtues become vices: For the honour of great actions lies not ſo much in doing good, as in doing well.

This Diſcretion conſiſteth in four things. To govern the good with good judgement; To correct the bad; To adminiſter well the temporal affairs of your charge; To uphold and preſerve your ſelf amidſt theſe encumbrances, like freſh water in the ſalt ſea.

The ordering of good is maintained in Three principal Acts. The firſt, to cauſe thoſe under us to obſerve ſtrictly ſuch things as are neceſſary, and cannot be omitted without diſorder or ſcandal. The ſecond, To invite, and ſweetly attract every one according to his condition, capacity, and judgement, to works of moſt perfection; whereunto they have no formal obligation. The third, To diſpoſe charges and burthens with a good Oeconomy, according to their inclinations and ſtrength of mind, whom you are to govern.

For correction; Either they are ſleight faults of well conditioned perſons, which you are to correct, & ſuch are to be handled very gently; Or they are hidden vices of ſome evil conſcience, which you neither muſt nor can make known; and there you muſt uſe much induſtry, patience, and wiſdom to diſlodge vice; and to draw the crooked ſerpent out of his cave obſtetricante manu, as the Scripture ſpeaketh, Job 26.23. Or they are known ſins of deſperate people, who offend without hope of amendment, infecting a multitude; and here you muſt ſet your ſelf with all your ſtrength, to take away both the fault and the faulty.

For temporal affairs, manage them as we have already ſhewed, and take heed of entangling your mind in them, like a fiſh in a net, depriving your ſelf of the liberty of Gods children, to ſerve the earth.

But above all, continually look into your ſelf, as the firſt piece of your government. Let your conſcience be pure, firm, and peaceable; ſpeaking and doing every thing with much conſideration; and never deſpiſing the counſel of thoſe who are able to adviſe you.

Laſtly, your ſixth wing is Devotion, which is divided into three kinds, the common, the ſingular, the continual. The common conſiſteth in performing exactly thoſe duties of piety, which are within the bounds of your profeſſion; and to do them by way of imitation of that celeſtial Militia, which is always employed in praiſing God; and by way of edification of thoſe, to whom you ow this good example. Singular devotion obligeth you to ſeek your principal refuge, in the tabernacle (following Moſes ſteps) for the neceſſities of your charge. Continual devotion ties you to a moſt fervent exercile of Gods preſence, which you teſtifie by a deſire to pleaſe him in all places, occaſions and actions, by dedicating all your works to him, before you begin them; and when you end them, always to ſet upon them the ſeal of thanki-giving due to his Divine Majeſty.

Engrave deeply in your heart this ſaying of S. Bernard, in his firſt book of Conſideration, Chap. 5. Cum omnes te habeant, eſto etiam tu ex habentibus unus. Quid ſolus fraudaris munere tui? Uſquequò vadens ſpiritus, & non rediens? If you are one full of buſineſs, and that all the world ſhare in you; take a part as well as others in your ſelf. Deprive not your ſelf of a good ſo juſtly yours, and be not one of thoſe that are ever travelling, yet never return home.

THE FOURTH PART OF THE CHRISTIAN DIARY.

The firſt SECTION.

RECREATION, how neceſſary.

AS concerning Recreation uſed in company, at meals, in lawfull games, in taking the air, in good converſation, it is neceſſary to divert the mind, and refreſh the ſtrength. Caſſian in his 24. Collation chap. 21. relates, how an Archer finding S. John the Evangeliſt playing with a Partridge, wondered that ſo renowned a man could paſs the time with ſo ſlight a recreation: The Saint looking towards the bow in his hand, asked him why he did not always carry it bent; who anſwering, it would ſpoil it; the Apoſtle replied, ſo it is with the mind of man, which muſt ſometimes be unbent, that it may ſhoot the better.

Treat not your belly as Caligula did his horſe; for he allow'd a Beaſt (for whom nature intended nothing but oats and hay) Princely delicacies and attendance. And you do the like, if you beſtow ſo much coſt and pains to feed your moſt ſenſual part, which the Divine Providence wills ſhould be nouriſhed ſparingly. Great feaſts, which begin in vanity, and continue in riot, end always in folly, and often in repentance. Nothing is got by pleaſures of the Taſte, but a more crazy body, a more cloſe priſon of fleſh, & a more ſtinking ſepulchre. Unhappy are thoſe feaſts, which the hunger of the poor acculeth before God. Above theſe ſixteen ages the tongue of the Rich Glutton hath burned in hell, all his tuns of delicious wine, not having left him ſo much as one drop to refreſh himſelf.

If you deſire to know what were the banquets of the Primitive Chriſtians, which ought to be models for ours) Tertullian gives you a diſcourſe thereon in his Apology. Our feaſts (ſaith he) expreſs what they are, in their names. They are called Ἀγάπαι (Charities) becauſe they are inſtituted for relief of the poor: Our Table reſembleth an Altar, and our Supper a Sacrifice: We mind not the expence; to ſpend in the name of Pietie, is gain. Our Table hath nothing ſavouring of baſeneſs, ſenſuality, or immodeſty;

The ſecond SECTION.

Of the Pleaſures of the Taſte.

MArk, that our minds muſt onely be unbent, not unſtrung: Avoid thoſe exceſſes which make men now adays as gluttonous in the eye, as the belly. It is a ſtrange vanity to affect the repute of a good taſte; to ſet the whole mind to ſerve that part of the body, which hath leaſt of the mind; and to nouriſh an eſteem which is fed onely with the ſteam of the kitchin.

We feed by measure: We drink the rules of temperance; We satiate our selves as much as is necessarie for those, who must rise at midnight, to offer up their prayers unto God; We speak and converse as in the presence of God, our hands washed, and candles lighted, every one repeateth what he knoweth out of the holy Scriptures, and his own invention to the praise of God. Prayer, as it began the banquet, concludes it: From the Table we go unto the exercise of modesty and decency: You would say, if you behold us, that we were not at supper, but at a lecture of holiness.

Alass! Confer the feasts of most Christians with these, and you compare the table of the Centaurs to that of the Angels.

The third Section.

Of Gaming.

BE not over-violent likewise at those Games of chance, which have in them so much covetousness, heat, and flame: Did a man commit no other sin, but conversing the third part, or half of his life with Kings and knaves of cards, being invited to the conversation of Angels, yet were he guiltie of no small offence: But besides, gaming was the invention of that devil Zabulon, as S. Cyprian observes, in a Treatise upon this subject. It is the altar of Fortune, detested by the Prophet; It is the shop of deceit, the school of covetousness, the apprentiship of blasphemy, the academy of anger; where are begot mad amities, unpunished thefts, pleasing murthers, and whence nothing for the most part is brought away, but a tempest in the mind, gall in the heart, and air in the purse: What excuse at the last day can he have, who gameth with a full hand, and detains (in the mean while) the wages of a servant, or the relief of some begget that pineth and quaketh at his gate?

Pilat's Souldiers cast lots on the garments of the Son of God, whilest the bloud distilled from his body; but they were executioners and infidels; who would not be struck with horrour to see a Christian, amidst so many images of the Son of God, without regard either of time, of God, or of man, play away the bloud of his family, whom he neglecteth, or of the poor, whom he despoileth? Away with these delights, which are bred (like the Salamander) in the tears of heaven.

Clemens Alexandrinus in his Pædagogue, sheweth plainly, that these games of cards, dice, and the like, were not allowed by the Primitive Church; for he teacheth us, that such pastimes are often as an ebullition of ungovern'd delights, and an indigestion of evil idleness.

If we must of necessity play, in complacence to others, we ought at least to have a care, that it be for some good end; that it be with our equals; without passion, little, moderate, and to the profit of the poor.

The fourth Section.

Of Dancing.

AS for Dancing, Balls, and Masks, it is true what the pious Bishop, and excellent Authour hath said in his Introduction; they resemble mushroms, the best of which are worth nothing. Luxury, vanity, foolish expence, masking, good chear, night, youth, love, liberty, are as dangerous counsellours of wisedom, as ill teachers of modesty: some may be sanctified in them by miracle, but every day more are lost in them, through weakness: since our force is weak, not miraculous, we ought, by flying from occasions, to seek that safetie which we cannot find in our own strength.

The fable saith, that the butterfly asked the owl, how she should deal with the fire, which had singed her wings; who counselled her, not to behold so much as its smoak. With what conscience can a faithfull soul frequent those worldly recreations, which have stain'd her puritie with so many blemishes? Must we stay till we are burned, ere we retire from the flame? I wonder at those who would spiritualize dancing, and make it agree with frequent communion; such in effect, with the Emperour Adrian, Lay Adonis in the manger of Jesus. There must be so many circumstances, of the intention, time, place, persons, and manner, to season such pleasures, that it were easier to abstain from them, than to use them well.

The fifth Section.

Of wanton songs, and plays.

IF you speak of wanton songs, of reading ill books, of unchaste comedies and plays, your conscience (which is the School-mistress of the soul) will perhaps tell you more than you are willing to believe. Such recreations are fore-runners of disorder, instruments of sensuality, tinder to sin, and scandal to virtue; evil, at that time entereth into you, by every gate of the sence, and goeth out onely at the gate of repentance, which is not always open to our indispositions. A young soul is surprized in these, as in a golden snare; to whom the description of sin, is invitation. For we live now in an age, where to know ill, and to do it, have scarce any Medium to sever them; and if at any time we are good, it is rather through ignorance of vice, than principles of virtue, saith Salvian.

The sixth Section.

Of walking, and running.

RECreations, the most innocent, are ever the most commendable; as those in the countrey, for exercise of the body; for the Countrey life (saith Columella) is the couzen germane to wisdom.

Setting aside the comfort of Churches, Justice, Learning, Arts and Traffick, what are great Cities, but great prisons? Men live there, like birds in a cage, they crowd, defile one another, & by frequent and infectious conversation, the trouble of business, the importunity of visits, the foolish tyranny of complements steal from them half their life. In the Countrey, the heaven, air, earth and waters, (which Cities snatch from us) are restored with greatest liberty. There, all the creatures of God speak to us face to face, to tell us the wonders of the Creatour. The Christians of the primitive Church made hermitages of their farms, to found a retreat from worldly business, and to prepare for their time of rest: but many now, make their gardens temples of Baal-peor, where no God is worshipped, but the belly, luxury, gaming, and uncleanness.

Many make walks and races, wherein none can run far without stumbling; for they resemble the list of Atalanta and Hippomenes, rather than the race where-S. Paul exhorted Christians to run; there the sences flattered with a thousand delightfull objects, many times put themselves in array; there the bloud is enflamed; the tongue untied; concupiscence enkindled; there, licentiousness often rendeth the vail, which until then was over the face of modesty; and impudently becomes portress to love; These are the sacrileges, which drie up years, breed disorder amongst seasons, barrenness in the bowels of the earth, and despair in our miseries.

The

The ſeventh SECTION.

The four conditions of recreation.

YOur recreation muſt have four eſpecial things; choiſe of perſons, good intention, innocency, moderation.

Choiſe of perſons, in avoiding evil company as the moſt dangerous ſhelf of life; for the friendſhip of wicked men is like a bundle of thorns, tied together to burn and crackle in the fire. Your friendſhip muſt be virtuous, faithful, diſintereſted, if you mean to have any fruits of it.

Good intention, as, to cheriſh health and ſtrength, that they may ſerve the ſoul; for a good man ſhould ſeek good even in play and at meals; like the ſaint, who roſe in the night, and fed with a poor hungry brother, that he might not be aſhamed of eating at a diſorderly hour.

Innocency; for much conſideration muſt be uſed therein, leſt nature ſhould diſſolve into bruitiſh life, unworthy a generous heart. Behind, comes gluttony, intemperate gaming, fooliſh jeſting, and detraction, in this age hard to be avoided.

The book moſt ordinary in companies of men, is man himſelf: Now very few take delight to diſcourſe of the Old and New Teſtament; nay not ſo much as of the old Roman Councels, Ægyptian Pyramids, or ancient wars of Ceſars. Men ſtudy books of the time, talk of garbs, clothes, looks, conditions, buſineſs, cuſtoms, alliances; and though we have no intent to wrong any, yet is it very eaſie, in ſuch variety of diſcourſe to let fall many words of far leſs value than ſilence; it is an excellent quality to ſtill good matter into company; either upon occaſion, by queſtion, conſequence, narration or propoſition, as the reverend Jaquinot obſerves in his Addreſs.

Moderation. For as the wiſe man ſaith, Prov. 25. 16. We glut our ſelves with hony: ſo ought we to have a care, that recreations (made to refreſh the mind) tend not by exceſs to diſſoluteneſs. You muſt obſerve what the time, place, and perſons require; and to paſs the time, muſt not exceed your ſelf by profuſeneſs.

The eighth SECTION.

Of vicious converſation, and firſt of impertinent.

THe Hebrews ſay, play, anger, the cup, and converſation, are the windows of the ſoul, through which ſhe is many times ſeen more than ſhe would be; he is wiſe, who makes uſe of meetings and company, as of a file to poliſh his mind, and to make it continually more apt for its functions.

Vicious converſation, may be reduced almoſt to three heads, that is, impertinent, vain, evil. Impertinent, as the clowniſh, fooliſh, troubleſom, which many have through want of diſcretion, faſhion and civility.

Theophraſtus, one of the quainteſt wits of antiquity, relateth ſome paſſages, which he ſaith he obſerved in his time, arguing a great weakneſs of judgement; ſome (ſaith he) lay hold on one that is going about buſineſs of concernment, to tell him ſomething (as they pretend) of great importance, which when told, is nothing but foolery. Others invite a travellour, newly come out of the countrey very weary, to walk up and down; others pull a man out of a ſhip ready to weigh anchor, to entertain him with follies on the ſhore; others come to bear witneſs, after the cauſe is judged; and bring with much ſweat, a Phyſitian to the dead: others pretend to know the way, and undertake to lead the reſt, but go wrong at the very firſt, and proteſt, they have forgot it. Others make rude enquiry into buſineſs, and ask a General of an Army, whither he goes, and what is his deſign. Some alſo there are (ſaith he) ſo ruſtick, that (not admitting any thing worth admiration in civil life) they ſtand ſtill to look upon an ox, as men in rapture; and in company, have no better behaviour, than to take their dog by the muzzle, and ſay what a fine dog this is, well he keeps the houſe! Such converſation is able greatly to vilifie a man, and to take from him all eſtimation he can gain in his profeſſion.

The ninth SECTION.

Of vain converſation.

VAin converſation, is that of talkers, flatterers, vain-glorious, and the like; poor Theophraſtus (in my opinion) was much tormented with a talker; ſince he ſo well deſcribeth one, who, with much paſſion, praiſed his wife? told what he dreamed the laſt night; what he had to dinner; that he had a weakneſs of ſtomack: From thence taking flight, he diſcourſed of times; and aſſured him, the men of ours came not near the ancients in any thing: Then he told him, that corn was cheap; that there were many ſtrangers in the city; that if it would rain, the year would be fruitfull; that he had a field to be ploughed; that Damippus gave the greateſt wax light at an offering; that there were ſo many ſtairs in ſuch a building, & that he had counted them, with a thouſand of the like. Such people (adds the Author) are more to be feared than a feaver. He that would live in quiet, muſt ſeldom keep them company. Horace mentions one very like, who put him into a great ſweat, and when he ſaw he was ſo tired, that he knew not which way to turn himſelf. I ſee Sir, ſaith he, that I am troubleſom, but there is no remedy; ſince I have met with you, I muſt needs wait on you; for (God be thanked) I have nothing elſe to do.

Flatterers, are much more acceptable, though many times more dangerous, for they will tell you, that all the world caſt their eyes upon you; that you are much eſteemed; that the whole town talks of ſuch a fortunate action of yours; that you have an excellent wit, a handſom body, a good grace, winning behaviour; that every thing becomes you, and that it ſeems Nature, when ſhe had made you broke her mold, becauſe ſhe never ſince framed the like; If you ſpeak, they bid ſilence to all the world; then extol your words as oracles; and if you jeſt at any, they burſt with laughter to pleaſe you; and deifie your imperfections: This is that which poyſons freindſhip, and blinds humane life.

The Vain-glorious, will for the moſt part entertain you with commendations of themſelves; and have a thouſand petty ſingularities in their carriage, their attire, their ſpeech, their houſes, their attendants; to ſhew, that they have ſomething more than others: The aforeſaid Authour ſaith, he hath obſerved ſome, that held it a great honour to have a Blackamore lackey, that they might be the more noted: and if they ſacrificed an ox, they nailed the horns at their gates, to give the world notice of their offering; and to conclude, were ſo great ſelf-lovers, that they made Epitaphs, even upon their dogs, ſpecifying their age, qualities and conditions; Theſe are teſtimonies of a ſoul very frivolous, and deſtitute of all Humility.

The tenth Section.

of evil Converſation.

Evil Converſation, is the worſt of all; as is that of the Harſh, who make themſelves unſociable in company; that of the Opinionated, who bear for their motto, It is ſo, and It is not ſo; ever contradicting, even the cleareſt truths; that of the Crafty and Deceitfull, who endeavour to diſcover all the ſecrets of others, whileſt they diſguiſe themſelves with a maſk of diſſimulation, and intricate ſpeech; feigning ignorance of what they know, knowledge of what they are ignorant, forgetfulneſs of promiſe, good will to thoſe they would circumvent, and many ſuch like. That of the Proud, who ſcorn and deſpiſe all but themſelves. That of the Cholerick, who are diſpleaſed upon every accident: That of Scoffers, Buffons, and Slanderers, who are obſcene, biting, and offenſive in all occaſions.

It were a long buſineſs to examine all theſe particularly; and I had freely unfolded them, in a Treatiſe of Manners and Paſſion, wherein I hoped to give the Reader ſatisfaction, but that the deſign of this little book diverted me. It were to ſmall purpoſe, to make ſo long a work of it; and it is always better to conclude well, than to enlarge ill.

The eleventh Section.

The Conditions of good Converſations.

I Tell you in brief, S. Bernard, Thomas Aquinas and other learned men are of opinion, that in Converſation we ought to be affable and pleaſing, yet not too familiar, nor inquiſitive into other mens buſineſs, not ſuſpicious, not light, not riotous, not diſcontented, not affected, not imperious, not croſs, not exceptious, not jeering, not fretfull, not triviall, not churliſh not too ceremonious, not too talkative, not too ſoft and compliant, not cholerick, not too reſerved, not proud, not vain. all thoſe through vanity (which is onely rich in fooleries) diſcourſe perpetually of themſelves, as if they were deities. But we muſt govern our ſelves with great diſcretion and modeſty; we muſt play, but not debaſe our ſelves, laugh, but not to exceſs; take recreation, but not to effeminacy; be conſtant, but not obſtinate; prudent, but not crafty; ſimple, but not ſtupid; concealing ill, furthering good, correcting our own faults by thoſe, we diſlike in others; always bringing home ſome fruit from this garden of Graces; and if acquainted with any ſecret fit to be concealed, we muſt make our breaſt its tomb.

You will find, there are ordinarily five qualities, which make converſation pleaſant; The firſt is, an obliging way, which ſweetly ſcattereth benefits, from which (in their due time and place) ſpring up recompences: This deſire of doing good to all the world, is a bait we muſt keep ever in the water; for by it men are taken more eaſily than fiſhes: And ſuch there have been, who by giving a glaſs of water opportunely, have obtained a Kingdom; as we ſee in the ſtory of Thaumaſtus and King Agrippa.

The ſecond Affability, joyned with a grace and ſweet behaviour, which hath a moſt powerfull charm over ſouls naturally enclined to honeſty. To do good, and not to do it handſomely is nothing. A benefit given with grudging, is a ſtony loaf, onely taken for neceſſity.

The third, a quick and wary prudence, to diſcern the diſpoſitions, capacities, manners, humours, affections, and aims of thoſe with whom we converſe; and to ſuit our carriage to every mans temper.

The fourth, Humility, without ſottiſhneſs or ſervile baſeneſs, which teacheth to yield to reaſon, and not to preſume upon our own ſtrength.

The fifth, (whereof we have already ſpoken) is a diſcreet Patience, to bear with men and buſineſs unmoved, ſo that you may keep your heart always in a good poſture, even in unexpected, and thorny accidents. He that underſtands this myſtery well, deſerves to command men, being here placed by virtue in a degree next the Angels.

A good rule for converſing well, is to propoſe unto your ſelf for pattern, one of a perfect converſation: So S. Auguſtine referred thoſe that deſired to profit in virtue, to the converſation of S. Paulinus. Vade in Campaniam, diſce Paulinum.

But the moſt effectuall precept is, to think how the Incarnate Word would converſe, if he were in our room; by his example, we ſhall do as Joſeph in Ægypt, of whom the Scripture Pſal. 105. (according to the Hebrew phraſe) ſaith, he tied the Princes of Pharaob's Court about his heart.

The Reverend Gontery, a man of great Judgement, and no leſs virtue, hath written a little Treatiſe of Converſation, wherein he deſcendeth very far to particulars. He that will read it, ſhall find wiſe inſtructions in it.

The twelfth Section.

Concluſion of the Diary.

AT night, before you go to bed, you are to make the examen of Conſcience, (which is the little Conſiſtory of the ſoul, as Philo terms it) where having given thanks to God, and invoked his holy grace, you muſt recall your thoughts, your words, your actions, your faults, and neglects to account, that you may ſee the gain, the loſs, and reckonings of that day; to further good, to correct evil; remitting the one to your own diſcretion, and the other to Gods mercy.

Eſteem this ſaying of S. Bernard, (in his book of the the Interiour houſe,) as an oratle, that one of the chiefeſt mirrours to behold God in, is a reaſonable ſoul, which finds it ſelf out.

There, we muſt ſeat the Conſcience in a Throne, with a Sceptre in her hand; and all paſſions, and imperfections at her feet.

There ſhe muſt take the liberty to ſay to you, Wicked ſervant, thou haſt loſt a day: what ſluggiſhneſs at thy riſing? what negligence in labour? how great words? how little works? Why this curious queſtioning? this raſh judgement? theſe wandering eyes? theſe ſtraying thoughts? Should you have been angry for ſo ſlight a cauſe, upon ſuch an occaſion; ſhould you ſo freely have cenſured and murmured at the actions of another? ſhould you have taken your refection ſo ſenſually? and ſought your eaſe in, and by all things, ſo greedily? and ſo of the reſt. If by the grace of God, you ſhall find ſome kind of virtues, yet muſt you well pick and ſift them, (as the perfume, which was to be ſet before the Tabernacle) to preſent them before the face of God; and ſay in concluſion with all humility, as the devout Southwell, Quod fui, Domine, ignoſce, quod ſum corrige, quod ero dirige. O Lord, forgive what I have been, correct what I am, direct what I ſhall be.

This done, ſay ſome vocall prayer, to ſhut the day up happily with ſome acts of contrition, of faith, of hope, of ſupplication, for your ſelf and friends.

Say here.

O Light of the Children of light! bright day which haſt no evening! The world is buried in the darkneſs nesse of night, and this day quite finished, wherein I see, as in a little Map, how my life shall end. O God, what benefits do I see in it, on thy part, what ingratitudes on mine? Preserve me in what is thine; and wash away with the precious bloud of thy Son, what is mine. Shelter me under the wings of thy protection, from so many shadows, apparitions, and snares of the father of darkness; and grant, that though sleep close my eys; yet my heart may never be shut to thy love.

Lastly, fall asleep upon some good thought, that your night (as the Prophet saith) may be enlightened with the delights of God; and if you chance to have any interruption of sleep, supply it with ejaculatory prayers, and elevations of heart; as the just did of old, called for this reason, The crickets of the night.

Thus shall you lead a life full of honour, quiet, and satisfaction to your self, and shall make every day a step to Eternity. The marks, which may amongst others give you good hope of your predestination, are eleven principall.

1. Faith, lively, simple, and firm. 2. Purity of life, exempt ordinarily from grievous sins. 3. Tribulation, 4. Clemency and mercy. 5. Poverty of spirit disengaged from the earth. 6. Humility. 7. Charity to your neighbour. 8. Frequentation of the blessed Sacrament. 9. Affection to the word of God. 10. Resignation of your own mind to the will of your Sovereign Lord. 11. Some remarkable act of virtue, which you have upon occasion exercised.

You will find this Diary little in volume, but great in virtue, if relishing it well, you begin to put it in practice. It contains many things, worthy to be meditated at leisure; for they are grave and wise precepts, choisely extracted out of the moral doctrine of the Fathers. Though they seem short, they cost not the less pains. Remember, that famous Artist Myrmecides, employed more time to make a Bee, than an unskilfull workman to build a house.

EJACULATIONS FOR THE DIARY.

In the Morning.

MY voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O Lord; In the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee, and will look up, *Psal.*5.3.

Thou shalt make thy face to shine upon me, and all the beasts of the forest shall gather themselves together, and lay them down in their dens, *Psal.*184.22.

My dayes are like the dayes of an hireling. Untill the day break, and the shadows flie away, Job 7.1. *Cant.*4.6.

Beginning a good work.

In the volume of the book it is written of me. I delight to do thy will, O my God; yea, thy Law is within my heart, *Psal.*40.7.8.

In good Inspirations.

The Lord God hath opened mine ear, and I was not rebellious, neither turned away back, Isaiah 50.5.

At Church.

How amiable are thy Tabernacles! O Lord of hosts, *Psal.*84.1.

Before reading.

Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth, 1 Samuel 3.9.

Speaking.

My heart is inditing a good matter; I speak of the things which I have made touching the King, Psal. 45.1.

Eating.

Thou openest thine hand, and satisfiest the desire of every living thing, Psal. 145.

In Prosperity.

If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth: If I prefer not thee above my chief joy, *Psal.*137.6.

Adversity.

The Lord killeth, and maketh alive, 1 *Sam.*2.6. Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil? Job 2.10. Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glorie? Luke 24.26.

Troubles.

Surely man walketh in a vain shew; surely they are disquieted in vain, *Psal.*39.6.

Calumnies.

If I pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ, *Gal.*1.10.

Praises.

Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy Name give glorie, *Psal.*115.1.

Against vain hope.

As a dream when one awaketh, so, O Lord, when thou awakest, thou shalt despise their image, Psalm 73.20.

Pride.

Whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased, Luke 14.11.

Covetousnes.

It is more blessed to give, than to receive, Acts 20.35.

Luxury.

Know ye not, that your bodies are the members of Christ? 1. *Cor.*6.15.

Envy.

He that loveth not his brother, abideth in death, 1 John 3.14.

Gluttony.

The Kingdom of God is not meat and drink, *Rom.*14.17.

Anger.

Anger.

Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, *Matth.*11.29.

Sloth.

Curſed be he that doth the work of the Lord negligently, *Jer.*48.10.

Rules of Faith.

God cannot be known but by himſelf. What is to be underſtood of God, is to be learned by God, Hilar. lib. 5. de Trin.

God doth not call us to the bleſſed life by hard queſtions. In ſimplicity muſt we ſeek him, in piety profeſs him. Idem lib. 10.

Remove not the ancient bounds which thy fathers have ſet, *Prov.*22.28.

Many are the reaſons which juſtly hold me in the boſom of the Catholick Church: Conſent of people and nations; Authority, begun by miracles, nouriſhed by hope, encreaſed by charity, confirmed by antiquity. Auguſt. lib. De utilitate credendi.

To diſpute againſt that which the univerſal Church doth maintenance, is inſolent madneſs. *Idem Epiſt.*118.

Let us follow univerſality, antiquity, conſent: Let us hold that which is believed every where, always, by all. Vincentius Lyrinenſis De profanis vocum novitatibus.

Acts of Faith.

Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief, *Marc.*9. 24.

I know that my Redeemer liveth, &c. Job 19.25.

Hope.

Though I walk through the valley of the ſhadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me, *Pſal.*24.4.

I will be with him in trouble; I will deliver him, and honour him, *Pſal.*90.15.

Charity.

Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I deſire beſides thee. My fleſh and my heart faileth; but God is the ſtrength of my heart, and my portion for ever. *Pſal.*73.25,26.

Feed me, O Lord, thy ſuppliant with the continual influence of thy Divinity: This I requeſt, this I deſire; that vehement love may throughly pierce me, fill me, and change me into it ſelf. Bloſius.

PRAYERS

for all Perſons and occaſions.

For the Church.

WE beſeech thee, O Lord, graciouſly to accept the prayers of thy Church, that ſhe being delivered from all adverſitie and errour, may ſerve thee in ſafety and freedom, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord.

For the King.

WE beſeech thee, O Lord, that thy ſervant CHARLS by thy gracious appointment our King and Governour, may be enriched with all encreaſe of virtue, whereby he may be able to eſchew evil, and to follow Thee, the Way, the Truth, and the Life, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord.

For a Friend.

ALmighty and ever-living Lord God, have mercy upon thy ſervant N. and direct him by thy goodneſs into the way of eternall ſalvation: that through thy grace, he may deſire thoſe things which pleaſe thee, and with his whole endeavour perform the ſame, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord.

For Peace.

O God, from whom all holy deſires, all good counſels, and all juſt works do proceed, give unto us thy ſervants that peace which the world cannot give, that both our hearts may be ſet to obey thy Commandments, and alſo that by thee we being defended from the fear of our enemies, may paſs our time in reſt and quietneſs, through the merits of Jeſus Chriſt our Saviour.

In the time of Plague.

LEt thy anger ceaſe, O Lod, and be appeaſed for the iniquity of thy people, as thou haſt ſworn by thy ſelf. O holy God, holy and ſtrong, holy and immortal, have mercy upon us.

For the Clergy.

ALmighty and everlaſting God, who by thy Spirit doſt ſanctifie and govern the whole body of the Church, graciouſly hear our prayers for all thoſe whom thou haſt ordained, and called to the publick ſervice of thy Sanctuary; that by the help of thy grace they may faithfully ſerve thee in their ſeveral degrees, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord.

For a Citie.

COmpaſs this Citie, O Lord, with thy protection, and let thy holy Angels guard the walls thereof; O Lord, mercifully hear thy people.

For the ſick.

O God the onely refuge of our infirmities, by thy mighty power relieve thy ſick ſervants, that they with thy gracious aſſiſtance, may be able to give thanks unto thee in thy holy Church, through Jeſus Chriſt.

For grace.

LOrd, from whom all good things do come; grant unto us thy humble ſervants, that by thy holy inſpiration we may think thoſe things that be good, and by thy merciful guiding, may perform the ſame through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

For the afflicted.

O Almighty God, the afflicted ſoul, the troubled ſpirit crieth unto thee: Hear O Lord, and have mercy; for thou art a merciful God.

For friends.

IBeſeech thee, O Lord, for all thoſe to whom I am indebted for my birth, education, inſtruction, promotion; their neceſſities are known unto thee; thou art rich in all things; reward them for theſe benefits, with bleſſings both temporal and eternal.

For enemies.

O God the lover and preſerver of peace and charity, give unto all our enemies thy true peace and love, and remiſſion of ſins: and mightily deliver us from their ſnares, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord.

For travellers.

ASſiſt us mercifully, O Lord, in our ſupplications and prayers; and diſpoſe the way of thy ſervants towards the attainment of everlaſting ſalvation, that among all the changes and chances of this mortal life, they may ever be defended by thy moſt gracious and ready help, through Chriſt our Lord.

For a Family.

ALmighty and everlasting God, ſend down thy holy Angel from heaven, to viſit, protect and defend all that dwell in this houſe, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord.

For the dying.

FAther of ſpirits and God of all fleſh, receive the ſouls which thou haſt redeemed with thy bloud, returning unto thee.

For the fruits of the earth.

O God in whom we live, and move, and have our being, open thy treaſure in the due ſeaſon, and give a bleſſing to the works of thy hands.

For women in travel.

O Lord, of thy goodneſs help thy ſervants, who are in pains of child-birth; that being delivered out of their preſent danger, they may glorifie thy holy name, bleſſed for ever.

Againſt temptation.

ALmighty God, which doſt ſee that we have no power of our ſelves to help our ſelves, keep thou us both outwardly in our bodies, and inwardly in our ſouls, that we may be defended from all adverſities, which may happen to the body, and from all evil thoughts, which may aſſault and hurt the ſoul, through Jeſus Chriſt.

For misbelievers and ſinners.

ALmighty and everliving God, who deſireſt not the death of a ſinner, mercifully look upon all that are deceived by the ſubtility of Satan, that all evil prejudice laid aſide, they may return to the unity of thy truth and love.

For Priſoners.

O God, who didſt deliver S. Peter from his chains, and reſtoredſt him to liberty, have pitie upon thy ſervants in captivity, releaſe their bonds, and grant them freedom and ſafety, for his merits who liveth and reigneth with thee and the holy Ghoſt, ever one God, world without end.

For temporal neceſſaries.

REpleniſh thoſe, O Lord, we beſeech thee, with temporal nouriſhment, whom thou haſt refreſhed with thy bleſſed Sacraments.

Againſt tempeſts.

DRive ſpiritual wickedneſs from thy houſe, O Lord, and preſerve it from the malignity of tempeſtuous weather.

A Prayer of Thomas Aquinas before ſtudy.

OUnſpeakable Creatour, who out of the treaſure of thy wiſdom, haſt ordained Hierarchies of Angels, and haſt placed them above the higheſt heaven, in a wonderfull order, and diſpoſed them ſweetly for all parts of the world; Thou, the true fountain, and incomprehenſible principle of light and wiſdom, vouchſafe to illuminate the darkneſs of my underſtanding with a beam of thy light; remove the darkneſs wherein I was born, ſin and ignorance; Thou who makeſt the tongues of infants eloquent, looſen my tongue, and pour forth the grace of thy ſpirit upon my lips; give me acutenes, to apprehend, capacity to retain, ſubtility to interpret, aptneſs to learn, readineſs to ſpeak; direct my beginning, further my progreſſion, and perfect my concluſion.

THE PENITENT, OR, ENTERTAINMENTS for LENT:

And for the firſt day upon the Conſideration of Aſhes.

THou art Duſt, and to Duſt thou ſhalt return, Geneſ. 3.

1. It is an excellent way to begin Lent with the conſideration of Duſt, whereby Nature gives us beginning, and by the ſame, Death ſhall put an end to all our worldly vanities. There is no better way to abate and humble the proudeſt of all Creatures, than to repreſent his beginning and his end. The middle part of our life (like a kind of Proteus) takes upon it ſeveral ſhapes not underſtood by others; but the firſt and laſt part of it deceive no man; for they do both begin and end in Duſt. It is a ſtrange thing that Man, knowing well what he hath been, and what he muſt be, is not confounded in himſelf, by obſerving the pride of his own life, and the great diſorder of his paſſions. The end of all other creatures is leſs deformed than that of man: Plants in their death retain ſome pleaſing ſmell of their bodies: The little roſe buries it ſelf in her natural ſweetneſs, and carnation colour. Many Creatures at their death leave us their teeth, horns, feathers, skins, of which we make great uſe. Others after death are ſerved up in ſilver and golden diſhes, to feed the greateſt perſons of the world. Onely mans dead carcaſe is good for nothing but to feed worms: and yet he often retains the preſumptuous pride of a Giant, by the exorbitancie of his heart, and the cruel nature of a murderer, by the furious rage of his revenge. Surely that man muſt either be ſtupid by nature, or moſt wicked by his own election, who will not correct and amend himſelf, having ſtill before his eyes Aſhes for his Glaſs, and Death for his Miſtreſs.

2. This conſideration of Duſt is an excellent remedy to cure vices, and an aſſured Rampire againſt all temptations. S. Paulinus ſaith excellently well; That holy Job was free from all temptations, when he was placed upon the ſmoke and duſt of his humility. He that lies upon the ground can fall no lower, but may contemplate all above him, and meditate how to raiſe himſelf by the hand of God, which pulls down the proud and exalts the humble. Is a man tempted with pride? The conſideration of Aſhes will humble him. Is he burned with wanton love, which is a direct fire?) But fire cannot conſume Aſhes. Is he perſecuted with covetouſneſs? Aſhes do make the greateſt greateſt Leeches and Bloud-Suckers caſt their Gorges. Every thing gives way to this unvalued thing, becauſe God is pleaſed to draw the inſtruments of his power out of the object of our infirmities.

If we knew how to uſe rightly the meditation of death, we ſhould there find the ſtreams of life: All the world together is of no eſtimation to him, that rightly knows the true value of a juſt mans death. It would be neceſſary, that they who are taken with the curioſity of Tulips, ſhould ſet in their Gardens a Plant called Napel, which carries a flower that moſt perfectly reſembles a Deaths head. And if the other Tulips do pleaſe their ſenſes, that will inſtruct their reaſon. Before our laſt death we ſhould die many other deaths; by forſaking all thoſe creatures and affections which lead us to ſin. We ſhould reſemble thoſe creatures (ſacred to the Ægyptians) called Cynocephales, which died piece-meal, and were buried long before their death: So ſhould we burie all our concupiſcences before we go to the grave, and ſtrive to live ſo, that when death comes, he ſhould find very little buſineſs with us.

Aſpiration.

O Father of all Eſſences, who giveſt beginning to all things, and art without end; This day I take Aſhes upon my head, thereby profeſſing (before thee) my being nothing; and to do thee homage for that which I am, and for that I ought to be by thy great bounties. Alas, O Lord, my poor ſoul is confounded to ſee ſo many ſparkles of pride and covetouſneſs, ariſe from this caitiffe duſt which I am: ſo little do I yet learn how to live, and ſo late do I know how to die. O God, of my life and death, I moſt humbly beſeech thee, ſo to govern the firſt in me, and ſo to ſweeten the laſt for me, that if I live, I may live onely for thee: and if I muſt die, that I may enter into everlaſting bliſs, by dying in thy bleſſed love and favour.

2. It imports us much to begin Lent well, entering into thoſe liſts, in which ſo many holy ſouls have run their courſe with ſo great ſtrictneſs, have been glorious before God, and honourable before men. The difficulty of it is apprehended onely by thoſe who have their underſtandings obſtructed by a violent affection to kitchen-ſtuffe. It is no more burdenſom to a couragious ſpirit, than feathers are to a bird. The chearfulneſs which a man brings to a good action in the beginning, does half the work. Let us waſh our faces by confeſſion: Let us perfume our Head (who is Jeſus Chriſt) by alms-deeds. Faſting is a moſt delicious feaſt to the conſcience, when it is accompanied with pureneſs and charity: but it breeds great thirſt, when it is not nouriſhed with devotion, and watered with mercy.

3. What great pain is taken to get treaſure; what care to preſerve it; what fear to looſe it; and what ſorrow when it is loſt? Alas, is there need of ſo great covetouſneſs in life, to encounter with ſuch extream nakedneſs in death? We have not the ſouls of Giants, nor the body of a Whale. If God will have me poor, muſt I endeavour to reverſe the decrees of heaven and earth, that I may become rich? To whom do we truſt the ſafety of our treaſures? To ruſt, to moths and thieves: were it not better we ſhould in our infirmities depend onely on God Almighty, and comfort our poverty in him who is onely rich, and ſo carrie our ſouls to heaven, where Jeſus on the day of his Aſcenſion did place our Sovereign good. Onely Serpents and covetous men deſire to ſleep among treaſures as Saint Clement ſaith. But the greateſt riches of the world is poverty, free from Covetouſneſs.

Aſpiration.

I Seek thee, (O inviſible God) within the Abyſs of thy brightneſs, and I ſee thee through the vail of thy creatures. Wilt thou always be hidden from me? Shall I never ſee thy face, which with a glimpſe of thy ſplendour canſt make Paradiſe? I work in ſecret, but I know thou art able to reward me in the light. A man can loſe nothing by ſerving thee, and yet nothing is valuable to thy ſervice, for the pain it ſelf is a ſufficient recompence. Thou art the food of my faſtings, and the cure of my infirmities. What have I to do with Moles, to dig the earth like them, and there to hide treaſures? Is it not time to cloſe the earth, when thou doeſt open heaven? and to carrie my heart where thou art, ſince all my riches is in thee? Doth not he deſerve to be everlaſtingly poor, who cannot be content with a God ſo rich as thou art?

The Goſpel for Aſhwedneſday. S. Matthew 6.

Of Hypocritical Faſting.

WHen you faſt, be not as the hypocrites, ſad, for they diſfigure their faces, that they may appear unto men to faſt. Amen, I ſay to you that they have received their reward.

But thou when thou doeſt faſt, anoint thy head, and waſh thy face; that thou appear not to men to faſt, but to thy Father which is in ſecret: and thy Father which ſeeth in ſecret, will repay thee.

Heap not up to your ſelves treaſures on the earth: where the ruſt and moth do corrupt, and where thieves dig through and ſteal. But heap up to your ſelves treaſures in heaven: where neither the ruſt nor moth doth corrupt, and where thieves do not dig through nor ſteal. For where thy treaſure is, there is thy heart alſo.

Moralities.

1. THat man goes to Hell by the way of Paradiſe, who faſts and afflicts his body, to draw the praiſe of Men. Sorrow and vanity together, are not able to make one Chriſtian Act. He deſerves everlaſting hunger, who ſtarves himſelf, that he may ſwell and burſt with vain glory. He ſtands for a ſpectacle to others, being the murderer of himſelf, and by ſowing vanity, reaps nothing but wind. Our intentions muſt be wholly directed to God, and our examples for our neighbour. The Father of all virtues is not to be ſerved with counterfeit devotions; ſuch lies are abominations in his ſight, and Tertullian ſaith, they are, as many adulteries.

The Goſpel for the firſt Thurſday in Lent, S. Matthew 18. of the Centurions words.

O Lord I am not worthy.

AND when he was entered into Capharnaum, there came to him a Centurion, beſeeching him, and ſaying, Lord my boy lieth at home ſick of the palſie, and is ſore tormented.

And Jeſus ſaith to him, I will come and cure him.

And the Centurion making anſwer, ſaid, Lord, I am not worthy that thou ſhouldeſt enter under my roof: but onely ſay the word, and my boy ſhall be healed. For I alſo am a man ſubject to Authority, having under me ſouldiers: and I ſay to this, go, and he goeth: and to another, come, and he cometh: and to my ſervant, do this, and he doth it. And Jeſus hearing this, marvelled, and ſaid to them that followed him, Amen, I ſay to you, I have not found ſo great faith in Iſrael.

And

And I ſay to you, that many ſhall come from the Eaſt and Weſt, and ſhall ſit down with Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob in the Kingdom of Heaven: but the children of the Kingdom ſhall be caſt out into the exteriour darkneſs, there ſhall be weeping and gnaſhing of teeth. And Jeſus ſaid to the Centurion, Go, and as thou haſt believed, be it done to thee. And the boy was healed in the ſame hour.

Moralities.

1. OUr whole Salvation conſiſts in two principles; The one is, in our being ſenſible of God; and the other, in moving toward him; the firſt, proceeds from faith; the other, comes of charity and other virtues. O what a happy thing it is to follow the examples of this good Centurion, by having ſuch elevated thoughts of the Divinity, and to know nothing of God, but what he is: To behold our heavenly Father, within this great family of the world, who effects all things by his ſingle word; Creates by his power; governs by his counſel; and orders by his goodneſs this great univerſality of all things. The moſt inſenſible creatures have ears to hear him. Feavers and tempeſts are part of that running camp, which marcheth under his Standard: They advance and retire themſelves under the ſhadow of his command: he onely hath power to give meaſures to the Heaven, bounds to the Sea, to joyn the Eaſt and Weſt together in an inſtant, and to be in all places where his pleaſure is underſtood.

2. O how goodly a thing it is to go unto him, like this great Captain: To go ſaid I? Nay, rather to flie as he doth, by the two wings of Charity and Humility. His charity made him have a tender care of his poor ſervant, and to eſteem his health more dear, than great men do the rareſt pieces in their Cabinets. He doth not truſt his ſervants, but takes the charge upon himſelf: making himſelf (by the power of love) a ſervant to him, who by birth was made ſubject to his command. What can be ſaid of ſo many Maſters and Miſtreſſes now adays, who live always ſlaves to their paſſions? having no care at all of the Salvation, health, or neceſsities of their ſervants, as if they were nothing elſe but the very ſcum of the world. They make great uſe of their labours and ſervice (which is juſt) but neglect their bodies, and kill their ſouls by the infection of their wicked examples. Mark the humility of this ſouldier, who doth not think his houſe worthy to be enlightened by one ſole glimpſe of our bleſſed Saviours preſence. By the words of Saint Auguſtine we may ſay, he made himſelf worthy by believing, and declaring himſelf ſo unworthy: yea, worthy that our Saviour ſhould enter, not onely into his houſe, but into his very ſoul. And upon the matter he could not have ſpoken with ſuch faith and humility, if he had not firſt encloſed (in his heart) him, whom he durſt not receive into his houſe.

3. The Gentiles come near unto God, and the Jews go from him; to teach us, that ordinarily the moſt obliged perſons are moſt ungratefull; and diſeſteem their benefactours for no other reaſon, but becauſe they receive benefits daily from them. If you ſpeak courteouſly to them, they anſwer churliſhly; and in the ſame proportion wherein you are good, you make them wicked; therefore we muſt be carefull that we be not ſo toward God. Many are diſtaſted with devotion, as the Iſraelites were with Manna: All which is good doth diſpleaſe them, becauſe it is ordinary: And you ſhall find ſome, who (like naughty grounds) caſt up thorns where roſes are planted. But we have great reaſon to fear, that nothing but hell fire is capable to puniſh thoſe, who deſpiſe the graces of God, and eſteem that which comes from him as a thing of no value.

Aſpirations.

O Almighty Lord, who doeſt govern all things in the family of this world, and doeſt bind all inſenſible creatures, (by the bare ſound of thy voice) in a chain of everlaſting obedience: Muſt I onely be ſtill rebellious againſt thy will? Feavers and Paſſies have their ears for thee, and yet my unruly ſpirit is not obedient. Alas, alas, this family of my heart is ill governed; It hath violent paſſions; my thoughts are wandering, and my reaſon is ill obeyed. Shall it never be like the houſe of this good Centurion, where every thing went by meaſure, becauſe he meaſured himſelf by thy commandments? O Lord, I will come reſolutely by a profound humility, and an inward feeling of my ſelf, ſince I am ſo contemptible before thine eyes. I will come with Charity toward theſe of my houſhold, and toward all that ſhall need me. O God of my heart, I beſeech thee, let nothing from henceforth move in me, but onely to advance my coming toward thee, who art the beginning of all motions, and the onely repoſe of all things which move.

The Goſpel for the firſt Friday in Lent, S. Matth. 5. Wherein we are directed to pray for our Enemies.

YOu have heard that it was ſaid, thou ſhalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemie. But I ſay to you, Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you: and pray for them that perſecute and abuſe you: that you may be the children of your Father which is in Heaven, who maketh his Sun to riſe upon good and bad, and raineth upon juſt and unjuſt. For if you love them that love you, what reward ſhall you have? Do not alſo the Publicans this? And if you ſalute your brethren onely, what do you more? Do not alſo the heathen this? Be you perfect therefore, as alſo your heavenly Father is perfect.

Moralities.

1. A Man that loves nothing but according to his natural inclination, loves onely like a beaſt or an infidel. The beſt ſort of love is that which is commanded by God, and is derived from judgement, conducted by reaſon, and perfected by Charity. Me thinks it ſhould be harder for a good Chriſtian to hate, than love his enemy. Hate makes him our equal, whereas love placeth us quite above him. By hating a mans enemy, he breaks the laws of God; he fights againſt the Incarnation of Chriſt, which was acted to unite all things in the bands of love: he gives the lie to the moſt bleſſed Euchariſt, whoſe nature is to make the hearts of all Chriſtians the ſame: he lives (like another Cain in the world) always diſquieted by ſeeking revenge, and it is a very death to him to hear another mans proſperity. Whereas to love an enemy, doth not bind us to love the injury he hath done us; for we muſt not conſider him as a maleſactour, but as a man of our own nature, as he is the Image of God, and as he is a Chriſtian. God doth onely command perfect things, not impoſſible. That which is very hard to fleſh and bloud, become eaſie by the help of grace and reaſon. Our bleſſed Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, being the Father of all harmony, can, and doth reconcile all contrarieties at his will and pleaſure.

2. If revenge ſeem ſweet, the gaining of it is moſt bitter: But there is nothing in the world more profitable, fitable, than to pardon an enemy by imitation of our Saviour. For it is then that our conſcience can aſſure us to be the children of God, and inheritours of his glory. We muſt not fear to be deſpiſed for eſteeming virtue, for ſuch contempt can onely proceed from thoſe, who know not the true value of that glory which belongs to the juſt. There is no better way to revenge, than leave it to God, who always doth his own buſineſs. When David wept for Saul, who was his enemy, his Clemency did inſenſibly make degrees, by which he mounted up to the throne of Judah. A good work which comes from the ſpirit of vanity, is like an emptied Mine, good for nothing. God, who is inviſible, would have our aſpects turned always toward him, and blind toward the world. Alms given by the ſound of a Trumpet, makes a great noiſe on earth, but reaps little fruit in Heaven. The flie of vanity is a miſchievous thing, which deſtroys all the perfumes of Charity. What need we any ſpectatours of our good works, every place is full where God is, and where he is not, there onely is Solitude.

Aſpirations.

O God of all holy affections, when ſhall I love all which thou loveſt, and have in horrour all that diſpleaſeth thy divine Majeſty: If I cannot love in ſome perſon his defects and ſins, I will love in him thine Image, and in that will I acknowledge thy mercies. If he be a piece of broken glaſs, in that little piece, there will ſhine ſome lines of a God-Creatour, and of a God-Redeemer. If thou haſt choſen him to exerciſe my patience, why ſhould I make him the object of my revenge, ſince he gives me trouble to gain me a Crown. He is a hammer to polliſh and make me bright, I will not hurt him, but reverence the arm that ſtrikes me. I reſign all vengeance into thy hands, ſince it is a Right reſerved for thy Almighty power. And certainly, the beſt revenge I can take, is to gratifie my enemy. Give unto me (O moſt mercifull Prince) the grace to ſuffer, and let the ſacrifice of my ſufferings mount up to thy propitiatory Throne.

The Goſpel for the firſt Saturday in Lent, S. Matth. 6.

Of the Apoſtles danger at Sea, and relief by our SAVIOUR.

AND when he had diſmiſſed them, he went into the mountain to pray, and when it was late, the boat was in the midſt of the Sea, and himſelf alone on the land. And ſeeing them labouring in rowing (for the wind was againſt them) and about the fourth watch of the night, he cometh to them, walking upon the ſea: and he would have paſſed by them. But they ſeeing him walking upon the ſea, thought it was a ghoſt, and cried out, for all ſaw him, and were troubled. And immediately he talked with them, and ſaid to them, Have confidence, it is I, fear ye not. And he went up to them into the ſhip, and the wind ceaſed; and they were far more aſtonied within themſelves, for they underſtood not concerning the loaves, for their heart was blinded.

And when they had paſſed over, they came into the land of Geneſareth, and ſet to the ſhore. And when they were gone out of the boat, incontinent they knew him, and running through that whole Countrey, they began to carry about in couches, thoſe that were ill at eaſe, where they heard he was. And whitherſoever he entered into towns, or into villages, or cities, they laid the ſick in the ſtreets, and beſought him, that they might touch but the hem of his garment, and as many as touched him, were made whole.

Moralities.

1. WHat a painfull thing it is to row, when Jeſus is not in the boat; all our travel is juſt nothing without Gods favour: A little blaſt of wind is worth more than an hundred ſtrokes of oars. What troubleſom buſineſſes there are: how many intricate families do labour much, and yet advance nothing, becauſe God withdraws himſelf from their iniquities; if he do not build, the workman deſtroyes what he is building. But all falls out right to thoſe, that embark themſelves with Jeſus. They may paſs to the Indies in a basket, when others ſhall miſcarry in a good ſhip, well furniſhed.

2. But how comes it about, that the ſhip of the poor Apoſtles is beaten ſo furiouſly by the winds and tempeſts? There are many ſhips with ſilver beaks, with fine linnen ſails, and ſilken tackles, upon which the ſea ſeems to ſmile. Do the waters reſerve their choller, onely to vent it upon that ſhip which carries juſt perſons? This is the courſe of mans life: The brave and happy men of this world enjoy their wiſhes, but their ſhip doth periſh in the harbour, as it is ſporting; whereas God by his infinite providence, gives tempeſts to his elect, that he may work a miraculous calm by his Almighty power. Dangers are witneſſes of their floting, and Combats are cauſes of their merit. Never think any man happy in his wickedneſs, for he is juſt like a fiſh that playes with the bait, when the hook ſticks faſt in his throat. We muſt wait and attend for help from Heaven patiently (without being tired) even till the fourth, which is the laſt watch of the night. All which proceeds from the hand of God, comes ever in fit time, and that man is a great gainer by his patient attendance, who thereby gets nothing but perſeverance.

3. They know Jeſus very ill, that take him for a Phantome or an illuſion, and crie out for fear of his preſence, which ſhould make them moſt rejoyce: So do thoſe ſouls which are little acquainted with God, who live in blindneſs, and make much of their own darkneſs. Let us learn to diſcern God from the illuſions of the world: The tempeſt ceaſeth when he doth approach; and the quietneſs of our heart is a ſure mark of his preſence, which fills the ſoul with ſplendour, and makes it a delicious garden. He makes all good whereſoever he comes, and the ſteps which his feet leave, are the bounties of his heart. To touch the Hem of his Garment, cures all that are ſick; to teach us, that the forms which cover the bleſſed Sacrament are the fringes of his holy humanity, which cures our ſins.

Aſpiration.

O Lord, my ſoul is in night and darkneſs, and I feel that thou art far from me. What billows of diſquiet riſe within my heart; what idle thoughts which have been too much conſidered? Alas (moſt redoubted Lord and Father of mercy) canſt thou behold from firm land this poor veſſel, which labours ſo extreamly, being deprived of thy moſt amiable preſence? I row ſtrongly, but can advance nothing, except thou come into my ſoul. Come (O my adored Maſter) walk upon this tempeſtuous Sea of my heart; aſcend into this poor veſſel; ſay unto me, Take courage, It is I. Be not conceited that I will take thee for an illuſion; for I know thee too well by thy powers and bounties, to be ſo miſtaken. The leaſt thought of my heart will quiet it ſelf to adore thy ſteps. Thou ſhalt reign within me; thou ſhalt diſperſe my cares; thou ſhalt recover my decayed ſenſes; thou ſhalt lighten my underſtanding; thou ſhalt inflame my will; thou ſhalt cure all my infirmities: And to conclude, thou onely ſhalt work in me, and I will be wholly thine.

The

The Gospel for the first Sunday in Lent, S. Matthew 4.

Of our SAVIOUR's being tempted in the Desart.

THen Jesus was led of the Spirit into the Desart, to be tempted of the Devil, and when he had fasted fourty days and fourty nights, afterward he was hungry: And the Tempter approched, and said to him, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread: Who answered and said, It is written, not in bread alone doth man live, but in every word that proceedeth from the mouth of God.

Then the Devil took him up into the holy Citie, and set him upon the pinacle of the Temple, and said to him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thy self down, for it is written, That he will give his Angels charge of thee, and in their hands shall they hold thee up, lest perhaps thou knock thy foot against a stone. Jesus said to him again, It is written, thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.

Again the Devil took him up into a very high mountain, and he shewed him all the Kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them, and said to him, All these will I give thee, if falling down thou wilt adore me. Then Jesus saith to him, Avant Satan; for it is written, the Lord thy God shalt thou adore, and him onely shalt thou serve. Then the Devil left him, and behold Angels came, and ministered to him.

Moralities.

1. JESUS suffered himself to be tempted (saith Saint Augustine) to the end he might serve for a Mediatour, for an example, and for a remedy to work our victory over all temptations. We must fight on his side: Our life is a continual warfare, and our days are Champions which enter into the lists. There is no greater temptation, than to have none at all: Sleeping water doth nourish poison. Motion is the worlds soul; fighting against temptations, is the soul of virtues, and glory doth spring and bud out of tribulations. Virtue hinders not temptation, but surmounts it. Jesu fasted (saith the ordinary gloss) that he might be tempted, and is tempted because he did fast. He fasted fourty days, and then was hungry; he did eat with his Disciples the space of fourty days after his resurrection, without any more necessity of meat, than the Sun hath of the earths vapours: to make us thereby know, that it onely appertained to him, to teach that great secret how to mannage want and abundance, by which S. Paul was glorified.

2. The first victory over a Temptation, is, to know that which tempts us: Some temptations are gay and smiling at their beginning, as those of love and pleasure, which end in terrible and bitter storms: Others are troublesom and irksom: Others doubtfull and intricate: Others rapide and sudden, which seize upon their prey like an Eagle: Others are close and catching. These are the snares of Satan, who comes like a Bore, roars like a Lion, and hisseth like a Serpent. We should always have an eye ready, to mark from whence the Temptation comes, whither it tends, what is the root of it, what the course, what the progress, and what power it may have over our spirit.

3. Solitude of heart, fasting, prayer, the word of God, are weapons of an excellent temper, which the Word Incarnate teacheth us to use in this conflict. These things are to be used with discretion, by the counsel of a good directour, to whom a man must declare all his most secret thoughts, and bear a breast of chrystal toward him, with a firm purpose to let him see all the inward motions of his heart. It is also good to note here, that our Lord would expressly be tempted in that Desart, which is between Jerusalem and Jericho, where the Samaritane (mentioned in the Parable) did pour wine and oyl into the sores of the poor wounded man; to teach us, that by his combat, he came to cure the wounds of Adam, and all his race, in the very place where they were received.

4. Sin is killed by flying the occasions of it. Absence, resistance, coldness, silence, labour, diversion, have overcome many assaults of the enemy. Sometimes a Spiders web is strong enough to preserve chastity, and at other times the thick walls of Semiramis are not sufficient. God governs all, and a good will to concur with him, is a strong assurance in all perils, and it will keep us untoucht amidst the flames of lust.

5. Since it imports us so much to fight valiantly, let us bring the hearts of Lions. Where is our Christianity, if we do not give testimony of it to God, both by our fidelity and courage? How many Martyrs have been rosted and broiled, because they would not speak one ill word? What honour can you expect by yielding at the first enterance, to a temptation? Look not upon the violence of it, but contemplate the Crown, which you should gain by conquering it; think at your enterance how you will come off, and know for certain, that he who truly considers the consequence of a wicked action, will never begin it.

6. Lent is the Spring-time for sanctified resolutions, it mortifies the body, that the spirit may triumph, it is a time of grace which tends to salvation and mercy. It imports extreamly to commend all to God at the beginning, to sanctifie this fasting, which is part of our devotion: we must abstain from flesh, and be content with one meal at seasonable hours, without making over large collations; except age, infirmity, or weakness, labour, or necessity of other functions, shall dispence with our diet: for those who are unable to fast suffer more by their disability, than others do by fasting. It is good to follow the counsel of Athanasius, who adviseth to eat late, and little, and at a table where there is but one sort of meat. We must also fast by abstinence from vice. For to weaken our body, and yet nourish our naughty passions, is to fast as the devils do, who eat nothing, and yet devour the world by the rage of their malice. Sobriety is a stream which waters all virtues. Our soul and body are as the scales of a ballance; if you pull down the one, you raise up the other; and if you tame your flesh, it makes the Spirit reign and govern.

Aspirations.

O Most mercifull Lord, Father, and Protectour of all my life, how great are the temptations and snares, whereunto I am subject; when I eat, drink, sleep, when I do business, when I am both in conversation and solitude? Whither shall this poor soul go, which thou hast thrown into a body so frail, in a world so corrupt, and amongst the assaults of so many pernicious enemies? Open, O Lord, thine eyes for my guidance, and compassionate my infirmities: without thee I can do nothing, and in thee I can do all that I ought. Give me, O Lord, a piercing eye, to see my danger, and the wings of an Eagle, to flie from it, or the heart of a Lion to fight valiantly, that I may never be wanting in my duty and fidelity to thee. I ow all that I am or have, to thy gracious favour, and I will hope for my salvation, not by any proportion of my own virtues (which are weak and slender) but by thy boundless liberalities, which onely do crown all our good works.

The Goſpel upon Munday, the firſt week of Lent, out of Saint Matthew 25.

Of the Judgement-Day.

And when the Son of man ſhall come in his Majeſty, and all the Angels with him, then ſhall he ſit upon the ſeat of his Majeſty. And all Nations ſhall be gathered together before him, and he ſhall ſeparate them one from another, as the Paſtour ſeparateth the ſheep from the goats: And ſhall ſet the ſheep at his right hand, but the goats at his left.

Then ſhall the King ſay to them that ſhall be at his right hand, Come ye bleſſed of my Father, poſſeſs you the Kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. For I was hungred, and you gave me to eat: I was athirſt, and you gave me to drink: I was a ſtranger, and you took me in: naked, and you covered me: ſick, and you viſited me. I was in priſon, and you came to me. Then ſhall the juſt anſwer him, ſaying, Lord, when did we ſee thee an hungred, and fed thee: athirſt, and gave thee drink? and when did we ſee thee a ſtranger, and took thee in? or naked, and covered thee? or when did we ſee thee ſick, or in priſon, and came to thee? And the King anſwering, ſhall ſay to them, Amen I ſay to you, as long as you did it to one of theſe my leaſt brethren, you did it to me.

Then ſhall he ſay to them alſo that ſhall be at his left hand, Get you away from me you curſed into fire everlaſting, which was prepared for the Devil and his Angels. For I was an hungred, and you gave me not to eat: I was athirſt, and you gave me not to drink: I was a ſtranger, and ye took me not in: naked, and you covered me not: ſick, and in priſon, and you did not viſit me. Then they alſo ſhall anſwer him, ſaying, Lord, when did we ſee thee an hungred, or athirſt, or a ſtranger, or naked, or ſick, or in priſon, and did not miniſter to thee? Then ſhall he anſwer them, ſaying, Amen I ſay to you, as long as you did it not to one of theſe leſſer, neither did you it to me. And theſe ſhall go into puniſhment everlaſting: but the juſt, into life everlaſting.

Moralities.

1. Behold here a Goſpel of great terrour, where our ſpirit, like the Dove of Noah, is placed upon the great deluge of Gods wrath, and knows not where to find footing. Every thing is moſt dreadfull; But what can be more terrible, than the certainty of Gods judgement, joyned with the great uncertainty of the hour of our death? It is an unchangeable decree, that we muſt all be preſented before the high Tribunal of the living God, to render a juſt account of all which our ſoul hath done, while it was joyned with our body, as we are taught by S. Paul. We muſt make an account of our time ſpent, of our thoughts, words, actions, of that we have done, and that we have omitted, of life, death, and of the bloud of Jeſus Chriſt; and thereupon receive a judgement of everlaſting life or death. All men know that this muſt certainly be done, but no man knows the hour or moment when it ſhall be. So many clocks ſtrike about us every day, and yet none can let us know the hour of our death.

2. O how great is the ſolitude of a Soul in her ſeparation, from ſo many great enticements of the world, (wherein many men live) and in an inſtant to ſee nothing but the good or ill we have done on either ſide us, what an aſtoniſhment will it be for a man ſuddenly to ſee all the actions of his life (as upon a piece of Tapiſtree) ſpred befor his eyes; where his ſins will appear like ſo many thorns, ſo many ſerpents, ſo many venemous beaſts. Where will then be that cozening vail of reputation, and reaſon of ſtate, which as yet cover ſo many wicked actions? The ſoul ſhall (in that day of God) be ſhewed naked to all the world, and her own eyes will moſt vex her, by witneſſing ſo plainly what ſhe hath done.

3. O what a parting water is Gods judgement, which in a moment ſhall ſeparate the mettals ſo different? O what a diviſion will then be made of ſome men which now live upon earth? Some ſhall be made clear and bright like the ſtars of heaven, & others like coals burning in hell. O what a dreadfull change will it be to a damned ſoul at her ſeparation from this life, to live onely in the company of devils, in that piercing ſenſe of torments, and eternal puniſhment? It is a very troubleſom thing, to be tied with ſilken ſtrings in a bed of Roſes, for the ſpace of eight days together. What may we think of a damned ſoul, which muſt dwell in a bed of flames, ſo long as there ſhall be a God.

4. Make uſe of the time given you to work your ſalvation, and live ſuch a life as may end with a happy death, and ſo obtain that favourable judgement, which ſhall ſay; Come, O thou ſoul bleſſed of God my Father, poſſeſs the kingdom which is prepared for thee from the beginning of the world. There is no better means to avoid the rigour of Gods judgements, than to fear them continually. Imitate the tree (mentioned in an Emblem) which being deſigned to make a ſhip, and finding it ſelf wind-ſhaken as it grew upon the land, ſaid, What will become of me in the ſea? If we be already moved in this world, by the bare conſideration of the puniſhment due to ſin, think what it will be in that vaſt ſea, and dreadfull Abyſs of Gods judgements.

Aſpirations.

O King of dreadfull Majeſty, who doeſt juſtly damn, and undeſervedly ſave ſouls; ſave me, O Fountain of Mercy. Remember thy ſelf (ſweet Jeſus) that I was the cauſe of that great journey which thou tookeſt from God to man; and do not deſtroy me in that dreadfull day, which muſt decide the Queſtion of my life or death for all eternity. Take care of my laſt end, ſince thou art the cauſe of my beginning, and the onely cauſe of all that I am. O Father of bounties, wouldeſt thou ſtop a mouth which deſires ſo earneſtly to praiſe and confeſs thee everlaſtingly? Alas (O eternal Sweetneſs) wouldeſt thou damn a ſoul which hath coſt thee ſo much ſweat and bloud, giving it for ever to thoſe cruel and accurſed powers of darkneſs? Rather, O Lord, pierce my heart with ſuch a fear of thy judgement, that I may always dread, and never feel them: If I forget, awake my memory, if I flie from thee, recal me again: If I deferre my amendment, ſtay for me; If I return, do not deſpiſe my ſoul, but open thoſe arms of mercy, which thou didſt ſpread upon the Croſs, with ſuch rigorous juſtice againſt thy ſelf, for ſatisfaction of my ſins.

The Goſpel upon Tueſday, the firſt week in Lent, out of Saint Matthew 21.

Jesus drove the Buyers and Sellers out of the Temple.

And when he was entered Jeruſalem, the whole City was moved, ſaying, Who is this? And the people ſaid, This is Jeſus the Prophet, of Nazareth in Galilee. And Jeſus entered into the Temple of God, and caſt out all that ſold and bought in the Temple, and the tables of the bankers, and the chairs of them that ſold pigeons he overthrew: and he ſaith to them, It is written, My houſe ſhall be called the houſe of prayer, but you have made it a den of thieves. And there came to him the blind and the lame in the Temple: and he healed them. And the chief Priests and Scribes seeing the marvellous things that he did, and the children crying in the Temple, and saying, Hosanna to the Son of David: they had indignation, and said to him, Hearest thou what these say? And Jesus said to them, Very well, have you never read, that out of the mouthes of infants and sucklings thou hast perfected praise? and leaving them, he went forth out of the City into Bethania, and remained there.

Moralities.

1. JEsus entering into Jerusalem, went streight to the Temple, as a good Son goes to his Fathers house; as a High-Priest to the Sanctuary; and as a sacrifice to the Altar. He doth very lively intereſt himself in the goods of his Heavenly Father, and chaseth out every prophane thing out of that sacred place, to give thereby glory to the living God, and to put all things in order. It is a wicked stain to Religion, when Ecclesiastical persons are vicious, and when Churches are profaned. Saint John Chrysostom saith, That Priests are the heart of the Church, but when they are wicked, they turn all into sin. A decaying tree hath always some ill quality about the root; so when any people are without discipline, the Pastours are without virtue. The want of reverence in Churches, begets the contempt of God; they cannot have Jesus in their hearts, when they give him affronts even in his own Temple.

2. His house (saith he) is a house of Prayer; but your heart should be the Sanctuary, and your lips the door. So long as you are without the exercise of prayer, you shall be like a Bee without a sting, which can make neither honey nor wax. Prayer is the chiefest and most effectual means of that Angelical conversation, to which God calls us, by the merits of his passion, and by the effects of his triumphant resurrection. It is the sacred business which man hath with God, and (to speak with Saint Gregory Nazianzen) it is the art, to make our souls divine. Before all things you must put into an order, the number, the time, the place, the manner of your prayers; and be sure that you pay unto God this tribute, with respect, fervour, and perseverance. But if you desire to make a very good prayer, learn betimes to make a prayer of all your life. Incense hath no smell without fire, and prayer is of no force without charity. A man must converse innocently and purely with men, that desire to treat worthily with God.

3. Keep your person and your house clean, from ill managing all holy things, and from those irreverences, which are sometimes committed in Churches. It is a happy thing for a man to be ignorant of the trade of buying and selling benefices, and to have no intercourse with the tribunals of iniquity. Many other sins are written in sand, and blown away with a small breath of Gods mercy; But the faults of so great impiety, are carved upon a corner of the Altar, with a graver of steel, or with a diamond point, as the Prophet saith. He deserves to be made eternally culpable, who dries up the fountain, which should waste himself, or poisons the stream, which he himself must drink; or contanimates the Sacraments which are given him, to purifie his soul.

Aspirations.

SPirit of God, which by reason of thy eminent height, canst pray to no body, and yet by thy divine wisdom, makest all the world pray to thee; Give me the gift of prayer, since it is the mother of wisdom; the seal of virginity, the sanctuary for our evils, and fountain of all our goods. Grant that I may adore thee in Spirit with reverence, stedfastness, and perseverance: and if it be thy divine pleasure that I pray unto thee as I ought; inspire into me (by thy virtue) such prayers as thou wilt hear by thy bountie.

The Gospel for Wednesday the first week of Lent, S. Matth. 12.

The Pharisees demand a Sign of JESUS.

THen answered him certain of the Scribes and Pharisees, saying, Master, we would see a sign from thee, who answered, and said to them: The wicked and adulterous generation seeketh a sign: and a sign shall not be given it, but the sign of Jonas the Prophet: For as Jonas was in the Whales belly three days, and three nights: so shall the Son of man be in the heart of the earth three days and three nights. The men of Nineveh shall rise in the judgement with this generation, and shall condemn it, because they did penance at the preaching of Jonas. And behold more than Jonas here, The Queen of the South shall rise in the judgement with this generation, and shall condemn it; because she came from the ends of the earth, to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and behold more than Solomon here. And when an unclean spirit shall go out of a man, he walketh through drie places, seeking rest and findeth not. Then he saith, I will return into my house whence I came out. And coming, he findeth it vacant, swept with besoms, and trimmed, then goeth he, and taketh with him seven other spirits, more wicked than himself, and they enter in, and dwell there, and the last of that man be made worse than the first. So shall it be also to this wicked generation.

As he was yet speaking to the multitudes, behold his mother and his brethren stood without, seeking to speak to him, and one said unto him, Behold thy mother and thy brethren stand without, seeking thee. But he answering him that told him, said, Who is my mother, and who are my brethren? And stretching forth his hand upon his Disciples, he said, Behold my mother and my brethren: for whosoever shall do the will of my Father that is in Heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother.

Moralities.

1. IT is a very ill sign, when we desire signs to make us believe in God. The signs which we demand to fortifie our faith, are oft-times marks of our infidelity. There is not a more dangerous plague in the events of worldly affairs, than to deal with the devil, or to cast nativities. All these things fill men with more faults than knowledge. For divine Oracles have more need to be reverenced than interpreted. He that will find God, must seek him with simplicity, and profess him with piety.

2. Some require a sign, and yet between Heaven and earth, all is full of signs. How many creatures soever they are, they are all steps and characters of the Divinity. What a happy thing it is to study what God is by the volume of time, and by that great Book of the world. There is not so small a flower of the meadows, nor so little a creature upon earth, which doth not tell us some news of him. He speaks in our ears by all creatures, which are so many Organ-pipes to convey his Spirit and voice to us. But he hath no sign so great as the Word Incarnate, which carries all the types of his glory and power. About him only should be all our curiosity, our knowledge, our admiration, and our love, because in him we can be sure to find all our repose and consolation.

3. Are we not very miserable, since we know not our own good, but by the loss of it, which makes us esteem so little of those things we have in our hands? The Ninivites did hear old Jonas the Prophet. The Queen of Sheba came from far to hear the wisdom of Solomon: Jesus speaks to us usually from the Pulpits, from the Altars; in our conversations, in our affairs and recreations: And yet we do not sufficiently esteem his words nor inspirations. A surfeited spirit mislikes honey, and is distasted with Manna, raving after the rotten pots of Ægypt. But it is the last and worst of all ills, to despise our own good. Too much confidence, is mother of an approching danger: A man must keep himself from relapses, which are worse than sins, which are the greatest evils of the world; he that loves danger, shall perish in it. The first sin brings with it one devil, but the second brings seven: There are some, who vomit up their sins, as the Sea doth cockles, to swallow them again. Their life is nothing but an ebbing and flowing of sins, and their most innocent retreats, are a disposition to iniquity. For as boiled water doth soonest freeze, because the cold works upon it with the greater force; so those little fervours of Devotion, which an unfaithfull soul feels in confessions, and receiving (if it be not resolute quite to forsake wickedness) serve for nothing else but to provoke the wicked spirit, to make a new impression upon her: It is then we have most reason to fear Gods justice, when we despise his mercie. We become neerest of kin to him, when his Ordinances are followed by our manners, and our life by his precepts.

Aspirations.

O Word Incarnate, the great sign of thy heavenly Father, who carriest all the marks of his glory, and all the characters of his powers. It is thou alone whom I seek, whom I esteem and honour: All that I see, all I understand, all that I feel, is nothing to me, if it do not carry thy name, and take colour from thy beauties, nor be animated by thy Spirit. Thy conversation hath no trouble, and thy presence no distast. O let me never lose by my negligence, what I possess by thy bounty. Keep me from relapses, keep me from the second gulf, and second hell of sin. He is too blind, that profits nothing by experience of his own wickedness, and by a full knowledge of thy bounties.

The Gospel for Thursday, the first week in Lent, out of S. Matth 15.

Of the Woman of Canaan.

AND Jesus went forth from thence, and retired into the quarters of Tyre and Sidon. And behold a woman of Canaan came forth out of these coasts, and crying out, said to him, Have mercy upon me, O Lord, the Son of David: my daughter is sore vexed of a devil, who answered her not a word. And his Disciples came and besought him, saying, Dismiss her, because she crieth out after us: And he answering, said; I was not sent but to the sheep that are lost of the house of Israel. But she came and adored him, saying, Lord help me, who answering, said: It is not good to take the bread of children, and to cast it to the dogs: but she said, Yea Lord, for the dogs also eat of the crums that fall from the tables of their masters. Then Jesus answering, said to her, O woman, great is thy faith, be it done to thee as thou wilt: and her daughter was made whole from that hour.

Moralities.

1. OUr Saviour Jesus Christ, after his great and wondrous descent from heaven to earth; from being infinite to be finite; from being God to be man; used many several means for salvation of the world. And behold entering upon the frontiers of Tyre and Sidon, he was pleased to conceal himself: But it is very hard to avoid the curiosity of a woman, who seeking his presence, was thereby certain to find the full point of her felicity. A very small beam of illumination reflecting upon her, carried her out of her Countrey, and a little spark of light brought her to find out the clear streams of truth. We must not be tired with seeking God, and when we have found him, his pteesence should not diminish, but encrease our desire to keep him still. We are to make enterance into our happiness, by taking fast hold of the first means offered for our salvation; and we must not refuse or lose a good fortune which knocks at our door.

2. Great is the power of a woman, when she applies her self to virtue; behold at one instant, how one of that sex assails God and the devil, prevailing with the one by submission, and conquering the other by command: And he which gave the wild Sea arms to contain all the world, finds his own arms tied by the chains of a prayer, which himself did inspire. She draws unto her (by a pious violence) the God of all strength, such was the fervency of her prayer, such the wisdom of her answers, and such the faith of her words. As he passed away without speaking, she hath the boldness to call him to her; whiles he is silent, she prays; when he excuseth himself, she adores him; when he refuseth her suit, she draws him to her. To be short, she is stronger than the Patriarch Jacob, for when he did wrestle with the Angel, he returned lame from the conflict, but this woman, after she had been so powerfull with God, returns strait to her house, there to see her victories, and possess her conquests.

3. Mark with what weapons she overcame the greatest of all conquerours. Charity drew her from home, to seek health for her daughter, because like a good mother, she loved her not with a luxurious love, but in her affliction; feeling all her dolours, by their passionate reflection upon her heart. Her faith was planted upon so firm a rock, that amongst all the apparances of despair, her hope remained constant. Humility did effect, that the name of Dog, was given her for a title of glory, she making profit of injuries, and converting into honour the greatest contempt of her person. Her words were low and humble, but her faith was wonderous high, since in a moment she chased away the devil, saved her daughter, and changed the word Dog, into the name of a Sheep of Christs flock, as Sedulius writes. Perseverance was the last of her virtues in the Combat, but it was the first which gained her Crown. If you will imitate her in these four virtues; Love, Faith, Humility, and Perseverance, they are the principal materials of which the body of your perfection must be compounded.

Aspirations.

O Jesus Christ, Son of David, I remember well that thy foresather did by his harp chase away the devil from Saul. And wilt not thou, who art the Father of all blessed harmonies, drive away from me so many little spirits, of Affections, of Appetites and Passions, which trouble and discompose my heart? This poor soul, which is the breath of thy mouth, and daughter of thine infinite bounties, is (like the Sun under a cloud) possessed with many wicked spirits, but it hath none worse than that of self-love. Look upon me (O Lord) with thine eyes of mercy, and send me not away with silence, since thou art the Word. Rather call me Dog, so that I may be suffered to gather up the crums which fall from thy table: Whatsoever proceeds from thy mouth is sacred, and must must be taken by me as a relique. If thou say I shall obtain my desire, I say I will have no other, than what thou inspirest, and I can be contented with nothing, but what shall be thy blessed will and pleasure.

The Gospel upon Friday, the first week in Lent, S. John 15.

Of the Probatick Pond.

After these things, there was a festival day of the Jews, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem: and there is at Jerusalem upon Probatica, a Pond, which in Hebrew is named Bethsaida, having five porches. In these lay a great multitude of sick persons, of blind, lame, withered, expecting the stirring of the water.

And an Angel of our Lord descended at a certain time into the Pond; and the water was stirred. And he that had gone down first into the Pond, after the stirring of the water, was made whole, of whatsoever infirmity he was holden. And there was a certain man there that had been eight and thirty years in his infirmity. Him, when Jesus had seen lying, and knew that he had now a long time, he saith to him, Wilt thou be made whole? The sick man answered him, Lord, I have no man, when the water is troubled, to put me into the Pond: for whiles I come, another goeth down before me. Jesus saith to him, Arise, take up thy bed, and walk. And forthwith he was made whole: and he took up his bed, and walked. And it was the Sabbath that day. The Jews therefore said to him that was healed, it is the Sabbath, thou mayest not take up thy bed. He answered them, He that made me whole, he said to me, Take up thy bed, and walk. They asked him therefore, What is that man that said to thee, Take up thy bed, and walk? But he that was made whole, knew not who it was. For Jesus shrunk aside from the multitude, standing in the place. Afterward Jesus findeth him in the Temple, and said to him, Behold thou art made whole: sin no more, lest some worse thing chance to thee. That man went his way, and told the Jews that it was Jesus that made him whole.

Moralities.

1. ALl the world is but one great Hospital, wherein so many persons languish, expecting the moving of the water, and the time of their good fortune. The Angels of earth which govern our fortunes, go not so fast as our desires. But Jesus, who is the great Angel of Counsel, is always ready to cure our maladies; to support our weakness, and make perfect our virtues. We need onely to follow his motions and inspirations, to meet with everlasting rest. It is a lamentable thing, that some can patiently expect the barren favours of men twenty or thirty years together, and yet will not continue three days in prayer, to seek the inestimable graces of God.

2. The first step we must make toward our salvation is to desire it. That man is worthy to be eternally sick, who fears nothing else but the loss of his bodily health. Men generally do all what they can possibly, to cure their corporal infirmities; they abide a thousand vexations (which are but too certain) to recover a health, which is most uncertain. And as for the passions of the mind, some love the Feavers of their own love, and their worldly ambition above their own life. They suck the head of a venemous aspick, and are killed by the tongue of a viper. They will not part with that which kills them; and if you take from them the worm which makes them itch, or the executioner who doth indeed torment them, they believe you take away the chiefest of their felicity. Happy is that soul which holds nothing so dear in this world, but will forsake it willingly to find God, and will spare nothing, to gain Paradise.

3. There is nothing more common, nor so rare as man. The world is full of vicious and unprofitable men. But to find one very compleat in all good things, is to find a direct Phenix. There are more businesses without men, than men without businesses. For how many charitable employments might many lazy and idle persons find out? So many poor mens affairs continue at a stand: so many miserable creatures languish: so many desolate persons long to find some man, who (with little trouble to himself) would take some small care of their affairs, and make up some little piece of their fortunes. Jesus is the man of God desired of all Ages; to him we must apply our selves, since he is both life and truth. By him we may come to all happiness, by him we may live in the fountains and streams of life, and in him we may contemplate the chiefest of all truths.

Aspirations.

WHat patience have I in committing sins, and how impatient am I in my sufferings for them? I am ever most ready to execute vice, and unwilling to abide the punishment. O good God, there are many years in which I have retained an inclination to this disorder, to that sin. My soul is bound, as it were, with iron chains, in this unhappy bed: will there be no Angel to move the water for me? But art not thou the Lord and Prince of Angels? Then I most humbly beseech thee (O blessed Saviour) do thou command, and by thy onely word my affairs will go well, and receive a happy dispatch; my body will become sound, my soul innocent, my heart at rest, and my life an eternal glory.

The Gospel upon Saturday the first week in Lent, and the Sunday following, out of S. Matthew 17.

Of the Transfiguration of our Lord.

And after six days, Jesus taketh unto him Peter and James, and John his brother, and bringeth them into a high mountain apart: and he was transfigured before them. And his face did shine as the Sun: and his garments became white as snow. And behold there appeared to them, Moses and Elias talking with him. And Peter answering, said to Jesus, Lord, it is good for us to be here, if thou wilt, let us make here three Tabernacles, one for thee, one for Moses, and one for Elias. And as he was yet speaking, behold a bright cloud over-shadowed them. And lo, a voice out of the cloud, saying, This is my well-beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased, hear ye him. And the Disciples hearing it, fell upon their face, and were sore afraid. And Jesus came and touched them: and he said to them, Arise, and fear not. And they lifting up their eyes, saw no body but onely Jesus. And as they descended from the Mount, Jesus commanded them, saying, Tell the vision to no body, till the Son of man be risen from the dead.

Moralities.

1. THe words of the Prophet Osee are accomplished; the nets and toils planted upon mount Tabor, not to catch birds, but hearts. The mountain which before was a den for Tigers and Panthers (according to the story) is now beautified by our Saviour, and becomes a place full of sweetness & ravishments. Jesus appears transfigured in the high robes of his glory. The cloud made him a pavillion of gold, and the Sun made his face shine like it self. The heavenly Father doth acknowledge his Son as a true Prince of glory; Moſes and Elias both appear in brightneſs, the one bearing the Tables of the Law, and the other carried in a burning Chariot (as Origen ſaith) which made the Apoſtles know him. For the Hebrews had certain figures of the moſt famous men of their Nation in books. They both (as Saint Luke ſaith) were ſeen in glory and Majeſty, which fell upon them by reflection of the beams which came from the body of Jeſus, who is the true fountain of brightneſs. The Apoſtles loſe themſelves in the deliciouſneſs of this great ſpectacle; and by ſeeing more than they ever did, deſired to loſe their eyes. O that the world is moſt contemptible to him, that knows how to value God as he ought. So many fine powders, ſo many pendents and favours of Glaſs, ſo many Towers and Columns of dirt plaiſtered over with gold, are followed by a million of Idolaters. To conclude, ſo many worldly jewels are like the empty imaginations of a ſick ſpirit, not enlightened by the beams of truth. Let us rely upon the word (ſaith Saint Auguſtine) which remains for ever, while men paſs like the water of a fountain, which hides it ſelf in the Spring, ſhews it ſelf in the ſtream, and loſeth it ſelf at laſt in the Sea. But God is always himſelf, there needs no Tabernacle made by the hands of man, to remain with him; for in Paradiſe, he is both the God and the Temple.

2. Tabor is yet but a ſmall pattern, we muſt get all the piece; we muſt go to the Palace of Angels and brightneſs, where the Tabernacles are not made by the hands of men. There we ſhall ſee the face of the living God clearly and at full: There the beauties ſhall have no vails to hide them from us: Our being ſhall have no end: Our knowledges will not be ſubject to errour, nor our loves and affections to diſpleaſure. O what a joy will it be to enjoy all, and deſire nothing; to be a Magiſtrate without a ſucceſſour, to be a King without an enemy, to be rich without covetouſneſs, to negotiate without money, and to be ever-living without fear of death.

3. But who can get up to this mountain, except he of whom the Prophet ſpeaks? who hath innocent hands and a clean heart? who hath not received his ſoul of God in vain, to bury it in worldly pelf. To follow Jeſus, we muſt transform our ſelves into him; by hearing and following his doctrine, ſince God the Father propoſeth him for the teacher of mankind, and commands us to hearken unto him. Wee muſt follow his examples, ſince thoſe are the originals of all virtues. The beſt trade we can practiſe in this world, is that of transfiguration: and we may do it by reducing our form to the form of our Lord, and walking upon earth like men in Heaven. Then will the Sun make us have ſhining faces, when purity ſhall accompany all our actions and intentions. Our clothes ſhall be as white as ſnow, when we ſhall once become innocent in our converſations, we ſhall then be raviſhed like the Apoſtles, and after we have been at Mount Tabor, we ſhall be blind to the reſt of the world, and ſee nothing but Jeſus. It is moreover to be noted, that our Saviour did at that time entertain himſelf with diſcourſe of his great future ſufferings, and of his death; to teach us, that his Croſs was the ſtep by which he mounted up to beatitude.

Aſpirations.

O Bleſſed Palace, O magnificent Tabor, which this day didſt hold upon thee the Prince of Glory; I love and admire thee, but I admire ſomewhat elſe above thee: It is the Heavenly Jeruſalem, that triumphant company, that face of God, where all thoſe beauties are, which ſhall never ceaſe to be beauties. It is for that I live, for that I die, for that I languiſh with a holy impatience. O my Jeſus, my moſt benign Lord, transform me then into thee, that I may thereby be transformed into God. If I have carried the earthly Image of Adam, why ſhould I not alſo carry the form of Jeſus? Catch me, O Lord, within thoſe tiſſued nets and golden toils of brightneſs, which thou didſt plant upon this ſacred mountain. It is there I would leave mine eyes, it is there I reſolve to breath out my ſoul. I ask no Tabernacles to be there built for me; I have long ſince contemplated thy heart, (O Father of eſſences and all bounties) as the moſt faithfull abode of my eternity.

The Goſpel upon Munday the ſecond week in Lent, S. John 8.

Jeſus ſaid to the Jews, Where I go, ye cannot come.

AGain therefore Jeſus ſaid to them, I go, and you ſhall ſeek me, and ſhall die in your ſin. Whither I go, you cannot come. The Jews therefore ſaid, Why, will he kill himſelf, becauſe he ſaith, Whither I go, you cannot come? And he ſaid to them, You are from beneath, I am from above: you are of this world, I am not of this world. Therefore I ſay to you, That you ſhall die in your ſins. For if you believe not that I am he, ye ſhall die in your ſins. They ſaid therefore to him, Who art thou? Jeſus ſaid to them, The beginning, who alſo ſpeak to you. Many things I have to ſpeak and judge of you: but he that ſent me, is true: and what I have heard of him, theſe things I ſpeak in the world. And they knew not that he ſaid to them, that his Father was God. Jeſus therefore ſaid to them, When you ſhall have exalted the Son of man, then you ſhall know that I am he, and of my ſelf I do nothing, but as the Father hath taught me, theſe things I ſpeak: and he that ſent me, is with me: and he hath not left me alone, becauſe the things that pleaſe him, I do always.

Moralities.

1. ONe of the greateſt misfortunes of our life, is, that we never ſufficiently know our own good, till we loſe it. We flie from that we ſhould ſeek: we ſeek that we ſhould avoid, and never begin to bewail our loſſes, but when they are not to be recovered. Thoſe Jews poſſeſſed an ineſtimable treaſure, by the preſence and converſation of the Son of God. But they ſet light by it, and ſo at laſt they lamented amongſt eternal flames, what they would not ſee in ſo clear a light. Let us take heed of deſpiſing holy things, and avoid hardneſs of heart, which is a gulf of unavoidable miſchiefs.

2. It is a ſtrange thing that God is ſo near us, and yet we ſo far from him. That which hinders us from finding him, is becauſe he is above, and we below. We are too much for the world; too faſt nailed to the earth; too much bound to our ſuperfluous buſineſſes and cares of this life; and too much ſubject to our own appetites. He muſt not be ſlave to his body, that pretends to receive good from God, who is a Spirit: He muſt not embark himſelf deeply into worldly matters, who deſires the ſociety of Angels. He muſt paſs from his ſenſe to his reaſon, from reaſon to grace, from grace to glory. If you deſire to find God, ſearch for him, as the three Kings did in the manger, in his humility: Look for him as the bleſſed Virgin did in the temple, in his piety: Seek him as the Maries did in his Sepulcher, by the meditation of death: But ſtay not there, ſave onely to make a paſſage to life.

3. When you have lifted me up to the Croſs, (ſaith our Saviour) you ſhall know that I am the true Son of God. And indeed it is a great wonder, that the infinite power of that Divinity, would manifeſt it ſelf in the infirmity of the Croſs. It was onely for God

God to perform this great deſign, & aſcend up to his throne of glory, by the baſeſt diſgraces of the world. The good thief ſaw no other title or ſign of his kingdom, but onely his body covered over with bloud, and oppreſſed with dolours. He learned by that book of the Croſs all the glory of Paradiſe: & he apprehended that none but God could endure with ſuch patience ſo great torments. If you will be children of God, you muſt make it appear by participation of his croſs, and by ſuffering tribulation: By that Sun our Eagle, tries his young ones, he who cannot abide that ſhining ray ſprinkled with bloud, ſhall never attain to beatitude. It is not comely to ſee a head crowned with thorns, ſit in a rotten chair of delicacies.

Aſpirations.

O Bleſſed Saviour, who doſt lift up all the earth with three fingers of thy power, raiſe up a little this painfull maſs of my body, which weighs down it ſelf ſo heavily. Give me the wings of an Eagle to flie after thee, for I am conſtantly reſolved to follow thee, whitherſoever thou goeſt: for though it ſhould be within the ſhadow of death, what can I fear being in the arms of life? I am not of my ſelf, nor of the world, which is ſo great a deceiver. Since I am thine by ſo many titles, (which bind me to adoration) I will be ſo in life, in death, in time, and for all eternity. I will take part of thy ſufferings, ſince they are the ſcarfs of our Chriſtian warfare. Tribulation is a moſt excellent engine: the more a man is kept under, the higher he mounts: He deſcends by perfect humility, that he may aſcend to thee by the ſteps of glory.

The Goſpel for Tueſday the ſecond week in Lent, S. Matthew 23.

Jeſus ſaid, The Phariſees ſit in Moſes chair, believe therefore what they ſay.

THen Jeſus ſpake to the multitudes, and to his Diſciples, ſaying, Upon the chair of Moſes have ſitten the Scribes & Phariſees. All things therefore whatſoever they ſhall ſay to you, obſerve ye, and do ye: but according to their works do ye not, for they ſay and do not: for they bind heavy burdens and importable, and put them upon mens ſhoulders, but with a finger of their own they will not move them. But they do all their works for to be ſeen of men, for they make broad their Phylacteries, and enlarge their fringes. And they love the firſt places at ſuppers, and the firſt chairs in the Synagogues, and ſalutations in the market-place, and to be called of men Rabbi: But be not you called Rabbi, for one is your Maſter, and all you are brethren. And call none father to your ſelf upon earth, for one is your Father, he that is in Heaven, neither be ye called Maſters, for one is your Maſter, Chriſt: he that is the greater of you, ſhall be your ſervitour. And he that exalteth himſelf ſhall be humble: and he that humbleth himſelf ſhall be exalted.

Moralities.

1. IT is a very dangerous errour, to think that our Saviour in this Goſpel, had a purpoſe to introduce an Anarchy, and to make all men equal. He ſheweth in many places, that he would have Kings, Princes, Magiſtrates, Fathers, and Doctours. But he would not have men to come to honours by a vain ambition, nor others to honour them but onely as they have dependency upon the power of God Almighty. Let every ſoul (ſaith the Apoſtle) be ſubject to higher Powers, for there is no power, but it cometh from God: He gives us ſuperiours, not for us to judge, but to obey them. If a man cannot approve their manners, he muſt at leaſt reverence the character of their authority. They ſhould be good Chriſtians for themſelves, but they are ſuperiours for us. He that reſiſteth their power, doth reſiſt God, who ordained them. And all the great evils happening by hereſies and rebellions, proceed from no other fountain, but from contempt of powers eſtabliſhed by the decree of heaven: A man may pretend zeal, but there is no better ſacrifice than that of obedience. If great perſons abuſe their offices, God will find it out, and as their dignities are great, ſo their puniſhment ſhall be anſwerable.

2. One of the greateſt diſorders of this life, is, that we go for the moſt part outwardly, to pleaſe the world, and are little careful of a good inward application of our ſelves to pleaſe God. In ſtead of taking the way of Gods image (from whence we all come) we are content to have virtues onely by imagination, and vices in their true eſſence. Nembroth profeſſed himſelf a ſervant of the true God, and yet adored the fire in ſecret. Jeſus hath many worſhippers in words, but few in truth. Some ſtand upon formalities, others upon diſguiſed habits, others amuſe themſelves about ceremonies, others go as upon certain ſprings, to make themſelves counted wiſe. Moſt men would ſeem what they are not, and much troubled to be ſeen what they are. All their time doth paſs in faſhions and countenances; but death and Gods judgements take off all thoſe masks.

3. To ſay that we have ſeen a man exteriourly devout and ſpiritual (except he be ſo inwardly) is to ſay, we have ſeen a houſe without a foundation, a tree without a root, a veſſel move upon the ſea without a bottom, and an excellent clock without a ſpring. For the ſame which the foundation is to a houſe, the root to a tree, the bottom to a ſhip, and the ſpring to a clock, the ſame is a mans interiour life to all virtue. What is a man the better, who reſembles window-cuſhions, which are covered with velvet, and ſtuft with hay; or to be like the picture of Diana, in Homers Iſland, which wept to ſome, and laught to others. A little ſpark of a good conſcience is better than all the lights of the world. Why do we crucifie our ſelves with ſo many diſſimulations, ſo many ceremonies, ſo many enforcements upon our natures, to ſerve and pleaſe men, onely to get ſmoke? He that ſows wind (ſaith the Prophet) ſhall reap a ſtorm. Let us live to our ſelves in the purity of a good conſcience, and of a perfect humility; if we deſire to live for ever with God. Thoſe ſhadows of falſe devotion proceed from the leaves of that fig-tree, wherwith Adam and Eve covered their nakedneſs: do not we know that hypocriſie is the ſame thing to virtue, which painting is to faces? and that it is the very moth which devours ſanctity, and will at the day of judgement make all thoſe appear naked, which to the world ſeem well apparrelled.

Aſpiration.

O God of all truth, wherefore are there ſo many fictions, and counterfeit behaviours? Muſt we always live to pleaſe the eyes of others, and run after the ſhadow of vanity, which leaves nothing but illuſion within our eyes, and corruption in our manners. I will live unto thee (O fountain of lives) within whom all creatures have life. I will retire my ſelf into my own heart, and negotiate with it by the ſecret feeling of a good conſcience, that I may treat with thee. What need I the eyes of men, if I have the eyes of God? They alone are ſufficient to do me good, ſince by their aſpect they give happineſs to all the Saints. I will ſeek for thee (O my beloved Lord) from the break of day, till the dead time of the night. All places are ſolitary where thou art not, and where thou art, there onely is the fullneſs of all pleaſures.

The

The Goſpel for Wedneſday, the ſecond week in Lent, S. Matth 20.

The Requeſt of the wife of Zebedee, for her ſons James and John.

AND Jeſus going up to Jeruſalem, took the twelve Diſciples ſecretly, and ſaid to them, Behold we go up to Jeruſalem, and the Son of man ſhall be delivered to the chief Prieſts, and to the Scribes, and they ſhall condemn him to death, and ſhall deliver him to the Gentiles, to be mocked, and ſcourged, and crucified, and the third day he ſhall riſe again.

Then came to him the mother of the ſons of Zebedee, with her ſons, adoring and deſiring ſomething of him: who ſaid to her, What wilt thou? She ſaith to him, Say that theſe my two ſons may ſit one at thy right hand, and one at thy left hand in thy Kingdom. And Jeſus anſwering, ſaid, You know not what you deſire. Can ye drink of the cup that I ſhall drink of? They ſay to him, We can. He ſaith to them, My cup indeed you ſhall drink of: but to ſit at my right hand and left, is not mine to give to you, but to whom it is prepared of my Father.

Moralities.

1. WHat a ſhort life have we, and yet ſuch large and vaſt ambitions? We fear every thing like mortal men, and yet deſire all, as if we ſhould be immortal upon earth. It is a ſtrange thing to obſerve how the deſire of honour ſlides even amongſt the moſt refined devotions. Some one is counted an Angel of Heaven amongſt men, who hath not forſaken his pretence upon earth. Ambition ſleeps in the boſoms of perſons conſecrated for the Altars. It overthrows ſome whom luxury could not ſtir; and moves thoſe whom avarice could not touch. We deſire all to be known, and to ſeem what we are not: but this ſeeming is that which doth bewitch us. All paſſions grow old and weaker by age; onely the deſire of worldly riches and honours, is a ſhirt which we never put off, till we come to the grave. Why do we ſo extreamly torment our poor life, by running after this ſhadow of honour, which we cannot follow without trouble, nor poſſeſs without fear, nor loſe without ſorrow? Is it not a ſtrange folly, that men love ſuch vanities, till the very laſt inſtant of their own ruins, and fear nothing, ſo they may tumble into precipices of gold and ſilver?

2. What great pains you take for theſe children, as if they did not more belong to God than you: you caſt day and night where to place them, when the Providence of God (which is the great Harbinger of the world) hath already markt their lodgings. One is ſettled in a good Religious courſe, another in the grave, another perhaps ſhall have more than is neceſſary to make him a good man. Eve imagined that her ſon Cain (having all the world) would have become ſome great God, when ambition made him a devil incarnate. You ſhall rarely make your children great Saints, by getting them great honours. You deſire they ſhould poſſeſs all that which overthrows them; and pretending to make a building with one hand, you deſtroy it with the other. By all your earneſt wiſhes, and all your laborious endeavours (for advancement of your children) you effect nothing, but thereby give them enticements to pleaſure, and weapons for iniquity.

3. Whereupon ſhould we build our ambitions, if not upon the bloud of the holy Lamb? At the foot of the Croſs we behold a God covered with bloud, crowned with thorns and reproches, who warns us to be humble; and at the ſame time we eagerly purſue worldly glory and ambition: We reſemble that unhappy daughter of Miltiades, who did proſtitute her ſelf under her fathers Tropheys. By our unmeaſurable hunting after honours, amongſt the ignominies of Jeſus Chriſt, we abandon our ſelves to diſhonour, and make no other uſe of the Croſs, but onely to be a witneſs of our infidelity.

Aſpirations.

AVoid, be gone you importunate cares of worldly goods and honours! you little tyrants, which burn the bloud within our veins, and fill the moſt innocent pleaſures of our life, with bitter ſorrows, what have I more to do with you? My children ſhall be what God will. They ſhall be but too rich, when they have virtue for their portion, and but too high, when they ſhall ſee a true contempt of the world under their feet. God forbid that I ſhould go about any worldly throne upon the holy Lambs bloud, or that I ſhould talk of honours, when there is mention made of the holy Croſs. O Jeſus, thou father of all true glories, thou ſhalt from henceforth be my onely crown. All greatneſs where thou art not, ſhall to me be onely baſeneſs, I will mount up to thee by the ſtairs of humility, ſince by thoſe thou cameſt down to me. I will kiſs the paths of Mount Calvary, which thou haſt ſprinkled with thy precious bloud, & eſteem the Croſs above all worldly things, ſince thou haſt conſecrated it by thy cruel pains; and brought us forth upon that dolorous bed, to the day of thy eternity.

The Goſpel upon Thurſday, the ſecond week in Lent, out of S. Luke 16.

Of the rich Glutton, and poor Lazarus.

THERE was a certain rich man, and he was clothed with purple and ſilk, and he fared every day magnifically. And there was a certain begger called Lazarus, that lay at his gate full of ſores, deſiring to be filled of the crums that fell from the rich mans table, but the dogs alſo came, and licked his ſores. And it came to paſs that the begger died, and was carried of the Angel into Abraham's boſom. And the rich man alſo died, and he was buried in hell, and lifting up his eyes, when he was in torments, he ſaw Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his boſom. And he crying, ſaid, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and ſend Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger into water, for to cool my tongue, becauſe I am tormented in this flame. And Abraham ſaid to him, Son, remember that thou didſt receive good things in thy life time, and Lazarus likewiſe evil: but now he is comforted, and thou tormented. And beſides all theſe things, between us and you there is fixed a great Chaos: that they which will paſs from hence to you, may not, neither go from thence hither. And he ſaid, Then father, I beſeech thee that thou wouldeſt ſend him unto my fathers houſe, for I have five brethren, for to teſtifie unto them, leſt they alſo come into this place of torments. And Abraham ſaid to him, They have Moſes and the Prophets: let them hear them. But he ſaid, No, father Abraham, but if ſome man ſhall go from the dead to them, they will do penance. And he ſaid to him, If they hear not Moſes and the Prophets, neither if one ſhall riſe again from the dead, will they believe.

Moralities.

1. A Rich man and a poor meet in this world, the one loaden with treaſures, the other with ulcers. They both meet in the other world, the one in a gulf of fire, the other in Abyſs of delights: Their ends are as different, as their lives were contrary:

contrary: to teach us, that he which ſhall conſider rightly, the end of all worldly ſins and vanities, will have in horrour the deſire of them. And as there is nothing, for which goodly poor men may not hope, ſo is there nothing, which wicked rich men ſhould not fear. He that is proud of riches, is proud of his burdens and chains, but if he unload them upon the poor, he will be eaſed of his pain, and ſecured in his way.

2. The life of man is a marvellous Comedie; wherein the greateſt part of our actions are plaid under a curtain, which the Divine Providence draws over them, to cover us. It concealed poor Lazarus, and kept him in obſcurity, like the fiſh, which we never ſee till it be dead. But Jeſus draws the curtain, and makes himſelf the hiſtorian of this good poor man, ſhewing us the ſtate of his ſoul, of his body, of his life and death. He makes him appear in Abrahams boſom, as within the temple of reſt and happineſs, and makes him known to the rich man, as to the treaſurer of hells riches. Are we not unworthy the name which we carry, when we deſpiſe the poor, and hate poverty, as the greateſt miſery? ſince the Son of God having once conſecrated it upon the throne of his manger, made it ſerve for his ſpouſe during life, and his bride-maid at the time of his death.

3. This rich glutton dreamed, and at the end of his dream found himſelf buried in hell. All thoſe pomps of his life, were ſcattered in an inſtant, as ſo many nocturnal illuſions, and his heart filled with eternal grief and torment. His firſt miſery is a ſudden, unexpected, and hydeous change, from a huge ſea of delicacies, into an inſufferable gulf of fire: where he doth acknowledge, that one of the greateſt vexations in miſery, is to have been happy. Another diſaſter which afflicts him, is to ſee Lazarus in Abrahams boſom; to teach us, that the damned are tormented by Paradiſe, even to the very loweſt part of hell; and and that the moſt grievous of their torments, is, they can never forget their loſs of God. So ſaith Theophylact, that Adam was placed over againſt the terreſtrial Paradiſe, from whence he was baniſhed, that in his very puniſhment, he might ſee the happineſs he had loſt by his foul fault. Now you muſt adde to the reſt of his ſufferings, the great Chaos which (like a diamond wall) is between hell and Paradiſe, together with the privation of all comfort; thoſe loſſes without remedy; that wheel of eternity; where death laſteth for ever, and the end begins again without ceaſing, and the torments can never fail or diminiſh.

4. Do good with thoſe goods which God hath given you, and ſuffer them not to make you wicked; but employ your riches by the hands of virtue: If gold be a child of the Sun, why do you hide him from his father? God choſe the boſom of rich Abraham, to be the Paradiſe of poor Lazarus. So may you make the needy feel happineſs by your bounty; your riches ſhall raiſe you up, when they are trodden under feet. The Prophet ſaith, you muſt ſow in the field of Alms, if you deſire to reap in the mouth of Mercy.

Aſpirations.

O God of Juſtice, I tremble at the terrour of thy judgements. Great fortunes of the world (full of honour and riches) are fair trees, oftimes the more ready for the ax: Their weight makes them apt to fall, and prove the more unhappy fuel for eternal flames. O Jeſus, father of the poor, and King of the rich, I moſt humbly beſeech thee, never give my heart in prey to covetouſneſs, which (by loading me with land) may make me forget Heaven. I know that death muſt conſume me to the very bones, and I ſhall then poſſeſs nothing, but what I have given for thee. Muſt I then live in this world (like a Griffin) to hoard up much gold, and ſilver whereof I ſhall never have uſe, and ſtill be vexed with care how to preſerve it? O moſt mercifull Lord, ſuffer me not to be taught by hell fire, that which I may have neglected to learn out of thy Goſpel. I moſt heartily renounce all luxury and pomp of the world, and this carnal life, which would always buſie it ſelf about my body. If thou be pleaſed to make me rich, I will be ſo for the poor; and if thou make me poor, I will make my ſelf rich in thee, who art the true riches of all thine elect.

The Goſpel upon Friday the ſecond week in Lent, S. Matth. 21.

Of the Maſter of a Vineyard, whoſe ſon was killed by his Farmers.

ANother Parable hear ye: A man there was, an houſholder, who planted a Vineyard, and made a hedge round about it, and digged in it a preſs, and builded a tower, and let it out to huſbandmen, and went forth into a ſtrange Countrey. And when the time of fruits drew nigh, he ſent his ſervants to the huſbandmen, to receive the fruits thereof. And the huſbandmen apprehending his ſervants, one they beat, another they killed, and another they ſtoned. Again, he ſent other ſervants, more than the former; and they did to them likewiſe. And laſt of all, he ſent to them his Son, ſaying, They will reverence my Son. But the huſbandmen ſeeing the Son, ſaid within themſelves, This is the heir, come, let us kill him, and we ſhall have his inheritance. And apprehending him, they caſt him forth out of the Vineyard, and killed him. When therefore the Lord of the Vineyard ſhall come, what will he do to thoſe huſbandmen! They ſay to him, The naughty men he will bring to nought: and his Vineyard he will let out to other huſbandmen, that ſhall render him the fruit of their ſeaſons.

Jeſus ſaith to them, Have you never read in the Scriptures, The ſtone which the builders rejected, the ſame is made into the head of the corner? By our Lord was this done, and it is marvellous in our eyes. Therefore I ſay to you, That the Kingdom of God ſhall be taken away from you, and ſhall be given to a Nation, yielding the fruits thereof. And he that falleth upon this ſtone, ſhall be broken: and on whom it falleth, it ſhall all to bruiſe him. And when the chief Prieſts and Phariſees had heard his Parables, they knew that he ſpake of them. And ſeeking to lay hands upon him, they feared the multitudes: becauſe they held him as a Prophet.

Moralities.

WE have reaſon to fear all that is in us, yea, even the gifts of God: All his favours are ſo many chains; If they bind us not to do our duty, they will bind us to the puniſhment due for that neglect. Our ſoul is given us by God, as a thing borrowed from Heaven, we muſt not be too prodigal of it. We muſt dig up ill roots, as we do in land cultivated: The time will come, that we muſt render up the fruits; and ſhall we then preſent thorns? Examine every day how you profit, and what you do: draw every day a line, but draw it toward eternity. What can you hide from God who knows all? What can you repay to God who gives all? and how can you requite Jeſus who hath given himſelf?

2. How many meſſengers doth God ſend to our hearts without intermiſſion, and how many inſpirations which we reject? So many Sermons which we do not obſerve, and ſo many examples which we neglect. Jeſus comes in perſon by the Sacrament of the Altar, and we drive him from us; to crucifie him, when we place the Devil and Mortal ſin in his toom. What other thing can we expect for reward of all these violences, but a most fearfull destruction, if ye do not prevent the sword of justice, by walking in the paths of Mercy? Our vanities, which at first are like small threeds, by the contempt of Gods grace, come to be great cables of sin. He that defers his repentance, is in danger to lose it, and will be kept out of the Ark, with the croaking Raven, since he hath neglected the mourning of the sorrowfull Dove.

theſe

3. It is a most horrible thing, to see a soul left to it self, after it hath so many times forsaken the inspirations of God. It becomes a desolate vineyard, without inclosure. The wild Boar enters into it, and all unclean and ravenous creatures do there sport and leap without controle. God hangs clouds over it, but will let no drop of water fall upon it. The Sun never looks upon it with a loving eye: all there is barren, venemous, and neat to hell. Therefore above all things, we must fear to be forsaken of God. Mercy provoked, changes it self into severe Justice. All creatures will serve (as Gods instruments) to punish a fugitive soul, which flies from him by her ingratitude, when he draws her to him by the sweetness of his benefits.

Aspiration.

ALas, O great Father of the worlds family, I am confounded to see thy vineyard so ill ordered, made so barren, and spoiled. My passions domineer, like wild beasts, and devours the fruits due to thy bounty. I am heartily sorry I have so little esteemed thy graces, and to have preferred all that, which makes me contemptible, before thee. I do this day renounce all the abuses of my soul. I will grow and prosper under thy blessings: I will flourish under thy aspect, and fructifie under thy protection. Command onely thy graces and sweet dews of Heaven (which are as paps of thy favours) to rain upon me, and water this rotten trunk of my heart. Speak to that eye of love; that beautifull eye of Jesus, that it will shine upon me but once with that ray, which doth make souls happy for ever.

The Gospel upon Saturday, the second week in Lent, S. Luke 15.

Of the prodigal Child.

AND he said, A certain man had two sons; and the younger of them said to his father, Father, give me the portion of substance that belongeth to me: and he divided unto them the substance. And not many days after, the youngest son gathering all his things together, went from home into a far Countrey, and there he wasted his substance, living riotously. And after he had spent all, there fell a sore famine in that Countrey, and he began to be in need: and he went and cleaved to one of the Citizens of that Countrey, and he sent him into his Farm to feed swine. And he would fain have filled his belly of the husks that the swine did eat, and no body gave unto him. And returning to himself, he said, How many of my fathers hirelings have abundance of bread, and I here perish for famine? I will arise, and will go to my father, and say unto him, Father, I have sinned against Heaven, and before thee, I am not now worthy to be called thy son, make me as one of thy hirelings. And rising up, he came to his father; and when he was yet far off, his father saw him, and was moved with mercy, and running to him, fell upon his neck and kissed him. And his son said to him, Father, I have sinned against Heaven, and before thee, I am not now worthy to be called thy son. And the father said to his servants, Quickly bring forth the first stole, and do it on him, and put a ring upon his hand, and shoes upon his feet, and bring the fatted calf, and kill it, and let us eat and make merry, because this my son was dead, and is revived, was lost, and is found. And they began to make merry. But his elder son was in the field, and when he came and drew nigh to the house, he heard musick and dancing. And he called one of the servants, and asked what these things should be? And he said to him, Thy brother is come, and thy father hath killed the fatted calf, because he hath received him safe, But he had indignation, and would not go in. His father therefore going forth, began to desire him. But he answering, said to his father, Behold, so many years do I serve thee, and I never transgressed thy commandment, and thou didst never give me a Kid to make merry with my friends. But after that thy son, this, that hath devoured his substance with whores, is come, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf. But he said to him, Son, thou art always with me, and all my things are thine. But it behoved us to make merry and be glad, because this thy brother was dead, and is revived; was lost, and is found.

Moralities.

1. THis parable is a true table, expressing the excursions of a prodigal soul, and her return to the mercy of God, by the way of repentance. Note, that the first step which she trode toward her own destruction (as Cain did) was her departing from God, not by changing of place, but of heart. It departed from the chiefest light, which made it fall into an eclipse of reason, and so into profound darkness. She diverted her self from the greatest bounty, which made her encline toward all wickedness, (being strayed from her sovereign being) which made her become just nothing.

2. She continued in sin, as in a Countrey which was just nothing, where she was vexed on all sides with disquiet, with cares, with fears and discontents. All sins toss their followers, as the ball is tossed at Baloon. Vanity sends them to pride: pride to violence: violence to avarice: avarice to ambition: ambition to pomp and riot: pomp to gluttony: gluttony to luxury: luxury to idleness: idleness to contempt and poverty, and that poverty brings them to all worldly misery. For all mischiefs follow a wicked soul, which departing from God, thinks to find a better condition.

3. Affliction opens the eyes of man, and makes him come to himself, that he may the better return to God. There is no journey so far, as when a man departs from himself, not by place, but by manners. A sea of Licentiousness interposeth it self between his soul and innocence, to divorce her from the way of goodness: But Gods grace is a burning wind, which dries it up; and having brought man to himself, takes him by the hand, and leads him even to God.

4. O what a happy thing it is, to consider the effects of Gods mercy in the entertainment of the good father, to his prodigal son: The one had lost all which he had of a good son: but the other had not lost what belonged to a good father. The son had yet said nothing, when fatherly affection pleaded for him in the heart of his father, who felt the dolours of a spiritual labour; and his entrails were moved to give a second birth to his son. Though he were old, yet he went the pace of a young man: Charity gives him wings to flie to the embracements of his lost child. He is most joyfull of that comes with him, even of his very poverty. This without doubt, should give us a marvellous confidence in Gods mercy, when we seek it with hearty repentance. It is a sea of bounty, which washeth away all that is amiss. Since he hath changed the name of master, into that of father, he will rather command by love, than reign by a predominant power. No man ought to despair of pardon, except he, who can be as fully wicked, as

God

God is good, none is ſo mercifull as God, none is ſo good a father as he: for when you may have loſt your part of all his virtues, you can never (while you live) loſe the poſſibility of his mercy. He will receive you between his arms without any other reaſon, but your return by repentance.

5. The ſame Parable is alſo a true glaſs, ſhewing the life of thoſe young unthrifts, who think they are born onely for ſport, for their bellies, and for pleaſure. They imagine their fathers keep for them the golden mines of Peru; and their life being without government, their expences are without meaſure. Some of them run through the world, they wander into all places, but never enter into conſideration of themſelves. They return from forrain parts loden with debts, and bring home nothing but ſome new fantaſtical faſhions, cringes, and corantoes. There are many of them in whom pride and miſery continue inſeparable, after they have loſt their money and their brains. Their fathers are cauſes of their faults, by gathering ſo much wealth for thoſe, who know not how to uſe it. Yet if they have the true repentance of the prodigal child, he muſt not deny them pardon: But mercy muſt not be had of thoſe who ask it by ſtrong hand, or ſeek it by a counterfeit ſorrow.

Aſpirations.

IT is an accurſed wandring to travel into the countrey of nothing, where pleaſure drops down as water from a ſtorm; the miſerable conſequences whereof have leaden feet, which never remove from the heart. Good God what a countrey is that, where the earth is made of quick-ſilver, which ſteals it ſelf from under our feet, when we think to tread upon it. What a countrey is that, where if a man gather one bud of roſes, he muſt be forced to eat a thouſand thorns, and be companion with the moſt naſty, filthy beaſts in their ſtinking ordures, and be glad to eat of their loathſom draffe for want of other meat. Alas, I have ſurfetted, and ſuch a miſery as this, is neceſſary to make me remember the happineſs which I poſſeſſed in thy houſe: O mercifull Father, behold my prodigal ſoul which returns to thee, and will have no other advocate but thy goodneſs; which as yet pleads for me within thy heart. I have conſumed all which I had, but I could not conſume thy mercy. For that is as an Abyſs which ſurpaſſeth that of my ſins, and Miſeries. Receive me as a mercenary ſervant, if I may not obtain the name of a ſon. Why ſhouldſt not thou receive that which is thine, ſince the wicked ſpirits have taken that which was not theirs? Either ſhew me mercy, or elſe ſhew me a heart more fatherly than thine, and if neither earth nor heaven can find the like, to whom wouldſt thou have me go but to thy ſelf, who doeſt not yet ceaſe to call me?

The Goſpel upon the third Sunday in Lent, S. Luke 11.

Jeſus caſt out the Devil which was dumb.

AND he was caſting out a devil, and that was dumb. And when he had caſt out the devil, the dumb ſpake, and the multitudes marvelled. And certain of them ſaid, in Belzebub the Prince of Devils he caſteth out Devils. And others tempting, asked him a ſign from Heaven. But he ſeeing their cogitations, ſaid to them: Every Kingdom divided againſt it ſelf, ſhall be made deſolate, and houſe upon houſe ſhall fall. And if Satan alſo be divided againſt himſelf, how ſhall his Kingdom ſtand? becauſe you ſay, that in Belzebub I do caſt out Devils. And if I in Belzebub caſt out Devils; your children, in whom do they caſt out? Therefore they ſhall be your judges. But if I in the finger of God do caſt out Devils, ſurely the Kingdom of God is come upon you. When the ſtrong armed keepeth his court, thoſe things are in peace that he poſſeſſeth; but if a ſtronger than he come upon him, and overcome him, he will take away his whole armour, wherein he truſted, and will diſtribute his ſpoils. He that is not with me, is againſt me; and he that gathereth not with me, ſcattereth. When the unclean ſpirit ſhall depart out of a man, he wandreth through places without water, ſeeking reſt; and not finding, he ſaith, I will return into my houſe whence I departed. And when he is come, he findeth it ſwept with a beſom, and trimmed. Then he goeth and taketh ſeven other ſpirits worſe than himſelf, and entering in, they dwell there. And the laſt of that man be made worſe than the firſt.

And it came to paſs, when he ſaid theſe things, a certain woman lifting up her voice out of the multitude, ſaid to him, Bleſſed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps that thou didſt ſuck. But he ſaid, Yea, rather, bleſſed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it.

Moralities.

1. THE Almond-tree is the firſt which begins to flouriſh, and it is often firſt nipt with froſt. The tongue is the firſt thing which moves in a mans body, and is ſooneſt caught with the ſnares of Satan. That man deſerves to be ſpeechleſs all his life, who never ſpeaks a word better than ſilence.

2. Jeſus, the eternal word of God, came upon earth to reform the words of man: his life was a lightening, and his word a thunder, which was powerfull in effect, but always meaſured within his bounds. He did fight againſt ill tongues in his life, and conquered them all in his death. The gall and vinegar which he took to expiate the ſins of this unhappy tongue, do ſhew how great the evil was, ſince it did need ſo ſharp a remedy. He hath cured by ſuffering his dolours, what it deſerved by our committing ſins. Other vices are determined by one act, the tongue goes to all: it is a ſervant to all malitious actions, and is generally confederate with the heart in all crimes.

3. We have juſt ſo much Religion as we have government of our tongues: A little thing ſerves to tame wild beaſts, and a ſmall ſtern will ſerve to govern a ſhip; Why then cannot a man rule ſo ſmall a part of his body? It is not ſufficient to avoid lying, perjuries, quarrels, injuries, ſlanders and blaſphemies, ſuch as the Scribes and Phariſees did vomit out in this Goſpel againſt the purity of the Son of God: We muſt alſo repreſs idle talk, and other frivolous and unprofitable diſcourſes. There are ſome perſons who have their hearts ſo looſe, that they cannot keep them within their breſts, but they will quickly ſwim upon their lips, without thinking what they ſay, and ſo make a ſhift to wound their ſouls.

4. Imitate a holy Father called Siſus, who prayed God thirty years together every day to deliver him from his tongue, as from a capital enemy: You ſhall never be very chaſte of your body, except you do very well bridle your tongue. For looſneſs of the fleſh proceeds ſometimes from liberty of the tongue: Remember your ſelf that your heart ſhould go like a clock, with all the juſt and equal motions of his ſprings; and that your tongue is the finger, which ſhews how all the hours of the day paſs. When the heart goes of one ſide, and the tongue of another, it is a ſure deſolation of your ſpirits Kingdom. If Jeſus ſet it once at peace and quiet, you muſt be very carefull to keep it ſo; and be very fearfull of relapſes. For the multiplying of long continued ſins, brings at laſt hell it ſelf upon a mans ſhoulders.

Aſpirations.

O Word incarnate, to whom all juſt tongues ſpeak, and after whom all hearts do thirſt and languiſh; chaſe from us all prating devils, and alſo thoſe which are dumb: the firſt provoke and looſe the tongue to ſpeak wickedly, and the other bind it when it ſhould confeſs the truth. O peace-making Solomon, appeaſe the diviſions of my heart, and unite all my powers to the love of thy ſervice. Deſtroy in me all the marks of Satans Empire, and plant there thy Trophees and Standards, that my ſpirit be never like thoſe devils which ſeek for reſt, but ſhall never find it. Make me preſerve inviolable the houſe of my conſcience, which thou haſt cleanſed by repentance, and clothed with thy graces: that I may have perſeverance to the end without relapſes, and ſo obtain happineſs without more need of repentance.

The Goſpel upon Munday the third week in Lent, S. Luke 4.

Jeſus is required to do Miracles in his own Countrey.

AND he ſaid to them, Certes, you will ſay to me this ſimilitude, Phyſitian cure thy ſelf: as great things as we have heard done in Capharnaum, do alſo here in thy Countrey. And he ſaid, Amen, I ſay to you, that no Prophet is accepted in his own Country. In truth I ſay to you, there were many widows in the dayes of Elias in Iſrael, when the heaven was ſhut three years and ſix moneths, when there was a great famine made in the whole earth; and to none of them was Elias ſent, but into Sarepta of Sidon, to a widow woman. And there were many Lepars in Iſrael under Elizeus the Prophet, and none of them made clean but Naaman the Syrian. And all in the Synagogue were filled with anger, hearing theſe things. And they roſe, and caſt him out of the Citie: and they brought him to the edge of the hill whereupon their Citie was built, that they might throw him down headlong. But he paſſing through the midſt of them, went his way.

Moralities.

1. THe malignity of mans nature undervalueth all that which it hath in hand, & little eſteems many neceſſary things, becauſe they are common. The Sun is not counted rare, becauſe it ſhines every day, and the elements are held contemptible, ſince they are common to the poor as well as the rich. Jeſus was deſpiſed in his own Countrey, becauſe he was there known to all the world, and the diſdain of that ungratefull Nation cloſed the hands of his great bounty. Is it not a great unhappineſs to be weary and tyred with often communicating? to be wicked becauſe God is good, and to ſhut up our ſelves cloſe, when he would impart himſelf to us: Men make little account of great benefits and ſpiritual helps, for that they have them preſent. They muſt loſe thoſe favours to know them well, and ſeek outragiouſly without effect, what they have kickt away with contempt, becauſe it was eaſily poſſeſt.

2. The choices and elections of God are not to be comprehended within our thoughts, but they ſhould be adored by our hearts. He is Maſter of his own favours, and doth what he will in the Kingdoms of Nature, Grace, and Glory. He makes veſſels of Potters earth, of gold and ſilver. He makes Holy-dayes and working-dayes (ſaith the Wiſeman) his liberalites are as free to him, as his thoughts. We muſt not examine the reaſon why he doth elevate ſome, and abaſe others. Our eye muſt not be wicked, becauſe his heart is good. Let us content our ſelves that he loves the humble, and to know that the loweſt place of all, is moſt ſecure. No man is made reprobate without juſtice, no man is ſaved without mercy. God creates men to repair in many, that which he hath made; and alſo to puniſh in the perſons of many, that which he hath not made.

3. Jeſus doth not cure his brethren, and yet cures ſtrangers; to ſhew, that his powers are not tied to any nation, but his own will. So likewiſe the graces of God are not to be meaſured according to the nature of him who receives them, but by the pure bounty of him who gives them. The humility of ſome doth call him, when the preſumption of others doth eſtrange him. The weak grounds of a dying law, did no good to the Jews, who diſdained the grace of Jeſus Chriſt, And that diſdain deprived them of their adoption, of the glory of the New Teſtament, of all the promiſes, and of all Magiſtracy. They loſt all, becauſe they would keep their own wills. Let us learn by the grace of God to deſire earneſtly that good, which we would obtain effectually. Perſons diſtaſted and ſurfetted cannot advance much in a ſpiritual life. And he that ſeeks after perfection coldly, ſhall never find it.

Aſpirations.

THy beauties (moſt ſweet Jeſus) are without ſtain, thy goodneſs without reproch, and thy converſation without importunity. God forbid I ſhould be of the number of thoſe ſouls which are diſtaſted with Manna and languiſh after the onions of Egypt. The more I taſte thee, the more I incline to do thee honour. Familiarity with an infinite thing, begets no contempt but onely from thoſe whom thou doeſt deſpiſe for their own faults. O what high ſecrets are thy favours. O what Abyſſes are thy graces. We may wiſh and run: But except thou cooperate, nothing is done. If thou ceaſe to work, all is undone. I put all my happineſs into thy hands: It is thou alone which knoweſt how to chuſe what we moſt need by thy Sovereign wiſdom, and thou giveſt it by thy extream bounty.

The Goſpel upon Tueſday the third week in Lent, S. Matth. 18.

If thy brother offend thee, tell him of it alone.

BUt if thy brother ſhall offend againſt thee, go and rebuke him between thee and him alone: if he ſhall hear thee, thou ſhalt gain thy brother: and if he will not hear thee, joyn with thee beſides one or two, that in the mouth of two or three witneſſes every word may ſtand. And if he will not hear them, tell the Church; and if he will not hear the Church, let him be to thee as the Heathen and the Publican. Amen, I ſay to you, whatſoever ye ſhall bind upon earth, ſhall be bound alſo in heaven: and whatſoever ye ſhall looſe upon earth, ſhall be looſed alſo in heaven. Again I ſay to you, that if two of you ſhall conſent upon earth, concerning every thing whatſoever they aſk, it ſhall be done to them of my Father which is in heaven: for where there be two or three gathered in my name, there am I in the midſt of them.

Then came Peter unto him, and ſaid, Lord, how often ſhall my brother offend againſt me and I forgive him? until ſeven times? Jeſus ſaid to him, I ſay not to thee until ſeven times, but until ſeventy times ſeven times.

Moralities.

1. THe heavens are happy that they go always in one meaſure, and in ſo great a revolution of ages do not make one falſe ſtep; but but man is naturally ſubject to fail: He is full of imperfections, and if he have any virtues, he carries them like duſt againſt the wind, or ſnow againſt the ſun. This is the reaſon which teaches him that he needs good advice.

2. It is ſomewhat hard to give right correction, but much harder to receive it profitably. Some are ſo very fair ſpoken, that they praiſe all which they ſee; and becauſe they will find nothing amiſs, they are ordinarily good to no body. They ſhew to thoſe whom they flatter, their virtues in great, and their faults in little; they will ſay to thoſe who are plunged in great diſorders, they have no other fault, but that they are not ſufficiently carefull of their own health. Others do correct with ſuch ſharpneſs and violence, that they wound their own hearts to cure other mens, and ſeem to have a greater mind to pleaſe their own paſſions, than to amend thoſe whom they would inſtruct. Correction ſhould be accompanied with ſweetneſs, but it muſt carry withall a little vigour to make a right temper, and to keep a mean between ſoftneſs and auſterity. Jeſus in the Prophet Iſaiah is called both a rod and a flower: to ſhew us (according to Origen) that he carries ſeverity mingled with ſweetneſs; to uſe either of them according to the diverſity of perſons.

3. It is not a very eaſie thing to receive brotherly correction patiently, we are ſo far in love with being well thought of. And after we have loſt the tree of life, (which is virtue it ſelf) we would keep the bark of it, which is onely reputation. All ſhadows proceed from thoſe bodies upon which ſomewhat ſhines; honour is the child of a known virtue: and many, when they cannot get one lawfull, are willing to have a Baſtard. This is the cauſe, why ſo many reſemble thoſe ſerpents, which requite them with poiſon, who ſing to them pleaſant ſongs. Whatſoever is ſpoken to inſtruct them, makes them paſſionate, and dart out angry ſpeeches againſt thoſe, who ſpeak to them mild and gentle words of truth, and tending to their ſalvation. Reſt aſſured, you can never get perfection, except you count it a glorie to learn, and diſcover your own imperfections.

4. There is nothing of more force than the prayers of juſt men: which are animated by the ſame ſpirit, and cimented together with perfect concord. They are moſt powerfull both in heaven and earth. When they deſire what God will, they are always heard; if not according to the wiſhes of their own nature, yet according to the greater profits of his grace. He is always happie, who hath that which he would; becauſe he knows how to wiſh what is fitting, and finds means to obtain what he deſires, by reaſon of his abſtinence from coveting that which cannot be had.

5. We muſt not offer to limit our goodneſs, but as it comes from an infinit God, we ſhould make it as near being infinite as we can. He gives the lie to virtues, who will reduce them to a certain number. We muſt never be weary of well doing, but imitate the nature of celeſtial things, which never make any end but to begin again.

Aſpiration.

O God, what ſpots are in my ſoul, and how little do I look into my own imperfections? Wilt thou never ſhew me to my ſelf (for ſome good time) that I may cure my ſelf by horrour of ſeeing what I am, ſince I do ſo often wound my ſelf, by being too indulgent to my own naughty affections. It is a great offence to break the glaſs which repreſenteth me to my ſelf by brotherly correction, and to think, I ſhall commit no more ſins when no body will take liberty to reprove me. I will humble my ſelf to the very duſt, and mount up to thy glorie by contempt of my own baſeneſs: Alas, muſt my ſoul be always ſo far in love with it ſelf, that it cannot ſuffer the remonſtrance of a friend? how will it then endure the tooth of an enemy? what can ſhe love being ſo partial to her ſelf, if ſhe do not love moſt ugly darkneſs, O my redoubted Maſter, I fear thine eyes which ſee thoſe obſcurities, which the fooliſh world takes to be brightneſs. If I cannot be always innocent, make me at leaſt acknowledge my ſelf faulty, that I may know my ſelf as I am; to the end thou mayeſt know me for an object capable of thy mercy.

The Goſpel upon Wedneſday the third week in Lent, S. Matthew 15.

The Phariſees asked Jeſus, Why do thy Diſciples contradict ancient Traditions.

THen came to him from Jeruſalem, Scribes and Phariſees, ſaying, Why do thy Diſciples tranſgreſs the tradition of the ancients? For they waſh not their hands when they eat bread. But he anſwering, ſaid to them, Why do you alſo tranſgreſs the commandment of God for your tradition? For God ſaid, Honour father and mother: and he that ſhall curſe father or mother, dying let him die. But you ſay, Whoſoever ſhall ſay to father or mother, The gift whatſoever proceedeth from me, ſhall profit thee, and ſhall not honour his father or his mother: and you have made fruſtrate the commandment of God for your own tradition. Hypocrites, well hath Eſaiah prophecied of you, ſaying, This people honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. And in vain do they worſhip me, teaching doctrines and commandments of men.

And having called together the multitudes unto him, he ſaid to them, Hear ye and underſtand, Not that which entereth into the mouth defileth a man, but that which proceedeth out of the mouth, that defileth a man. Then came his Diſciples and ſaid to him, Doſt thou know that the Phariſees when they heard this word were ſcandalized? But he anſwering, ſaid, All planting which my heavenly Father hath not planted, ſhall be rooted up. Let them alone, blind they are, guides of the blind: and if the blind be guide to the blind, both fall into the ditch. And Peter anſwering, ſaid to him, Expound us this parable. But he ſaid, Are you alſo as yet without underſtanding? Do you not underſtand, that all that entereth into the mouth, goeth into the belly, and is caſt forth into the privie? But the things that proceed out of the mouth, come forth from the heart, and thoſe things defile a man. For from the heart come forth evil cogitations, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, falſe teſtimonies, blaſphemy: Theſe are the things that defile: but to eat with unwaſhen hands, doth not defile a man.

Moralities.

1. THe ſpirit of man is wretched, and makes it ſelf buſineſs by being diſquieted with petty little things: and tormenting it ſelf with formalities, whiles it lives in a deep neglect of all that which is moſt eſſential to her ſalvation. The Phariſees did place their perfections in waſhing themſelves every hour of the day; in bearing writs of the Law upon their foreheads, and thorns upon their heels; but made no ſcruple to take away the honour due to fathers and mothers from their children; to make ſpoil of the world by a ravenous avarice (which took upon it the appearance of piety) and to give up innocent bloud under ſhew of juſtice. The world doth now furniſh it ſelf with ſuch like devotions. Some make it a ſin to look upon a fair flower with delight: to eat with a good appetite; to drink cool wine in hot weather: to burn a paper, upon which the name of Jesus is written: to tread upon two straws that lie a cross. But to set money to usury, to remember injuries for ever, to keep a poor workmans wages, to oppress the weak, to accuse the innocent, to spoil miserable persons: These are the little sins which pass for virtues in this world. Assure your self that such proceedings are abominable before God; and there can be no better devotion in the world, than to have a true and right feeling of God, and to live in honesty, not sophisticated, but such as is produced out of the pure lights of nature. The conscience of hypocrites is a spiders web, whereof no garment can ever be made. Hypocrisie is a very subtil fault, and a secret poison, which kils other virtues with their own swords.

2. Jesus is our great Master, who hath abridged six hundred and thirteen Precepts of the old Testament within the Law of love. Do but love (saith Saint Augustine) and do what you will: but then your love must go to the right fountain, which is the heart of God. It is in him you must cherish and honour your neatest friends; and for him also you are bound to love even your greatest enemies. Be not afraid to shew him your heart stark naked, that he may pierce it with his arrows; for the wounds of such an archer are much more precious than rubies. You shall gain all by loving him; and death it self, which comes from this love, is the gate of life. If you love him truly, you will have the three conditions of love, which are, to serve him, to imitate him, and to suffer for him. You must serve him with all fidelity in your prayers, and all your actions: you must imitate him (what possibly you can) in all the passages of his life; And you must hold it for a glory to participate (with a valiant patience) all the fruits of his Cross.

Aspirations.

O Great God, who judgest all hearts, and doest penetrate the most secret retirements of our consciences, drive away from me all counterfeit Pharisaical devotions, which are nothing but shews, and cannot subsist but by false apparencies. O my God, my Jesus, make me keep the Law of thy love, and nothing else. It is a yoke which brings with it more honour than burden; It is a yoke which hath wings, but no heavines: Make me serve thee, (O my Master) since thou beholdest the services of all the Angels under thy feet: Make me imitate thee, (O my Redeemer) since thou art the original of all perfections: make me suffer for thee, (O King of the afflicted) and that I may not know what it is to suffer, by knowing what it is to love.

The Gospel upon Thursday the third week in Lent, S. Luke 4.

Jesus cured the Feaver of Simons Mother in Law.

And Jesus rising up out of the Synagogue, entered into Simons house, and Simons wives mother was holden with a great Feaver, and they besought him for her. And standing over her, he commanded the Feaver, and it left her: And incontinent rising, she ministred to them. And when the Sun was down, all that had diseased of sundry maladies, brought them to him: But he imposing hands upon every one, cured them. And Devils went out from many, crying and saying, that thou art the Son of God. And rebuking them, he suffered them not to speak, that they knew he was Christ. And when it was day, going forth, he went into a desart place, and the multitudes sought him, and came even unto him: and they held him, that he should not depart from them. To whom he said, That to other Cities also must I Evangelize the Kingdom of God: because therefore I was sent. And he was preaching in the Synagogues of Galilee.

Moralities.

1. A Soul within a sick body, is a Princess that dwels in a ruinous house: Health is the best of all temporal goods; without which, all honours are as the beams of an eclipsed sun: Riches are unpleasing, and all pleasures are languishing. All joy of the heart subsists naturally in the health of the body. But yet it is true, that the most healthfull persons are not always the most holy. What profit is there in that health, which serves for a provocation to sin, for an inticement to worldly pleasure, and a gate to death? The best souls are never better nor stronger, than when their bodies are sick: their diseases are too hard for their mortal bodies, but their courage is invincible. It is a great knowledge to understand our own infirmities. Prosperity keeps us from the view of them, but adversity shews them to us. We should hardly know what death is, if so many diseases did not teach us every day that we are mortal. Semiramis the proudest of all Queens had made a law, whereby she was to be adored in stead of all the gods, but being humbled by a great sickness, she acknowledged her self to be but a woman.

2. All the Apostles pray for this holy woman which was sick, but she herself asked nothing, nor did complain of any thing. She leaves all to God, who is onely Master of life and death. She knew that he which gives his benefits with such bounty, hath the wisdom to chuse those which are most fit for us. How do we know, whether we desiring to be delivered from a sickness, do not ask of God to take away a gift which is very necessary to our salvation? That malady or affliction which makes us distaste worldly pleasures, gives us a disposition to taste the joyes of heaven.

3. How many sick persons in the heat of a Feaver promise much, and when they are well again perform nothing. That body which carried all the marks of death in the face, is no sooner grown strong by health (which rejoyceth the heart, and fils the veins with bloud) but it becomes a slave to sin. The gifts of God (being abused) serve for nothing but to make it wicked; and so the soul is killed by recovery of the flesh. But this pious woman is no sooner on foot but she serves the Authour of life, and employes all those limbs, (which Jesus cured of the Feaver) to prepare some provisions to refresh him. He that will not use the treasures of heaven with acknowledgement, deserveth never to keep them. When a man is recovered from a great sickness, as his body is renewed by health, so on the other side, he should renew his spirit by virtue. The body (saith Saint Maximus) is the bed of the soul, where it sleeps too easily in continual health, and forgets it self in many things. But a good round sickness doth not onely move, but turn over this bed, which maketh the soul awake, to think on her salvation, and make a total conversion.

Aspirations.

O Word Incarnate, all Feavours and Devils flie before the beams of thy redoubled face. Must nothing but the heat of thy passions always resist thy powers and bounties? To what maladies and indispositions am I subject? I have more diseases in my soul soul then limbs in my body. My weakness bends under thy scourges, and yet my sins continue still unmoveable. Stay (O benign Lord) stay thy self near me. Cast upon my dull and heavy eyes, one beam from those thine eyes, which make all storms clear, and all disasters happie. Command that my weakness leave me, and that I may arise to perform my services due to thy greatness, as I will for ever ow my salvation to thine infinite power and bounty.

The Gospel upon Friday the third week in Lent, S. John 4.

Of the Samatitan woman at Jacobs Well, neer Sichar.

He cometh therefore into a Citie of Samaria, which is called Sichar, beside the Mannor that Jacob gave to Joseph his son. And there was there the fountain of Jacob. Jesus therefore wearied of his journey, sate so upon the fountain. It was about the sixth hour.

There cometh a woman of Samaria to draw water, Jesus saith to her, Give me to drink: for his Disciples were gone into the Citie to buy meats: therefore that Samaritan woman saith to him, How dost thou being a Jew ask of me to drink which am a Samaritan woman? for the Jews do not communicate with the Samaritanes. Jesus answered and said to her, If thou didst know the gift of God, and who he is that saith unto thee, Give me to drink, thou perhaps wouldst have asked of him, and he would have given thee living water. The woman saith to him, Sir, neither hast thou wherein to draw, and the well is deep; whence hast thou the living water? Art thou greater than our father Jacob who gave us the well, and himself drank of it, and his children and his cattel. Jesus answered, and said to her, Every one that drinketh of this water, shall thirst again; but he that shall drink of the water that I will give him, shall not thirst for ever: but the water that I will give him, shall become unto him a fountain of water springing up unto life everlasting. The woman saith to him, Lord, give me this water, that I may not thirst, nor come hither to draw.

Jesus said to her, Go call thy husband, and come hither. The woman answered and said, I have no husband. Jesus saith to her, Thou hast said well that I have no husband: for thou hast had five husbands, and he whom thou now hast, is not thy husband. This thou hast said truely.

The woman saith to him, Lord, I perceive that thou art a Prophet. Our fathers adored in this mountain, and you say, that Jerusalem is the place where men must adore. Jesus saith to her, Woman believe me, that the hour shall come, when you shall neither in this mountain, nor in Jerusalem, adore the Father. You adore that you know not: we adore that we know; for salvation is of the Jews: but the hour cometh, and now is, when the true adorers shall adore the Father in spirit and verity. For the Father also seeketh such to adore him. God is a spirit, and they that adore him, must adore in spirit and verity. The woman saith to him, I know that Messias cometh, (which is called Christ) therefore when he cometh, he will shew us all things. Jesus saith to her, I am he that speak with thee.

And incontinent his Disciples came: and they marvelled that he talked with a woman. No man for all that said, What seekest thou, or why talkest thou with her? The woman therefore left her water-pot, and she went into the Citie, and saith to those men, Come and see a man that hath told me all things whatsoever I have done: Is not he Christ? They went forth therefore out of the Citie, and came to him.

In the mean time the Disciples desired him, saying, Rabbi, eat. But he said to them, I have meat to eat which you know not. The Disciples therefore said one to another, hath any man brought him for to eat? Jesus saith to them, My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, to perfect his work. Do not you say, that yet there are four moneths, and harvest cometh? Behold, I say to you, lift up your eyes, and see the Countries, that they are white already to harvest: And he that reapeth, receiveth hire, and gathereth fruit unto life everlasting, that both he that soweth, and he that reapeth, may rejoyce together. For in this is the saying true, that it is one man that soweth, and it is another that reapeth. I have sent you to reap that for which you laboured not: others have laboured, and you have entered into their labours.

And of that Citie many believed in him of the Samaritanes, for the word of the woman giving testimonie, that he told me all things whatsoever I have done. Therefore when the Samaritanes were come to him, they desired him that he would tarrie there. And he tarried there two dayes. And many moe believed for his own word: and they said to the woman, That now, not for thy saying do we believe: for our selves have heard, and do know, that this is the Saviour of the world indeed.

Moralities.

1 THe God of all power is weary, the main sea desires a drop of salt water: the King of Angels becomes a suppliant for a little part of all that which is his own. This Gospel shews us clearly the love of God toward humane nature, and the infinite zeal which he hath to the salvation of souls. Is it not a thing, which should load us with confusion, to see, that he who is filled with all felicities hath onely one thirst, which is, that we should thirst after him? and that we should make chief account of that living water, which he carrieth within his breast, which indeed properly is grace, the onely way to glory.

2. Behold the difference between Jacobs Well, and the Well of Jesus; between contentments of the world, and the pleasures of God. The Well of Jacob is common to men and beasts; to shew unto us, that a man which glorieth himself of his sensual delights, makes a Trophee of his own baseness, and a Triumph of his fault. It is just s if Nabucadnezzar forsaking his Crown and Throne (to transform himself into a beast) should brag, that he had gotten a hansom stable, and very good hay. But the fountain of Jesus holds in it the water of graces, a wholesom water, pure and Christalline; which brings us to the society of Angels. The water of Jacob though it be but a water for beasts, yet it is hard to obtain: There are many which run mad after riches, honours and contentments of this world, and can never come to possess them: They live in a mill, and gain nothing out of it, but the noise and dust. They turn round about upon the wheel of disquiet, and never rest. But if good fortune sometime cast them a bone, there are a hundred dogs which strive to catch it. All their life is nothing but expectation, and their end onely despair. Whereas the Well of Jesus is open to all the world; he seeketh, he asketh, he calleth, he giveth gratis, he requireth nothing of us but our selves, and would have us for no other reason but onely to make us happie. The Well of Jacob begetteth thirst, but doth not quench it. Do not you consider that the Samaritan woman left her pot there, and did not drink? After so many fantasms and illusions, which do amuse worldlings, they must part from the world with great thirst. But the fountains of our Saviour free us from the desire of all creatures, and do establish within mans spirit, an object of which the heart can never lose the delight. O happy Samaritan! (saith Saint Ambrose) which left her pot empty, that she might return full of Jesus Christ. She did no wrong to her fellow Citizens, for if she brought no water to the Town, yet she made the fountain it self come thither.

3. Is it not a ſhamefull thing that God ſhould ſeek us amongſt the heats of his love and ſufferings, deſireth nothing but us, is contented with the poſſeſſion of our heart, and yet we cannot be content with him? Shall not we forſake all the diſorders of a ſenſual life which hinder the effect of Gods grace? Shall not we forſake and leave behind us our pitcher, bidding farewell to all thoſe occaſions which lead us to ſin, to avoid that fire whereof we have reaſon to fear the ſmoke?

Aſpirations.

O (Unexhauſtible fountain of all beauties) that my ſoul hath been long alienated from thee. I have ſo many times run after the ſalt waters of worldly pleaſures and contentments, which have not ceaſed to kindle a wicked thirſt within my veins, in ſuch a violent proportion, that I could not quench it. But now (O ſweet Saviour) my ſoul (being weary and diſtaſted with all the fading delights of this tranſitory world) doth languiſh inceſſantly after thee. Whether the break of day begin to gild the mountains with his brightneſs, whether the Sun be advanced high in his courſe, or whether the night do caſt a dark vail over all mortall things. I ſeek and deſire thy entertainments, which are the onely ſweet Idea's of my ſoul. I plunge my ſelf within the contemplation of thy greatneſs, I adore thy powers: The firſt which torments me (by loving thee) is ſo precious, that I would not loſe it to drink Nectar; and I can never quench it, but in the ſtreams of thoſe delights and pleaſures, which proceed from the throne of the holy Lamb.

The Goſpel upon Saturday the third week in Lent, S. John the 8.

Of the woman found in adultery.

And Jeſus went into the mount Olivet, and early in the morning again he came into the temple, and the people came to him, and ſitting he taught them.

And the Scribes and Phariſees bring a woman taken in adultery, and they did ſet her in the midſt, and ſaid to him, Maſter, this woman was even now taken in adultery. And in the law Moſes commanded to ſtone ſuch. What ſayeſt thou therefore? and this they ſaid tempting him, that they might accuſe him. But Jeſus bowing himſelf down, with his finger wrote in the earth. When they therefore continued asking him, he lifted up himſelf, and ſaid to them, He that is without ſin of you, let him firſt throw the ſtone at her. And again bowing himſelf, he wrote in the earth. And they hearing, went out one by one, beginning at the Seniours, and Jeſus alone remained, and the woman ſtanding in the midſt. And Jeſus lifting up himſelf, ſaid to her, Woman, where are they that accuſed thee? Hath no man condemned thee? who ſaid, No man, Lord. And Jeſus ſaid, Neither will I condemn thee. Go, and now ſin no more.

Moralities.

1. MEn naturally love better to cenſure the life of another, than to examine their own. The Ravens accuſe Doves, and he ſits often upon a Tribunal to condemn vice, who doth lodge it in his heart. Many reſemble the Cocks which crow againſt a Baſilisk, and yet bear the ſeed of it in their entrails. Reaſon would always, that we begin to reform others, by the cenſure of our own life. No word can carrie ſuch life and vigour with it, as that which is followed by action. To talk all and do nothing, is to build with one hand, and deſtroy with the other. The land of the living ſhall never be for thoſe, who have their tongues longer than their arms.

2. To what purpoſe is it to ſpeak good words, and yet lead an ill life? A man can neither hide himſelf from God nor himſelf: his conſcience is a thouſand witneſſes. Thoſe, who were ready to lift up their hands to ſtone the adulterous woman, were diverted, and departed with confuſion, ſeeing their ſins written in the duſt, with certain figures to expreſs them. If we could always behold our own life before our eyes (as a piece of Tapiſtry) we ſhould there ſee ſo many Serpents amongſt flowers, that we would have more horrour of our own ſins, than will to cenſure thoſe who are like our ſelves.

3. God ſhews mercy, but will not ſuffer his mildneſs to be abuſed, ſin muſt not print its ſteps upon his clemency. It is a falſe repentance for a man to act that which himſelf hath condemned: and after ſo many relapſes, to take but one fall into everlaſting pain. The ordinary Gloſs obſerves, that our Saviour bended down, when he wrote upon the earth, to ſhew that the remembrance of our ſins lay heavy upon him: But when he began to pardon, he aroſe up; to teach us, what joy and comfort he takes in the Kingdom of his mercy.

Aſpirations.

O Sovereign Judge, who ſitteſt upon a Tribunal ſeat, born up with truth and power; make me rather judge mine own life, than cenſure the lives of others. Muſt I be full of eyes without, and blind within? Shew me my ſtains, and give me water to waſh them out. Alas, I am altogether but one ſtain, and thou art all purity. My ſoul is aſhamed to ſee it ſelf ſo dark before thy light, and ſo ſmutted over, before thine immortal whiteneſs. Do not write me upon the ground, as a child of earth; write me in heaven, ſince I am the portion which thou haſt purchaſed with thy precious bloud: Blot out my ſins, which are but too deeply graven upon my hands, and pardon, by thine infinite mercy, what thou mayeſt condemn by juſtice.

The Goſpel upon Sunday the fourth week in Lent, S. John 6.

Of the five Fiſhes, and two Barly loaves.

After theſe things Jeſus went beyond the Sea of Galilee, which is of Tiberias; and a great multitude followed him, becauſe they ſaw the ſigns which he did upon thoſe that were ſick. Jeſus therefore went up into the mountain, and there he ſate with his Diſciples. And the Paſcha was at hand, the feſtival day of the Jews. When Jeſus therefore had lifted up his eyes, and ſaw that a very great multitude cometh to him, he ſaith to Philip, Whence ſhall we buy bread, that theſe may eat? and this he ſaid, tempting him, for himſelf knew what he would do. Philip anſwered him, two hundred penyworth of bread is not ſufficient for them, that every man may take a little piece. One of his Diſciples, Andrew the brother of Simon Peter, ſaith to him, There is a Boy here that hath five Barly loaves, and two Fiſhes, but what are theſe among ſo many? Jeſus therefore ſaith, Make the men ſit down. And there was much graſs in the place. The men therefore ſate down, in number about five thouſand. Jeſus therefore took the loaves, and when he had given thanks, he diſtributed to them that ſate. In like manner alſo of the Fiſhes, as much as they would. And after they were filled, he ſaid to his Diſciples, Gather the fragments that are remaining, leſt they be loſt. They gathered therefore, and filled twelve baskets with fragments of the five Barly loaves which remained to them that had eaten. Thoſe men therefore when they had ſeen What a ſign Jeſus had done, ſaid, That this is the Prophet indeed that is to come into the world. Jeſus therefore when he knew that they would come to take him, and make him a King, he fled again into the mountain himſelf alone.

Mora-

Moralities.

1. WHat a happie thing it is to ſerve God, whoſe converſation is ſo worthy all love! See how he carried himſelf toward this poor multitude, which followed him with ſuch zeal and conſtancy. It ſeems they were his children, that he carried them all upon his ſhoulders, that he had their names, their Countries, their qualities, and the conditions of their ſmall fortunes graven in his heart. He is ſo tender over them, he ſo afflicts himſelf about them, as a Shepherd over his poor flock. He inſtructs them, he ſpeaks to them of heavenly things, he heals their maladies, he comforts their ſadneſs; he lifts his eyes up to heaven for them; and for them he opens his divine hands (the treaſures of Heaven) and nouriſhes them by a miracle, as they had wholly reſigned themſelves to him with ſuch abſolute confidence. O how are we cheriſhed by heaven, ſince God doth bind himſelf to help us! And we ſhould be unfaithfull not to truſt him, who makes nature it ſelf ſo faithfull to us. It is here much to be obſerved, that God doth no miracles for his own profit; he doth not change ſtones into bread in the Deſart to nouriſh himſelf after that long faſt which he did there make; but for his faithfull ſervants he alters the courſe of nature; and being auſtere to himſelf, he becomes indulgent to us; to teach us, that we ſhould deſpoil our ſelves of ſelf-love, which ties us to our own fleſh, and makes us ſo negligent to our neighbour.

2. What precious thing is to be gotten by following the world, that we ſhould forſake Jeſus in the Deſart, and run after vain hopes at Court, and great mens houſes, where we pretend to make ſome fortune? How many injuries muſt a man diſſemble? How many affronts muſt he ſwallow? How many deadly ſweats muſt he endure, to obtain ſome reaſonable condition? How many times muſt he ſacrifice his children, engage his own conſcience, and offer violences to others, to advance the affairs of great men? And after many years ſervice, if any foreaird or ruinous buſineſs committed to his charge (in the purſuit whereof he muſt walk upon thorns) ſhall chance to miſcarry, all the fault muſt be laid upon a good officer; and if he prove unlucky, he ſhall ever be made culpable, and in the turning of a hand, all his good ſervices forgotten and loſt: and for a final recompence, he muſt be loaden with infinite diſgraces. It is quite contrary in the ſervice of God: for he encourages our virtues, he ſupplies our defects, governs our ſpiritual, and yet neglects not our temporal occaſions. He that clothes the flowers of the Meadows more gorgeouſly than Monarchs, who lodges ſo many little Fiſhes in golden and azure ſhels, he, who doth but open his hand and repleniſhes all nature with bleſſings, if we be faithfull in keeping his Commandments, will never forſake us at our need. But yet we find all the difficulties of the world to put our truſt in him, we vilifie our cares of eternity: and by ſeeking after worldly things whereby to live, we torment our ſelves, and in the end loſe our own lives. A man that muſt die, needs very few wordly things; a very little Cabbin will ſuffice nature, but whole Kingdoms will not ſatisfie covetouſneſs.

3. Jeſus flies from Scepters, and runs to the Croſs; he would have no worldly Kingdoms, becauſe their Thrones are made of Ice, and their Crowns of Glaſs. He valued the Kingdom of God above all things, that he might make us partakers of his precious conqueſt, and infinite rich prize. But now it ſeems that heaven is not a ſufficient Kingdom for us; men run after land, and itch after the ambition of fading greatneſs: and ſometimes all their life paſſeth away in great ſins, and as great troubles to get a poor title of three letters upon their Tomb. Alas! do we know better than God, in what honour conſiſts, that we muſt ſeek after that which he did avoid, and not imitate that which he followed?

Let us follow God, and believe that where he is, there can be no deſart or ſolitude for us. They ſhall never taſte the delights of virtue that feed upon the joys of vanity. All worldly pleaſures are Comets made fat with the ſmokes and vapours of the earth: and in ſtead of giving light and brightneſs, they bring forth murders and contagions: but the following of God is always ſweet, and he which ſuffers thereby, changes his very tears into nouriſhment.

Aſpiration.

O My God! Shall I always run after that which flies from me, and never follow Jeſus who follows me by incomparable paths, and loves me even while I am ungratefull. I will no more run after the ſhadows of worldly honour, I will no more have my own will, which both is, and hath proved ſo unfaithfull. I will put my ſelf into the happy courſe of Gods diſpoſition, for all which ſhall happen unto me, either in time or eternity; his carefull eye watches over me; it is for me that his hands have treaſures, and the very Deſarts poſſeſs abundance. O crucified love, the moſt pure of all beauties, it is for thee that ſo many generous Champions have peopled the Deſarts, and paſſed the ſtreams of bitterneſs and ſorrow, bearing their croſſes after thee; and thereupon have felt the ſweetneſs of thy viſits amongſt their cruel rigours. God forbid, that I ſhould give the lie to ſo great and ſo generous a company. I go to thee, and will follow thee amongſt the deſarts; I run not after bread, I run after thy divine perſon, I will make much of thy wounds, I honour thy torments, I will conform my ſelf to thee, that I may find joy amongſt thy dolours, and life it ſelf amongſt thine infinite ſufferings.

The Goſpel upon Munday the fourth week in Lent, S. John 2.

Of the whipping buyers and ſellers out of the Temple.

AND the Paſch of the Jews was at hand, and Jeſus went up to Jeruſalem, and he found in the Temple them that ſold Oxen, and Sheep, and Doves, and the Bankers ſitting. And when he had made, as it were, a whip of little cords, he caſt them all out of the Temple, the ſheep alſo and the oxen, and the money of the Bankers he poured out, and the tables he overthrew. And to them that ſold Doves, he ſaid, Take away theſe things hence, and make not the houſe of my Father a houſe of merchandiſe. And his Diſciples remembered that it is written, The zeal of thy houſe hath eaten me. The Jews therefore anſwered, and ſaid to him, What ſign doeſt thou ſhew us, that thou doeſt theſe things? Jeſus anſwered and ſaid to them, Diſſolve this Temple, and in three dayes I will raiſe it. The Jews therefore ſaid, in fourty and ſix years was this Temple built, and wilt thou raiſe it in three dayes? But he ſpake of the Temple of his body. Therefore when he was riſen again from the dead, his Diſciples remembered that he ſaid this, and they believed the Scripture, and the word that Jeſus did ſay. And when he was at Jeruſalem in the Paſche upon the feſtival day, many believed in his name, ſeeing his ſigns which he did. But Jeſus did not commit himſelf unto them, for that he knew all, and becauſe it was not needfull for him that any ſhould give teſtimony of man: for he knew what was in man.

Moralities.

1. PIety is a ſilver chain hanged up aloft, which ties heaven and earth, ſpiritual and temporal, God and man together. Devotion is a virtue derived to us from the Father of all light, who gives us thereby means to hold a traffick or commerce with Angels. All which is here below, ſinks by its proper weight, and leans downward toward natural corruption: Our ſpirit though it be immortal, would follow the weight of our bodies, if it were not indued with the knowledge of God which works the ſame effect in it, as the Adamant doth with iron: for it pierceth and gives it life, together with a ſecret and powerful ſpirit, from which all great actions take their beginning: You ſhall never do any great act, if the honour of God, and the reverence of ſacred things ſhall not accompany all your pretences. For if you ground your piety upon any temporal reſpects, you reſemble that people, which believes the higheſt mountains do ſupport the skies.

2. There are no ſins which God doth puniſh more rigorouſly, nor ſpeedily, than thoſe which are committed againſt devotion and piety: He doth not here take up the ſcourge againſt naughty Judges, uſurers and unchaſte perſons, becauſe the Church is to find remedy againſt all faults which happen in the life of man. But if a man commit a ſin againſt Gods Altar, the remedy grows deſperate. King Ozias felt a leoproſie riſe upon his face at the inſtant when he made the ſume riſe from the cenſor, which he uſurped from the high Prieſts. Ely the chief Prieſt was buried in the ruins of his own houſe, for the ſacriledge of his children, without any conſideration of thoſe long ſervices, which he had performed at the Tabernacle. Keep your ſelf from ſimonies, from irreverence in Churches, and from abuſing Sacraments. He can have no excuſe, which makes his Judge a witneſs.

3. Jeſus was violently moved by the zeal which he bare to the houſe of his heavenly Father. But many wicked rich men limit their zeal onely to their own families. They build great Palaces upon the peoples bloud, and they nothing care though all the world be in a ſtorm, ſo long as they (and what belongs to them) be well covered. But there is a revenging God who doth inſenſibly drie up the roots of proud Nations, and throws diſgrace and infamy upon the faces of thoſe, who neglect the glories of Gods Altars to advance their own. He who builds without God, doth demoliſh, and whoſoever thinks to make any great encreaſe without him, ſhall find nothing but ſterility.

Aſpiration.

O Moſt pure Spirit of Jeſus, which waſt conſummate by zeal toward the houſe of God, wilt thou never burn my heart with thoſe adored flames, wherewith thou inſpireſt chaſte hearts? Why do we take ſo much care of our houſes (which are built upon quick-ſilver, and roll up and down upon the inconſtancies of humane fortunes) while we have no love nor zeal towards Gods Church, which is the Palace which we ſhould chuſe here upon earth, to be as the Image of heaven above? I will adore thy Altars (all my life) with a profound humility. But I will firſt make an Altar of my own heart, where I will offer ſacrifice; to which I doubt not but thou wilt put fire with thine own hand.

The Goſpel upon Tueſday the fourth week in Lent, S. John 7.

The Jews marvel at the learning of Jeſus who was never taught.

And when the feſtivity was now half done, Jeſus went up into the Temple and taught. And the Jews marvelled, ſaying, how doth this man know letters, whereas he hath not learned? Jeſus anſwered them, and ſaid, my doctrine is not mine but his that ſent me. If any man will do the will of him, he ſhall underſtand of the doctrine, whither it be of God, or I ſpeak of my ſelf; he that ſpeaketh of himſelf ſeeketh his own glorie, but he that ſeeketh the glorie of him that ſent him, he is true, and injuſtice in him there is not. Did not Moſes give you the Law, and none of you doth the Law? Why ſeek you to kill me? The multitude anſwered and ſaid, thou haſt a Devil, who ſeeketh to kill thee? Jeſus anſwered and ſaid to them, One work I have done, and you do all marvel, Therefore Moſes gave you circumciſion, not that it is of Moſes, but of the Fathers, and in the Sabbath ye circumciſe a man. If a man receive circumciſion in the Sabbath, that the law of Moſes be not broken, are you angry at me becauſe I have healed a man wholly in the Sabbath? Judge not according to the face, judge juſt judgement.

Certain therefore of Jeruſalem ſaid, Is not this he whom they ſeek to kill: And behold, he ſpeaks openly, and they ſay nothing to him. Have the Princes known indeed that this is Chriſt? But this man we know whence he is. But when Chriſt cometh, no man knoweth whence he is. Jeſus therefore cried in the Temple, teaching and ſaying, Both me you do know, and whence I am you know; and of my ſelf I am not come. But he is true that ſent me, whom you know not. I know him, becauſe I am of him, and he ſent me. They ſought therefore to apprehend him, and no man laid hands upon him, becauſe his hour was not yet come. But of the multitude many believed in him.

Moralities.

1. IT appears by this Goſpel that Jeſus was judged according to apparences, not according to truth. It is one of the greateſt confuſions which is deeply rooted in the life of man, that every thing is full of painting, and inſtead of taking it off with a ſpunge, we foment it, and make our illuſions voluntary. The Prophet Iſay adviſeth us to uſe our judgement, as men do leaven to ſeaſon bread. All the objects preſented to our imaginations, which we eſteem are fading, if we do not adde ſome heavenly vigour to help our judgement.

2. To judge according to apparences is a great want both of judgement and courage. The firſt makes us prefer vanity before truth; the ſecond gives that to ſilk and golden clothes, which is properly due to virtue: We adore painted coals and certain dark fumes covered outwardly with ſnow; But if we did know how many great miſeries, and what beaſtly ordure is hidden under cloth of gold, ſilk, and ſcarlet, we would complain of our eyes for being ſo far without reaſon. It is a kind of Apoſtacy and rebellion againſt Gods providence, to judge without calling God to be a preſident in our counſel; or to take in hand any humane inventions without the aſſiſtance of his Spirit.

3. God is pleaſed to lodge pearls within cockles; and beſtows his treaſures of wiſdom and virtue, many times upon perſons, who have the moſt unfaſhionable outſides, to countercheck humane wiſdom. He makes his orators of thoſe who are ſpeechleſs; and numbers of frogs and flies to overthrow mighty armies. He makes Kings out of ſhepherds, and ſerves himſelf of things which are not, as if they were. The moſt pleaſing Sacrifice which he receives upon earth, is from the humble; and when we deſpiſe thoſe, we divert the honours of God. We offer Sacrifice to the worlds opinion, like the Sages of Egypt; who did light candles and burn incenſe to Crocodiles. The Jews loſt their faith to follow apparences: and there is no ſhorter way to Apoſtacy, than to adore the world and neglect God.

4. An ill opinion make folks many times paſs a raſh judgement: They mount into Gods chair to judge the hearts of men: The chaſte doves are uſed like like Ravens, and Ravens like Swans. Opinion puts falſe ſpectacles upon our eyes, which make faults ſeem virtues, and virtues crimes. Yet nevertheleſs we ſhould think that virtuous perſons will not conceive an ill ſuſpition of their neighbour without a very ſure ground: Saint John Climacus ſaith, fire is no more contrary to water, than raſh judgement is to the ſtate of repentance. It is a certain ſign, that we do not ſee our own ſins, when we ſeek curiouſly after the leaſt defects of our neighbour. If we would but once enter into our ſelves, we ſhould be ſo buſie to lament our own lives, that we ſhould not have time to cenſure thoſe of others.

Aſpirations.

O Judge moſt redoubtable, who doſt plant thy Throne within the heart of man, who judgeſt the greateſt Monarchs, without leaving them power to appeal; Thy judgements are ſecret and impenetrable: That which ſhines to our eyes like a Diamond, is like a contemptible worm in thy ballance. That which we value as a Star thou judgeſt to be a coal. We have juſt ſo much greatneſs, virtue, and happineſs, as we have by enterance into thy heart. And he whom thou eſteemeſt, needs not the judgement of mortal man. No innocent is juſtified, nor guilty perſon condemned without thee, and therefore I will from henceforth judge onely according to thee. I will lay down all my affections, and take thine, ſo far as I ſhall be able; and I will account nothing great, but what ſhall be ſo in thy eſteem.

The Goſpel upon Wedneſday the fourth week in Lent, S. John 9.

Of the blind man cured by clay and ſpittle.

And Jeſus paſſing by, ſaw a blind man from his nativitie: and his Diſciples asked him, Rabbi, Who hath ſinned, this man or his parents, that he ſhould be born blind, Jeſus anſwered, Neither hath this man ſinned, nor his parents; but that the works of God may be manifeſted in him. I muſt work the works of him that ſent me while it is day, the night cometh when no man can work. As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world. When he had ſaid theſe things, he ſpit on the ground, and made clay of the ſpittle, and ſpred the clay upon his eyes, and ſaid to him, Go, waſh in the Pool of Silo, which is interpreted, ſent. He went therefore and waſhed, and he came ſeeing.

Therefore the neighbours, and they which had ſeen him before, that he was a beggar, ſaid, Is not this he that ſate and begged? Others ſaid, that this is he. But others no, not ſo, but he is like him. But he ſaid that I am he. They ſaid therefore to him, How were thine eyes opened? He anſwered, that man that is called Jeſus, made clay, and anointed mine eyes, and ſaid to me, Go to the Pool of Silo and waſh: and I went and waſhed, and ſaw. And they ſaid to him, Where is he? He ſaith, I know not. They bring him that had been blind to the Phariſees: And it was the Sabbath when Jeſus made the clay, and opened his eyes.

Again therefore the Phariſees asked him, how he ſaw. But he ſaid to them, he put clay upon mine eyes, and I waſhed, and I ſee. Certain therefore of the Phariſees ſaid, This man is not of God, that keepeth not the Sabbath. But others ſaid, How can a man that is a ſinner do theſe ſigns? And there was a ſchiſm among them. They ſay therefore to the blind again. Thou, what ſayeſt thou of him that opened thine eyes? And he ſaid, that he is a Prophet. The Jews therefore did not believe of him, that he had been blind, and ſaw, until they called the Parents of him that ſaw, and asked them, ſaying; Is this your ſon, whom you ſay that he was born blind? how then doth he now ſee? His parents anſwered them, and ſaid, we know that this is our ſon, and that he was born blind: but how he now ſeeth we know not, or who hath opened his eyes we know not, ask himſelf, he is of age, let himſelf ſpeak of himſelf. Theſe things his parents ſaid, becauſe they feared the Jews. For the Jews had now conſpired, that if any man ſhould confeſs him to be Chriſt, he ſhould be put out of the Synagogue. Therefore did his parents ſay, that he is of age, ask himſelf. They therefore again called the man that had been blind, and ſaid to him, Give glorie to God, we know that this man is a ſinner.

He therefore ſaid to them, Whether he be a ſinner, I know not; one thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I ſee. They ſaid therefore to him, What did he to thee? How did he open thine eyes? He anſwered them, I have now told you, and you have heard, why will you hear it again? will you alſo become his Diſciples? They reviled him therefore, and ſaid, be thou his Diſciple, but we are the Diſciples of Moſes: we know that to Moſes God did ſpeak: but this man we know not whence he is. The man anſwered and ſaid to them, For in this it is marvellous, that you know not whence he is, and he hath opened mine eyes. And we know that ſinners God doth not hear. But if a man be a ſerver of God, and do the will of him, him he heareth. From the beginning of the world it hath not been heard, that any man hath opened the eyes of one born blind; unleſs this man were of God, he could not do any thing. They anſwered and ſaid to him, Thou waſt wholly born in ſins, and doſt thou teach us? And they did caſt him forth.

Jeſus heard that they caſt him forth, and when he had found him, he ſaid to him, Doſt thou believe in the Son of God? He anſwered and ſaid, Who is he Lord, that I may believe in him? And Jeſus ſaid to him, Both thou haſt ſeen him, and he that talketh with thee, he it is. But he ſaid, I believe Lord: and falling down, he adored him.

Moralities.

1. JEſus the Father of all brightneſs (who walked accompanied with his twelve Apoſtles, as the Sun doth with the hours of the day) gives eyes to a blind man, and doth it by clay and ſpittle: to teach us, that none hath power to do works above nature, but he that was the Authour of it. On the other ſide, a blind man becomes a King over perſons of the cleareſt ſight; and being reſtored to light, he renders again the ſame, to the firſt fountain from whence it came. He makes himſelf an Advocate to plead for the chiefeſt truth, and of a poor beggar becomes a confeſſour; and after he had deplored his miſery at the Temple gate, teacheth all mankind the eſtate of its own felicities. We ſhould (in imitation of him) love the light by adoring the fountain of it, and behave our ſelves as witneſſes and defenders of the truth.

2. God is a light, and by his light draws all unto him: he makes a break of day by his grace in this life, which becomes afterward a perfect day for all eternity. But many loſe themſelves in this world, ſome for want of light, ſome by a falſe light, and ſome by having too much light.

3. Thoſe loſe themſelves for want of light, who are not at all inſtructed in the faith and maxims of Chriſtian Religion; and thoſe inſtead of approching near the light, love their own darkneſs. They hate the light of their ſalvation, as the ſhadow of death: and think, that if you give them eyes to ſee their blindneſs, you take away their life. If they ſeem Chriſtians, they yet have nothing but the name and the appearance, the book of Jeſus is ſhut from them, or if they make a ſhew to read, they may name the letters, but never can produce one right good word.

4. Others deſtroy themſelves by falſe lights, who being wedded to their own opinions, and adoring the Chimera's of their ſpirit, think themſelves full of knowledge, juſt and happy; that the ſun riſeth onely for them, and that all the reſt of the world is in darkneſs; they conceive they have the faireſt ſtars for conductours; but at the end of their career, they find (too late) that this pretended light, was but an Ignus fatuus, which led them to a precipice of eternal flames. It is the worst of all follies to be wise in our own eye-sight, and the worst of all temptations is, for a man to be a devil to himself.

find

5. Those ruin themselves with too much light, who have all Gods law by heart, but never have any heart to that law. They know the Scriptures, all learning and sciences: they understand every thing but themselves: they can find spots in the sun; they can give new names to the stars; they perswade themselves, that God is all that they apprehend: But after all this heap of knowledge, they are found to be like the Sages of Pharaoh: and can produce nothing but bloud and frogs: They embroil and trouble the world; they stain their own lives, and at their deaths leave nothing to continue but the memory of their sins. It would be more expedient for them (rather than have such light) to carry fire, wherewith to be burning in the love of God, and not to swell and burst with that kind of knowledge. All learning which is not joyned with a good life, is like a picture in the air, which hath no table to make it subsist. It is not sufficient to be elevated in spirit (like the Prophets) except a man do enter into some perfect imitation of their virtues.

Aspirations.

O Fountain of all brightness, before whom night can have no vail, who seest the day spring out of thy bosom, to spread it self over all nature, will thou have no pitie upon my blindness? will there be no medicine for my eyes, which have so often grown dull & heavy with earthly humours. O Lord, I want light, being always so blind to my own sins. So many years are past, wherein I have dwelt with my self, and yet know not what I am. Self-love maketh me sometimes apprehend imaginary virtues in great, and see all my crimes in little. I too often believe my own judgement, and adore my own opinions, as gods, and goddesses, and if thou send me any light, I make so ill use of it, that I dazle my self, even in the brightness of thy day; making little or no profit of that which would be so much to my advantage, if I were so happy as to know it. But henceforth I will have no eyes but for thee: I will onely contemplate thee, (O life of all beauties) and draw all the powers of my soul into my eyes, that I may the better apprehend the mystery of thy bounties. O cast upon me one beam of thy grace so powerfull, that it may never forsake me till I may see the day of thy glory.

The Gospel upon Thursday, the fourth week in Lent, S. Luke the 7.

Of the widows son raised from death to life at Naim by our Saviour.

And it came to pass afterward he went into a Citie that is called Naim, and there went with him his Disciples, and a very great multitude: And when he came nigh to the gate of the Citie, behold a dead man was carried forth, the onely son of his mother: and she was a widow, and a great multitude of the Citie with her; whom when our Lord had seen, being moved with mercy upon her, he said to her, Weep not. And he came near, and touched the Coffin: And they that carried it, stood still: and he said, Young man, I say to thee, Arise. And he that was dead sate up, and began to speak. And he gave him to his mother: and fear took them all; and they magnified God, saying, That a great Prophet is risen among us: and that God hath visited his people. And this saying went forth into all Jewry of him, and into all the Countrey about.

Moralities.

JEsus met at the Gates of Naim, (which is interpreted the Town of Beauties) a young man carried to burial, to shew us, that neither beauty nor youth are freed from the laws of death. We fear death, and there is almost nothing more immortal; here below every thing dies, but death it self. We see him always in the Gospels, we touch him every day by our experiences, and yet neither the Gospels make us sufficiently faithfull, nor our experiences well advised.

2. If we behold death by his natural face, he seems a little strange to us, because we have not seen him well acted. We lay upon him sithes, bows and arrows; we put upon him ugly antick faces, we compass him round about with terrours and illusions, of all which he never so much as thought. It is a profound sleep, in which nature lets it self fail insensibly, when she is tired with the disquiets of this life. It is a cessation of all those services which the soul renders to the flesh. It is an execution of Gods will, and a decree common to all the world. To be disquieted and drawn by the ears, to pay a debt which so many millions of men (of all conditions) have paid before us, is to do as a frog that would swim against a sharp stream of a forcible torrent. We have been as it were dead to so many ages which went before us; we die piece-meal every day; we assay death so often in our sleep; discreet men expect him, fools despise him, and the most disdainfull persons must entertain him. Shall we not know and endeavour to do that one thing well, which being once well performed, will give us life for ever? Me thinks it is rather a gift of God to die soon, than to stay late amongst the occasions of sin.

3. It is not death, but a wicked life we have cause to fear. That onely lies heavy, and both troubles us, and keeps us from understanding and tasting the sweets of death. He that can die to so many little dead and dying things (which makes us die every day by our unwillingness to forsake them) shall find that death is nothing to him. But we would fain (in death) carry the world with us upon our shoulders to the grave; and that is a thing we cannot do. We would avoid the judgement of a just God, and that is a thing which we should not so much as think. Let us cleat our accounts before we die, let us take order for our soul by repentance, and a moderate care of our bodies burial: Let us order our goods by a good and charitable Testament, with a discreet direction for the poor, for our children and kinred, to be executed by fit persons. Let us put our selves into the protection of the Divine providence, with a most perfect confidence; and how can we then fear death, being in the arms of life?

Aspirations.

O Jesus, fountain of all lives, in whose bosom all things are living; Jesus, the fruit of the dead, who hast destroyed the kingdom of death; why should we fear a path, which thou hast so terrified with thy steps, honoured with thy bloud, and sanctified by thy conquests? Shall we never die to so many dying things? All is dead here for us, and we have no life, if we do not seek it from thy heart. What should I care for death, though he come with all those grim, hideous and antick faces, which men put upon him, for when I see him through thy wounds, thy bloud, and thy venerable death, I find he hath no sting at all. If I shall walk in the shadow of death, and a thousand terrours shall conspire against me on every side to disturb my quiet, I will fear nothing, being placed in the arms of thy providence. O my sweet Master, do but once touch the winding sheet of my body, which holds down my ſoul ſo often within the ſleep of death and ſin. Command me to ariſe and ſpeak, and then the light of thy morning ſhall never ſet: my diſcourſes ſhall be always of thy praiſes, and my life ſhall be onely a contemplation of thy beautifull countenance.

of

The Goſpel upon Friday the fourth week in Lent, S. John 11.

Of the raiſing of Lazarus from death.

And there was a certain ſick man, Lazarus of Bethania, of the Town of Mary and Martha her ſiſter. (And Marie vvas ſhe that anointed our Lord vvith ointment, and vviped his feet vvith her hair, vvhoſe brother Lazarus vvas ſick) his ſiſters therefore ſent to him, ſaying, Lord, behold, he vvhom thou loveſt is ſick. And Jeſus hearing, ſaid to them, This ſickneſs is not to death, but for the glorie of God, that the Son may be glorified by it. And Jeſus loved Martha and her ſiſter Marie, and Lazarus. As he heard therefore that he vvas ſick, then he tarried in the ſame place two dayes: Then after this he ſaith to his Diſciples, Let us go into Jewry again, The Diſciples ſay to him, Rabbi, now the Jews ſought to ſtone thee, and goeſt thou thither again? Jeſus anſwered, Are there not twelve hours of the day? If a man vvalk in the day, he ſtumbleth not, becauſe he ſeeth the light of this vvorld: but if he vvalk in the night, he ſtumbleth, becauſe the light is not in him. Theſe things he ſaid: and after this he ſaith to them, Lazarus our friend ſleepeth; but I go that I may raiſe him from ſleep. His Diſciples therefore ſaid, Lord, if he ſleep, he ſhall be ſafe. But Jeſus ſpake of his death, and they thought that he ſpake of the ſleeping of ſleep. Then therefore Jeſus ſaid to them plainly, Lazarus is dead, and I am glad for your ſake, that you may believe, becauſe I vvas not there: but let us go to him. Thomas therefore vvho is called Didymus, ſaid to his condiſciples, Let us alſo go to die with him. Jeſus therefore came, and found him now having been four dayes in the grave. And Bethania vvas nigh to Jeruſalem, about fifteen furlongs. And many of the Jews vvere come to Martha and Mary to comfort them concerning their brother. Martha therefore vvhen ſhe heard that Jeſus vvas come, vvent to meet him: but Mary ſate at home. Martha therefore ſaid to Jeſus, Lord, if thou hadſt been here, my brother had not died. But now alſo I know, that vvhat things ſoever thou ſhalt ask of God, God vvill give thee. Jeſus ſaith to her, Thy brother ſhall riſe again. Martha ſaith to him, I know that he ſha'l riſe again in the reſurrection in the laſt day. Jeſus ſaid to her, I am the reſurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, although he be dead, ſhall live. And every one that liveth, and believeth in me, ſhall not die for ever. Believeſt thou this? She ſaid to him, Yea, Lord, I have believed that thou art Chriſt the Son of God, that art come into this vvorld.

Moralities.

1. OUr Saviour Jeſus makes here a ſtrong aſſault upon death, to cure our infirmities at the coſt of his deareſt friends; He ſuffered Lazarus, whom he loved tenderly, to fall into a violent ſickneſs, to teach us, that the bodies of Gods favourites are not free from infirmities; and that, to make men Saints, they muſt not enjoy too much health. A ſoul is never more worthy to be a houſe for God, than when ſhe raiſeth up the greatneſs of her courage, the body being caſt down with ſickneſs. A ſoul which ſuffers is a ſacred thing. All the world did touch our Saviour before his Paſſion, The throng of people preſſed upon him, but after his death he would not be touched by S. Mary Maudlin, becauſe he was conſecrated by his dolours.

2. The good ſiſters diſpatch a meſſenger, not to a ſtrange God, as they do who ſeek for health by remedies, which are a thouſand times worſe than the diſeaſe: But they addreſſed themſelves to the living God; the God of life and death, to drive away death. And to recover life, they were content onely to ſhew the wound to the faithfull friendſhip of the Phyſician, without preſcribing any remedies: for that is better left to his providence, than committed to our paſſion.

3. He defers his cure to raiſe from death. The delay of Gods favours, is not always a refuſal, but ſometimes a double liberality. The vows of good men are paid with uſury: It was expedient that Lazarus ſhould die, that he might triumph over death, in the triumph of Jeſus Chriſt. It is here that we ſhould always raiſe high our thoughts, by conſidering our glory in the ſtate of reſurrection; he would have us believe it, not onely as it is a leſſon of Nature imprinted above the skies, upon the plants or elements of the world, and as a doctrine which many ancient Philoſophers had by the light of nature; but alſo as a belief, which is faſt joyned to the faith we have in the Divine providence, which keeps our bodies in truſt under its ſeal within the boſom of the earth, ſo that no preſcription of time can make laws to reſtrain his power, having paſſed his word, and raiſed up Lazarus who was but as one grain of ſeed in reſpect of all poſterity.

4. Jeſus wept over Lazarus, thereby to weep over us all. Our evils were lamentable, and could never ſufficiently be deplored, without opening a fountain of tears within heaven, and within the eyes of the Son of God. This is juſtly the river which comes from that place of all pleaſure to water Paradiſe. How could thoſe heavenly tears come from any other, than the place of all delight, ſince they iſſued from a brain, and from eyes which were united to the divinity? And how ſhould they not water Paradiſe, ſince for ſo many ages they have flowed over the Church for producing the fruits of juſtice. The balm of Egypt could not grow without water of that Well, which was commonly called the fountain of Jeſus: becauſe the bleſſed Virgin had there waſhed the clothes of her dear Son: And we have no Odour of virtue, nor good converſation, (which is not directly barren) except it be endued with the merit of our Saviours tears.

Aſpirations.

O Eyes of my Saviour, from whence the ſun receives his cleareſt light: fair eyes which onely deſerve eternal joyes and delights. Why ſhould you this day be moiſtened with tears? Thou doſt give me (O onely love of my heart) the bloud of thy ſoul, before thou ſhedſt that of thy body. There are ſo many things to make me weep and I feel them ſo little, that if thy tears do not weep for me, I ſhall always be miſerable. Water then (O my ſweet Maſter) the barrenneſs of my ſoul from that fountain of bleſſing, which I have opened within thine eyes and heart: I have opened it by my ſins, and let it I beſeech thee bleſs me by thine infinite mercies.

The Goſpel upon Saturday the fourth week in Lent, S. John 8.

Upon our Saviours words, I am the light of the world.

Again therefore Jeſus ſpake to them, ſaying, I am the light of the vvorld, he that followeth me, vvalketh not in darkneſs, but ſhall have the light of life. The Phariſees therefore ſaid to him, Thou giveſt teſtimonie of thy ſelf, thy teſtimonie is not true. Jeſus anſwered and ſaid to them, although I do give teſtimonie of my ſelf, my teſtimonie is true; becauſe I know vvhence I came, and vvhither I go: but you know not vvhence I came, or whither I go. You judge according to the flesh, I do not judge any man. And if I do judge, my judgement is true, because I am not alone, but I and he that sent me, the Father. And in your law it is written, that the testimonie of two men is true. I am he that give testimonie of my self; and he that sent me, the Father, giveth testimonie of me. They said therefore to him, where is thy Father? Jesus answered, Neither me do you know, nor my Father: if you did know me, perhaps you might know my Father also. These words Jesus spake in the Treasurie, teaching in the Temple, and no man apprehended him, because his hour was not yet come.

or

Moralities.

1. THere is in the blessed Trinity a communicating light, to which nothing is communicated: another light which is communicative and communicated: and a third light which is communicated, but not communicating. The first is the heavenly Father, who gives but takes nothing. The second is that of the Son, who takes from his Father and gives to the holy Ghost all that can be given; The third is the holy Ghost, which receives equally from the Father and the Son, and doth produce nothing in the Trinity. But Jesus illuminating from all eternity, this state (for ever to be adored) did vouchsafe to descend into the countrey of our darkness, to scatter it by his brightness. It is he that hath thrown down the Crocodiles and Bats from prophane Altars; who hath broken so many idols; who hath overthrown so many Temples of the adulterers and murdering gods, to plant the honours of his heavenly Father. He hath invested the world during so many ages, with the shining of his face. He doth not cease to give light, nor to kindle in our hearts many inspirations, which are like so many stars to conduct us to the fountain of all our happiness. You are very blind if you do not see this, and much more miserable if you despise it.

2. It is most dangerous to do as the Jews did, to speak every day to the light, and yet love their own darkness. Screech-owls find holes and nights to keep themselves from day, which they cannot abide. But he that flies from the face of God, where can he find darkness enough to hide himself? When he shall be within the gulf of sin, his own conscience will light up a thousand torches to see his punishments. It is the worst of all mischiefs, to pay for the contempt of the fountain of light by suffering eternal darkness.

3. Let us behold the conversation of Jesus Christ as a sea mark, stickt all over with lights: his life gives Testimony of his Sanctity: his miracles publish his power; his law declares his infinite wisd m, his Sanctity gives us an example to imitate, his power gives the strength of Authority, to make him the more readily obeyed; and from his wisdom faith is given us to regulate and govern our belief.

Aspirations.

O My Lord Jesus, the spirit of all beauties, and the most visible of all lights, what do the eyes of my soul, if they be not always busied in the contemplation of thy brightness. When I find thou art departed from me, me thinks I am buried within my self, and that my soul is nothing else, but a Sepulchre of terrours, phantasms and deaths; But when thou returnest by thy visits and consolations, I am chearfully revived, and my heart leaps in thy presence, as a child rejoyceth at sight of his dear nurse. O Light of lights, which dost illuminate man coming into this world, I will contemplate thee at the sun-rising above all creatures. I will follow thee with mine eyes all the day long, and I will not leave thee at sun-setting, for there is nothing can be in value near like thee. It belongs onely to thee, (O Sun of my Soul) to arise at all hours, and to give light at Mid-night, as well as at Noonday.

The Gospel upon Passion Sunday, S. John the 8.

upon these words, Who can accuse me of sin?

WHich of you shall argue me of sin? If I say the verity, why do you not believe me? He that is of God, heareth the words of God: therefore you hear not, because you are not of God. The Jews therefore answered, and said to him, Do not we say well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a Devil? Jesus answered, I have no Devil: but I do honour my Father, and you have dishonoured me. But I seek not mine own glorie. There is that seeketh and judgeth. Amen, Amen, I say to you, if any man keep my word, he shall not see death for ever. The Jews therefore said, now we have known that thou hast a Devil; Abraham is dead, and the Prophets, and thou sayest, if any man keep my word, he shall not taste death for ever. Why, art thou greater than our Father Abraham who is dead? and the Prophets are dead. Whom doest thou make thy self? Jesus answered, if I do glorifie my self, my glorie is nothing. It is my Father that glorifieth me, whom you say that he is your God, and you have not known him, but I know him. And if I shall say that I know him not, I shall be like to you, a lier: but I do know him, and do keep his word. Abraham your father rejoyced that he might see my day, and he saw and was glad. The Jews therefore said to him, Thou hast not yet fifty years, and hast thou seen Abraham? Jesus said to them, Amen, Amen, I say to you, before that Abraham was made, I am. They took stones therefore to cast at him. But Jesus hid himself, and went out of the Temple.

Moralities.

1. THe Saviour of the world being resolved to suffer death as the Priest of his own sacrifice, and sacrifice of his priesthood, shews that it is an effect of his mercy, and not a suffering for any fault. He doth advance the standard of the Cross (which was the punishment of guilty persons) but he brought with him innocencie, which is the mark of Saints: he honours it with his dolours, and sanctifies it with his bloud, to glorifie it in the estimation of all the just. He is without spot, and capable to take all stains, by his infinite sanctity: and yet he suffered as a sinner, to blot out all our sins; It is in this suffering he would have us all imitate him. He doth not require us to make a heaven, nor stars, nor to enlarge the sea, or to make the earth firm; but to make our selves holy as he is holy (according to our capacity). And this we may gain by his favour, which he hath by his own nature. No man is worthy to suffer with Jesus, who doth not purifie himself by the sufferings of Jesus. If we suffer in sin, we carrie the Cross of the bad thief. We must carrie the Cross of Jesus, and consecrate our tribulations by our own virtues.

2. It is said that the venomous serpent called a Basilisk (which kills both men and beasts by his pestilent breath) kills himself when he looks upon a looking glass, by the very reflection of his own poison. The Jews do here the very same; They come about this great mirrour of sanctity, which carried all the glory of the living God; he casts his beams upon them, but envy, the mother of murder (which kills it self onely by the rayes of golden arrows) makes them dart out venomous words to dishonour diſhonour him: yet his incomparable virtue kills them, without loſing any of his own brightneſs; to teach us, that the beauty of innocency, is the beſt buckler againſt all ſlanders. Though it ſeem to be tarniſhed for a time, yet her brightneſs will thereby become more lively: for it is a ſtar which the blackeſt vail of night cannot darken.

3. Abraham did rejoyce at this day of God two thouſand years before it was manifeſted to the world: All the Patriarchs did long after it; and did anticipate their felicities by the purity of their thoughts. This bleſſed Day hath been reſerved for us, and yet many of us deſpiſe it. We ſo much love the day of man, that by the force of too much love to it, we forget the love of God. We ſhould, and muſt contemn thoſe periſhing dayes of worldly honours and pleaſures, which are covered with eternal night, that we may partake the eternity of that beautifull day, which ſhall never have any evening.

Aſpirations.

O God of purity, in whoſe preſence the Angels (raviſhed with admiration) do cover their faces with their wings, and have no ſweeter extaſies, than the admiration of thy beauty: The ſtars are not pure enough before thy redoubted Majeſty. The Sun beholds thee as the true Authour of his light. Thou onely canſt purifie all humane kind, by a ſanctity which ſpreads it ſelf over all Ages. Alas, I am confounded to ſee my ſinfull ſoul ſo often dyed black with ſo many ſtains, and beaſtly ordures, before thoſe moſt pure beams of thy glory. Waſh, O waſh again out all that which diſpleaſeth thee. Regenerate in my heart a Spirit, that ſhall be worthy thy ſelf. How ſhall I follow thee to Mount Calvarie, if I be purſued with ſo many ill habits, which I have often deteſted before thine eyes? How can I go in company with the firſt and greateſt of all Saints, drawing after me ſo many ſins? The increaſe of my offences would multiply thy croſſes: I will therefore do my beſt to drown all my imperfections within thy bloud. I will procure light to my nights (by that bright and beautiful day which Abraham ſaw) from that glorious day which took beginning from thy Croſs. I will no more care for the day of man, that I may the better apply my ſelf to the day of God.

The Goſpel upon Munday, the fifth week in Lent, S. John 7.

Jeſus ſaid to the Phariſees, You ſhall ſeek and not find me: and he that is thirſty, let him come to me.

AND the Princes and Phariſees ſent Miniſters to apprehend him. Jeſus therefore ſaid to them: Yet a little time, and I will be with you, and I go to him that ſent me: you ſeek me, and ſhall not find, and where I am, you cannot come. The Jews therefore ſaid among themſelves, Whither will this man go, that we ſhall not find him? will he go into the diſperſion of the Gentile, and teach the Gentiles: what is this ſaying, that he hath ſaid? You ſhall ſeek me, and ſhall not find: and where I am, you cannot come.

And in the laſt, the great day of the feſtivity, Jeſus ſtood and cried, ſaying, If any man thirſt, let him come to me and drink. He that believeth in me, as the Scripture ſaith, out of his belly ſhall flow rivers of living water. (And this he ſaid of the Spirit) that they ſhould receive, which believed in him.

Moralities.

1. TAke for your comfort this excellent word of our Saviour: he that is thirſty, and deſires in this world to thirſt after God, let him come unto me, and he ſhall quench his thirſt at the chiefeſt fountain. S. Auguſtine ſaith, We are all here, as David was in the deſart of Idumea: our life is a perpetual alteration, which will never be ſettled while we live. If we be weary, we deſire reſt, and if we reſt overlong, our bed becomes troubleſom, though it ſhould be all of roſes. Then again, we thirſt to be in action and buſineſs, which alſo in a ſhort time tires us, and puts us into another alteration; and that carries us again to a deſire to do nothing. All our life goeth like Penelopes web: what one hour effects, the next deſtroys. We do ſufficiently perceive that we are not well in this world: It is a large bed, but very troubleſom, wherein every man ſtirs and tumbles himſelf up and down, but no man can here attain to his perfect happineſs.

2. This ſhews us plainly that we are made for God, and that we ſhould thirſt after divine things, if we deſire true contentment. There is no default in him, becauſe all that can be deſired, is there, and yet there is no ſuperfluity, becauſe there can be nothing beyond him. There onely we abound without neceſſity, we are aſſured without fear, & glorious without change. And it is there onely where we find all our ſatisfactions perfectly accompliſhed. For to ſpeak truth, contentment conſiſteth in four principal things, which are, to have a contenting object, to have a heart capable to apprehend it; to feel a ſtrong inclination to it, and to enter into an abſolute full poſſeſſion of it. Now God hath provided for all this by his infinite bounty. He will not have us affect any other object of pleaſure but his own. He is God, and therefore can have nothing but God for his ſatisfaction, and intends graciouſly that we ſhall have the ſame. He will have us thirſt after him, and quench our thirſt within himſelf: and to this, our ſoul is ſingularly diſpoſed; for as God is a Spirit, ſo is our ſoul onely ſpiritual. We have ſo ſtrong an inclination to love God, that even our vices themſelves (without thinking what they do) love ſomewhat of God. For if pride affect greatneſs, there can be nothing ſo great, as the Monarch of it. If luxury love pleaſure, God containeth all pure delights in his boſom: and this which I ſay, may be verified of all ſins whatſoever. If the preſence of a right object, and the enjoying be wanting, we have nothing ſo preſent as God. S. Paul ſaith, We are all within him, within him we live, and within him we have the fountain of all our motions: we ſee him through all his creatures, until he take off the vail, and ſo let us ſee him, and taſte of his Glory.

3. A true and perfect way to make us thirſt after God, is to forſake the burning thirſt which we have after bodily and worldly goods: Our ſoul and fleſh go in the ſeveral ſcales of a ballance, the riſing of one, pulls down the other: It is a having two wives, for us to think we can place all our delights in God, and withal enjoy all worldly contentments. A man muſt have a conſcience free from earthly matters, to receive the infuſion of grace; we muſt paſs by Calvary, before we come to Tabor; and firſt taſte gall with Jeſus, before we can taſte that honey-comb, which he took after his reſurrection.

Aſpirations.

O God, true God of my ſalvation, My heart which feeleth it ſelf moved with an affectionate zeal, thinks always upon thee, and in thinking, finds an earneſt thirſt after thy beauties, which heats my veins. My ſoul is all conſumed, & I find that my fleſh it ſelf inſenſibly followeth the violence of my ſpirit. I am here, as within the deſarts of Affrica, in a barren world, the drought whereof makes it a direct habitation for dragons. O my God, I am tormented with this flame, and yet I cheriſh it more than my ſelf. Will there be no good Lazarus found to dip the end of his finger within the fountain of the higheſt Heaven, a little to allay the burning of my thirſt. Do not tell me (O my dear Spouſe) that there is a great Chaos between thee and me: Thou haſt already paſſed it in coming to me by thy bounty: and wilt not thou lift me up then by thy mercy?

The Goſpel upon Tueſday the fifth week in Lent, S. John 7.

Jeſus went not into Jewry, becauſe the Jews had a purpoſe to take away his life.

After theſe things Jeſus walked into Galilee: for he would not walk into Jewry, becauſe the Jews ſought to kill him. And the feſtival day of the Jews Scenopegia was at hand. And his brethren ſaid to him, Paſs from hence, and go into Jewry, that thy Diſciples alſo may ſee thy works which thou doſt. For no man doth any thing in ſecret, and ſeeketh himſelf to be in publick: if thou do theſe things, manifeſt thy ſelf to the world: for neither did his brethren believe in him: Jeſus therefore ſaith to them; My time is not yet come: but your time is always ready. The world cannot hate you, but me it hateth, becauſe I give teſtimony of it, that the works thereof are evil. Go you up to this feſtival day, I go not up to this feſtival day, becauſe my time is not yet accompliſhed.

When he had ſaid theſe things, himſelf tarried in Galilee: But after his brethren were gone up, then he alſo went up to the feſtival day, not openly, but as it were in ſecret. The Jews therefore ſought him in the feſtival day, and ſaid, Where is he? And there was much murmuring in the multitude of him. For certain ſaid that he is good: And others ſaid, No, but he ſeduceth the multitudes: yet no man ſpake openly of him for fear of the Jews.

Moralities.

1. Jeſus hides himſelf in this Goſpel (as the Sun within a cloud) to ſhew himſelf at his own time: to teach us, that all the ſerets of our life conſiſteth in well concealing, and well diſcovering our ſelves. He did conceal the life which he took from nature, when he might have been born a perfect man as well as Adam, and yet did he hide himſelf in the hay of a baſe ſtable. He concealeth his life of grace, diſſembling under ſilence, ſo many great and divine virtues, as if he had lockt up the ſtars under lock and key, as holy Job ſaith. He keeps ſecret his life of Glory, retaining for thirty three years the light of his ſoul, which ſhould without intermiſſion have glorified and caſt a divine brightneſs upon his body. But when he concealed himſelf, the ſtars diſcovered him at his birth; the Sun at his death: all the Elements did then confeſs him, and all creatures gave teſtimony of his Divinity.

2. We ſhould be well known of God, if we did not ſo curiouſly enquire into the knowledge of the world. Vanity at this day opens all her gates to manifeſt divers men to the world, who ſhould otherwiſe be buried in obſcurity and darkneſs. It maketh ſome appear by the luxurious exceſs of their apparrel, as ſo many ſale creatures, whoſe heads (being high and coſtly dreſt up) go to the market of idle love. Others by the riches and pomps of the world, others by honours and dignities, others by the ſpirit of induſtry, and others by the deeds of arms and policy. Every one ſets out himſelf to be ſeen and eſteemed in the world. It ſeemeth that life is made for nothing but to be ſhewed, and that we ſhould always live, for that which makes us die. We are a kind of walking ſpirits, which return late to our lodgings: But yet nevertheleſs, giving our ſelves ſo continually to the world, me thinks we ſhould at leaſt ſtay with our ſelves every day one ſhort hour. It is ſaid, that the Pellican hides her egs, and that they muſt be ſtollen from her, to make them diſcloſe: But vanity is an egge, which all the world hatcheth under her wings, and none are willing to forſake it.

3. If it be needfull to ſhew your ſelf to the world, be then known by your virtues, which are characters of the Divinity. Let men know you by your good examples, which are the ſeeds of eternity, and of all fair actions. You muſt be known by your alms and bounty, which are the ſteps which God left imprinted in this world. If you muſt riſe to honours and dignities, take them as inſtruments of holineſs: and be not powerfull, but to be more obliged to do good by ſo being.

Aſpirations.

O God, which didſt conceal thy ſelf; how comes it about, that I deſire ſo much to be ſeen, and make my ſelf known to the world? What can I diſcover, if I ſhew that which I am, but onely ſin, vanity, miſery, and inconſtancy, which make the four elements of my life? To what ſerves this itch of ſeeing, but onely to receive into our eyes the ſeeds of curioſity? Why do we covet to be ſo much ſeen, but to expoſe our ſelves to vanity, and to carry a Torch in a blaſt of wind? Alas (O Merciſull Lord) I have very long lived for my ſelf, and for the eyes of the world, when ſhall I begin to live for thee? Shall I never ſee thoſe happy moments of my life, which will receive light onely from the day of thy face? Let me (O moſt beloved of my heart) be blind to all the world, ſo that I may have eyes for thee. If the condition of my eſtate muſt needs ſhew me to the world, let it be to give it part of thy light, without receiving any part of that darkneſs which covereth it. Let me be in the world to do good, but let me dwell in thee, as within the Fountain of all goodneſs.

The Goſpel upon Wedneſday the fifth week in Lent, S. John 10.

The Jews ſaid, If thou be the Meſſias, tell us plainly.

And the Dedication was in Jeruſalem, and it was in winter: And Jeſus walked in the Temple in Solomons Porch. The Jews therefore compaſſed him round about, and ſaid to him, How long doſt thou hold our ſoul in ſuſpence? If thou be Chriſt, tell us openly. Jeſus anſwered them, I ſpeak to you, and you believe not. The works that I do in the Name of my Father, they give teſtimony of me. But you do not believe, becauſe you are not of my ſheep. My ſheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me, and I give them life everlaſting, and they ſhall not periſh for ever, and no man ſhall pluck them out of my hand. My Father, that which he hath given me, is greater than all, and no man can pluck them out of the hand of my Father. I and the Father are one.

The Jews took up ſtones to ſtone him: Jeſus anſwered them, Many good works I have ſhewed you from my Father, for which of theſe works do you ſtone me? The Jews anſwered him, for a good work we ſtone thee not, but for blaſphemie, and becauſe thou, being a man, makeſt thy ſelf God. Jeſus anſwered them: Is it not written in your Law, that I ſaid, You are Gods? If he called them Gods, to whom the word of God was made, and the Scripture cannot be broken: whom the Father hath ſanctified, and ſent into the world, ſay you, That thou blaſphemeſt, becauſe I ſaid, I am the

Son

Son of God? If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. But if I do, and if you will not believe me, believe the works, that you may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in the Father.

Moralities.

1. THe Wolfs encompaſs the good ſhepheard, counterfeiting Lambs, to draw truth out of his mouth, which they would perſecute. They reſembled a certain plant, which carrieth the name and ſhape of a Lamb, but hath a contrary ſubſtance, and different qualities, for it is ravenous as a wolf, and devours all the herbs which grow about it. So are there many who do inſinuate themſelves into the friendſhip of good men, by fair (but counterfeit) reſpects, to the end that afterward they may be made the object of their cruelty. Thoſe men look after the Meſſias in the Porch of Solomon, as Herod ſought after him in the Manger, not to adore, but to kill him. Their mouth carries honey, when their heart hatcheth poiſon: but nothing is unknown to God, from whom hell it ſelf hath not darkneſs enough to hide it ſelf.

2. Jeſus knows his flock, and his flock reciprocally knows him, and in that conſiſts all our happineſs, to know God, and to be known of him. The chiefeſt of all wiſdom, is to know him, and to be known by him, and to be written in the Book of life, which is the laſt and chiefeſt of all felicities. It is true, that he knows all things by the knowledge of a clear intelligence, which ſerves the wicked onely to diſcover plainly their crimes: whereas he knows the juſt by a ſcience of favour and approbation, which indeed is eternal predeſtination. If we be unknown to God, we muſt make our ſelves known to him by ſome good virtue, which doth not depend onely upon us. The firſt beam is of prevenient grace, and our vocation to Chriſtianity, which is part of our predeſtination, and is not all within our power. We have not been elected, becauſe we have believed in God, by our own forces; but we believe, becauſe we have been elected. The firſt knowledge comes purely from God, but it is in us by his grace, to purſue this firſt light, and to advance our predeſtination to glory, by forcing our ſelves to know him perfectly, who hath known us ſo liberally.

3. Jeſus will not be known ſingly by his words, but by his works. Our words muſt agree with our good actions, as the needle of a clock agrees with the ſprings. When we have heard, or read ſome good doctrine, that Sermon, or reading, muſt paſs into our manners. It is ſurely a ſtrange thing, that many employ their leiſure to know much, and yet will not ſpend ſome conſiderable time, to make themſelves good Chriſtians. We muſt be Philoſophers, more by imitating the example of God, than by any curious enquiry of his greatneſs. Our Chriſtianity teacheth us, that we ſhould be more knowing and skilfull in the practiſe of our life, than of our tongue; and that we are rather made to perform great actions, than to ſpeak them. We muſt have a ſpecial care that our hands do not give our mouth the lie. What can we gain (in the judgement of God) by being like thoſe trees, which have a fair outſide, garniſhed with leaves, yet good for nothing but to give a ſhadow, and to make a little noiſe when the wind blows? God requires of us fruit, ſince he is the Father of all fertility, and nothing is barren in the land of the living.

Aſpirations.

O My God, I know thee, becauſe thou was firſt pleaſed to know me: Thou haſt known me by thy goodneſs, and I will do my beſt to know thee, that I may obtain all happineſs. O that I might know that my name is written in the Book of life; and alſo know the life which I may poſſeſs within the heart of Jeſus, in which ſo many lives do live. O how ſhould I then find my ſpirit raviſhed in thoſe beautifull Idæas of glory? Fix thine eyes on me (O Lord) and thou ſhalt thereby bring to me the fountain of all happineſs. The Father hath given me to thee, and I am the conqueſt of thy precious bloud; Suffer not a ſoul to be taken away from thee, which hath coſt thee ſo many ſweats and ſufferings. I am thine by ſo many titles, that I will be no more mine own, but onely to have the right of renouncing that which I am, and to eſtabliſh what ſhall be thine in this little kingdom of my heart.

The Goſpel upon Thurſday, the fifth week in Lent, S. John 7.

Upon S. Marie Magdalen's waſhing our Saviour's feet in the Phariſees houſe.

AND one of the Phariſees deſired him to eat with him. And he being entered into the houſe of the Phariſee, he ſate down to meat. And behold, a woman that was in the Citie, a ſinner, as ſhe knew that he ſet down in the Phariſees houſe, ſhe brought an Alabaſter box of ointment; and ſtanding behind, beſide his feet, ſhe began to water his feet with tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head, and kiſſed his feet, and anointed them with ointment. And the Phariſee that had bid him, ſeeing it, ſpake within himſelf, ſaying, This man, if he were a Prophet, would know certes who, and what manner of woman ſhe is which toucheth him, that ſhe is a ſinner. And Jeſus anſwering, ſaid to him, Simon, I have ſomewhat to ſay unto thee. But he ſaid, Maſter, ſay. A certain Creditour had two debtours, one did owe five hundred pence, and the other fifty; they having not wherewith to pay, he forgave both, whether therefore doth love him more: Simon anſwering, ſaid, I ſuppoſe that he to whom he forgave more. But he ſaid to him, Thou haſt judged rightly. And turning to the woman, he ſaid unto Simon, Doeſt thou ſee this woman? I entered into thy houſe, water to my feet thou didſt not give: but ſhe with tears hath watered my feet, and with her hairs hath wiped them. Kiſs thou gaveſt me not; but ſhe, ſince I came in, hath not ceaſed to kiſs my feet. With oyl thou didſt not anoint my head: but ſhe with ointment hath anointed my feet. For the which I ſay to thee, many ſins are forgiven her, becauſe ſhe hath loved much. But to whom leſs is forgiven, he loveth leſs. And he ſaid to her, Thy ſins are forgiven thee. And they that ſate together at the table, began to ſay within themſelves, Who is this that alſo forgiveth ſins? And he ſaid to the woman, Thy faith hath made thee ſafe, Go in peace.

Moralities.

1. SAint Marie Magdalen is under the feet of Jeſus Chriſt, as is that work of Saphires (mentioned in Exodus) under the feet of God. It is a work wrought by the right hand of the Higheſt, the wonder of women, the moſt happy of all lovers; who made profit of ſin, which deſtroyes all; who ſanctified that love, which ſo little knew the way to any ſanctity. This is the fountain mentioned in the Book of Eſther, in the viſion of Mordochens; A fountain which became a river, and after changes it ſelf into the Sun, which gives beams and ſhowers at one inſtant. She is a fountain at the Phariſees talbe ſhe is a river in her ſolitary grove, ſhe is a Sun both in Paradiſe, and in that great exaltation, wherein the Catholick Church now beholds her. Being now in glory, ſhe doth not yet forbear to open fountains of tears (by imitation of her) within the ſouls of repentant ſinners, of whom inceſſantly ſhe procures the converſion. Happy is that heart which is pierced with the imitation of her virtues, thereby to gain ſome part of her crowns.

2. Every thing is admirable in her converſion: A ſinner wounded with love, cures her ſelf by love. She changes the fire of Babylon, into that of Jeruſalem. She plucks out of her wound the venemous dart of worldly love, to make large room for the arrows of Jeſus, which pierce her heart; and at an inſtant make a harmony of heavenly paſſions within the bottom of her ſoul. She holds the wound dearer than life, and goes ſtreight to her conquerour, to deſire death, or increaſe of love.

3. She appears moſt ingenious in her affections, to provide no water wherewith to waſh her Maſters feet, ſince ſhe could draw it ſo fitly out of her own eyes. This was the water which Jeſus did thirſt after, when he asked of the Samaritane woman ſome to drink; But that poor woman was ſo aſtoniſhed, that ſhe forſook her pitcher, and forgot that which Jeſus asked. Now the holy Magdalen brings her eyes to the Phariſees table, as to veſſels full of Chryſtal water, which was of that pure ſtream which comes from the holy Lamb. Heaven is wont to water the earth, but here the earth waters Heaven. A ſoul which was before black, and burnt up with the fire of concupiſcence, provides a Fountain for the KING of higheſt Heaven. She drawes tears from her ſins, to make them become the joyes of Paradiſe.

4. She ſanctifies all that which was eſteemed moſt prophane. Her hairs, which were the nets wherein ſo many captive ſouls did figh under the yoke of wanton love, are now (as the enſigns and ſtandards of wicked Cupid) trampled under the feet of her Conquerour. Thoſe kiſſes, which carried the poiſon of a luxurious paſſion in her heart, do now breath from her nothing but the delicacies of chaſtity. Her pleaſing odours which were before vowed to ſenſuality, are now become the ſweeteſt exhalations from that Amber Iſle, which brings an odoriferous perfume to Jeſus Chriſt. She brings with her Aromatick ſpices, to burn her ſelf at the Mountain of her Sun, who makes himſelf her Prieſt, her Advocate, and Bride-man.

5. She had gained the great Jubilee, and was aſſured of it, by the word of the Eternal Biſhop; and yet during all the reſt of her life, ſhe practiſed upon her ſelf a ſanctified revenge, and her penance never ends, but with her life; to confound our coldneſs, who know ſo little what it is to bewail a ſin. She is as timorous in the aſſurance of her pardon, as we are ſecure at the approch of Gods juſtice. No body could be ſo patient, and ſo conſtant in her love, but ſhe, that had a holy emulation toward heavenly charity. It is her perſeverance which draws to the earth a perfect copy of that life (without limit) which the bleſſed ſouls enjoy in heaven. It is ſhe alone to whom eternity was then given, becauſe ſhe had power to offer repentant frailty to Eternity it ſelf.

Aſpirations.

Upon Saint Mary Magdalens great Repentance.

O Jeſus, my Conquerour, and my Sovereign Biſhop, thou art pleaſed to be ſatisfied of thy unworthy ſervant; but I am not yet content with my ſelf. No, no, my life and penance ſhall end together, ſince I have loſt that which ſhould never have been ſeparated from my body, before the ſeparation of my ſoul. And ſince I cannot enter chaſt into my grave, I will now go repentant into an obſcure and ſavage Cave, where the Sun ſhall ſhine no more upon a head ſo ſinfull as mine. Mine eyes (O mine eyes) who have firſt received that fire which hath ſo paſſionately devoured my ſoul, I will make you imitate the Pond of Heſebon, and ſooner ſhall thoſe two fountains be dried up, which ſerve the ſtream of Jordan, than you ſhall want water to waſh the ſteps of your Concupiſcences. I will have that neck (which hath ſuffered it ſelf to be embraced by unlawfull Arms) held under the yoke of him that hath overcome me, and ſo happily ſubjected me to to his Empire. Theſe arms and hands, which have been the chains of wanton embracements, ſhall henceforth for ever be lifted up to Heaven in prayer, and they ſhall have no other Altars, but the feet of my Lord and Maſter, if I dare think my ſelf worthy to kiſs them. This mouth, which hath been the gate of unchaſtity, ſhall now become a Temple of Gods praiſes. And this heart, which hath been a burning furnace of worldly love, ſhall be a burning lamp of holy affections before God; and ſhall have no other oyl to maintain it, but that water which ſhall be drawn from mine eyes. O my God, ſince I have ſo betrayed my heart, abuſed my youth, ſpent prodigally thy Treaſures, and made crowns to Baal out of thy ſilver; ſince I have forſaken thee, who art eternal, unchangeable, and incomparable Goodneſs, (without whom all other goods are nothing) to follow a wanton fire, which hath brought me to the brim of everlaſting precipice; where ſhall I find ſufficient tears to waſh my offences? where ſhall I find enow parts of my body, to be continually offered up as the ſacrifice of my repentance? I would make my life immortal, to have my pains ſo laſting, and if thy mercy will not let me be the object of thy vengeance, let me at leaſt ſerve for a ſacrifice at thy Altars.

The Goſpel upon Friday the fifth week in Lent, S. John 11.

The Jews ſaid, What ſhall we do? for this man doth many miracles.

THe chief Prieſts therefore and the Phariſees, gathered a Councel, and ſaid, What ſhall we do? for this man doth many ſigns: if we let him alone ſo, all will believe in him, and the Romans will come and take away our place and Nation. But one of them named Caiaphas, being the High Prieſt of that year, ſaid to them, You know nothing, neither do you conſider that it is expedient for us, that one man die for the people, and the whole Nation periſh not. And this he ſaid not of himſelf, but being the High Prieſt of that year, he propheſied that Jeſus ſhould die for the Nation: and not onely for the Nation, but to gather in one the children of God that were diſperſed. From that day therefore they deviſed to kill him. Jeſus therefore walked no more openly among the Jews, but he went into the Countrey beſide the Deſart, unto a Citie that is called Ephrem, and there he abode with his Diſciples.

Moralities.

1. ONe of the greateſt Tragedies acted in the life of man, which makes curious perſons to queſtion, wiſe men to wonder, good men to groan, and the wicked to rejoyce; is to ſee an innocent man oppreſſed by colour of juſtice. Now Jeſus being reſolved to eſpouſe our miſeries, as far as they can reach, was pleaſed to paſs through thoſe rigours and formalities of the wicked, coloured with a pretext of equity. He is not here condemned by a mean people without conſideration, without power, without formality of proceſs: But by theſe chief Prieſts and principal men of that Nation assembled in Counsel; they informed themselves, they reason, and conclude his death. The Lions of Solomons throne, did anciently bear certain Writs of the Law, to signifie, that it was to be handled by courageous and clear-seeing Judges. But here Foxes got it into their hands, and did manage it by crafty deceits and wickedness. Alas, we are far from the Laws of God, when we cannot abide the least word spoken against our reputation. We are troubled to suffer for innocency, as if it were a greater honour to suffer for a direct offence. Shall we never think, that the triumph of vertue consists in well doing, and (thereby) sometimes receiving harm, even from those who are esteemed good men?

and

2. There are some difficulties in affairs, where truth is shut up, as within a cloud. Wise men can hardly find out where the point lies, but God doth so order it, that falshood leaves always certain marks by which it may be known; and the beauty of truth is ever like that lake of Affrick, which early or late discovers all that is cast into it, and makes all impostures plainly appear, when we think they are most concealed. And this appears by the proceeding of Caiaphas, who chose to condemn Christ, for those things which were the certain tokens, that he was the true Messias. He concluded his death by reason of his miracles, and those gave him authority, as to the Prince of life. A troubled spirit makes darts of every thing, (which it can) to fight against reason, and kills it self, not suspecting its own poison.

3. The devil publisheth Jesus for the true Messias, and so doth likewise Caiaphas prophesie the same. It is not always a certain mark of goodness, to speak that which is good, but it is an assurance of vertue to avoid that which is ill. There are many from whom good works do escape, while they both think and do ill. Truth makes use of their tongues, when Devils command their hearts. It is this which makes us to see our Saviours Empire, and the extent of his conquests, which is not limited by time, he being already entered into possession of Eternity: and it is not bounded by place; because it contains all Immensity. Night hath no power to cover it, because it is light it self; It cannot be shut up in any deceitfull shadow, because it scatters and discovers all falshood: It cannot be comprehended within our senses, because it exceeds their Capacity; and it is present in all places, being omnipotent and eternal in all time.

Aspirations.

O Jesus, Father of all blessed unions, who hast suffered death to unite all the children of God together, who are scattered over all the countreys of the world; wilt thou have no pitie of my heart, so many times torn in pieces, & strayed among a great multitude of objects, which estrange and draw me from the first of all Unities? My soul melts through all the Gates of my senses, by running after so many creatures which do kindle covetousness, but never serve to refresh or cool the heat of it. Draw me (O Lord) from the great throng of so many exteriour things, that I may retire into my own heart, and from thence arise to thine, where I may find that peace, which thou hast cemented fast with thy most precious bloud.

When shall I see the first beams of that liberty, which thou grantest to thy children? When shall my thoughts return from wandering in those barren regions, where thou art not acknowledged? When shall I be re-united, and so purified by thy favours, that they may celebrate continual days of feast in my soul? I am already there in desire, and shall be there in presence, when by help of thine infinite grace and mercy, I can be wholly thine.

The Gospel upon Saturday, the fifth week in Lent, S. John 12.

The chief Priests thought to kill Lazarus, because the miracle upon him, made many follow JESUS.

But the chief Priests devised for to kill Lazarus also; because many for him of the Jews went away, and believed in Jesus.

And on the morrow a great multitude that was come to a festival day, when they had heard that Jesus cometh to Jerusalem, they took the boughs of Palms, and went forth to meet him, and cried, Hosanna, blessed is he that cometh in the name of our Lord, the King of Israel. And Jesus found a young Ass, and sate upon it, as it is written, Fear not daughter of Sion: behold, thy King cometh, sitting upon an Asses colt. These things his Disciples did not know at the first: but when Jesus was glorified, then they remembered that these things had been written of him, and these things they did to him. The multitude therefore gave testimony, which was with him when he called Lazarus out of the grave, and raised him from the dead. For therefore all the multitude came to meet him, because they heard that he had done this sign. The Pharisees therefore said among themselves, Do you see that we prevail nothing? Behold the whole world is gone after him.

And there were certain Gentiles of them that came up to adore in the festival day. These therefore came to Philip, who was of Bethsaida of Galilee, and desired him, saying, Sir, we are desirous to see Jesus. Philip cometh and telleth Andrew. Again, Andrew and Philip told Jesus: but Jesus answered them, saying, The hour is come that the Son of man shall be glorified. Amen, Amen, I say to you, Unless the grain of wheat falling into the ground, die, it self remaineth alone: but if it die, it bringeth much fruit. He that loveth his life, shall lose it: and he that hateth his life in this world, doth keep it to life everlasting. If any man minister to me, let him follow me: and where I am, there also shall my minister be. If any man minister to me, my Father will honour him.

Moralities.

1. ADmire here the extasies of our sweet Saviour: He is ravish'd by the object of his death, and is transported by the Idæa of his sufferings. The trumpet of Heaven sounded in the voice which was heard by this great multitude. He encourages himself to his combat; he looks confidently upon the Cross, as the fountain of his glories, and planted his elevation upon the lowest abasements. Shall not we love this Cross, which Jesus hath cherished as his Spouse? He gave up his soul in the arms of it, to conquer our souls. We shall never be worthy of him, till we bear the Ensigns of his war, and the ornaments of his peace. Every thing is Paradise to him, that knows how to love the Cross: and every thing is hell to those who flie from it; and no body flies it, but shall find it. It is the gate of our mortality, whither we must all come, though we turn our backs to it.

2. What a great secret it is, to hate our soul, that we may love it; To hate it for a time, that we may love it for all eternity; to punish it in this life, to give it thereby a perpetual rest in that to come; To despise it, that we may honour it: To handle it roughly, that it may be perfectly established in all delights? And yet this is the way which all just men have passed, to arrive at the chiefest point of their rest. They have resembled the Flowers-de-luce, which weep for a time, & out of their own tears produce seeds which renew their beauties. The salt sea for them becomes a flourishing field, as it did to the people of God, which they came forth of the chains of Ægypt. The cloud which appeared to the Prophet Ezechiel, carried with it winds and storms, but it was environed with a golden circle, to teach us that the storms of afflictions which happen to Gods children, are encompassed with brightness, and smiling felicity. They must rot as a grain of wheat, that they may bud out and flourish in the ear. They must abide the diversity of times, and endure the sythe and flail; They must be ground in a mill, and pass by water and fire, before they can be made bread pleasing to Jesus Christ. Our losses are our advantages; we loose nothing, but to gain by it; we humble and abase our selves to be exalted, we despoil our selves to be better clothed, and we mortifie our selves, to be revived. O what a grain of wheat is Jesus Christ, who hath past all these trials, to make the heighth of all heavenly glories bud out of his infinite sufferings.

Aspirations.

O God, I have that passionate desire, which these strangers had, to see Jesus. I do not ask it of Philip, nor shall Philip have cause to ask Andrew. My Jesus, I ask it of thy self. Thou art beautifull even in the way of the Cross; Thou didst shew thy self couragious in the Abyss of thy pains: thou art admirable in the contempt of death. The heavenly trumpet hath already sounded for thee, and chearfulness gives wings to carry thee to this great combat, where death and life fight singly together: which makes life die for a time, and death live for ever. I will forsake my very soul, to follow thee in this Agonie, and find my life in thy death, as thou hast extinguished death in thy life.

The Gospel upon Palm-Sunday, S. Matthew 21.

Our SAVIOUR come in triumph to Jerusalem a little before his Passion.

AND when they drew nigh to Jerusalem, and were come to Bethphage, unto mount Olivet, then Jesus sent two Disciples, saying to them, Go ye into the Town that is against you, and immediately you shall find an Ass tied, and a colt with her: loose them, and bring them to me. And if any man shall say ought unto you, say ye, That our Lord hath need of them, and forthwith he will let them go. And this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Prophet, saying, Say ye to the daughter of Sion, Behold thy King cometh to thee, meek, and sitting upon an Ass, and a Colt, the foal of her that is used to the yoke. And the Disciples going, did as Jesus commanded them: and they brought the Ass, and the Colt; and laid their garments upon them, and made him to sit thereon. And a very great multitude spred their garments in the way: and others did cut boughs from the trees, and strawed them in the way, and the multitudes that went before, and that followed, cried, saying: Hosanna to the Son of David, blessed is he that cometh in the Name of the Lord.

Moralities.

1. OUr Saviour goes to his death in triumph: he appears to be a King, but a King of hearts, who requires nothing of us, but our selves, onely to make us happy and contented in him. He triumphs before the victory, because none but he could be sure of the future certainty of his happiness. But he watered his triumphs with tears, to weep for our joys, which were to proceed out of his sadness. It is related by an ancient Orator, that when Constantine made his entery into great Britany, (where he was born) the people received him with so great applause, that they kissed the Sails and Oars of the vessel which brought him, and were ready to pave the streets with their bodies for him to tread on. If they did so for a mortal man, what should we not do for an eternal God, who comes to buy us with his precious bloud, and demands enterance into our hearts, onely to give us Paradise.

2. He walks towards his Cross, amongst the cries of favours and joy, to teach us, with what chearfulness we should conform our selves to abide our own sufferings, imitating the Apostles, who received their first reproches, as Manna from heaven. He would have us prepared and resolved always to suffer death patiently; whether it be a death which raiseth up our spirit to forsake sensuality, or a natural death. Whethersoever it be, we should embrace it as the day which must bring us to our lodging, after a troublesom pilgrimage. Doth it not appear plainly, that those who are loth to forsake the world, are like herbs put into an earthen pot among straw and dung, and yet would be unwilling to come forth of it. The furniture of our worldly lodging grown rotten, the roof is ready to fall upon our heads, the foundation shakes under our feet, and we fear that day, which (if we our selves will) shall be the morning of our eternal happiness. It is not death, but onely the opinion of it, which is terrible, and every man considers it according to the disposition of his own spirit.

3. The Palm-branches which we carry in our hands, require from us the renewing of a life purified and cleansed in the bloud of the holy Lamb. In the beginning of Lent we take upon our heads the ashes of Palm branches, to teach us, that we do then, enter (as it were) into the Sepulcher of repentance: But now we carry green bows, to make us know, that now we come out of the tomb of Ashes, to enter again into the strength of doing good works, in imitation of the trees, which having been covered with snow, and buried in the sharpness of winter, do again begin to bud out in the Spring time.

4. The garments spred under the feet of Jesus, declare, that all our temporal goods should be employed toward his glory; and that we must forsake our affections to all things which perish, that we may be partakers of his kingdom. No man can stand firm, that is delighted with moveable things. He that is subject to worldly affections, binds himself to a wheel which turns about continually. Jesus accepted this triumph, onely to despise it: he reserved the honour of it in his own hands, to drown it in the floud of his tears, and in the sea of his precious bloud. If you be rich and wealthy, do not publish it vainly, but let the poor feel it. You must live amongst all the greatness and jollity of this world, as a man whose onely business must be to go to God.

Aspirations.

O Sovereign King of hearts, after whom all chaste loves do languish, I am filled with joy to see thee walk amongst the cries of joy, and the Palms and garments of thy admirers, which served for carpets. I am ravished with thy honours, and the delights of thy glory, and I applaud thy triumphs. Alas, that all the earth is not obedient to thy laws; and that the tongues of all people do not make one voice, to acknowledge thee sole Monarch of Heaven and earth. Triumph at least in the hearts of thy faithfull servants (O my magnificent Master) make a triumphal Ark composed of hearts; Put fire to it with thy adored hand; Pour out one spark of that heat, which thou camest to spread upon the earth. Let every thing burn for thee, and consume it self in thy

thy love. I do irevocably bind my heart to the magnificence of thy triumph, and I love better to be thy ſlave, than to be ſaluted King of the whole world.

The Goſpel upon Munday in holy week, S. John 12.

Saint Marie Magdalen anointed our Saviours feet with precious Ointment: at which Judas repined.

JEſus therefore ſix days before the Paſche, came to Bethania, where Lazarus was, that had been dead, whom Jeſus raiſed: and they made him a ſupper there, and Martha miniſtered, but Lazarus was one of them that ſate at the table with him. Marie therefore took a pound of Ointment of right Spikenard precious, and anointed the feet of Jeſus, and wiped his feet with her hair: and the houſe was filled of the odour of the Ointment. One therefore of his Diſciples, Judas Iſcariot, he that was to betray him, ſaid, Why was not this Ointment ſold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor? And he ſaid this, not becauſe he cared for the poor, but becauſe he was a thief, and having the purſe, carried the things that were put in it. Jeſus therefore ſaid, Let her alone, that ſhe may keep it for the day of my burial: for the poor you have always with you, but me you ſhall not have always. A great multitude of the Jews knew that he was there: and they came, not for Jeſus onely, but that they might ſee Lazarus, whom he raiſed from the dead.

Moralities.

1. LAzarus being raiſed from his grave, converſeth familiarly with Jeſus and to preſerve the life which he had newly received, he ties himſelf continually to the fountain of lives: to teach us, that ſince we have begun to make a ſtrong converſion from ſin to grace, we muſt not be out of the ſight of God: we muſt live with him, and of him; with him, by applying our ſpirit, our prayers, our ſervours, our paſſionate ſighs toward him: and live of him, by often receiving the bleſſed Sacrament. Happy they (ſaith the Angel in the Apocalyps) who are invited to the wedding-ſupper of the Lamb. But note, that he who invites us to this feaſt, ſtands upright amidſt the Sun, to ſignifie, that we ſhould be as pure as the beams of light, when we come unto the moſt holy Sacrament. Lazarus did eat bread with his Lord, but (to ſpeak with S. Auguſtine) he did not then eat the bread of our Lord, and yet this great favour is reſerved for you, when you are admitted to that heavenly banquet, where God makes himſelf meat, to give you an Antepaſt of his Immortality.

2. God will have us acknowledge his benefits, by the faithfulneſs of our ſervices. S. Peter's mother in law, as ſoon as ſhe was healed of her Feaver, preſently ſerved her Phyſitian. And obſerve, that Martha ſerved the Authour of life, who had redeemed her brother from the power of death. The faithfull Mary, who had ſhed tears, gave what ſhe had moſt precious, and obſerves no meaſure in the worth, becauſe Jeſus cannot be valued. Cleopatra's pearl (eſtimated to be worth two hundred thouſand crowns) which ſhe made her friend ſwallow at a Banquet, this holy woman thought too baſe; She melts her heart in a ſacred Limbeck of love, and diſtils it out by her eyes. And Jeſus makes ſo great account of her waters and perfumes, that he would ſuffer no body to waſh his feet, when he inſtituted the bleſſed Sacrament, as not being willing to deface the ſacred characters of his ſacred Lover.

3. Judas murmures and covers his villanous paſſion of Avarice, under the colour of Charity, and Mercy towards the poor. And juſt ſo do many cover their vices with a ſpecious ſhew of virtue. The proud man would be thought Magnanimous; the prodigal would paſs for liberal, the covetous for a good huſband; the brain-ſick raſh man, would be reputed couragious; the glutton, a hoſpitable good fellow; Sloth puts on the face of quietneſs, timorouſneſs of wiſdom, impudence of boldneſs, inſolence of liberty, and over-confident or ſawcy prating, would be taken for eloquence. Many men (for their own particular intereſts) borrow ſome colours of the publick good, and very many actions, both unjuſt and unreaſonable, take upon them a ſemblance of piety. S. Irenæus ſaith, that many give water, coloured with ſleckt white-lime or plaſter, in ſtead of milk. * And all their life is but a Farſe, where Blackamores are whited over with meal. Poor truth ſuffers much more amongſt theſe cozenages: But you muſt take notice that in the end, wicked and diſſembling Judas did burſt, and ſhew his damned ſoul ſtark naked. Yet ſome think fairly to cover foul intentions, who muſt needs know well, that hypocriſie hath no vail to cozen death.

* A Farſe is a French Jig, wherein the faces of all the actours are whited over with meal.

Aſpirations.

I See no Altars in all the world more amiable than the feet of our Saviour; I will go by his ſteps to find his feet; and by the excellencies of the beſt of men, I will go find out the God of gods. Thoſe feet are admirable, and S. John hath well deſcribed them to be made of mettal, burning in a furnace, they are feet of mettal by their conſtancy, and feet of fire by the enflamed affections of their Maſter. Let Judas murmure at it, what he will; but if I had a ſea of ſweet odours, and odoriferous perfumes, I would empty them all upon an object ſo worthy of love. Give, (O mine eyes) Give at leaſt tears to this precious Holocauſt, which goes to ſacrifice it ſelf for ſatisfaction of your libidinous concupiſcences. Waſh it with your waters, before it waſh you with its bloud. O my ſoul, ſeek not after excrements of thy head, to drie it: Thy hairs are thy thoughts, which muſt onely think of him, who thought ſo kindly and paſſionately of thee, on the day of his Eternity.

The Goſpel upon Maunday Thurſday, S. John the 13.

Of our Saviours waſhing the feet of his Apoſtles.

AND before the feſtival day of the Paſche, Jeſus knowing that his hour was come, that he ſhould paſs out of this world to his Father: whereas he had loved his that were in the world, unto the end he loved them. And when ſupper was done, whereas the devil now had put into the heart of Judas Iſcarior, the ſon of Simon, to betray him, knowing that the Father gave him all things into his hands, and that he came from God, and goeth to God: he riſeth from ſupper, and layeth aſide his garments, and having taken a towel, girded himſelf. After that he put water into a baſon, and began to waſh the feet of the Diſciples, and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded. He cometh therefore to Simon Peter; and Peter ſaith to him, Lord, doſt thou waſh my feet? Jeſus anſwered, and ſaid to him, That which I do, thou knoweſt not now, hereafter thou ſhalt know. Peter ſaith to him, Thou ſhalt not waſh my feet for ever. Jeſus anſwered him, if I waſh thee not, thou ſhalt not have part with me. Simon Peter ſaith to him, Lord, not onely my feet, but alſo hands and head. Jeſus ſaith to him, He that is waſhed, needeth not but to waſh his feet, but is clean wholly: and you are clean, but not all; for he knew who he was that would betray him, therefore he ſaid, You are not clean all.

Therefore after he had waſhed their feet, and taken his garments, being ſet down, again he ſaid to them, Know you what I have done to you? You call me Maſter, and Lord, and you ſay well, for I am ſo. If then I have waſhed your feet, Lord and Maſter, you alſo ought to waſh one anothers feet. For I have given you an example, that as I have done to you, ſo do you alſo.

Moralities.

1. JEſus loves his ſervants for an end, and till the full accompliſhment of that end. The world loves his creatures with a love which tends to concupiſcence; but that is not the end for which they were made, or ſhould be loved. There is a very great difference between them: for the love of worldly men, plays the tyrant in the world; ſnatching and turning all things from the true ſcope and intention, for which they were made by God, diverting them to profane uſes, by turbulent and forcible ways. The world pleaſeth it ſelf to ſet up Idols every where, to make it ſelf adored in them, as chief Sovereign. It makes uſe of the Sun to light his crimes; of the fatneſs of the earth to fatten his pleaſures, of apparrel for his luxury, of all mettals to kindle Avarice, and of the pureſt beauties to ſerve ſenſuality. And if by chance it love any creature, with a well-wiſhing love, and as it ought to be loved, that is not permanent. The wind is not more inconſtant, nor a calm at Sea more unfaithfull than worldly friendſhip. For ſometimes it begins with Fire, and ends in Ice. It is made as between a pot and a glaſs, and is broken ſooner than a glaſs. The ancient Almans tried their children in the Rhine, but true friendſhip is tried in a ſea of Tribulation. It is onely Jeſus (the preſerver and reſtorer of all things) who loves us from Eternity to Eternity. We muſt follow the ſacred ſteps of his examples, to reduce our ſelves to our firſt beginning, and to bring our ſelves to the final point of our happineſs.

2. The water at firſt was a mild element, which ſerved the Majeſty of God, as a floting chariot, ſince (as the Scripture ſaith) his Spirit was carried upon the waters, from whence he drew the ſeeds which produced all the world. But after man had ſinned, like a Supream Judge, he made uſe of the gentleſt things to be the inſtruments of our puniſhments. The water which carried the Divine Mercies, was choſen at the deluge, to drown all mankind. Now at this time Jeſus ſanctified it by his ſacred touch: He took the Baſon, which being in his hands, became greater and more full of Majeſty, than all the Ocean. Our ſpots, which eternity could not waſh clean, are taken away at Baptiſm, by one onely drop of water, ſanctified by his bleſſing. He prevents the bath of his bloud, by the bath of an element: which he doth expreſly before his inſtitution of the bleſſed Sacrament; to teach us, what purity of life, of heart, of faith, of intentions and affections, we muſt bring to the holy Euchariſt. It is neceſſary to chaſe away all ſtrange gods (which are ſins and paſſions) before we receive the God of Iſrael: we muſt waſh our ſelves in the waters of repentance, and change our attire by a new converſation. Is it too much for us to give fleſh for fleſh, the body of a miſerable man, for that of Jeſus Chriſt? The conſideration of our ſins ſhould bring up the bloud of bluſhing into our cheeks, ſince they were the onely cauſe why he ſhed his moſt precious bloud upon the Croſs for us. Alas, the Heavens are not pure before his moſt pure Spirit, which purifies all nature: Then how can we go to him, with ſo many voluntary ſtains and deformities? Is it not to caſt flowers upon a dung-hill, and to drive Swine to a clear fountain, when we will go to Jeſus (the Authour of innocency) carrying with us the ſteps and ſpots of our hanious ſins?

3. Jeſus would not onely take upon himſelf the form of man, but alſo of a baſe ſervant, as S. Paul ſaith. It was the office of ſlaves to carry water to waſh bodies; which made David ſay, That Moab ſhould be the Baſon of his hope, expreſſing thereby, that he would humble the Moabites ſo low, that they ſhould ſerve onely to bring water to waſh unclean houſes. Alas, who would have ſaid, that the Meſſias was come amongſt us to execute the office of a Moabite? What force hath conquered him, what arms have brought him under, but onely love? How can we then become proud, and burn incenſe to that Idol, called Point of honour, when we ſee how our God humbled himſelf in this action? Obſerve with what preparation the Evangeliſt ſaid, that his Heavenly Father had put all into his hands: that he came from God, and went to God; yet in ſtead of taking the worlds Scepter, he takes a Baſon, and humbles himſelf to the moſt ſervile offices. And if the waters of this Baſon cannot burſt in us the foul impoſtume of vanity, we muſt expect no other remedy, but the eternal flames of hell fire.

Aſpirations.

O King of Lovers, and Maſter of all holy Loves, Thou loveſt for an end, and till the accompliſhment of that end. It appertains onely to thee, to teach the Art of loving well, ſince thou haſt practiſed it ſo admirably. Thou art none of thoſe delicate friends, who onely make love to beauties, to gold, and ſilk; thou loveſt our very poverty, and our miſeries; becauſe they ſerve for objects of thy charity. Let proud Michol laugh (while ſhe liſt) to ſee my dear David made as a water-bearer; I honour him as much in that poſture, as I would, ſitting upon the throne of all the world. I look upon him holding this Baſon, as upon him that holds the vaſt ſeas in his hands. O my merciful Jeſus, I beſeech thee waſh; waſh again, and make clean my moſt ſinfull ſoul. Be it as black as hell, being in thy hands, it may become more white than that Dove (with ſilver wings) of which the Prophet ſpeaks. I go, I run to the fountain; I burn with love amongſt thy purifying waters. I deſire affectionately to humble my ſelf, but I know not where to find ſo low a place as thine, when thou thus waſt humbled before Judas, to waſh his traiterours feet.

Upon the Garden of Mount Olivet.

Moralities.

1. JEſus enters into a Garden, to expiate the ſin committed in a Garden by the firſt man. The firſt Adam ſtole the fruit, and the ſecond is ordained to make ſatisfaction. It is a ſtrange thing, that he choſe the places of our delights, for ſuffering his pains; and never lookt upon our moſt dainty ſweets, but to draw out of them moſt bitter ſorrows. Gardens are made for recreations, but our Saviour finds there onely deſolation. The Olives, which are tokens of peace, denounce war unto him. The plants there do groan; the flowers are but flowers of death, and thoſe fountains are but fountains of ſweat and bloud. He that ſhall ſtudy well this Garden, muſt needs be aſhamed of all his pleaſant Gardens: and will forſake thoſe refined curioſities of Tulips, to make his heart become another manner of Garden, where Jeſus ſhould be planted, as the onely Tree of Life, which brings forth the moſt perfect fruits of juſtice.

2. It was there that the greateſt Champion of the world undertook ſo great Combats, which began with ſweat and bloud, but ended with the loſs of his life. There were three marvellous Agonies, of God and and Death; of Joy and Sorrow; of the Soul and Flesh of Jesus. God and Death were two incomparable things; since God is the first, and the most universal of all lives, who banisheth from him all the operations of death, and yet his love finds means to unite them together for our redemption.

The joy of beatitude was a fruition of all celestial delights, whereunto nothing which displeased, could have access; and yet Jesus suffered sorrow, to give him a mortal blow, even in the Sanctuary of his Divinity. He afflicted himself for us, because we knew not what it was to afflict our selves for him, and he descended by our steps to the very anguishes of death, to make us rise by his death, to the greatest joyes of life.

To be short, there was a great duel between the affectionate love, and the virginal flesh of Jesus. His soul did naturally love a body, which was so obedient; and his body followed wholly the inclinations of his soul: There was so perfect an agreement between these two parties, that their separation must needs be most dolorous. Yet Jesus would have it so, and signed the decree by sweating bloud. And, as if it had been too little to weep for our sins with two eyes, he suffered as many eyes as he had veins, to be made in his body, to shed for us tears of his own bloud.

3. Observe here how this soul of Jesus amongst those great anguishes, continued always constant, like the Needle of a Sea-compass in a storm. He prays, he exhorts, he orders, he reproves, and he encourages; he is like the Heavens, which (amongst so many motions and agitations) lose no part of their measure or proportion. Nature and obedience make great convulsions in his heart; but he remains constantly obedient to the will of his Heavenly Father: he tears himself from himself, to make himself a voluntary sacrifice for death, amongst all his inclinations to life; to teach us that principal lesson of Christianity, which is to desire onely what God will, and to execute all the decrees of his divine Providence, as our chiefest helps to obtain perfection.

Aspirations.

O Beauteous garden of Olives, which from henceforth shalt be the most delicious object of my heart. I will lose my self in thy walks, I will be lost with God, that I may never be lost. I will breathe onely thy air, since it is made noble by the sighs of my dear Master. I will gather thy flowers, since Jesus hath marked them with his bloud. I will wash my self in those fountains, since they are sanctified by the sweat of my Jesus. I will have no other joy, but the sorrow of the Son of God, nor any other will but his. O my sweet Saviour, Master and teacher of all humane kind, wilt thou be abridged of thine own will (which was so reasonable and pure) to give me an example of mortifying my passions, and shall I (before thy face) retain any wicked or disordinate appetites? Is it possible I should desire to be Lord of my self (who am so bad a Master) when I see the Authour of all goodness separate himself from himself, onely to make me and all mankind, partakers of his merits?

Of the apprehension of Jesus.

IN that obscure and dolorous night, wherein our Saviour was apprehended, three sorts of darkness were cast; upon the Jews, upon Judas, and upon Saint Peter: A darkness of obduration upon the hearts of the Jews; a darkness of ingratefull maligny upon Judas; and a darkness of infirmity upon Saint Peter. Was there ever any blindness like that of the Jews, who fought for the shining Sun with lighted torches, without knowing him by so many beams of power, which shined from him? They are strucken down with the voice of the Son of God, as with lightening; and they rise again upon the earth to arm themselves against Heaven. They bind his hands to take away the use of his forces, but they could not stop the course of his bounties. To shew that he is totally good, he is good and charitable, even amongst his merciless executioners, and he lost all he had (saving his Godhead) onely to gain patience.

When S. Peter stroke the high Priests servant, the patience of our Lord Jesus received the blow, and had no patience till he was healed. If goodness did shew forth any one beam in the garden, modesty sent forth another in the house of Annas, when his face was strucken by a servile hand, his mouth opened it self as a Temple, from whence nothing came but sweetness and light. The God of Truth speaketh to Caiaphas, and they spit upon his brightness, and cover that face which must discover Heaven for us. The mirrour of Angels is tarnisht with the spittle of infernal mouthes, and wounded by most sacrilegious hands, without any disturbance of his constancy. That was invincible by his vertue, as the willfulness of the Jews stood immoveable by their obduration. There are souls, which after they have filled the earth with crimes, expect no cure of their diseases, but by the hell of the reprobate

2. The second darkness appeareth by the black passion of Judas, who falls down into hell with his eyes open; and after he had sold his soul, sold Jesus, and both all he had, and all he was, to buy an infamous halter to hang himself. A soul become passionate with wanton love, with ambition or avarice, is banished into it self, as into a direct hell, and delivered to her own passions, as to the Furies. The Poet Hydra had but seven heads; but the spirit of Avarice (S. Iohn Climacus saith) hath ten thousand. The conversation of Jesus, which was so full of infinite attractions, could never win the spirit of Iudas, when it was once bewitched with covetousness. The tinkling of silver kept him from rightly understanding Iesus. He makes use of the most holy things, to betray Holiness it self. He employes the kiss of peace, to begin war. He carries poison in his heart, and honey in his mouth: he puts on the spirit of Iesus, to betray him. This shews us plainly, that covetous and traiterous persons are farthest from God, and neerest to the devils.

3. The third power of darkness appeared in the infirmity of S. Peter, who after so many protestations of fidelity, for feat of death, renounced the Authour of life. One of the Ancients said, The greatest frailty of Humanity, was, that the wisest men were not infallibly wise at all times. And all men are astonished to see, that the greatest spirits (being left to themselves) become barren, and suffer eclipses, which give examples to the wisest, and terrour to all the world. God hath suffered the fall of S. Peter, to make us have in horrour all presumption of our own forces; and to teach us, that over-great assurance is oftentimes mother of an approaching danger. Besides, it seemeth he would by this example, consecrate the virtue of repentance in this fault of him, whom he chose to be head of his Church; to make us see, that there is no dignity so high, nor holiness so eminent, which doth not ow Tribute to the mercy of God.

Aspirations.

Upon S. Peters tears.

IT is most true (saith S. Peter) that a proud felicity hath alwayes reeling feet. Thou which didst defie the gates of hell, hast yielded thy self to the voice of a simple woman. All those conquests which thou thou didſt promiſe to thy ſelf, are become the tropheys of ſo weak a hand Return to the combat, and ſince ſhe hath triumphed over thee, do thou at leaſt triumph over thy ſelf. Alas, I am afraid even to behold the place of my fall, and the weak ſnares of a ſimple woman appear to me as boiſterous chains. Yet what can he fear, who is reſolute to die? If thou find death amongſt theſe maſſacres, thou ſhouldſt rather embrace than decline it: For what can it do, but make thee companion of life it ſelf? Our ſoul is yet too foul to be a ſacrifice for God; let us firſt waſh it with tears. I fell down before the fire, and I will riſe by water. I have walked upon the ſea to come to Jeſus, and I will now return to him by the way of my tears. I will ſpeak now onely by my tears, ſince I have lately talked ſo wickedly with my mouth. Since that which ſhould open to ſpeak Oracles for the Church, hath been employed to commit foul treaſon; ſince we have nothing left free to us, but ſighs and groans, let us make uſe of the laſt liberty which is left us, and when all is ſpent, return to the mercy of Jeſus, which all the ſins of the world can never evacuate. I will from henceforth be a perpetual example to the Church by my fall, and riſing again from death; for the comfort of ſinners; and the fault of one night ſhall be lamented by me alll the days of my life.

Moralities upon the Pretorian, or Judgement-Hall.

1. IN the paſſion of our Saviour, all things are divine, and it ſeemeth they go as high as they could be raiſed by that Sovereign power, joyned with extream love. Jeſus the moſt ſupream and redoubted Judge, who will come in his great Majeſty to judge the world, fire and lightening ſtreaming from his face, and all things trembling under his feet, was pleaſed at this time to be judged as a criminal perſon. Every thing is moſt admirable in this judgement: The Accuſers ſpeak nothing of thoſe things, which they had reſolved in their counſels, but all ſpake againſt their conſciences. As ſoon as they are heard, they are condemned; juſtice forſaketh them, and they are wholly poſſeſt with rage. Pilate, before he gave judgement upon Jeſus, pronounced it againſt himſelf: for after he had ſo many times declared him innocēt, he could not give judgement, without proteſting himſelf to be unjuſt. The ſilence of Jeſus is more admired by this infidel, than the eloquence of all the world; and Truth, without ſpeaking one word, triumpheth over falſhood. A Pagan Lady (the wife of Pilate) is more knowing than all the Laws: more religious than the Prieſts; more zealous than the Apoſtles, more couragious than the men of Arms: when ſhe ſleepeth, Jeſus is in her ſleep: when ſhe talketh, Jeſus is upon her tongue: if ſhe write, Jeſus is under her pen: her letter defended him at the Judgement-Hall, when all the world condemned him; ſhe calleth him holy, when they uſed him like a thief: She maketh her husband waſh his hands, before he touched that bloud, the high price of which ſhe proclaimed. She was a Roman Lady by Nation, called Claudia Procula, and it was very fit ſhe ſhould defend this Jeſus, who was to plant the Seat of his Church in Rome. All this while Jeſus doth good amongſt ſo many evils: He had cauſed a place to be bought newly for the burial of Pilgrims at the price of his bloud; he reconciles Herod and Pilate, by the loſs of his life. He ſets Barrabas at liberty, by the loſs of his honour: he ſpeaks not one word to him that had killed S. John the Baptiſt, who was the voice. And the other to revenge himſelf (without thinking what he did) ſhewed him as a King. He appears before Pilate as the king of dolours, that he might become for us the King of glories. But what a horrour is it to conſider, that in this judgement, he was uſed like a ſlave, like a ſorcerer, like an accurſed ſacrifice? Slavery made him ſubject to be whipped, the crown of thorns was given onely to Enchanters, and that made him appear as a Sorcerer: And ſo many curſes pronounced againſt him, made him as the diſmiſſive Goat, mentioned in Leviticus, which was a miſerable beaſt, upon which they caſt all their execrations, before they ſent it to die in the deſart. He that bindeth the ſhowers in clouds, to make them water the earth, is bound and drawn like a criminal perſon: He that holds the vaſt ſeas in his fiſt, and ballanceth Heaven with his fingers, is ſtrucken by ſervile hands. He that enamels the boſom of the earth, with a rare and pleaſing diverſity of flowers, is moſt ignominiouſly crowned with a crown of thorns. O hydeous prodigies, which took away from us the light of the Sun, and covered the Moon with a ſorrowfull darkneſs. Behold what a garland of flowers he hath taken upon his head, to expiate the ſins of both Sexes. It was made of briars and thorns, which the earth of our fleſh had ſowed for us, and which the virtue of his Croſs took away. All the pricks of death were thruſt upon this prodigious patience, which planted her throne upon the head of our Lord. Conſider how the Son of God would be uſed for our ſins, while we live in delicacies? and one little offenſive word goeth to our hearts; to which, though he that ſpake it, gave the ſwiftneſs of wings, yet we keep it ſo ſhut up in our hearts, that it getteth leaden heels, which make it continue there fixed.

Aſpirations.

ALas, what do I ſee here? A crown of thorns grafted upon a man of thorns: A man of dolours, who burns between two fires, the one of love, the other of tribulation; both which do inflame and devour him equally, and yet never can conſume him. O thou the moſt pure of all beauties, where have my ſins placed thee? Thou art no more a man, but a bloudy skin taken from the teeth of Tigers and Leopards. Alas, what a ſpectacle is this to deſpoil this ſilk * worm, which at this day attires our Churches and Altars? How could they make thoſe men (who looked upon thy chaſte body) ſtrike and diſfigure it? O white Alabaſter, how haſt thou been ſo changed into ſcarlet? Every ſtroke hath made a wound, and every wound a fountain of bloud. And yet ſo many fountains of thy ſo precious bloud, cannot draw from me one tear. But O ſacred Nightingale of the Croſs, who hath put thee within theſe thorns, to make ſo great harmonies onely by thy ſilence? O holy thorns, I do not ask you where are your Roſes. I know well they are the bloud of Jeſus, and I am not ignorant that all roſes would be thorns, if they had any feeling of that which you have. Jeſus carried them upon his head, but I will bear them at my heart: and thou (O Jeſus) ſhalt be the object of my preſent dolours, that thou mayeſt after be the Fountain of my everlaſting joys.

* Ego ſum vermis & non homo. Pſalm 21.

Moralities for Good Friday upon the death of JESUS CHRIST.

MOunt Calvarie is a marvellous ſcaffold, where the chiefeſt Monarch of all the world, loſeth his life, to reſtore our ſalvation which was loſt, and where he makes the Sun to be eclipſed over his head, and ſtones to be cloven under his feet; to teach us by inſenſible creatures, the feeling which we ſhould have of his ſufferings.

This is the ſchool where Jeſus teacheth that great Leſſon, which is the way to do well. And we cannot not better learn it than by his examples, ſince he was pleaſed to make himſelf paſſible and mortal, to overcome our paſſions, and to be the Authour of our immortality.

The qualities of a good death may be reduced to three points: of which the firſt is to have a right conformity to the will of God, for the manner, the hour, and circumſtances of our death.

The ſecond is, to forſake as well the affections, as the preſence of all creatures of this baſe world.

The third is, to unite our ſelves to God by the praćtiſe of great virtues, which will ſerve as ſteps to glory.

Now theſe three conditions are to be ſeen in the death of the Prince of Glory upon Mount Calvarie; which we will take as the pureſt Idea's, whereby to regulate our paſſage out of this world.

1. CONſider in the firſt place, that every man living hath a natural inclination to life, becauſe it hath ſome kind of divinity in it. We love it, when it ſmileth upon us, as if it were our Paradiſe; and if it be troubleſom, yet we ſtrive to retain it, though it be accompanied with very great miſeries. And if we muſt needs forſake this miſerable body, we then deſire to leave it by ſome gentle and eaſie death. This maketh us plainly ſee the generoſity of our Saviour, who being Maſter of life and death, and having it in his power to chuſe that manner of death which would be leaſt hydeous, (being of it ſelf full enough of horrour) yet nevertheleſs, to conform himſelf to the will of his heavenly Father, and to confound our delicacies, he would needs leave his life by the moſt dolorous and ignominious, which was to be found among all the deaths of the whole world. The Croſs among the Gentiles, was a puniſhment for ſlaves, and the moſt deſperate perſons of the whole world. The Croſs amongſt the Hebrews was accurſed: It was the ordinary curſe which the moſt uncapable and moſt malicious mouthes did pronounce againſt their greateſt enemies. The death of a crucified man, was the moſt continual, languiſhing, and tearing of a ſoul from the body, with moſt exceſſive violence and agony. And yet the Eternal Wiſdom choſe this kind of puniſhment, and drank all the ſorrows of a cup ſo bitter. He ſhould have died upon ſome Trophey, and breathed out his laſt amongſt flowers, and left his ſoul in a moment: and if he muſt needs have felt death, to have had the leaſt ſenſe of it that might be. But he would trie the rigour of all greateſt ſufferings: he would fall to the very bottom of diſhonour: and (having ever ſpared from himſelf all the pleaſures of this life) to make his death compleat, he would ſpare none of thoſe infinite dolours. The devout Simon of Caſſia asketh our Saviour, going toward Mount Calvarie, ſaying, O Lord, whither go you with the extream weight of this dry, and barren piece of wood? Whither do you carry it, and why? Where do you mean to ſet it? Upon mount Calvary? That place is moſt wild & ſtony: how will you plant it? Who ſhall water it? Jeſus anſwers, I bear upon my ſhoulders a piece of wood, which muſt conquer him, who muſt make a far greater conqueſt by the ſame piece of wood: I carry it to mount Calvarie, to plant it by my death, and water it with my bloud. This wood which I bear, muſt bear me, to bear the ſalvation of all the world, and to draw all after me. And then (O faithfull ſoul) wilt not thou ſuffer ſome confuſion, at thine own delicacies? to be ſo fearfull of death by an ordinary diſeaſe, in a doun-bed, amongſt ſuch neceſſary ſervices, ſuch favourable helps, conſolations and kindneſſes of friends ſo ſenſible of thy condition? We bemoan and complain our ſelves of heat, cold, diſtaſte, of diſquiet, of grief: Let us allow ſome of this to Nature; yet muſt it be confeſt, that we lament our ſelves very much: becauſe we have never known how we ſhould lament a Jeſus Chriſt crucified. Let us die as it ſhall pleaſe the Divine Providence: If death come when we are old, it is a hayen: If in youth, it is a direct benefit antedated: If by ſickneſs, it is the nature of our bodies: If by external violence, it is yet always the decree of Heaven. It is no matter how many deaths there are, we are ſure there can be but one for us.

2. Conſider further, the ſecond condition of a good death, which conſiſts in the forſaking of all creatures, and you ſhall find it moſt punctually obſerved by our Saviour at the time of his death. Ferrara, a great Divine, who hath written a book of the hidden Word, toucheth twelve things abandoned by our Saviour.

1. His apparrel, leaving himſelf naked.
2. The marks of his dignitie.
3. The Colledge of his Apoſtles.
4. The ſweetneſs of all comfort.
5. His own proper will.
6. The authority of virtues.
7. The power of Angels.
8. The perfect joys of his ſoul.
9. The proper clarity of his body.
10. The honors due to him.
11. His own skin.
12. All his bloud.

Now, do but conſider his abandoning the principal of thoſe things, how bitter it was. Firſt, the abandoning of neareſt and moſt faithfull friends, is able to afflict any heart: Behold him forſaken by all his ſo well-beloved Diſciples, of whom he had made choice (amongſt all mortal men) to be the depoſitaries of his doctrine, of his life, of his bloud. If Judas be at the myſtery of his Paſſion, it is to betray him. If S. Peter be there aſſiſting, it is to deny him: If his ſorrowfull mother ſtand at the foot of the Croſs, it is to increaſe the grief of her Son; and after he had been ſo ill handled by his cruel executioners, to crucifie him again by the hands of Love. The couragious Mother, to triumph over her ſelf by a magnanimous conſtancy, was preſent at the execution of her dear Son. She fixed her eyes upon all his wounds, to engrave them deep in her heart. She opened her ſoul wide, to receive that ſharp piercing ſword, with which ſhe was threatened by that venerable old Simeon at her Purification: And Jeſus, who ſaw her ſo afflicted for his ſake, felt himſelf doubly crucified upon the wood of the Croſs, and the heart of his dear Mother. We know it by experience, that when we love one tenderly, his afflictions and diſgraces will trouble us more than our own, becauſe he living in us by an affectionate life, we live in him by a life of reaſon and election. Jeſus lived and repoſed in the heart of his bleſſed Mother, as upon a Throne of love, and as within a Paradiſe of his moſt holy delights. This heart was before as a bed covered with flowers: But this ſame heart (on the day of his Paſſion) became like a ſcaffold hanged with mourning, whereupon our Saviour entered, to be tormented and crucified upon the croſs of love, which was the Croſs of his Mother. This admirable Merchant, who deſcended from Heaven to accompliſh the buſineſs of all Ages; (who took upon him our miſeries, to give us felicities) was plunged within a ſea of bloud; and in this ſo precious ſhipwrack, there remained one onely ineſtimable pearl, (which was his divine Mother) and yet he abandons her, and gives her into the hand of his Diſciple. After he had forſaken thoſe neareſt to him, ſee what he does with his body; Jeſus did ſo abandon it (a little before his death) that not being content onely to deliver it as a prey to ſorrow, but he ſuffered it to be expoſed naked, to the view of the world. And amongſt his ſharpeſt dolours, (after he had been refuſed the drink which they gave to malefactours, to ſtrengthen them in their torments) he took for himſelf vinegar and gall. O what a ſpectacle was it to ſee a body torn in pieces, which reſted it ſelf upon its own wounds, which was dying every moment, but could not die, becauſe that life diſtilled by drops? What Martyr did ever endure, in a body ſo ſenſible and delicate, having an imagination ſo lively, and in ſuch piercing dolours, lours, mixt with so few comforts? And what Martyr did suffer for all the sins of the whole world, as he did, proportioning his torments according to the fruits which were to proceed from his Cross? Perhaps, O faithfull soul, thou lookest for a mans body in thy Jesus, but thou findest nothing but the appearance of one, crusted over with gore bloud: Thou seekest for limbs, and findest nothing but wounds: Thou lookest for a Jesus, which appeared glorious upon Mount Tabor, as upon a Throne of Majestie, with all the Ensigns of his Glory, and thou findest onely a skin all bloudy, fastened to a Cross between two thieves. And if the consideration of this cannot bring drops of bloud from thy heart, it must be more insensible than a diamond.

3. To conclude, observe the third quality of a good death, which will declare it self by the exercise of great and heroick virtues. Consider that incomparable mildness which hath astonished all Ages, hath encouraged all virtues, hath condemned all revenges, hath instructed all Schools, and crowned all good actions: He was raised upon the Cross, when his dolours were most sharp and piercing; when his wounds did open on all sides, when his precious bloud shed upon the earth, and moistened it in great abundance; when he saw his poor clothes torn in pieces, and yet bloudy in the hands of those who crucified him. He considered the extream malice of that cruel people, how those which could not wound him with iron, pierced him with the points of their accursed tongues. He could quickly have made fire come down from Heaven upon those rebellious heads. And yet forgetting all his pains to remember his mercies, he opened his mouth, and the first word he spake, was in favour of his enemies, to negotiate their reconciliation, before his soul departed. The learned Cardinal Hugues admiring this excessive charity of our Saviour toward his enemies, applies excellent well that which is spoken of the Sun in Ecclesiasticus. He brings news to all the world at his rising, and at noon day he burns the earth, and heats those furnaces of Nature, which make it produce all her feats.

So Jesus the Sun of the intelligible world, did manifest himself at his Nativity, as in the morning. But the Cross was his bed at noon, from whence came those burning streams of Love, which enflame the hearts of all blessed persons, who are like furnaces of that eternal fire, which burns in holy Sion.

On the other part, admire that great magnanimity which held him so long upon the Cross, as upon a throne of honour and power; when he bestowed Paradise upon a man that was his companion in suffering. I cannot tell whether in this action we should more admire the good fortune of the good thief, or the greatness of Jesus. The happiness of the good thief, who is drawn for a cut-throat to prison; from prison to the Judgement-hall, from thence to the Cross, and thence goes to Paradise, without needing any other gate, but the heart of Jesus.

On the other side, what can be more admirable than to see a man crucified, to do that act, which must be performed by the living God, when the world shall end? To save some, to make others reprobate, and to judge from the height of his Cross, as if he sate upon the chiefest throne of all Monarchs.

But we must needs affirm, that the virtue of patience in this, holds a chief place, and teaches very admirable lessons. He endures the torments of body, and the pains of spirit, in all the faculties of his soul, in all the parts of his virgin flesh; and by the cruelty and multiplicity of his wounds, they all become one onely wound, from the sole of his foot, to the top of his head.

His delicate body suffers most innocently, and all, by most ingrate and hypocritical persons, who would colour their vengeance with an apparance of holiness. He suffers without any comfort at all, and (which is more) without bemoaning himself; he suffers whatsoever they would, or could lay upon him, to the very last gasp of his life. Heaven wears mourning upon the Cross, all the Citizens of Heaven weep over his torments, the earth quakes, stones rend themselves, Sepulchers open; the dead arise: Onely Jesus dies unmoveable upon this throne of patience.

To conclude, who would not be astonished at the tranquility of his spirit, and amongst those great convulsions of the world, which moved round about the Cross, amongst such bloudy dolours, insolent cries, and insupportable blasphemies, how he remained upon the Cross, as in a Sanctuary, at the foot of an Altar, bleeding, weeping, and praying, to mingle his prayers with his bloud and tears. I do now understand why the Wiseman said, He planted Isles within the Abyss, since that in so great a Gulf of afflictions, he shewed such a serenity of spirit; thereby making a Paradise for his Father (amongst so great pains) by the sweet perfume of his virtues. After he had prayed for his enemies, given a promise of Paradise to the good thief, and recommended his Mother to his Disciple, he shut up his eyes from all humane things, entertaining himself onely with prayers and sighs to his Heavenly Father. O that at the time of our deaths, we could imitate the death of Jesus, and then we should be sure to find the streams of life.

Aspirations.

O Spectacles of horrour, but Abyss of goodness and mercy. I feel my heart divided by horrour, pitie, hate, love, execration, and adoration. But my admiration being ravished, carries me beyond my self. Is this then that bloudy sacrifice which hath been expected from all Ages? This hidden mystery, this profound knowledge of the Cross; this dolorous Jesus, which makes the honourable amends between Heaven and earth, to the eternal Father, for expiation of the sins of humane kind.

Alas, poor Lord, thou hadst but one life, and I see a thousand instruments of death, which have taken it away. Was there need of opening so many bloudy doors, to let out thine innocent soul? Could it not part from thy body without making (on all sides) so many wounds? which after they have served for the objects of mens cruelty, serve now for those of thy mercy? O my Jesus, I know not to whom I speak, for I do no more know thee in the state thou now art; or if I do, it is onely by thy miseries, because they are so excessive, that there was need of a God to suffer what thou hast endured. I look upon thy disfigured countenance, to find some part of thy resemblance, and yet can find none but that of thy love. Alas, O beautifull head, which dost carry all the glory of the highest Heaven, divide with me this dolorous Crown of Thorns; they were my sins which sowed them, and it is thy pleasure that thine innocency should mow them. Give me, O Sacred mouth, give me that Gall which I see upon thy lips: suffer me to sprinkle all my pleasures with it, since after a long continuance, it did shut up and conclude all thy dolours. Give me, O Sacred hands, and adored feet, the Nails which have pierced you: love binds you fast enough to the Cross without them. But do thou, O Lord, hold me fast to thy self, by the chain of thine immensity.

O Lance, cruel Lance, Why didst thou open that most precious side? Thou didst think perhaps to find there the Sons life, and yet thou foundest nothing but the Mothers heart. But without so much as thinking what thou didst, in playing the murderer, thou hast made a Sepulcher, wherein I will from henceforth bury my soul. When I behold these wounds of my dear Saviour, I do acknowledge the strokes of my own hand; I will therefore likewise engrave there my my repentance: I will write my conversion with an eternal Character. And if I must live, I will never breathe any other life, but that onely which shall be produced from the death of my Jesus crucified.

The Gospel for Easter-day. S. Mark 16.

AND when the Sabbath was past, Mary Magdalene, and Mary of James, and Salome brought spices, that coming, they might anoint Jesus. And very early the first of the Sabbaths, they come to the Monument: the Sun being now risen. And they say one to another, who shall roll us back the stone from the door of the Monument? And looking, they saw the stone rolled back, For it was very great. And entering into the Monument, they saw a young man sitting on the right hand, covered with a white Robe: and they were astonied. Who saith to them, Be not dismayed, you seek Jesus of Nazareth that was crucified: he is risen, he is not here, behold the place where they laid him. But go, tell his Disciples, and Peter, that he goeth before you into Galilee: there you shall see him, as he told you.

Moralities.

1. THE Sepulcher of Jesus becomes a fountain of life, which carries in power, all the glories of the highest Heaven. Our Saviour riseth from thence, as day out of the East; and appears as triumphant in the ornaments of his beauties, as he had been humbled by the excess of his mercies. The rage of the Jews looseth here its power, death his sting, Satan his kingdom, the Tomb his corruption, and hell his conquest. Mortality is destroyed, life is illuminated; all is drowned in one day of glory, which comes from the glorious light of our Redeemer. It is now (saith Tertullian) that he is revested with his Robe of Honour, and is acknowledged as the eternal Priest for all eternity. It is now (saith S. Gregory Nazianzen) that he re-assembles humane kind (which was scattered so many years by the sin of one man) and placeth it between the arms of his Divinity. This is the Master-piece of his profound humility; and I dare boldly affirm (saith S. Ambrose) that God had lost the whole world, if this Sacred Virtue, which he made so clearly shine in his beloved Son, had not put him into possession of his Conquests. We should all languish after this Triumphant state of the Resurrection, which will make an end of all our pains, and make our Crowns everlasting.

2. Let us love our Jesus as the Maries did, that, with them, we may be honoured with his visits. Their love is indefatigable, couragious and insatiable. They had all the day walkt round about the Judgement-Hall, Mount Calvary, the Cross, and the Sepulcher. They were not wearied with all that: And night had no sleep to shut up their eyes. They forsook the Image of death, which is sleep, to find death it self, and never looked after any bed, except the Sepulcher of their Master; They travel amongst darkness, pikes, launces, the affrights of Arms, and of the night, nothing makes them afraid. If there appear a difficulty to remove the stones, love gives them arms. They spare nothing for their Master and Saviour: They are above Nicodemus and Joseph, they have more exquisite perfumes, for they are ready to melt and distil their hearts upon the Tomb of their Master. O faithfull lovers, seek no more for the living amongst the dead: That cannot die for love, which is the root of life.

3. The Angel in form of a young man (covered with a white Robe) shews us, that all is young and white in immortality. The Resurrection hath no old age; it is an age, which can neither grow, nor diminish. These holy Maries enter alive into the sepulcher, where they thought to find death, but they learn news of the chiefest of lives. Their faith is there confirmed, their piety satisfied, their promises assured, and their love receives consolation.

Aspirations.

I Do not this day look toward the East, O my Jesus, I consider the Sepulcher, it is from thence this fair Sun is risen. O that thou appearest amiable, dear Spouse of my soul. Thy head, which was covered with thorns, is now crowned with a Diadem of Stars, and Lights, and all the glory of the highest Heaven rests upon it. Thine eyes, which were eclipsed in bloud, have enlightened them with fires and delicious brightness, which melt my heart. Thy feet and hands, so far as I can see, are enamel'd with Rubies, which, after they have been the objects of mens cruelty, are now become eternal marks of thy bounty. O Jesus, no more my wounded, but my glorified Jesus, where am I? What do I? I see, I flie, I swound, I die, I revive my self with thee. I do beseech thee, my most Sacred Jesus, by the most triumphant of thy glories, let me no more fall into the image of death, nor into those appetites of smoke and earth, which have so many times buried the light of my soul. What have I to do with the illusions of this world? I am for Heaven, for Glory, and for the Resurrection, which I will now make bud out of my thoughts, that I may hereafter possess them with a full fruition.

The Gospel upon Munday in Easter-week, S. Luke the 24.

AND behold, two of them went the same day into a Town, which was the space of sixty furlongs from Jerusalem, named Emmaus. And they talked betwixt themselves of all those things that had chanced. And it came to pass, while they talked and reasoned with themselves, Jesus also himself approching, went with them, but their eyes were held, that they might not know him. And he said to them, What are these communications that you confer one with another walking, and are sad? And one, whose name was Cleophas, answering, said to him, Art thou onely a stranger in Jerusalem, and hast not known the things that have been done in it these dayes? To whom he said, What things? And they said, Concerning Jesus of Nazareth, who was a man, a Prophet, mighty in work and word before God and all the people. And how our chief Priests and Princes delivered him into condemnation of death, and crucified him. But we hoped that it was he that should redeem Israel: And now besides all this, to day is the third day since these things were done. But certain women also of ours made us afraid; who, before it was light, were at the Monument, and not finding his body, came, saying, That they saw a vision also of Angels, who say that he is alive. And certain men of ours went to the Monument; and they found it so as the women said, but him they found not.

And he said to them, O foolish, and slow of heart, to believe in all things which the Prophets have spoken. Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and so enter into his glory? And beginning from Moses and all the Prophets, he did interpret to them in all the Scriptures, the things that were concerning him. And they drew nigh to the Town whither they went; and he made semblance to go further. And they forced him, saying, Tarry with us, because it is toward night, and the day now far spent, and he went in with them. And it came to pass, while he sate at the table with them, he took bread, and blessed, and brake, and did reach to them. And their eyes were opened, and they knew him: and he vanished out of their sight. And they said one to the other, Was not our heart burning in us whiles he spake in the way, and opened unto us the Scriptures? And rising up the same hour, they went back into Jerusalem, and they found the eleven gathered together, and those that were with them, saying, That our Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon. And they told the things that were done in the way: and how they knew him in the breaking of bread.

Moralities.

1. IT is a strange thing, that God is always with us, and we are so little with him. We have our being, our moving, our life from him: he carries us in his arms, he keeps us as a nurse doth her dear child; and yet all this while we scarce know what he is, and use him so often as a stranger. He is in our being, and yet we keep him far from our heart, as a dead man, who is quite forgotten. And Enoch walked with him, and for that he was taken from the conversation of men, and reserved for Paradise. To speak truth, our soul should always be languishing after her Jesus, and count it a kind of Adultery to be separated from him, so much as by thought. Let us learn a little to talk with him; we commonly have that in our tongue, which we keep in our heart. Let us sweeten the sadness of our pilgrimage, by the contemplation of his beauties. Let us look upon him as God and man; the God of gods, the Man of men; our great Saviour and Prophet, powerfull both in word and work; for if his word be thunder, his life is a lightening. He hath been here doing good to all the world, and suffering hurt from all the world; doing good without reward, and enduring evil without impatience. We all pass here as Torrents into valleys; the onely question is of our passing well: whether we look on worldly goods as on waters which pass under a bridge, and as upon the furniture of an Inn which is none of ours. If we be embarked in the Vessel of life, let us not amuse our selves to gather Cockles upon the shore; but so, that we may always have our eyes fixt upon Paradise.

2. Two things do hinder those Pilgrims from knowing Jesus as they should. The one is, their eyes are dazeled; and the other is, the little account they make of the Cross, which drives them into the mistrust of the Resurrection. And this is it which crosseth us all our life, and so oft diverts us from the point of our happiness. Our eyes are dazeled with false lights of the world, they are darkened with so many mists and vapours of our own appetites and passions, that we cannot see the goods of heaven in the brightest of their day. Worldly chains have a certain effective vigour and pleasure, which is onely painted, but they have a most certain sorrow, and a most uncertain contentment: They have a painful labour, and a timorous rest: A possession full of misery, and void of all beatitude. If we had our eyes well opened, to penetrate and see what it is, we should then say of all the most ravishing objects of the world; How senseless was I when I courted you? O deceitfull world, thou didst appear great to me, when I saw thee not as thou art: But so soon as I did see thee rightly, I did then cease to see thee; for thou wast no more to me but just nothing. We run in full career after all that pleaseth our sense, and the Cross, which is so much preached to us, is much more upon our Altars, than in our hearts. We will not know, that the throne of Mount Calvarie, is the path-way to Heaven; and as this truth wanders from our hearts, Jesus departs from our eyes. Let us at least pray Jesus to stay with us, for it is late in our hearts, and the night is far advanced by our want of true light. We shal not know Jesus by discourse, but by feeding him in the persons of his poor, since he gives the continual nourishment of his body.

Aspirations.

O Onely Pilgrim of the world, and first dweller in the heart of thy heavenly Father, what a pilgrimage hast thou made, descending from Heaven to earth, and yet without forsaking Heaven? Thou hast markt thy steps by thy conquests: made visible thy way by thine own light, thou hast watered it with thy precious bloud, and paved it with thy wounds. O what a goodly thing it is to walk with thee, when thou openest thy sacred mouth, as the opening of a temple, to discover the beauties and mysteries of it. O that is most pleasing to understand that mouth, which distils so much honey through lips of Roses. But wherefore (My good Lord) art thou pleased to hide thy self from a soul which languishes after thee? Take away the vail from mine eyes, and suffer thy self to be seen in the vesture of thy heavenly beauties. If I must bear the Cross, and pass by the throne of Mount Calvarie, to come to Heaven, I most humbly submit to thy divine pleasure, that I may possess all that thou art.

The Gospel upon Tuesday in Easter week, S. Luke the 24.

AND whiles they spake these things, Jesus stood in the midst of them, and he saith to them, Peace be to you, It is I, fear not. But they being troubled and frighted, imagined they saw a Spirit. And he saith to them, Why are you troubled, and cogitations arise in your hearts? See my hands and feet, that it is I my self, handle, and see: for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as you see me to have. And when he had said this, he shewed them his hands and feet. But they yet not believing, and marvelling for joy, he said, Have you here any thing to be eaten? But they offered him a piece of fish broiled, and a honey-comb. And when he had eaten before them, taking the remains, he gave to them. And he said to them, These are the words which I spake to you when I was yet with you, that all things must needs be fulfilled, which are written in the Law of Moses, and the Prophets, and the Psalms, of me. Then he opened their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures. And he said to them, That so it is written, and so it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise again from the dead the third day, and penance to be preached in his Name, and remission of sins unto all Nations.

Moralities.

1. WE think sometimes that Jesus is far from us, when he is in the midst of our heart: he watches over us, and stretches out his divine hands for our protection. Let us live always as if we were actually in his presence, before his eyes, and in his bosom. An ancient Tradition doth observe, that after our Lords Ascension, the Apostles did never eat together, but they left the first napkin, for their good Master, conceiving, that according to his promise, he was always with them: Let us accustom our selves to this exercise of Gods presence: It is a happy necessity to make us do well, to believe and apprehend that our Judge is always present. If respect make him formidable, love will teach us, that he is the Father of all sweetness. There can be no greater comfort in this world, than to be present in heart and body with that which we love beast.

2. Jesus is taken by his Apostles for a Spirit, because after the Resurrection he pierced the walls, and appeared suddenly as Spirits do. S. Paul also saith, in the second to the Corinthians, that now we do no more know Christ according to the flesh, that is to say, by the passions of a mortal body, as S. Epiphanius doth doth expound it. We muſt make little uſe of our bodies, to converſe with our Jeſus, who hath taken upon him the rare qualities of a Spirit. We muſt raiſe our ſelves above our ſenſes, when we go to the Father of light, and the Creatour of ſenſe. He teaches us the life of Spirits, and the commerce of Angels, and makes eſſayes of our immortality, by a body now immortal. Why are we ſo tied to our ſenſe, and glued to the earth? Muſt we ſuffer our ſelves to enter into a kingdom of death, when we are told of the reſurrection of him, who is the Authour of all lives?

3. Admire the condeſcending and bounties of our Lord to his dear Diſciples. He that was entered into the kingdom of ſpirits, and immortal converſation, ſuffers his feet and hands to be touched, to prove in him the reality of a true body. He eats in preſence of his Apoſtles, though he was not in more eſtate to digeſt meat, than the Sun is to digeſt vapours. He did no more nouriſh himſelf with our corruptible meats, than the Stars do by the vapours of the earth. And yet he took them to confirm our belief, and to make us familiar with him. It is the act of great and generous ſpirits to abaſe themſelves, and condeſcend to their inferiours. So David being anointed King, and inſpired as a Prophet, doth not ſhew his perſon terrible in the height of his great glory, but ſtill retained the mildneſs of a ſhepheard. So Jeſus, the true Son of David (by his condeſcending to us) hath conſecrated a certain degree, whereby we may aſcend to Heaven. Are not we aſhamed that we have ſo little humility or reſpect to our inferiours, but are always ſo full of our ſelves; ſince our Lord, ſitting in his Throne of glory and majeſty, doth yet abaſe himſelf to the actions of our mortal life? Let it be ſeen by our hands whether we be reſuſcitated, by doing good works, and giving liberal alms: Let it appear by our feet, that they follow the paths of the moſt holy perſons. Let it be ſeen by our nouriſhment (which ſhould be moſt of honey) that is, of that celeſtial ſweetneſs which is extracted from prayer. And if we ſeem to refuſe fiſh, let us at leaſt remain in the element of piety, as fiſh is in water.

Aſpirations.

THy love is moſt tender, and thy cares moſt generous (O mild Saviour.) Amongſt all the torrents of thy Paſſion, thou haſt not taſted the waters of forgetfulneſs. Thou returneſt to thy children, as a Nightingale to her little neſt. Thou doſt comfort them with thy viſits, and makeſt them familiar with thy glorious life. Thou eateſt of a honey-comb by juſt right, having firſt taſted the bitter gall of that unmercifull Croſs. It is thus, that our ſorrows ſhould be turned into ſweets. Thou muſt always be moſt welcome to me in my troubles, for I know well, that thou onely canſt pacifie, and give them remedy. I will govern my ſelf toward thee, as to the fire: too much near familiarity will burn us; and the want of it will let us freeze: I will eat honey with thee in the bleſſed Sacrament; I know that many there do chew, but few receive thee worthily. Make me (O Lord) I beſeech thee, capable of thoſe which here on earth ſhall be the true Antepaſts to our future glory.

The Goſpel upon Low-Sunday, S. John the 20.

THerefore when it was late that day, the firſt of the Sabbaths, and the doors were ſhut where the Diſciples were gathered together for fear of the Jews, Jeſus came and ſtood in the midſt, and ſaith to them, Peace be to you. And when he had ſaid this, he ſhewed them his hands and ſide. The Diſciples therefore were glad when they ſaw our Lord. He ſaid therefore to them again, Peace be to you. As my Father hath ſent me, I alſo do ſend you. When he had ſaid this, he breathed upon them, and he ſaid to them, Receive ye the Holy Ghoſt; Whoſe ſins you ſhall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whoſe you ſhall retain, they are retained. But Thomas, one of the twelve, who is called Didymus, was not with them when Jeſus came: the other Diſciples therefore ſaid to him, We have ſeen our Lord. But he ſaid to them, Unleſs I ſee in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the place of the nails, and put my hand into his ſide, I will not believe.

And after eight days, again his Diſciples were within, and Thomas with them. Jeſus cometh, the doors being ſhut, and ſtood in the midſt, and ſaid, Peace be to you. Then he ſaith to Thomas, Put in thy finger hither, and ſee my hands; and bring hither thy hand, and put it into my ſide, and be not incredulous, but faithfull. Thomas anſwered and ſaid to him, My Lord and my God: Jeſus ſaith to him, Becauſe thou haſt ſeen me, Thomas, thou haſt believed: Bleſſed are they that have not ſeen, and have believed.

Moralities.

1. JEſus the Father of all bleſſed harmonies (after ſo many combats) makes a general peace in all nature. He pacifieth Limbo, taking the holy Fathers out of darkneſs, to enjoy an eternal light, and ſending the damned to the bottom of hell. He pacifieth the earth, making it from thenceforth to breathe the air of his mercies. He pacifieth his Apoſtles, by delivering them from that profound ſadneſs, which they conceived by the imaginary loſs of their dear Maſter. He pacifieth Heaven, by ſweetening the ſharpneſs of his Heavenly Father, quenching by his wounds, the fire which was kindled of his juſt anger. Every thing ſmileth upon this great Peace-maker: Nature leaveth her mourning, and putteth on robes of cheatfulneſs, to congratulate with him his great and admirable conqueſts. It is in him that the Heavenly Father (by a ſingular delight) hath poured out the fullneſs of all Graces, to make us an eternal dwelling, and to reconcile all in him, and by him; pacifying by his bloud from the Croſs. all that is upon earth, and in Heaven. This is our Joſhua, of whom the Scripture ſpeaketh, that he clears all differences, and appeaſeth all battels. No ſtroke of any hammer or other iron, was heard at the building of Solomon's Temple; and behold the Church (which is the Temple of the living God) doth edifie ſouls with a marvellous tranquilitie.

2. The Sun is not ſo well ſet forth by his beams, as our Saviour is magnificently adorned, with his wounds. Thoſe are the characters which he hath engraved upon his fleſh, after a hundred ingenious faſhions. The Ladies count their pearls and diamonds, but our Saviour keeps his wounds, in the higheſt attire of his Magnificences. It is from thence, that the beauty of his body, taketh a new ſtate of glory, and our faith in the reſurrection is confirmed: that the good fill themſelves with hope, miſcreants with terrour, and Martyrs find wherewith to enflame their courage. Theſe divine wounds open themſelves as ſo many mouthes, to plead our cauſe before the Celeſtial Father. Our Saviour Jeſus never ſpake better for us, than by the voice of his preciousBloud. Great inquiry hath been made for thoſe mountains of myrrh and frankincenſe, which Solomon promiſeth in the Canticles, but now we have found them in the wounds of Jeſus. It is from thence that there cometh forth a million of ſanctified exhalations of ſweetneſs, of peace and propitiation, as from an eternal Sanctuary. A man may ſay they are like the Carbuncle, which melteth the wax upon which it is imprinted, for they melt our hearts by a moſt profitable impreſſion. At this ſight the Eternal Father calms his countenance, and the ſword of his Juſtice returneth into the ſheath. Shall not we be worthy of all miſeries, if we do not arm theſe wounds againſt us, which are ſo effectual in our behalf? And if this bloud of our Abel (after it hath reconciled his cruel executioners) ſhould find juſt matter to condemn us for our ingratitudes? John the Second, King of Portugal, had made a ſacred vow, never to refuſe any thing which ſhould be asked of him in the virtue of our Saviour's wounds; which made him give all his ſilver veſſel to a poor gentleman, that had found out the word. And why ſhould not we give our ſelves to God, who both buyeth and requireth us by the wounds of Jeſus?

3. Jeſus inſpireth the ſacred breath of his mouth upon the Apoſtles, as upon the firſt fruits of Chriſtianity: to repair the firſt breath, and reſpiration of lives, which the Authour of our race did ſo miſerably loſe. If we can obtain a part of this, we ſhall be like the wheels of Ezechiels myſterious chariot, which are filled with the ſpirit of life. That great Divine called Matthias Vienna, ſaid, That light was the ſubſtance of colours, and the ſpirit of Jeſus is the ſame of all our virtues. If we live of his fleſh, there is great reaſon we ſhould be animated by his Spirit. Happy a thouſand times are they, who are poſſeſſed with the the Spirit of Jeſus, which is to their ſpirit as the apple of the eye. S. Thomas was deprived of this amorous communication, by reaſon of his incredulitie. He would ſee with his eyes, and feel with his hands, that which ſhould rather be comprehended by faith: which is, an eye bleſſedly blind: which knoweth all within its own blindneſs, and is alſo a hand, which remaining on earth, goeth to find God in Heaven.

Aſpirations.

GReat Peace-maker of the world, who by the effuſion of thy precious bloud, haſt pacified the wars of fourty ages, which went before thy death. This word of peace hath coſt thee many battels, many ſweats and labours, to cement this agreement of Heaven and earth, of ſence and reaſon, of God and man. Behold thou art at this preſent like the Dove of Noah's Ark, thou haſt eſcaped a great deluge of paſſions, and many torrents of dolours, thrown head-long one upon another. Thou bringeſt us the green Olive branch, to be the mark of thy eternal alliances. What? Shall my ſoul be ſo audacious and diſordered, as to talk to thee of war, when thou ſpeakeſt to her of peace? To offer thee a weapon, when thou offereſt her the Articles of her reconciliation, ſigned with thy precious bloud? Oh, what earth could open wide enough her boſom to ſwallow me, if I ſhould live like a little Abiram, with a hand armed againſt Heaven, which pours out for me nothing but flowers and roſes? Reign (O my ſweet Saviour) within all the conquered powers of my ſoul, and within my heart as a conqueſt which thou haſt gotten by ſo many titles. I will ſwear upon thy wounds, which after they have been the monuments of thy fidelity, ſhall be the adored Altars of my vows and ſacrifices. I will promiſe thereupon, an inviolable fidelity to thy ſervice. I will live no more but for thee, ſince thou haſt killed my death in thy life, and makeſt my life flouriſh within thy triumphant Reſurrection.

FINIS.

AN ALPHABETICAL TABLE

Setting down the moſt obſervable Matters contained in the firſt three TOMES of the HOLY COURT.

A

Adviſe. Fol. 38
Abdelemin. 7
Abraham the Hermit, 86
Abſtinence defined. 468
The Actions of men muſt be directed to one aſſured Butt. 67
Apprehenſion of Affronts. 47
Retreat into the Conſcience in Affronts, is a good remedy againſt them. 58
Aglae a noble Dame. 379
She is a worldly Widow. ibid.
She is in love. ibid.
Her admirable Converſion. 380
Her devotion in enquiry after Martyrs. ibid.
Her ſpeech to Boniface her Steward. ibid.
Agrippa Grand-child of Herod, 32
His flatterie. ibid.
Alexander ſon of Mariamne impriſoned. 130
Alms the works of God. 9
Ambition an itch. 56
It is a forreign vice. ibid.
It is the life of a ſlave. 57
The Ambitious are miſerable. ibid.
Extream diſaſter of an Ambitious man. ib.
Ambitious men travel for Rachel and find Leah. 58
Ambition was the God of Antiochus. 349
S. Ambroſe 175
His Calling, ib.
His Election, 176
His rare endowments, 179
His government. ib.
He cheriſheth the Religious, 181
He took away ſuperſtitions and exceſſes. ib.
His puritie of invention, ib.
His Oration againſt Symmachus, 184
He refuteth Symmachus his ſtrongeſt arguments. ib.
His anſwer concerning the dearth, 186
His greatneſs in the Converſion of S. Auguſtine. 188
He ſpeaketh unto the two ſouls of his Pupils. 211
His brave ſpeech to Theodoſius. 214
The majeſtie of S. Ambroſe. 205
His prudence and charitie, 209
He is perſecuted by Juſtina. 206
Reſolution of S. Ambroſe. 207
His death. 215
Ammon plotteth inceſt with his ſiſter. 107
He is counſelled to this ſin by Joadab. ib.
He diſſembleth ſickneſs. ib.
Thamars advile to him. ib.
He deſpiſeth his diſhonoured ſiſter. ib.
He is ſlain. 108
Anaſtatius fearing thunder, is ſlain by a Thunder bolt. 288
Angelical Ænigma's. 56
Why bad Angels puniſhed without mercy. 23
Antipater his cunningneſs in geting the kingdom of Judea. 115
He calumniateth his brothers. 130
He is thrown from the top of the wheel. 132
His Conſpiracy is diſcovered. 133
His wofull event. ib.
His Accuſation before his Father. ib.
His death. 135
Wicked Antiochus puniſhed. 348
He is delivered Hoſtage to the Romans. 347
His manners, 393
He warreth againſt Ptalomey. ib.
The war between them is ended by a marriage. ib.
Antonie's generous act. 352
A trick of an Ape. 33
Apes in the Court of Salomon. 36
A pretty tale of an Ape. ib.
Intellectual Appetite faulty. 37
Appetite of man infinite. 436
Apple of diſcord. 445
Arbogaſtus. 219
Ariſtobulus taken priſoner by Pompey, and Jeruſalem becomes tributarie. 115
His pitifull death. 119
Arius, and his qualities. 251
Original of Arians: ib.
Their proceedings. ib.
Condemnation of Arius. 254
End of Arius. ib.
Arts tributarie to Great-men. 16
Aſtrologie, the vanity thereof. 89
Athanaſius. 254
Athenais her admirable adventure. 141
She pleadeth her cauſe before Pulcheria. 142
Her Converſion. ib.
She could not brook Pulcheria. 145
Audas deſtroyeth a Pyraum. 242
S. Auguſtine converted by S. Ambroſe. 288
His wit. ib.
His inclination. ib.
He ſtudied Judicial Aſtrologie. 289
His Religion. ib.
Curioſitie, Preſumption and Love, the three impediments in the converſion of S. Auguſtine. 290
The Oeconomy of God in the converſion of S. Auguſtine. 293
He is baptized by S. Ambroſe. 298

B

The Bat employeth her eyes to make her wings. 382
An excellent Act of regard the Cavalier. 227
Opinion concerning Beatitude. 435
The eſſential point of Beatitude is union with God. 437
Three acts of Beatitude. ib.
Three effects of Beatitude. 438
Excellency of Beatike ſcience. ib.
Beautie of beatike love, as it is compared to the weakneſs of worldly love. ib.
Beautie condemned by Idolaters. 9
Defence of Beautie as the gift of God. 10
Natural Beautie of men praiſed by Poets. ib.
Beautie an inſtrument of God. ib.
Beautie of our Saviour. ib.
Power of Beautie. 11
Beautie of Conſtantine. 15
Abuſe of Beautie damnable. ib.
Vanitie of Beautie. 93
Tyrannie of the Belly. 52
Bede, a Reverend Father of the Church. 274
Boetius his Nobilitie. 276
His eminent wiſdom and learning. 278
He was ſtiled the Father and Light of his Country. 287

His opinion of the providence of God. 295
His death. ibid.
Basilius his notable act. 5
Bonifacius martyred. 380

C

Calcula a great coffer. 47
The devils busied about Calumny. 46
From whence it proceedeth. 47
Horrour of Calumny. ibid.
Calumny plotted against the sons of Marianne. 128
Calumny of Fausta against her son Crispus. 244
Her rage turned into pitie. ibid.
Her Calumny discovered. ibid.
Her death. ibid.
Camerarius his observation concerning the Heron. 405
The excellency of a brave Captain. 217
The delight of Histories to praise Captains. 218
Singular commendation of Cato. 13
The praise of the strength and courage of Cato. ibid.
The Stone Ceraunia. 7
Charity excellently displayed. 2
Charity towards God and our neighbour defined. 469
Charity in Conversation defined. ibid.
Charity with the acts thereof. 91
An excellent passage of Charity. ibid.
Charls of Anjou is taken and put to death. 402
Charlemaign his goodness and indulgence. 403
Chastity defined. 468
Three sorts of Chastity, with the acts thereof. 85, 86
A royal act of Chastity in a Souldier. 230
S. Paul calleth Chastity Sanctification. 304
Excellent Instructions for Children. 343
Chrysaphius an heretical Eunuch projecteth ruin to Theodosius his Court. 147
He entangleth the Emperour and his Wife in the heresie of the Eutyches. 148
Christians Warfare delicate. 2
To do good and suffer wrong, the true Character of a Christian. 48
Virtue of the first Christians. 53
The happiness to be born a Christian. 339
Solitude of Christian Religion. ibid.
Clergy reformed. 149
Clotilda. 309
Her birth and education. ibid.
Clodoveus requireth her in marriage. ibid.
An Embassadour is dispatched to the King of Burgundie concerning the Marriage. 310
Her first Request to King Clodoveus her husband. 312
How she behaved her self in the Conversion of her husband. 313
She converteth her husband. 315
How Clodoveus behaved himself after Baptism. 316
Communion without preparation, what it is. 72
What ought to be done in the day of receiving the Communion. 73
Considerations for Communions. ibid.
Fruits of Communions. ibid.
General Confession of sin the beginning of spiritual life. 69
Practice of ordinary Confession. 70
Three sorts of Conscience from whence Impiety doth spring. 26
Horrible estate of a sinfull Conscience. 27
Brutish Conscience. ibid.
Curious Conscience. ibid.
Nothing so pleasing as the house of a good Conscience. 48
Constancy in Tribulation doth manifestly appear in the death of Sofia and Eleonora. 411
Constantia her exceeding Clemency to the Son of Charls of Anjou, being condemned to death. 403
Constantine's Law. 12
His greatness. 233
His Nobility. 235
His notable Moderation. ibid.
He was bred up in the Court of Diocletian. 237
His first battel against Lycinius. 242
His great Victory. 243
His first Marriage. 244
The beginning of his Conversion. 246
His absolute Conversion. ibid.
His Baptism. ibid.
The History of his Baptism, drawn from the acts of Saint Sylvester, is more easie piously to be believed, than effectually proved. 247
His Oration. ibid.
The great alteration of the world by his Oration and Example. 248
His Piety, Devotion, and Humility. 249
He made an Oration in the Assembly of Bishops. 253
His Successours. 259
Constantinople built. 254
His death. 274
Divers degrees of Contemplation. 384
Contrition, what it is. 71
Cross of Nature, what it is. 52
Honour of the Cross. 251
The Court full of Envie. 17
Comparison between a Courtier and a Religious man. 18
A Courtier frustrated of his hope, how he is afflicted. 352
Courage compared to the River Tygris. 13
Baseness of Courage in some Noble-men. 14
Crispus his death. 245
Curiosity, and the Description thereof. 188
The whole world an enemy of Curiosity. 405
Impious Curiosity pulls out both its eyes. 27
Dangerous Curiosity. 28

D

Pains of the Damned are eternal. 431
Three Reasons to prove the eternity of the Damned. ibid.
An excellent Conceit of Picus Mirandula concerning the punishment of the Damned. 432
Strange Narration of Palladius concerning the Damned. ibid.
Souls of the Damned tormented by their lights. ibid.
Daniel and his Companions bred at Court. 16
Daniel the Hermite having seen a Vision, went to Constantine, and spake to Eulogius. 364
David his remedy against a malevolent Tongue. 48
Day is precious. 94
Motives to pass the Day well. ibid.
Every Day a Table of Life. ibid.
To provide in the evening for the Day to come. 95
Three parts of the Day. ibid.
Five things to be practised in the Day. ibid.
Desperate Death. 24
Its Attendants. 66
Meditation of Death. 67
Death of the Just is sweet. 415
Quality of a good Death is the indifferency of time and manner. 416
Worldly irresolutions of Death. 417
The way how to be well provided for Death. 418
A good Death must have Union with God. 419
A notable Ænigma of Death. 436
Devotion defined. 467
That the great number of Devout men, should settle men in Devotion. 82
The adhering to creatures doth marre all in Devotion. ib.
Pretext of Devotion dangerous, illustrated by the Fowler. 203
Devotion subject to many illusions, and the reason why. 381
Gross and afflicting Devotion. 382
Three blemishes of anxious Devotion. ibid.
Quaint Devotion. 383
The pomp and practises of this Devotion. ibid.
Reasons of the nullity of this Devotion. 384
Transcendent Devotion. ibid.
Illusions of this Transcendent Devotion. 385
S. Lewis the true Table of Solid Devotion. 387
State of the Church under Diocletian. 234
His conditions. ibid.
He forsaketh the Empire. 235
Dissimulation reigneth every where. 394
Dissimulation doth ruin humane faith. 395
Dissimulation shamefull to the Authour of it. ibid.
Dissimulation doth debase a man. ibid.
The horrours and hatred of Dissimulation. 396

The troubles and miseries of Dissimulation. ibid.
The dreadfull Events of Dissemblers. ibid.
The power of the Divinity over Infidels. 346
Different opinion of the Divinity. 348
It is a sacrilege to make Divinity of proper Interest. 399
How abominable vicious Domesticks are. 12
Duels unlawfull. 14
A Duel is no act of Courage. ibid.
Who anciently entered into Duels. ibid.
There is want of Generosity in Duels. ibid.
Authors of Duels. 224
Courage of Duellers like to that of the possessed. 225
Dydimus his bold attempt. 86

E

EDucation, its force. 15
Defects of Education. ibid.
Moses educated in the Court. 16
Education of Children recommended by excellent passages of the holy Fathers. 17
Eleazar his Combat, 347
The Isle of Amber the felicity of Epicurus. 405
The Philosophie of Epicurus doth bear sway in the world. 404
The foundation of Episcopal life. 180
Epomina a rare example of Conjugal Piety. 306
Errours of the Time. 341
Eternity of nothing, first humiliation of man. 349
Eucharist the foundation of Paradise. 72
Greatness of the Eucharist. ibid.
Eusebius the Patron of Hereticks. 252
Eustatius his Oration at the opening of the Councel. 253
Evils generally proceed from ignorance, and from the want of the knowledge of God. 62
Evil alwayes beareth sorrow behind it, but not true penance. 66
Eudoxia mother of Theodosius. 138
Her humour. ibid.
Bishops treat with her. ibid.
Her Zeal. ibid.
She goeth into Palestine. 147
Her return is laboured by Chrysaphius. ibid.
She lived in the Holy Land in the Eutychian heresie. 153
Her Conversion. 155
Her worthy life and glorious death. ibid.
Remedies and reasons against Excess. 52
Indignity of Excess in apparel. ibid.
Necessity of Examen. 71
Six things in the Examen to employ the most perfect. ibid.
Ill Example the work of Antichrist. 22
Exemplar crimes deserve Exemplar punishments. 23
An Observation upon the Chariot of Ezechiel. 451

F

FAith, what it is, and the dignity thereof. 62
Its Object, and the manner of its working. ibid.
Touch-stone to know whether we have Faith. 63
Heroick acts of Faith. ibid.
How acts of Faith may be made easie. 64
What ought to be the Faith of good Communicants. 72
To be Faithfull to the King, one must be loyal to God. 236
To be Faithfull, is to be conformable to reason. 340
The great Providence of God in the establishment of Faith. ibid.
The repose which our Faith promiseth. 341
Constancy of Faith. 417
Fathers and Mothers compared to Ostriches. 16
Fantasies to gain honours. 25
Conclusions against Fatalitie. 36
Maxims of Fatalitie. 365
Favorinus his excellent Observations. 10
Excellency of Fidelity. 395
Flattery punished. 349
Flattery inebriateth Great-men from the Cradle. 46
Great Spirits, enemies to the Flesh. 405
Immoderate love of health, doth make a man become suppliant, and servile to the Flesh. 406
Plotinus a great enemy to his own Flesh. 405
Instance upon the weakness and miserie of the Flesh. ibid.
Hierom his Observation upon the Flower of Box. 406
A notable Fable of the Flie and Silk-worm. 43
Fortitude defined. 486
Fantasies of Ancients upon the Names of Fortune. 360
Fortune is in the power of Providence. ibid.
A Conclusion against those who curse Fortune. 362
Manners are changed with Fortune. 364

G

Aramant the Fountain. 301
God's hands, a golden bowl full of the Sea. 9
God named Obliging in the beginning of the World. 19
God, a great Thesis. 22
God is better known to us than our selves. 344
God, most easie to be known. ibid.
All things contribute to the knowledge of God. 345
God in this life handleth the wicked as the damned. 348
God is who he is. 349
Excellency of the Simplicity and Universality of God in comparison of the World. 350
Perfections of God. 351
God, his Goodness. 355, 367
An excellent similitude of God with the Ocean. 351
The God of Hosts besiegeth a Citie. 217
Diversity of Gods. 349
Gods pastime, what it is. 42
Why God admitted not the Ostrich and Swan into the number of Victims. ibid.
Knowledge of the Goodness, Justice, and Power of God. 356, 357
God governeth the world with two hands. 439
God will repleniſh us with himself. 437
Desperate desire of worldly Goods. 418
Gratian the son of Valentinian. 200
His excellent qualities. 201
Affectionate words of S. Ambrose unto him. ibid.
His zeal and virtue by the direction of S. Ambrose. ibid.
His admirable Charity. 202
Maximus rebell th against him. ibid.
His pitifull death. 204
Gratitude in the Law of God. 20
Excellent proofs of natural Gratitude. 19
Gratitude defined. 488
The acts of Gratitude. 90
Gratitude of the Hebrews. ibid.
Practise of S. Augustine, to encourage himself to Gratitude. 20
Greatness of God. 437
Greatness of an honest man. 48
Lives of Great-ones enlightened. 6
The great virtue of Great-ones. 7
Authority of Great-ones to strengthen Devotion. 8
Great-ones heretofore have perverted the world. 21
Great-ones that are vicious, draw on themselves horrible execrations of God. 23
Great-ones strangely punished. 24
Three sorts of Great ones do make Fortune. 25
True Devotion in Great-ones. 60
Humility of Great-ones. 92
A good Document for Great-ones. 139
Plague of Great-ones. 140
Great-ones are the flatterers of Gods. 349

H

HEart of man, what it is. 69
Hebrews horribly persecuted. 347
Heliogabalus, his wheel. 57
Hell defined. 432
How the fire of Hell burneth. 430
Helena the Beauty and grace of her time. 236
She is married to Constantius. ibid.
Her exceeding virtue. ibid.
Exceeding love of Constantius and Helena. ibid.
Effects of Heresie. 35
Herod depresseth the Royal Stock. 117
His deep Hypocrisie and Dissimulation. 120
He is accused for the death of Aristobulus. ibid.
His Apologie for himself full of craft. 121
His Oration against his Wife. 125
His fury after the death of Mariamne. 127

He advanceth Antipater his ſon, whom he had by Doris. 128
His horrible condition in his latter days. 134
Herod's fearfull maladie. 135
His notorious cruelty even in his extreameſt ſickneſs. ibid.
His miſerable death. ibid.
Hermingildus his retreat and converſion. 325
His father's letter to him, and his to his father. 326
He is wickedly betrayed by Goizintha. 328
His letter to his wife, and his undaunted reſolution. 330
His death. 331
His young ſon Hermingildus died not long after. 332
A notable Obſervation upon the habit of a High Prieſt. 95
Hilarion of Coſta a reverend Father. 388
Hippocrates his deſire how to cure the itch of ambition. 56
Houſe of the Moth. 25
Houſe of Swallows. ibid.
A notable Doctrine of Hugo. 61
Humility defined. 468
Humiliation of Death. 350
State of Humilitie. 18
All the world teacheth us the leſſon of Humilitie. 56
The kingdom of Hypocriſie. 11
Reaſons againſt Hypocriſie. ibid.
Baſeneſs of Hypocriſie. ibid.
Hypocriſie confuted in the great School of the world. 42
Hypocriſie condemned by the Law of Heaven. ibid.
Deformity of Hypocriſie. ibid.

I

Jacques de Vitry his pretty Obſervation. 39
Idleneſs the buſineſs of ſome Great men. 44
Abuſe of an Idolatrous ſpirit. 13
Jeſus one and the ſame for Nobles and Plebeians. 3
Excellent qualities of Jeſus Chriſt. 376
He is the Concurrence of all perfections. ibid.
Three Excellencies of Jeſus, in which all other are included. ibid.
His Sanctity, Wiſdom, and Power. 377
Practice of the love of Jeſus reduced to three heads. ibid.
Miracles of the perſon of Jeſus. 442
Jeſus entereth into his glory by his merit. ibid.
Suſpenſion of actual glory in the body of our Saviour Jeſus. ibid.
Imitation of Jeſus Chriſt the abridgement of Wiſdom. 3
Images of Emperours how much reverenced. 13
Impietie hath its miſery. 36
Impietie condemned in the Tribunal of Nature. 420
Impietie chaſtiſed. 451
Againſt Toleration of Impietie. 452
Impuritie of life ariſeth from three ſources. 85
Reaſons againſt Inconſtancie. 40
Inconſtancie of men. 236
Indegondis tranſporteth the Catholick Faith into Spain. 323
The perſecutions of Indegondis. 324
By her mediation there is a Treaty of peace between Levigildus and his ſon. 327
The glory and greatneſs of that man who knows how to ſuffer Injuries. 40
Obſervation of Iſaiah 30. 8, 406
Belief of Judgement moſt general. 438
Judea, in what condition before Herod came to the Crown. 89

K

Knowledge of good and evil, doth make the ſin more foul. 23
Knowledge of ones ſelf very hard. 69
No certain Knowledge of four things. 440

L

Lacedæmonians practice. 381
Ladies excellent in pietie. 388
Sordid Liberalitie of Emmanuel Comenus. 91
Ignorance and bruitiſhneſs of Libertines. 449
Arrogancy of Libertiniſm. 450
The Table of Philo of the manners of Libertines. ibid.
Puniſhment of God upon Libertines. ibid.
Evil of a ſleight Lie. 145
Lying the key of vice. 469
A Life led by opinion, is ridiculous. 8
Condition of this Life well deſcribed. 65
Man muſt lead a Pilgrims Life in this world. 72
Our Life is a Muſick-book. 84
Four ſorts of Life. 137
Opinion of the other Life. 403
Life and Death the two poles of the World. ibid.
Divers kinds of Life. ibid.
Life was given to Cain for a puniſhment. 414
Diſturbances of Life. 435
Divers wayes of humane Life, according to Saint Gregorie: ibid.
The choice of conditions of Life is hazardous. ibid.
Miſeries of this preſent Life. 436
Of the Lilie with ſix leaves. 72
Divers kinds of Love. 228, 229
Love turned into rage. 244
The baſeneſs of Love. 375
Love of inviſible things moſt penetrating. ibid.
Worldly Lovers being converted, are the moſt fervent in the Love of God, illuſtrated by a compariſon. 379
Excellency of Love. 399
Diviſion of Love. ibid.
There is a poſſibility in man to love his enemies. ibid.
Effects of the Love of enemies in the Law of Nature. 400
Loyalty of a wife to her husband. 352
Luſt ruineth Empires. 154
Luſt is a fire that burneth the garment of the ſoul. 182
Luxurie the ſin of the heel. 195
Lycinius his condition. 242
His end. 243
Lycurgus his greatneſs. 3

M

Magnanimitie. 468
Man a Stage-player upon the Theatre of the world. 12
Three ſorts of Man in every man. 61
Character of the carnal and ſpiritual Man. ibid.
Of the nature and dignity of man, what he hath been, what he is, and what he ſhall be. 64
Man hath more non-eſſence than eſſence. 350
Mans ingratitude towards God. 346
Mutability of men. ibid.
Miſeries of an indebted man. 352
It is dangerous to diſoblige pious and learned Men. 379
Diverſitie of Men. 413
Monument of the Empreſs Marie. 418
Five notable things in the myſtery of the Maſs. 74
Maſs a ſacrifice. ibid.
Inſtructions for the Married. 96
Mariamne's accuſation and pitifull death. 124
Martianus, of whom a marvellous accident. 150
His good ſucceſs. ibid.
A great Maſſacre at Theſſalonica. 214
Maxims very dangerous uſed by Hereticks. 183
Maxentius acteth a ſtrange Tragedie. 240
He is defeated by Conſtantine. 241
Maximian the Baloon of Fortune. 239
A remarkable ſpeech of Maximus. 79

Maximus overthrown and put to death. 209, 210
Meditation its definition. 75
Neceſſity and eaſineſs of Meditation. ibid.
What you muſt underſtand to Meditate well. ibid.
Practice and Form of Meditation, conſiſteth in ſix things. 76
Seven ways to dilate ones ſelf in Meditating in abundance upon ſundry thoughts. ibid.
Modeſtie important. 87
Modeſtie of a ſon of S. Lewis. 418
Modeſtie defined. 468
The actions of Modeſtie. ibid.
Marvellous contempt of money. 227
Monica the mother of S. Auguſtine, her qualities. 193
Her death. 198
A ſingular ſaying of Sir Thomas Moor. 90
Mother of Maccabees perſecuted. 348

N

NAtures evils. 355
Atures voice. 370
Nature delighteth in contrarieties. 412
Nature the price of time. 43
Nebucadnezzar nurſed by a Goat. 16
Nero his folly. 12
Notable action of Noah. 414
Nobility the firſt gift of God. 4
Nobility not tied to bloud. ibid.
Againſt ſuch as betray their Nobility. 5
Nobility of Noah, wherein. ibid.
Nobility of Eleazar, and his excellent ſpeech. ibid.
Priviledges of Nobility. 8
Noble-men, why ill educated. 16
Nobility very much corrupted. 17
Noble-mens particular obligation. 20
Noble-men examples of great importance in the world. 21
Noble-men appeal from the ſentence of Labour. 51
Diſorders in corrupt Nobility. 218, 219
Novelty in Religion dangerous. 31
Novelty ever ſuſpected by the Wiſe. 32

O

OAths of Magiſtrates. 90
Bedience defined. 468
The qualities of an Officer. 272
Onocratalus his inſtinct. 417
Souls in the torrent of Opinion. 37
Opinion the ſource of all corruption. ibid.
Strange giddineſs of Opinion. 38
We muſt wean our ſelves from the Opinion of the world. 66
Every one ought to have a good Opinion of the Providence of God, and to know the ways thereof. ibid.
Oration of Symmachus to Theodoſius and Valentinian the Younger, for the Altar of Victory, Exerciſe of Pagan Religion, and Revenues of Veſtals. 182

P

PAgans, and their acts. 227
Terreſtrial Paradiſe the Chamber of Juſtice. 51
Tyranny of Paſſions over the Soul. 64
Paſſions are Ecchoes. 83
Paſſions of Love. ibid.
The danger of this Paſſion. ibid.
Preſervatives againſt this Paſſion. ibid.
Ordinary and ſovereign Remedies for this Paſſion. ibid.
The folly of this Paſſion. ibid.
How Raymund and Lullius were cured of this Paſſion. ibid.
Want of employment is the cauſe of our being enſnared by this Paſſion. ibid.
Partiality of parents. 108
Patience the nature of God. 48
Patience defined. 468
Praiſe of Patience. 93
Patience of S. Macarius. ibid.
Patience of Great men what. ibid.
The firſt Patience is to endure ones ſelf, the next to ſpare men, and endure men. ibid.
Patience of David. ibid.
Acts of Patience. ibid.
Patience the Sanctuary of Mortals. ibid.
Mariamne wife of Herod, the picture of Patience. 114
Pearls are Uſhers, ſaith Seneca. 9
Paulina did bear about her a million of Gold. 93
The deſire of S. Auguſtine to ruine the Opinion of Pelagius. 366
Penance called by the name of Envy. 17
Five degrees of Penance among the Ancients. ibid.
The Practice of theſe degrees at Court. ibid.
Philo's notable Speech concerning the eſtate of Moſes. 417
Invincible proofs of Piety. 28
Piſo's mad cruelty. 90
Plato his Opinion concerning Souls. 406
Who always ſtriveth to Pleaſe himſelf, muſt neceſſarily diſpleaſe others. 84
The quality of worldly Pleaſures, and their ſhortneſs. 65
Politicians are vain without the direction of God. 362
Pompey in Paleſtine. 115
His cruel vanity. 340
Reſolutions of great courages in Poverty. 392
Poverty of three ſorts, either of Neceſſity, Profeſſion, or Affection. 89
Practice of the poverty of Affection. ibid.
Poverty a chief ſcourge. 352
Difficulties of the Poor in virtue. 8
Poverty defined. 468
Poverty the Iſland of Ithaca. 363
Pulcheria ſiſter of Theodoſius, and her qualities. 441
Againſt the neceſſity inferred of Præſcience. 361
The Doctrine of Prædeſtination, with three reaſons of this Doctrine. 366
S. Paul and S. Auguſtine interpreted in the matter of Prædeſtination. ibid.
The Doctrine of the moſt ancient Fathers concerning Prædeſtination. ibid.
The fruits of God's glory derived from Prædeſtination. 367
The matter of Prædeſtination. ibid.
Marvellous ſecret of Prædeſtination. 368
Praiſe of Prayer, with the neceſſity thereof. 68
Practice of Vocal Prayer. 77
Government of Vocal Prayer. 78
Cup and Harp in Prayer, what is underſtood thereby. ibid.
Remedies againſt Diſtractions in Prayer. ibid.
Sublime Prayer. 381
Pretended Religion, how far from true Chriſtianity. 34
Pride, eſpecially of the Nobility, reprehended. 92
The humility of Primiſlaus and Pope Benedict the eleventh. ibid.
Proſperity. 7
Procopius preſented to Diocletian. 368
He is ſent to deſtroy the Chriſtians, and is converted to Chriſtianiſm. ibid.
Conſtancy of Procopius. 369
His ſufferings for Religion. ibid.
His impriſonment and Martyrdom. ibid.
Prodigality of a Venetian Lady, and her puniſhment. 418
Voice of Propheſie. 37
Excellent Propheſies touching our Saviour. ibid.
Diſloyalties that ſpring from the Maxim of Proper Intereſt. 389
Reaſons againſt this Maxim. ibid.
It's a great ſacriledge to make a Divinity of Proper Intereſt. 390
Proper Intereſt is like the feathers of an Eagle. ibid.
Falſe Pretexts of Intereſt. 391
Horrour of Poverty doth nouriſh the fervour of Intereſts. ibid.
Hidden Paſſages of the Divine Providence in the reclaiming of Souls. 192
The Theatre of Divine Providence. 233
Admirable Providence of God above all humane things. 258
Belief of a Providence is the ſweetneſs of Life. 354
Manifeſt proof of the Providence of God. 355
Maxims of Providence. 356
Four foundations and pillars of Providence. ibid.
Providence of God in the ordinary marks of nature. 358 Particular providences over divers Countries. ibid.
The admirable Providence of God in protecting King Mithridates in his cradle. ibid.

Providence over Empires. 359
Providence over the Church. ibid.
Three Squadrons against Providence. ibid.
Great Providence to stick to Altars and the Church. 148
Against Providence three squadrons of nice ones, according to humane prudence. 361
Providence of God, concerning the sentence of death in the generality of men. 414
Providence in the death of the vicious. ibid.
Providence of God in limits of our appetites. 346
The Prowess of Christians. 221
Importance of Prudence. 88
Prudence a hand sprinkled with eyes. ibid.
Hierogliph of Prudence. ibid.
Truest Prudence is to distrust their own judgement. ibid.
Prudence defined. 467
Ptolomey his magnificence. 392
His Librarie. ibid.
His daughter Berenice entereth into Babylan. ibid.
Purgatory compared to the Cherubins fiery sword. 425
Proved by the light of Nature. ibid.
The opinions of the Ancient concerning Purgatory. ibid.
An excellent opinion on the belief of Purgatory among the Hebrews. ibid.
Notable Purgation of the Ægyptians. ibid.
Purgatory proved by the light of Faith. 426
The manner of Purgatory. 427
Against the dulness of those who do not understand it. ibid.
Rigour of the living against the souls in Purgatory. 428
Pirrho's stupidity. 92

R

Absaces the false Souldier, his damnable Precepts, which contain a true Satyre of the manners of depraved Nobility. 218
Rebellions and Seditions fatal to the people. 364
Wholesom advise how to resolve on the choice of Religion. 35
Maxims of the Catholick and pretended Religion. 36
The powerfull operation of Religion. 340
Commotions for matters of Religion. 342
Three things necessary to dispose ones self in Religion. 31
Without Religion all is unprofitable, observed in the quality of Julian. 373
Four notable points to discover the falshood of pretended Religion. 32
An excellent Resolution upon worldly accidents. 362
Resurrection proved more than any other mystery. 440
No impossibility in the Resurrection to an Omnipotent hand. 441
Three properties of splendour in the Resurrection of our Saviour. 443
The triumphant glory of the Resurrection. ibid.
The sweetness of the repose of Jesus, and all the Elect in the estate of Resurrection. ibid.
Relation of the Resurrection to the Creation. ibid.
The joys of the heart of Jesus in the first instant of the Resurrection. ibid.
The goodly world he beheld in his Idæa's at his Resurrection. ibid.
Revenge is not onely contrary to Divine right, but to the right of Nature. 399
The Maxim of Revenge opposeth common sense. ibid.
Goodly company of those who did not desire Revenge. 400, 401
Not to Revenge injuries, is not so much an election of virtue, as a necessity of salvation. ibid.
The horrour and confusion of Revenge. ibid.
Goodly Considerations to pacifie the mind against Revenge. ibid.
Absalom close in his Revenge. 408
Riches the mother of vices, and neglect of God. 364
Riot cruel and injurious to God and his Church. 53
Tyranny of Riot. 406
Reasons against the Maxims of Riot. 461
Rispelimes. 265
Rodomonts. 93
A condemnation of Rodomonts and Duels. 224
Romin Empire full of strange disorders. 154

S

Sacriledge of fair souls. 13
To Sacrifice the Calf without flower. 78
Sanctity the character of Nobility. 5
Sanctity an irrefragable argument of Faith. 29
Sadness the snare of Satan. 83
Immortification one cause of Sadness. 84
Sadness a plant of our own growing. ibid.
Prayer the best remedy against Sadness. ibid.
Unworthiness of Sadness. 85
Two great Obstacles of Salvation. 43
To handle the affairs of Salvation, is a matter of no small importance. 31
Sameas his grave and free Speech concerning Herod. 116
Sames a Martyr of poverty. 89
Scoffing the harbinger of Atheism. 46
Danger of Scoffing. 47, 368
Self-love hard to be repressed. 400
Semblances the children of opinion and lying. 37
Sesostris his Chariot applied to the rich. 9
Simplicity defined. 468
Simplicity the chief virtue of Saints. 41
What it is to be Simple. ibid.
Simplicianus a holy man. 96
Sins committed for want of witnesses. 6
Sin of the flesh a mark of Reprobation, and injurious to the incarnation of the Son of God. 50
Sincerity preserved in the light of Nature. 396
Slander the wound of Frogs. 46
Greatness of the Soul. 64
Souls of men different in qualities. 4
Excellencies of the Soul remarkable. 11
The Soul clothed with royal purple. 12
What the Soul is, and wherefore it is a Spirit. ibid.
The care that is to be had of the Soul. 423
Piety the first virtue, and the Soul of Military virtue. 220
The belief of the immortality of the Soul invincible. 420
The operations of the Soul are admirable. 421
Sentence of God upon the immortality of the Soul. ibid.
Piety and Valour of a French Souldier. 222
Notable Devotion of a Souldier. 223
Military virtues of a French Souldier. 226
A great indignity of the abuse of the Spirit. 12
Apparition of the Soul of Samuel. 423
Spurina. 3
Stratonica her ridiculous pride. 93
Supereminency of person. ibid.
Suems persecuted. 342
His admirable constancy. ibid.
Three Suns shine at one time. 370
Symmachus magnifieth the Vestals. 182
Shamefull Law of the Sybarites. 87
Synagogue of the Jews burned. 213

T

Temperance the first tribute of Sanctity. 86
Emptations remora's of the Soul. 79
Temptation is a Christians trade. ibid.
What is the cause that many yield in Temptation. ibid.
It is not good to tempt Temptations. 80
The sweetness of victory over Temptation. ibid.
Tertullian his parable of the Ass to the Hereticks of his time. 33
An excellent conceit of Tertullian. 19
Tertullian his saying is repugned. 267
Thaumastus made the second man in the Kingdom, for having given a glass of water. 91
Theodosius his birth and extraction foretold. 137
His Baptism. 139
His Education. 140
Sanctity of his Court. 143
The Discourse between him, and a Hermite. 144
Theodosius destroyeth Maxna. 139
He maketh the Court holy. 212
His remarkable Piety. 261
His death. 148
Theodosia her revenge. 368

Theodorick's practice which he gave to Cassiodorus. 274
Theodorick slew Odoacer at a Banquet. 281
Strange act of Theodorick. 90
A crafty and witty conceit of Theodora. 397
Theophilus a bloudy Emperour. 402
The admirable Justice of Theodorick. 285
Time not onely precious, but onely necessary. 43
Time compared to a River. 44
Time irrevocable. ibid.
The Tongue compared to the Almond-Tree. 45
The Tongue a feathered Bell. ibid.
The Tongue the Incensory of the Divinity. 47
Trajan his notable Act. 90
Travel of worldlings. 79
Triumph of Asmodeus, with a description of his Chariot, wheels, horses, coach-man, and Court. 49
The power of Truth. 395
As bad contesting against Truth, as against the master of the Bowe. ibid.
Tutours are Fathers over the Spirits. 373

V

Valentinian father to Gratian, his death. 200
Verity a Sea. 45
Virgins give an Altar of Gold to the Church of S. Sophia. 140
Ungratefull men punished. 23
Diversity of Unions. 437
Union of glory, what it is. ibid.
Unworthiness of being ashamed of well-doing. 82

W

Want a great misery. 15
Excellent discipline in War. 226
The name of Sun given to Warriours. 172
Tragical events of the Wicked. 257
Equity of the Senate of Rome to support Widows. 340
William of Paris his notable Doctrine. 360
Weakness of humane Wisdom. 362
Good Wives of bad husbands. 388
Wisdom requisite in Prelates. 169
All Wisdom reduced to one Word. 88
Over-much Wit troubleth. 37
Modesty of Great Wits. 450
Women stout to do good. 39
Women without Devotion, as a Bee without a sting. 302
The rare qualities which are given to them in Scripture. ibid.
Houshold affairs recommended to Women. 305
Words are the Chariot of the Soul. 70
Word of God altered in Chairs, by the extravagant opinions of hearers. 385
The World a Clock, and how. 18
Worldlings condition. 24
The World an Island of Dreams. 16
The vanity of the World, and misery thereof. 119
The vanity and inconstancy of the World. 146
Practise of Worldly men. 389
Baseness of the World. 414
Tertullian his Conceit concerning the World. ibid.
Three Ties of the World. 417
Discordant acts of the World. 442
The World is full of Craft. 397
A Wonderfull Spectacle of the affairs of the World. 238

Z

Zeal of a Ladie towards God. 90
Zeal ought to be had towards Religion. 341

The End of the Table of the first Three TOMES.

Tranquility a paradise which he gave to Caligula. 274
Treachery flew over as a Banquet. 281
Stunge ad of Treachery. 90
A crafty and witty conceit of Treachery. 297
Treachery a bloody Empire. 402
The admirable Justice of Treachery. 285
Time not onely precious, but onely necessary. 43
Time compared to a River. 45
Time irrevocable. ibid.
The Tongue compared to the Almond-Tree. 45
The Tongue a tasbered Bell. ibid.
The Tongue the Incendiary of the Divinity. 47
Tongue his notable Act. 90
Travel of worldlings. 75
Triumph of Alexander, with a description of his Chariot; 49 wheels, horses, coach-man, and Coure. 49
The power of Truth. 295
As bad consulting against Truth, as against the nature of the sowe. ibid.
Tyrons are Fathers over the Spirits. 373

V

Valentinian father to Gratian, his death 206
Vany a Sea. 45
Virgins give an Altar of Gold to the Church of S. Sophia. 140
Disgraceful, an punished. 23
Diversity of Unions. 437
Union of glory, what it is. ibid.
Unworthiness of being absence of well-doing. 83

W

What a great misery 15
Excellent discipline in War. 226

The name of Sun given to Warriors. 174
Tragical events of the Wicked 287
Inquiry of the Scene of Joy to happen Widows. 340
William of Paris his notable Doctrine. 389
Weakness of Humane Wisdom. 364
Good Wives of bad Husbands. 358
Wisdom required in Princes. 187
All Wisdom reduced to one Word. 88
Over much Wit troublesh. 83
Modesty of Great Wits. 450
Women most to do good. 39
Women without Devotion, as a Bee without a sting 202
The rare qualities which are given to them in Scripture. ibid.
How bold affairs recommended to Women. 365
Words are the Chariot of the Soul. 70
Word of God altered in Charity by the extravagant opinions of hearers. 383
The World a Clock, and how. 18
Worldlings condition. 24
The World an Island of Dreams. 16
The vanity of the World, and misery thereof. 119
The vanity and inconstancy of the World. 146
Frailtie of Worldly men. 389
Darkness of the World. 414
Two Men his Concert concerning the World. ibid.
Three Lies of the World. 417
Discordant acts of the World. 442
The World is full of Craft. 397
A Wonderfull Speculatie of the affairs of the World. 238

Z

Zal of a Ladie towards God. 90
Zal ought to be had towards Religion. 341

The End of the Table of the first Three TOMES.

THE HOLY COURT,

THE COMMAND OF REASON OVER THE PASSIONS.

VVritten in French by F. N. Caussin.

AND

Translated into Engliſh by Sir T.H.

WITH

HISTORICALL OBSERVATIONS UPON IT.

Printed M. D C. L.

TO THE

EXCELLENT PRINCESSE,

THE DUTCHESSE OF

BUCKINGHAM.

Excellent Princesse,

THis Translation of the Holy Court, as it had it's first life breathed into it by the animating spirit of her sacred Majesties Royall acceptance; so in this last, and concluding piece it infinitely desires such your favourable enterteinment. Nor, verily, can I (where so bright and resplendent a Star, from a Sphear of Greatnesse, hath already lighted up a flame to direct others in their approbation) but with much confidence hope the like propitious rayes may benignly reflect from your so near a confining Influence.

Here shall your Grace behold the powerfull predominance of Reason over passions, not taught in Epictetus, or Senecas Prophane School, but dictated from the Truth-teaching sacred Oracles of Christian Piety.

Here the soul is informed, and judgement rectified, to hate vice, and flie it; to love virtue, and practise it, not in exteriour garbs, and petty slight formalities, which onely serve to amuse vulgar spirits: but by the interiour Habits, and serious embracement of the most solid virtues. The pretious memory (Excellent Princesse) of your thrice-noble Father, whose living Image, and second-self you representatively are, together with your known love of pious Books, and daily practise in your life of the wholesome precepts couched in This, hath encouraged my present addresse, to serve for the enterteinment of your vacant hours, which thus silently spent, and maturely digested, will have the force, and efficacy of the most serious employment, and may Exemplarily invite other eminent Spirits, to imitate your Graces profitable, and well-seasoned retirements. I wiſh (excellent Lady) there were any thing wherein I might better expreſſe the devoted ſervice I ow to your eminent ſelf, and illuſtrious Family: but ſince weak endeauours can produce but ſlender effects, and noble diſpoſitions do readily pardon incident imperfections; I will reſt in the cheerefull hope of Excuſe, and in the ardent Vow of a ſtudious willingneſſe to become worthy the Title of

Your Graces humbleſt, and moſt obſequious ſervant,

THOMAS HAWKINS.

To my Lord,

MY LORD THE DUKE OF ANGVIEN,

ELDEST SONNE OF MY LORD THE PRINCE.

MY LORD,

I Finiſh the Holy-Court in my Books, when your age inviteth you to begin it in your manners; and for your firſt exerciſe of arms, I offer you the Combats and Empire over Paſsions, which is greater then that of the world.

There it is where you ſhall know the induſtry of a warre, which nature wageth, and reaſon teacheth us; which is never too ſoon learned, and which is ordinarily but too late underſtood. Princes in other battels ſpeak with mouths of fire, and make uſe of a million of hands; but in this which I repreſent, they are alone, and therein employ but the moitie of themſelves, one part of Man being revolted againſt the other. Beſides, all the honour of the uictory reſts in themſelves; arms, fortreſſes, and Regiments not at all participating therein, and if they prove fortunate in theſe encountres, they ſtand in the eſteem of wiſe men, for Demy-Gods.

Their quality obligeth them to this duty more then other men, ſince Paſſions are winds, which in popular life raiſe but little waves, but in them ſtir up mountains of water. For which, I, am perſwaded, that, as you ſo dearly have loved the labours of my Pen, and ſought for your inſtruction out of my Books; I could not do a better ſervice, or more ſuitable to your age, then by arming you againſt theſe plagues, which have ſo often tarniſhed Diadems on the brow of Ceſars, and turned Conquerours into Slaves.

Sir, I promiſe my ſelf much from your Greatneſſe in this Conqueſt, ſeeing it already hath given teſtimonies to the world, worthy of your eminent Birth, which oblige you to virtue, out of a neceſſity, as ſtrong, as your diſpoſition is ſweet. VVit, which is as the principall Genius of your houſe, hath in you caſt forth glimmers, that have flown throughout Europe, when you publickly anſwered throughout all Philoſophy, in an age wherein other Princes begin to learn the firſt elements. You have placed wiſedome on the higheſt Throne of Glory, and it by your mouth hath rendred Oracles to inſtruct the learned, and aſtoniſh Doctours. In the firſt ſeaſon of life, which ſo many other ſpend in delights, you have heightned the lights of your underſtanding by the labour and induſtry of ſtudy, living, as certain Plants, which bear the figure of Starres all invironed with Thorns.

It is time, that all your Brightneſſe change into Fire, and ſince Sciences are but Colours, which appeare not in the night-time, if Virtue do not illuminate them, they muſt be gilded with the rayes of your good life, and enkindled with the ardours of your courage, as you very happily have already begun.

Sir, I do aſſure my ſelf, that of all thoſe things you know you will onely approve the good, and that of all ſuch as you can, you will do none but the juſt. This is it you owe to the King, to whom you have the honour to be ſo near. This is it, which the education of the moſt prudent of Fathers, and the tender care of the beſt of mothers, exact. This is it, that France, which looketh on you (as a Sien of its Lillies) wiſheth. This is it, which bloud, the moſt noble on Earth, breeding the moſt happy in the world, and that face, where Grace and Majeſty make ſo ſweet a commixion, ceaſe not to promiſe us.

As there is nothing little in you, ſo we muſt not endure any thing, imperfect: and if that, which we take to be ſpots in the Sun, be Stars; it plainly ſheweth us, that all muſt be ſplendour in your condition, and that we muſt not expect years, ſince the wit of Princes is much ſwifter then time.

Your great Vncle, who gained the battel of Ceriſoles, ſaid to thoſe who upbraided him with his youth, that he did not cut with his beard, but with his ſword: and I am perſwaded, that you will will imitate his valour, to take part in his glory, yea even in this your minority, wherein the Kings colours being already to fly under your name.

My Lord, remember, the throne of the Sun among the Egyptians was ſupported by Lyons, and that you muſt be all heart to ſupport that of our moſt Chriſtian King, in imitation of the great Prince, to whom you ow your Birth; For whoſe ſake I wiſh you as many bleſsings as Heaven promiſeth you, eſteeming my ſelf moſt happy to be able to contribute my labours and ſervices to the glory of your education, ſince I have the honour to call my ſelf by juſt title:

SIR,

Your moſt humble and moſt affectionate ſervant in our Lord,

N. CAUSSIN.

A TASTE OF THE SEVERALL DISPOSITIONS OF MEN,

VVhich serves for a Foundation to the Discourse of PASSIONS.

THE HOLY COURT was not (as yet) sufficiently beautified with the eminent lustre of Glory (wherein I represented it) but it was necessary, that taking possession of the Empire over passions, it should wear a crown, which it hath gained by its travell, and wrought by its proper virtues. In this last Tome (dear Reader) I present thee the absolute reformation of the soul by eternall principles, and the victory over powers which oppose Reason.

Thou art not ignorant, that Angels and bruit beasts are but of one piece, the one being wholly Spirit, and the other Flesh: But Man (a middle creature between Angels and bruit beasts) participateth both of flesh and Spirit by an admirable tye, which in him occasioneth continuall war of Passions, which are properly commotions of animall and sensitive nature caused by the imagination of good and evil, with some alteration of body. They take their origen from two Appetites, of which the Concupiscible causeth Love, Hatred, Desire, Aversion, Joy and Sadnesse: The Irascible, causeth Hope, Despair, Boldnesse, Fear and Anger. To this ordinary number, I add Shamefastnesse, Envy, Jealousie and Compassion, to accomplish our work in all its parts.

All Passions are generally in all men, but all appear not in all. There is a certain mixture in nature, which is the cause, that the worst have something of good and the best something of bad. Now note, that as the Platonists distinguish five sorts of divels; to wit, Fiery, Airy, Aquatick Terrestriall and Subterranean: so humane spirits are divided into as many forms, which produce merveilous diversities in every nature. The Fiery, are Spirits of fire, whereof some seem to be enkindled with the purest flames of stars, which are magnanimous, pure, vigorous, bold, intelligent, active, amiable, and munificent. And of this sort are the most illustrious of Kings and of Queens, of Princes and of Princesses, good Prelates, great and virtuous Ladies, the wise the valiant, the most notable States-men, Generals of Armies, Conquerours, yea and the Saints most eminet in virtue. There are others also Fiery, but burnt with the fire of Comets, which are maligne, counterfeit, vicious, insolent, pievish, crosse, covetous, ambitious, cruel, arrogant, inhumane, violent, and impetuous. Of this matter were composed the Tiberiuses, the Herods, the Neros, and the Domitians, who seemed to be born for the desolation of mankind.

The Airy are likewise of two kinds very different: for the one are of a temperate constitution which maketh them mild, peaceable, pious, cordiall, sociable, gracefull, affable, courteous, pliant, witty, liberall and active.

Of this kind are many gentle, courteous, modest and handsome women: men of honour and of quality, who make a noble Company, and are infinitely apt for all the civilities of a laudable conversation. But if they degenerate from this degree, they become great eaters, great scoffers, dissolute, vain flatterers, lascivious, and brutish.

Others, like unto stirred air are, turbulent, stormy, cholerick, suspitious, impatient, nice, biting undertakers, mutable, mutinous, unquiet, murmurers, and slanderers. It is they who raise quarrels, and litigious wranglings in the world, who disturb men and affairs: wherein they many times are as quick-silver in guildings, onely used to make it resolve into smoke.

Of the Aquaticks some are slow and cold, tasteless, without affection, without cordiality, wedded to their own petty profits, and born for themselves. Of this rank you see many that make a good shew, who resemble those dryed-up or frozen fountains upon a throne of marble, which have ostent enough, but afford no water. Others, which like standing and marishy waters, are close, foul, sluggish, trasterous and dangerous. Others, like the sea, are ambitious, unequal, uncertain, fantasticall, and capricious, every moment changing shape in this great Comedy of the world. Others are peaceable and usefull, as goodly Fountains and great Rivers.

As for the Terrestriall, they are stubborn, inflexible, dull and stupid, of the condition of those people who thought they were at the end of numbers, when they had counted to four, and could go no further. Some in the beginning appear what they are, and others have a specious outside, which makes them to passe for handsome beasts. Sometimes they are loutish, cloudy, enemies of joy, of innocent pleasure, of beauty, of witty conceits, of discourse, of inventions, slaves of gain, and traitours to their own life, out of the exorbitancy of their avarice. In this number you shall find many like to those (which Theophrastus describeth) who neither lend fire nor salt to their neighbours; who wear hidious habits, and cause themselves to be shaven very close, that they may be at the lesse cost with their Barber; who have Magazines of pedlers, and who laden with old keyes, walk every day up and down their grounds, to see whither they have not changed place. Some are like Poulcats, others are Fawns and Satyrs, who are addicted to base, and shamefull lusts, captious, shifting, impudent, night-walkers, and Hobgoblins, who extreamly disturb the repose of humane life, if laws armed with force endeavour not to dissipate them, to make use of chains to restrain them.

The Subterraneans are Melancholick, close, hypocriticall, silent, fumish, sad, irreconcileable, bloody, and and enormities. They are very apt to hatch revenges long pondred, to build Babylonish in their hearts, wherein no day light appeareth: Nevertheless, as they most times have an impotency in the execution of bad designs, so they cherish, but not satisfie their passions. Yet do these qualities diversify commixt one with another, you the highest with the lowest from whence proceed infinite variations in the spirit of man, so that there is not any thing so changeable in all nature, or so hard to be known, as man.

Some seem to be born with good parts, but through the want of some help of nature, or instruction, they degener are into bad, and render themselves very capable of deceits and illusions. So many are become Huguenots, for that they want vigour of judgement, and see not that we rather should reserve our selves to a Generall Councell, then to their silly arguments. Others abuse themselves in spirituall life, and would willingly refine devotion, even to the talking with Angels, and the seeing a white Pidgeon. Others, to appear strong wits, contemn all ordinary guises, make themselves extravagant, and as the Antipodes of mankind.

Others put themselves into the number of confused Scholars, who have store of learning, but very ill-digested. There are some who with much endeavour to seem wise, become crafty, they converse not but under a mask, they see snares in every place, they have the rudest of physinomie. They draw tribute out of the good turns they do their friends, they make profit of all, they become extreamly distrustfull, and they would willingly be of that kind, of which Theophrastus speaketh, who every moment tell their money, and make their Lackeys go before them for fear they should run away. Others, out of too much desire of glory, become vain, affected in their speech, in their actions, and in all their proceedings, to the studying and learning by heart the slightest complements, as do some women, whom one would take to be virgins of the Goddesse Memory, and such as boast elocution, who traffick in hearers, and invite to their sermons, more then one would to weddings or burials.

Some, out of an intemperance of neatnesse, and of dotage upon health, torment their life, such circumspection use they in their diet, their garments, their furnitures, in all things which are for their use. They every where carry their bread and wine along with them, and never sit well but in their own chair. Others take delight to negotiate they alwayes have their hands full of Papers, they make a Registers office of their Cabinet: they are great Formalists, and strangely persecute the world with their punctualities. They put one businesse into an hundred dishes, and incessantly trouble all such as have to do with them. Others desirous to make themselves over much pleasing in their conversation, become bablers and ceremonious; they are importune and unseasonable in complements; they go to prattle with their friends whilest they have a feaver; they tell extravagant tales, wherein they take themselves to be very facetious, although at the latter end of the discourse they be asked where the conceit to be laughed at, lies: They burthen themselves also with news of no value; They make a secret of every thing, and give things out for mysteries, which are proclaimed with a Trumpet.

There are some, who not to seem flatterers tell truth with an ill grace, they are great Censurers, and they see not any one, whom they reform not from the head to the heel. If they put themselves upon matter of doctrine, and eloquence; they are the Fathers of wits, and the creatours of excellent conceits, under whom the Empire of learning circumvolveth: and if they talk of State-matters, of the Church, of Justice, and of War; they are the Gods of Leves and battels, who pronounce Edicts, assemble Councels, levy Armes, raise fortifications, correct Kingdomes, move the earth; and in their own imagination, change the face of the Universe. Others are so diligent, that they tire all the world with their unreasonable activities; others use afflicting delayes, and stir so little in all their designs, that they seem to be in a perpetuall Solstice.

You see some extreamly open brested, who tell all their thoughts, and, as if their heart were a sieve, it keeps nothing which it sends not instantly out by the lips: Some proceed to a simplicity, next door to sootishnesse, which makes them do many extravagancies; and when it hath a mixture of vanity men of mean condition imitate the actions of the great: and silly Citizens wives say, my Lord and Husband, as well as Sarah, of the greatest Ladies. There are among these some subtile Coxcombs, and fortunate fools, who daily deceive themselves to their own gain.

They who have a Magistrall aspect are much more odious, when with a countenance supercilious, and Tone of a voyce affected, they make speeches, and usurp a personage which neither age, quality, nor merit allloweth them. Dreamers, and pensive are heavie in conversation, and the squeamish who make their good aspects and fair countenances to be bought, are insupportable; but the apprehensive, who deplore all things, multiply what they can the miseries of the times, and ceasing not to blame the actions of those who govern, raise more mischiefs then remedies.

Good God! what an alteration do passions make in us? but it is a gift from heaven, that they may be changed, and that by Grace and the practice of good instructions, we can despoil our selves as well of an evil habit, as of an old garment.

It is not expedient to be without passion, nor is it possible to humane nature; but it is much to obtein by discretion the moderation of a thing, of which we by necessity have the experience. These motions are given us with our bodies, they are little spirits which are born and die with us; some find them more mild, others, more wayward; but every one hath his part, howbeit there are very few who well understand their own portion. Young people, who shew no desire, no affection, no feeling, are commonly abject spirits; unlesse this come to them by grace, or some notable constraint, which in the end is the cause, that of a young Angel, an old Devil is often made: we must not lose humanity (saith Saint Augustine) to acquire tranquility of mind, nor think that, that which is hard and boistrous is alwayes right, or that one hath much health, when he is come to the highest degree of stupidity. All good spirits have delicate apprehensions, and resemble the burning bush which had thorns among lights; but they are none of the best, who, to follow nature, abandon reason.

I affirm the Starres contribute much to our inclinations, and Birth, much more: Education maketh another nature; Bloud, choler, melancholy, and flegme, do in our passions, what the elements do in our bodies. Yea stature it self conduceth: spirit, goodnesse, grace, full garb, and courage is very often in little bodies which have their heat moderated and well digested. But if great bodies be destitute of it, they are very lazy; and if they have too much of it, they are flaming fornaces full of violence: which made S. Cyril say, that greatnesse was given to Gyants for a punishment of their wickednesse. But this must be understood without any prejudice to well-composed tall statures, which have much Majesty. There are humours so sticking, that what care soever be used, there is somewhat still remains behind, which (according to Job) sleeps with us in our graves.

graves. I have heard that a good Religious man having been bred with the milk of a Goat, was very modest in publick by a great reflection he made on his actions: But he ever had some hour in secret wherein he had his frisks and his capers.

Nevertheless, one cannot believe, how much one gaineth upon his own nature, when he will take the pain to manure it: but for want of using industry therein, one makes to himself a turbulent life, a continuall torment, a hasty death, and his salvation to be doubtfull.

There are some who drive away one devil by another, curing one passion with another, and tyring them all, that they may have none; which was the cause that Theodosian said, that they are, as that possessed man, who had a legion of devils in his body. Some by the counsell of certain Directours, would break them all at once, as that souldier, who thought to pull off a horses tail by strength of arm and not by drawing one hair after another. Others expect remedy from time, from affairs, from change of life and condition, and are rather cured by wearinesse, then prudence.

Others continually flatter themselves and think they have got great victories, when they have lessened their fits, and left the root of the Feaver. But they who will therein proceed seriously, endeavour first of all to find out the enemy, and as we all have one passion, which predominateth in our heart above the rest, and which most entertaineth our thoughts, they principally assail that waging to rough battels by prayer, fasting, alms, consideration, reading of good books, continuall examen of conscience, flight from occasions, diversion upon some better thing, good company, imitation of holy personages, counsel of sage directours, and by a thousand stratagems which the spirit of God furnisheth them with, in the fruitfulnesse of their inventions. After they have pulled down their chief adversary, they easily prevail against the rest, and continuing their progression in the list of generous souls, they come in the end to a great tranquility.

This is it I intend to shew in this last volume, wherein I treat of Passions in a new tone, my purpose being rather to shew their remedies, then their pictures. I know Monsieur Coeffeteau (the eloquent Bishop of Marseilles) who hath afforded immortall lights to French eloquence, hath set forth the Table of humane passions. I lay not my pencil upon the line of this Apelles, I begin where he ends, and if he be content to paint them, I endeavour to cure them.

For this purpose, having briefly explicated the nature, proprieties, effects, and symptomes of every passion; I set against it two remedies; the first whereof is drawn from some divine perfection, contrary to the disorder of the same Passion: and because that is (yet) too sharp, and dazling by the quickneſſe of its lights, I shew it, sweetned and tempered in the virtues of Jesus Christ.

In the end of the Book I bring the examples of those who have overcome their Passions, and of such as have sunk under their violence, deriving profit out of all, for the scope which I aim at. There are certain Flies which live on Monks-hood, a venemous herb, and who make use of an antidote against its poyson. So they who have tried the malice and danger of passions, may profit us whether they edifie us by their repentance, or divert us by their disasters.

I conclude the HOLY COURT in this Volume, which I esteem above the rest, by reason of its utillity: and, writing of passions to cure them; I wish in my self an incurable one, which is, to desire the progression of my Readers, and to beseech God they may submit Sense to Reason, Time to Eternity, and the Creature to the Creatour.

THE FIRST TREATISE.
OF LOVE.

Sect. 1. Of the Neceſsity of Love.

Againſt thoſe Philoſophers who teach Indifferency, ſaying, We muſt not Love any thing.

All Happineſſe included in love.

THe Divine Providence which hath concluded our ſalvation in Love, very plainly ſhews us, That the means to be quickly happy is to love Felicity; and that the way we walk in to become ſingularly happy, is to eſteem (as we ought) the chief of Felicities. We loſe all our good hap for want of loving; and our Love, through the defect of well placing it; which is the cauſe that we daily learning ſo many Arts, forget what we ſhould eternally practiſe, if it be true we deſire to be everlaſtingly happy.

S. Dion. l. de Hierarch. coleſt. συναγωγὸν πατέρα. God the Father of unions draweth all to unity by the means of love.

I find the great Apoſtle of France S. Denis, ſaid well, when he called God, The Father of Unions, who ceaſeth not to gather and rally together all the creatures into his heart which iſſued out of his heart. He is, That in the life of Intelligencies, which the Sun is in the celeſtiall world: but one immoveable Sun, about which ſo many changes, and agitations of all creatures circumvolve, who groan and aim at this Firſt beauty, the true Center of Repoſe.

It concerneth us, ſince we are made for it, and that God hath given us Love, which is to the ſoul, That, which wings are to Birds, to carry us to it's fruition. It is a riches, which is onely ours, and which would be infinitely profitable, if we could tell how to employ it well: but for want of well loving, we apply the moſt precious thing, which is Love, to gain wretched Creatures, as if one uſed a golden hook to fiſh for Frogs, and a Sceptre to ſhake Hey. This is it which cauſeth me to undertake in this diſcourſe, to ſpeak of the well ordering of Love, as the moſt aſſured way we can chooſe to arrive at Tranquility, and to ſhew that we firſt of all moſt neceſſarily love, to be happy in the world, and that the moſt loving and tendreſt hearts are ordinarily the beſt.

The Sect of Philoſophers of Indifferency.

This age ſcant enough in goodneſſe, and fruitfull in malice, hath of late brought forth a Sect of wits, who term themſelves the Philoſophers of Indifferency, and who make boaſt to be very inſenſible, as well in the fear of the Divinity; as in tenderneſſe towards the miſeries of men.

To what purpoſe is it (ſay they) to addict ones ſelf to the worſhip of a God, whom we cannot ſufficiently know? And wherefore ſhould we be ſolicitous for the afflictions of another, which nothing concern us? This is to make our ſelves eternally miſerable, and to be tormented with all manner of objects. He who would live contented in the world, muſt love nothing but himſelf, entertein himſelf within himſelf, and concerning himſelf; and derive pleaſure, as a tribute, out of all the creatures of the world; but to take heed not to enter into the participation of their troubles, and ſhould we ſee all to be turned topſie turvey, ſo it inconvenienceth not us in any thing to let time ſlide, to catch good by the wings whileſt we may, and to let evil fall on the miſerable.

Theſe kind of people are ſo unnaturall, that they laugh at all, and mock at the miſeries which others ſuffer. If you tell them of a houſe burnt, they ſay it is nothing, and that it is but a fire of great wood: If of an inundation of water; that Fiſhes have a good time of it: If of a warre, or contagion; that it is a good harveſt for death, and that there are too many bread-eaters: If one ſay ſuch a friend hath loſt an eye; they anſwer he is very happy, becauſe he ſhall ſee but half the bad times.

I do not think there is a vice in the whole world more brutiſh, or contrary to nature, then this obdurateneſſe; which is the cauſe I would caſt it under the feet of love: and ſhew you, that tenderneſſe towards God as a Father, towards men as the lively Images of his Goodneſſe, is the principall foundation of all virtues.

1. Reaſon againſt the Indifferents.

Conſider firſt, that all the good order of life comes from the knowledge of the Firſt cauſe, whereon all Creatures have their dependence; as on the contrary, the Diſorder of all actions ſpringeth from the ignorance of the ſubmiſſion we ow to the Increated Eſſence. Now he, who loveth none but himſelf, and cares not but for his own Intereſts, maketh himſelf as the chief end, and the God of himſelf, which ſufficiently proveth it to be the moſt palpable folly, and the greateſt evil may be imagined in Nature.

There is none, but God, which is for it ſelf.

It is a remarkable thing, that among all Eſſences there is none but God alone, who, as he can know nothing out of himſelf, nor love any thing but in himſelf, ſo he doth nothing but for himſelf. For in doing all for himself, he doth all for us, since we have no good, which tendeth not to him, as to its scope, which subsisteth not in him as on its Basis, which resteth not in him, as in its Centre. Thus did S. Thomas understand that notable saying of Mercury Trismegistus. Unity hath produced unity, and hath reflected its love on it self.

Monas genuit monadem, & in se suum reflexit amorem, S. Thom. 1. part. q 32. a. 1. 1.

It is not but for an Infinite Essence to do so; but had the highest Angel in heaven the thought onely to behold himself, and hence-forward to work for himself, he would instantly be pulled out of heaven, and would of a bright Sun, become a sooty Coal.

What may one think then of a man, who sayes in his heart, I am born for my self, and I have no other aim in the world, but to satisfie my mind with all contentments, nor shall the evils of another ever enter into my heart, till Fire commix with Water, and Heaven with Earth, If I obtein my ends all shall go well? Hearken how God speaketh in the Prophet Ezechiel to these wicked ones. Behold, I come to fall upon thee (oh! thou great Dragon) who lyest stretched out at length in the midst of thy Rivers, and darest say, this stream is mine, and I made my self. Assure thee I will put a bridle upon thee, and when I have fastned to thy scale all the fishes of the waters wherein thou bearest sway, I will drag thee from the midst of the Kingdome of waves and I will throw thee into a wilderness: thou shalt lie upon the dry land, nor shall any one care to see thy obsequies performed. For I have abandoned thee to the beasts of the field, and to the birds of the air, to be devoured.

Ecce ego ad te, draco magne qui tuba in medio fluminum tuorum, &c. Ezec. 29. 3.

This sentence of God was executed on the person of the Emperour Tyberius, under whom our Saviour suffered that death which gave life to the world. Verily he was a man, who through the whole course of his Empire made himself the God of himself, the slave of his passions, and the hatred of mankind. He lay close as an Owl in the retirement of his filthy lusts, he was greedy as a Griphon, in such sort, that dying he had above three-score and six millions of gold in his coffers, which he, with the Empire, left to an infamous nephew, who, as it is thought, hastned his death, tearing that sensuall soul out of the body, which in the world breathed nothing, but the love of it self.

How can a man so wretched, so caitive, behold himself as a Divinity, seeing God in the heighth of glory, riches and beauties, which so happily entertains him within himself, hath so affectionate bowels of mercy for man, that he thinks of him from all eternity, he presenteth himself unto him on all sides, with hands repleni shed with benefits in so great a diversitie of Creatures, and hath in generall so much care of all men, and of every one in particular, that he who were not well instructed by faith, might have matter to imagine that Man were the God of God himself!

S. Tho opusc. de Beatit. Quasi homo fit Dei Deus.

Let us besides produce another proof, which more evidently convinceth this obdurateness of heart, and this cruel rechlessnesse of the Philosophers, who teach Indifferency; which is, that all creatures, yea the most insensible, are made by God to impart, and to compassionate. If the Sun hath light, it is not for himself, he clotheth the Air, the Land, and Sea with a golded net, he imparteth it also as well to the little eyes of the Ant, as to those of the mightiest Monarch in the world, he soweth seeds of flames and vigour, to warm and quicken totall nature. If the Air hath Rain, it keeps it not eternally within the treasurie of clouds, but distilleth it as in a Limbeck to moysten the earth. If the Sea have waters, it so diveth them among all the Rivers, as to bear men and victuall in Vessels, and to make it self a knot of commerce from Land to Land, from Countrey to Countrey, from World to World. If the earth hath fruits, it preserves them not for it self, no more then the trees which bear them; but plentifully opens its bosome profusely to communicate it self to all nature. Every thing, saith a great Bishop of Paris, is bound by the Divine Providence to communicate it self; so true it is, that God hath banished avarice from humane things. As each creature giveth it self by love, so it suffers with others by conformity. All the world is united and collected within it self, as the parts of an Egg are tyed one within another; All the members of the Universe mutually love and embrace; and if they make warre it is but to establish their peace; If there be want of an element, as of Air, the Water would mount to heaven, or heaven descend to the water, rather then not supply the defect of a neighbour. It is a law which God hath engraven, as with a toole of Adamont in the bosome of Nature.

2. Reason drawn from the communication of creatures.

Unaquæq; res cogitur dare seipsa, adeo exclusit Deus avaritiam à rebus humanis. Guil. Paris. 1. de univers.

It hath been observed, that Palmes divided one from another by an arm of the Sea, which had overflowed the countrey, bowed their tops one towards another by a naturall inclination, as witnessing their Amity, and protesting against the fury of that element which had disunited them; and if this sense be in plants, what may we say of living creatures? where we see cares, troubles, anxieties, goings, and comings, combats, yells, neglect, and losse of body, repose and life, with the sense they have of the detriment and dammage of their like. And shall we not say then, that a man who loveth nothing in the world, and onely studieth the preservation of himself, is a prodigie in Nature, fit to be denyed the Air he breatheth, the light which reflecteth on him, the fire which warms him, the viands which feed him, and the earth which bears him?

I add for a third reason, that pity and tenderness of heart is not onely authorized by God and nature, but it is established, as by a common decree of nations. Photius the learned Patriarch of Constantinople observeth in his Bibliotheque, a wonderfull judgement given in the City of Athens, where he saith, the Senate of Areopagites being assembled together upon a mountain, without any roof but heaven; the Senatours perceived a bird of prey which pursued a little Sparrow, that came to save it self in the bosome of one of their company. This man, who naturally was harsh threw it from him so roughly that he killed it; whereat the Court was offended, and a Decree was made, by which he was condemned and banished from the Senate: Where the most judiciall observe, That this company, which was at that time one of the gravest in the world, did it not for the care they had to make a law concerning Sparrows; but it was to shew that clemency and mercifull inclination was a virtue so necessary in a State, that a man destitute of it, was not worthy to hold any Place in government, he having (as it were) renounced Humanity.

3. Reason of the tenderness of great hearts

A notable sentence of the Areopagites.

We likewise see, that the wisest and most courageous men in the world have been infinitely tender, full of love, zeal, affection, care, anxiety and travel, for the good of another. David and Jonathan, who were the bravest Princes over the people of God, loved each other so much, that the Scripture speaking of this Amity, saith, Their souls were tied together with an inseparable band. S. Paul was so affectionate and jealous for the salvation of his Corinthians, that he seemed to carry them all in his bowels, and daily to bring them forth with convulsions and pains attended by joyes and delights not to be expressed. Saint Ambrose bitterly bewailed the death of his brother Satyrus, that to hear him speak, one would think he meant to distill out his eyes and breathe out his soul on his Tombe. So did S. Bernard at the decease of his brother Gerard. S. Augustine was a man all of fire before and after his conversion, with onely this difference, that this fire before the morn-tide of his salvation was nourished with corruptible matter of Earth, but after he became a Christian, he lived upon the most pure influences of heaven. S. Gregory Nazianzen saith he more breathed S. Basile, then the aire it self, and that all his absences were to him so many deaths. S. Chrysostome in banishment was perpetually in spirit with those he most esteemed. S. Jerome better loved to entertain his spirituall amities in little Bethelem, then to be a Courtier in Rome where he might be chosen Pope. And if we reflect on those who have lived in the light of nature; Plato was nothing but love. Aristotle had never spoken so excellently of friendship, had he not been a good friend. Seneca spent himself in this virtue, being suspected by Nero for the affection he bare to Piso. Alexander was so good that he carried between his arms a poor souldier frozen with cold, up to his throne to warm him, and to give him somewhat to eat from his royall hands. Trajan brake his proper Diadem to bind up the wound of one of his servants. Titus wept over the ruines of rebellious Jerusalem. A man may as soon tell the starres in the heavens, as make an enumeration of the brave spirits which have been sacrificed to amity.

out

Wherefore great hearts are the most loving.

If we seek out the causes, we shall find it ordinarily proceedeth from a good temperature which hath fire and vigour, and that comes from good humours, and a perfect harmony of spirit: little Courages are cold, straightned, and wholly tied to proper interests, and the preservation of their own person. They lock themselves up in their proprieties as certain fishes in their shell, and still fear least elements should fail them; But magnanimous hearts, who more conform themselves to the perfections of God, have sources of Bounty, which seem not to be made, but to stream and overflow such as come near them. This likewise many times proceedeth from education; for those who fall upon a breeding base, wretched, and extremely penurious, having hands very hard to be ungrasped, have likewise a heart shut up against amities, still fearing lest acquaintance may oblige them to be more liberall then they would; contrariwise, such as have the good hap to be nobly bred hold it an honour to oblige, and to purchase friends every where.

Add also that there is ever some gentilenesse of spirit among these loving souls, who desiring to produce themselves in a sociable life, and who understanding it is not given them to enlighten sands and serpents, will have spectatours, and subjects of its magnificence. Which happens otherwise to low and sordid spirits; for they voluntarily banish themselves from the conversation of men, that they may not have so many eyes for witnesses of their faults; So that we must conclude against the Philosophers of Indifferency, that Grace, Beauty, strength and power of nature are on their side, who naturally have love and affection.

§. 2. Of Love in generall.

Love, the soul of the universe.

LOve when it is well ordered is the soul of the universe, which penetrateth, which animateth, which tieth and maintaineth all things: and so many millions of creatures as aspire and respire this love, would be but a burden to Nature, were they not quickned by the innocent flame, which gives them lustre, as to the burning Bush, not doing them any hurt at all.

Fornacem custodiens in operibus ardoris. Eccl. 43.

I may say, that, of honest love, which the wise man did of the Sunne; That it is the superintendent of the great fornaces of the world, which make all the most Pieces of work in Nature.

Love, the superintendent of the great Fornace of the world.

Have you ever beheld the Forge-master described by the same wise-man? You see a man in his shirt all covered over with sweat, greace, and smoke, who sporteth among the sparks of fire, and seemeth to be grown familiar with the flames: He bums gold and silver in the fornace, then he battereth it on the Anvil with huge blows of the hammer, he fashioneth it, he polisheth it, he beautifies it, and of a rude and indigested substance, makes a fair piece of plate to shine on the Cup-boards of the most noble houses.

Faber ferrarius sedens juxta in eodem & considerans opus ferri: vapor ignis uret carnes ejus, & in calore fornacis concertatur, &c. Eccl. 38.

So doth love in the world, it taketh hearts, which are (as yet) but of earth and morter, it enkindleth them with a divine flame, It beats them under the hammer of tribulations and sufferings, to try them, It filleth them by the assiduity of prayer, It polisheth them by the exercise of virtues, lastly it makes vessels of them worthy to be placed above the Empyreall heaven.

Thus did it with S. Paul, and made him so perfect, that the First verity saith of him, that he is his vessel of election, to carry his name among nations and the Kings of the Earth, and that he will shew him how much he must suffer for his sake. The whole nature of the world tendeth to true love; every thing loves; some of necessity, other by inclination, and other out of reason. He who will love nothing (saith S. Augustine) is the most miserable and wretched man on earth; nor is it without cause, that in imprecations pronounced over the wicked, it is said, Let him not love, nor be beloved by any.

Act. 9.

Pigri, mortui oeteſtandi eritis ſi nihil ametis: Amare, ſed quid ameris vide. Auguſt. in Pſal. 31. Hoc amet, nec ametur ab ullo. Juvenal.

The ancient Sages have observed in the light of Nature, that there are seven excellent things to be esteemed as gifts from heaven, which are clearnesse of senses, vivacity of understanding, grace to expresse ones thoughts, ability to govern well, Courage in great and difficult undertakings, fruitfulnesse in the productions of the mind, and the strength of love; and forasmuch as concerneth the last, Orpheus and Hesiodus have thought it so necessary, that they make it the first thing that came out of the Chaos before the Creation of the world.

Seven excellent things.

The Platonists revolving upon this conceit, have built us three worlds; which are, the Angelicall nature, the soul, and the Frame of the universe. All three (as they say) have their Chaos. The Angel before the ray of God, had his in the privation of lights; Man, in the darknesse of Ignorance and Sinne; The materiall world, in the confusion of all its parts: But these three Chaoses were dissipated by love, which was the cause that God gave to Angelicall spirits the knowledge of the most sublime verities, to Man Reason, and to the world, Order.

Vide Marsilium Ficinum in convivium Platonis. An excellent conceit of the Platonists.

All we see is a perpetuall circle of God to the world, and of the world to God; This circle beginning in God by inestimable perfections, full of charms and attractives, is properly called Beauty: and when it comes to extend it self in the world, and to draw it to it self, it is called love. But if you consider it in the condition wherein it gathereth together all Creatures to the first cause, and makes its works re-ascend to God, they say it then takes the name of Pleasure, which is a most happy satisfaction of to all Nature in its Authour. So love is a circle, which turns from good to good by an everlasting revolution.

The nature of love Lib. 1. de civit. c. 8. Amor inhians habere quod amatur cupiditas est, idem amor habens eóque fruens, letitia est, fugiens quod adversatur timor est: quod si acciderit ei, tristitia est: proinde mala sunt ista si malus est amor; bona si bonus.

Now, if you desire I should in few words explicate the nature thereof, its origen, progresse, causes, qualities and effects; you must observe a notable doctrine of S. Augustine, who saith, That Love whileſt it is in the search of what it loveth, is called Desire; and when it enjoyeth the thing beloved, it is changed into joy. But if it avoid that thing which is contrary to it, either in effect, or opinion, it is Fear; and if the Fear hath its effect by the arrivall of the evil it apprehendeth, it turns into Sadneſſe. This love takes ſundry countenances, according to divers Circumſtances.

I agree all this is ſaid with good reaſon, yet notwithſtanding we muſt affirm with divines, that this Oracle of Doctours hath in this difinition rather compriſed the cauſe, the effects, and progreſſes of love; then its eſſence and nature: For to ſpeak properly, love is neither Deſire, Fear, Joy, nor Sadneſſe; but A Complacence of the Appetite or will in an object convenient either according to verity, or apparence; But if we will ſpeak more generally, we ſay it is nothing, but an inclination propending and moving to a good which is conform to it: For by the definition, we include all the kinds of love which are divided principallly into three branches, to wit, Naturall, Animall, and Reaſonable love. Naturall love conſiſteth in things inanimate, which have their ſympathies, and Antipathies, As Palmes, male, and female, Amber and ſtraw, Iron and the Adamant. Animall love, is that Beginning which giveth motion to the ſenſitive appetite of beaſts to ſeek for that which is fit for them, and to be pleaſed in the enjoying what they ſought for. Reaſonable love, is an Act which purſueth and acceppteth the good repreſented by the underſtanding, wherein we may alſo comprehend Angelicall and Divine love, which S. Denis addeth to theſe three kinds whereof we ſpeak.

5. Definition of love.

Richard de Medvill. diſt. 27. l. 3. Art. 1. q. 1.

Its diviſion.

Reaſonable love is alſo divided into love of Amity, and love of Concupiſcence. Love of Amity, which wiſheth good to the thing beloved for it ſelf, without enquiry into its own proper intereſſe: As when it deſired to one, Health, knowledge, grace, virtues, wealth, honours, without pretence of any benefit to it ſelf. This is to affect with a love of amity, which is very rare now a daies, ſo mercenary are affections, and when this love is not onely Affective (as Divines ſpeak, contenting it ſelf with bare deſires) but Effective, by plentifully opening hands to liberality, it mounteth to a huge degree of Complacence.

Gabriel. d. 27. q. 1. l. 3.

Love of Concupiſcence, is an intereſſed love, which cauſeth one to love a thing, not for it ſelf, but for the pleaſure, and commodity derived from it, or to be hoped (in time) to be derived from it: So the Horſeman deſireth beauty, ſtrength, and courage, in his horſe and dog; not for their ſakes, but his own contentment. Such love is worldly love, commonly defiled with baſe and animall conſideration, nor is ever purified, but when it, for God, loveth that which cannot in it ſelf be lovely.

Behold the nature and Eſſence of Love in its whole latitude: Now to ſpeak of the proceedings of the ſoul in its loves, The firſt ſtep it makes when it beginneth to love, is the degree of the conformity of the will with the good is propoſed. The ſenſes, imagination, underſtanding, give it notice of ſome Beauty, Goodneſſe, or Commoditie, which it conceiveth to be fit for it. Thereupon it beginneth to take fire, and to have ſparks of deſires, which make it to wiſh the good propoſed unto it. Thence it paſſeth to the ſecond Degree, which is that of Sharp-ſweet Complacence, which pleaſingly each moment, holds it fixed upon the thoughts of its object. Sometimes between hope to poſſeſſe it, another while between fear to loſe it and many other paſſions, which accompany this (as yet ſuffering) Complacence.

The ſteps and progreſſions of love.

Philippus Presb.

From this degree it goes to the third, which is inquiſition and motion, where love putteth on wings to fly ſpeedily into the boſome of its repoſe, employing all poſſible means for its contentment; and if it be favoured in its purſuit, it advanceth to the fourth degree, which is union, eſteemed the principall ſcope of Amities. From this union ariſeth another Complacence, which is not painfull and dolorous; but ſatisfied, and pleaſed in the fruition of its object which is the heighth of love.

By the ſides of love are lodged Beauty and Goodneſſe, for that (as S. Denis ſaith) they are the objects and motive of love, which are ſo allied together, that the Grecians call them by one ſelf ſame name. The Sages have ever ſought for the true cauſes which diſpoſe the wils of men to love: and there are many different opinions upon this point. Some hold, it is a quality, which God imprinteth on nature; others imagine it comes from the aſpect of ſtarres, and from divers conſtellations; Others make it to proceed from Parents, and education: others from a certain Harmony and conſonancy of hearts, which meeting in accord upon the ſame Tone, have a naturall correſpondence. Laſtly, the Maxime of Divines and Philoſophers much ſwayeth, which ſaith, that Fair, and Good, make all loves.

Its cauſes.

I hold that to accord theſe opinions, a notable diſtinction muſt be made of three loves, which we have propoſed in the beginning, to wit, Naturall, Animall, and Reaſonable. Foraſmuch as concerneth Naturall or Animall love, beſides the order of nature, it is God which giveth to each creature neceſſary inclinations to arrive at their end. Well there may be influency of ſtarres, which bear ſway over humours and bodies, and with the ſtarres, bands of bloud, temperature of Humours, education and ſecret qualities, which tie creatures with the knot of a certain love, the cauſe whereof is not well known. For how many are there, who love things which are neither lovely nor good? I not onely ſay in effect, but in their own opinion and judgement, yet are they thereunto faſtned by ſome Tie, nor can they free themſelves from it, but by the abſolute power of Reaſon. Do we not daily find by experience, that a Man who is, and who knoweth himſelf to be deformed and wicked, yet faileth not by Nature, to be in love with himſelf? So through a love of Concupiſcence he may love things which have neither Beauty nor Goodneſſe, although he daily have a blind feeling of ſome thing ſuitable to ſenſuallity, and an unperceivable attractive.

As for love of reaſon, which is properly Humane love, one may be aſſured, it alwayes looks directly upon good and fair, not ſimply, but good, fair acknowledged, agreeable to its contentment; This is the root of all reaſonable amities, and hitherto thoſe great ſources of love reduced, which are, Honeſty, utilitie, Delectation, Reſemblance, reciprocall love, obliging and pleaſing converſation.

Means to make ones ſelf to be beloved worthily.

Within theſe ſix heads (in my opinion) the fifteen means to make one to be beloved are compriſed, which are touched by Ariſtotle in the ſecond book of his Rhetorick; To wit, to love that which a friend loveth, to entertain his apprehenſions, his joyes and his diſcomforts, his hatred and Amities; to keep him in a laudable opinion of our ſufficiency by good parts of wit, courage, virtue, induſtrie, and reciprocally to hold him in good eſteem, to love him, to oblige him, to praiſe him unto others, to bear with him in his humours, to truſt him with your ſecrets, readily to ſerve him without forgetfulneſſe or negligence, to be inviolably faithfull to him, which we will more amply deduce in the ſubſequent ſection.

But if you regard its effects, I find three great empires it exerciſeth in the world, naturall, civil, and ſupernaturall. In the naturall, it cauſeth all ſimpathies, antipathies, accords, ties, generations, productions. In the civill world, it builds two cities, as ſaith S. Auguſtine, very different. If it be good, it raiſeth a Citie of peace, wherein chaſte Amities ſway, and with them, Truth, Faith, Honour, Virtues, contentments, delights. If it be bad, It makes a Babylon full of confuſion, where cares, fears, griefs, warre, enmities, impurities,

Notable effects of love in the 3. worlds.

ties, adulteries, incests, sacriledges, bloud, murther, and poison inhabit; and all that, which commonly ariseth from this fatall plague. In the supernaturall world, it causeth nine effects, which are very well figured by the celestiall throne of love: composed of nine diaphanous globes; whose effects are Solitude, Silence, Suspension, Indefatigability, Languishment, Extasie, and Transanimation, which we more at length will consider in the sequele of this Treatise.

§. 2. Of Amity.

Eccl. 6. Medicamentum vitæ. Amity the tree of life.

AMITY is the medecine of health, and Immortality of life, and in a manner doth that in Civill life, which the tree of life in terrestriall Paradise promises in naturall life with an infinite number of sweetnesses and pleasures: it immortaliseth us after death in the remembrance of that which is most dear unto us in the world: It is that, which giveth light to dark affairs, certainty to doubtfull, support to tottering, goodnesse to evil, grace to good, order to irregular, ornament to simple, and activenesse to dead. By it, the banished find a countrey, the poor a patrimony, great ones find offices, the rich services, the Ignorant knowledge, the feeble support, the sick health, and the afflicted comfort. Should a man live on Nectar and Ambrosia, among starres and Intelligencies; he would not be happy, if he had not friends to be witnesses of his good fortune: and we may truly say, that Amity continually makes up the greater part of our Felicities. It is not here my purpose to extend my self with full sail upon the praise thereof, since so many excellent wits have already handled this subject; but, to shew how good Amities are to be chosen, and how to be cultivated.

It Includeth all Blessings.

What amity is. Affectus est spontanea & suavis animi ad aliquem inflectio. Cultiod. de assect.

There are some who make profession to be friends, and know not so much as what friendship is, but Aristotle plainly proves, there is difference between affection, Good-will, Love, Amity, and Concord. Affection is a spark of love, not yet throughly formed, in which understanding hath some slight passion. Good-will, A simple Good-will and consent born towards some one, although many times there be no great knowledge of the party, as it happeneth to such, who of two Combatants favour rather the one then the other, not knowing either of them. Love is an affection already formed and inclined with fervour to the good of Conformity, Amity is a love of mutuall well-wishing, grounded upon communication. Whence may be inferred that all those who love, are not friends, but all such as are true friends, necessarily love. The meanest people may love the most eminent; but there can be no Amity, since they therein find not correspondence.

Miserable lovers.

There are entranced lovers in the world, who are enamoured of all beauties, none returning them love again: which deserves either laughter, or compassion, seeing they may directly go to the first of Beauties, where they shall find reciprocall contentment. After love, followeth concord, which is the fruit of it, in the union of judgement and will.

Three sorts of amity.

Now, well to understand how to choose good Amities, the Species or kind of them must be known; wherein I find that one Hippodamus a great Platonick Philosopher hit right, when he established three sorts of Amities, whereof, one belongs to beasts, the other to men, and the third to Demi-gods.

Animall Amity.

Animall Amities are those which subsist onely in Nature, and which are common to us with beasts. Thus (saith S. Augustine) a mother which loveth her children for flesh and bloods sake, not otherwise raising her thoughts towards God, doth but as a Hen, a Dove, a Tigresse, a Serpent, and so many other living creatures, which have so great affection towards their little ones. It is not that these Amities are not very necessary, since Nature inspires them, and powreth them into the veins with the soul by admirable infusions, which preserve the estate of the world entire. It is good, much to affect ones own, but we must build upon the first elements of Nature; and by Grace and Reason raise the edifice of true charity. Parents ought to love their children as a part of their own bodies, which Nature hath separated from themselves: But, Amity should never divide their hearts. Children are bound to love their parents, as fishes their water. Brothers cannot too much esteem the love and Concord which they mutually maintain together. A husband and a wife are bound to a most strict commerce of Amity, since as God produced a word in heaven, and with the word the holy Ghost: So, he hath been pleased to create Adam on earth, as his own Image, and out of this Image, he hath drawn Eve to be unto a man a spirit of peace, and a love of a perpetuall lasting.

Pro magno laudarurus sum in homine, quod videam in Tigride. August. 4to. homil. 38.

There is no doubt, but that to fail in these laws, and to break the Knots which God hath tied with his own hands for all the living, is a vice which surpasseth all kind of brutishnesse. Notwithstanding, the evil manners of men corrupt things the most sacred, and are the cause that some love their own Bloud farre above God himself, and others even furiously persecute them. I put likewise in the number of animall-Amities all such as love one another for sport, for the Belly, and Lust: For they have no other scope; they do not much better then wanton whelps who cease not to run up and down, turn after turn, dallying and playing one with another. And such as love their wives no otherwise then for pleasure, do like the male Crevisse, who in his little Cavern hath many females, for whom he fights as for an Empire. All this kind of proceeding smells too much of the brute beast, nor can it have any merit in heaven.

Bodies in the Theatre of nature.

Humane Amities, and their foundation.

The Amities of men are those which are exercised with reason, and are ordinarily built upon three foundations which Aristotle expresseth in the Treatise he wrote of it, which are utility, pleasure, and morall virtue. Utility, is now adayes the most common Ciment of worldly Amities, and you find few friends, who hold it not in much esteem. It is that, which hath raised Towns, Cities, and the societie of men; That, which having raised, maintaineth them by mutuall offices rendered one another in the necessities of ordinary life. The hand must wash the hand, and the finger, the finger. One contributes his counsel, another his industry, another his abilities, another his pain, one his pen, another his tongue, and another his feet. All set themselves a-work, to do service to Amity. I know Philosophers will say, that this is somewhat mercenary; it notwithstanding preserveth communities, and he who would take it out of the world should find almost nothing in it, but a meer shadow of Amity.

Intereſt the fift Gospel of many.

Particular Intereſt is (as it were) the fift Gospel of Christianity depraved in the minds of many, and is the great God of the Time, to whom millions of souls do homage. Think not, that so many busie spirits, and men fervent to make a fortune, care much for Idle friends, although they were endowed with all the virtues of the Anchorets of the wilderneſſe. They esteem not gods of clay, although they had all the curious draughts of Polycletus upon them: It is gods of Gold and silver they would have, men which may give them whatsoever they desire. They carry these dispositions even to Altars, and make piety it self mercenary; For we see, many are little enough moved to hear of the greatest Saints in heaven, when a discourse is made of their excellent virtues: but, if peradventure an extraorextraordinary cure happen, thither they runne by heaps, and the saint which is the authour of them hath magnificent Altars waited on by many vows, offerings, and Candles. It is the poverty of the heart of man to measure all things by proper interest, but it is a maxime deep-settled through all Ages in the opinion of the multitude, and one may truely say, that to him utilitie is the mother of the Gods. Others who have a more gentle spirit seek for pleasure in their affections. I do not say those pleasures, which we have placed in Animall Amities, but some worthy recreation, as that of the Mathematicks, of Eloquence, of Poesie, of Painting, of Musick, ingenuous Sports, pleasant jests, most witty and quaint. This hath much predominance upon spirits who love recreative pastime, and I think the seven Sages of Greece, should they live again, would die for hunger in that house, where one who can jest with a good grace might make a brave fortune. These kind of amities although they may for a time be sweet to sense, are subject to change according to the diversitie of Ages, seasons, humours, employments, and occasions.

Avarus Evangeliorum irrisor, transgressorque perpetuus. Climach. Grad. 16.

Tertull. in lib. ad Nationes. Dii vero qui magis tributim, magis sanctimajestas constituitur in quæstum, venditis totam divinitatem, non licet eam gratis coli.

Amities of pleasure.

Merry jests.

The best men tie themselves to the honesty of morall vertues, and singularly love one who is wise, prudent, courageous, just, temperate, liberall, magnificent, weighing all this in the course of a life sutable to Aristotles Philosophy, and do please themselves with the familiarity of such a man, and are entertained by a Correspondence of manners, a delightfull conversation, and an affection very sincere, but not extraordinary.

Amities grounded upon Honesty.

The third sort of Amities, which the Pythagorian calleth, of Demi-gods, and which we may attribute to the most rare and excellent soul, is, among such as mutually love one another, not for ordinary vertues, but for celestiall qualities, graces, and singular gifts of God, and interchangeably love in an extatick manner, to wit, by a rapture of spirit, of heart, and affection, which causeth all things to be common among them, so much as vertue and honesty permitteth. Such was the Amity of the first Christians, of whom, with much wonder, the Pagans said; Behold, how they love one another! See how ready they are to die each for other: and that which the Poets found to be a matter so rare, reckoning up some few parts of true friends. Christianity made it appear, at that time, in as many subjects as it had men. But at this present, the multiplication of persons hath abbreviated the extent of charity. That generous spirit (which borrowed the golden wings of the dove of the Prophet, to fly throughout the world, and to sacrifice it self for a neighbour) is waxed cold, and rests immured within its little house, busing it self almost wholly in the preservation of its Individuums.

Amity of Demi-gods.

Vide ut invicem se diligant & pro alterutro mori sint parati. Tertull. Apolog.

From the discourse of these sorts of Amity, it is now much more easie to judge of the conditions of a good friend, then to meet with the effects of it: but if you will follow the way I shall prescribe, I will shew you what choice is to be used.

Qualities of a good friend.

First I am of Aristotles opinion, that Great ones (to speak according to the ordinary course of life) are not very fit for Amities, because they love themselves too much, and make use of men as of Instruments for their purposes, looking after nothing but the establishment of their own greatnesse: Besides the licentious life they commonly leade in a fortune which permits them all, is the cause that good men love them not, unlesse they become as virtuous and magnificent, as they are powerfull. Which is the cause, that being usually encompassed with a multitude of flatterers, or of interessed people, who labour to enrich themselves in the mannage of their affairs, they have very few good friends. But there are some among them, who are endowed with so eminent virtues, affabilitie, and bounty, that they win affections, and find friends, who would willingly offer themselves up as a sacrifice for their glory. Amity desireth equallity; If it find it not, it makes it: and although one cannot alwayes exact it in an Arithmeticall proportion, and that two friends of divers qualities cannot be in all kinds equall in offices rendred one to another, yet it is ever necessary therein to observe some proportion; which many great ones do not, thinking all is due to them, and that having usurped the bloud and sweat of men, they are but victimes born to be sacrificed to their magnificence. Which made the great Aristotle say, That if of two friends the one should become a God, he would cease to be a friend. In which he spake as a man, and a man ignorant of the Divinity; For he figured to himself a god of a luskish and proud humour, wholly busied within himself, and disesteeming all whatsoever under himself. But had he known the ineffable sweetnesse of the divine Bounty, he would rather with Tertullian have said, that there is nothing so worthy of God, as the salvation of man.

Great men are not ordinarily the best friends.

Arist. 8. & 9. Moral.

Tertull. contra Marcionem. Nihil tam Deo dignum, quam salus hominis.

Secondly, it is most certain, that those who love too much, are not very proper for great and strong amities, for with over much eagernesse to love all, they love nothing. You find men of honour in the world, who are extremely endearing, and who create amities innumerable, their heart resembleth the weathercock on a steeple which turns with every wind; they no sooner see one, but they oppresse him with favours, promises and courtesies: but such amities resemble those bubbles of water which rise upon a river during the time of a shower, and break as soon as they grow. Birds, which have yet the shell on their backs are taken with the sweetnesse of their bait, and think they have gotten their favour upon the first acquaintance; but the prudent well see, that they say to all the world, is not spoken to them.

Who loves too much, loveth little.

Men too endearing incapable of amity.

They do as Plato, who in the beginning thought himself much obliged to a Ferriman, that courteously without asking ought, had wafted him, imagining this was done in respect of his merit, but when he afterward perceived, he thus entertained persons of the meanest condition, He then could well say, Friend, I ow thee nothing.

The Judgement of Plato.

Seneca lib. 6. de Benefic. c. 18. Negavit illi jam apud Platonem positum, officium.

Moreover, we may truely affirm, that such are never good friends, who too much adhere to themselves, and rest fully satisfied with themselves; For amity being a certain transportment of a friend to a friend, it loveth to go out and readily succour such as stand in need of its help: but the man who is fast tied to his own interests, captived by his own employments, irrevocably squared out to his own hours, is a piece not to be stirred, but with many engines. Adde also to those the fantasticall suspicions, and unequall spirits, who daily at least, have some fit of folly; and infinitely vary both in manners and visage, which maketh poor Amity to fare ill in their hands. But prudent, and patient friends, who have need of them, strive to find out the folds of their hearts, to observe their good fits, and the lightsome seasons of their mind.

One must not adhere too much to ones self to be a good friend.

Unequall spirits.

Lastly, I would banish out of the temple of Amity all wicked lives, and evil humours, weak brains, and indiscreet tongues, which are not retentive of a secret; the over-curious, the light, the exorbitant, flouters, Buffons, the sad, mischievous murmurers, great talkers, and the Ceremonious.

Men banished from the Temple of amity.

To choose a friend well, it is necessary he be honest, prudent, of a good disposition, cordiall, obliging, faithfull, and patient. Honesty is the foundation of all the most eminent amities; without which there is not any thing can be of a solid subsistence. Prudence is the instrument for every thing, and the Rule of all the actions of mans life. Good disposition seasoneth the greatest plea-

The choise of a friend.

sures

ſures of converſation. Cordiality makes a commixion of hearts and minds, which is the principall ſcope of Amity. Obligations, maintained by mutuall offices, ſtraightly knit affections. Fidelity, which is an unmoveable rock againſt all the aſſaults of men and time, which tend to the diviſion of hearts; and Patience in the defects of a friend, is that which crowneth the perfections of Love.

§. 4. Of Amity between perſons of different Sex.

I Hold my ſelf obliged by the neceſſity of the ſubject, to ſpeak here of the Amity of different Sexes, eſpecially, between people of the world, as alſo, becauſe many complain, that men of our profeſſion would willingly handle them as Hermites of Thebais, and wholly forbid them the converſation of women; I will deliver what conſcience and civility permit in this. It is often asked whether women be capable of good Amity, and whether it may be tyed between ſex and ſex out of wedlock-bands?

This is a very hard queſtion for me to reſolve, becauſe, having all my time been employed (according to the laws of my profeſſion) to court wiſdome and virtue, and having had little practice, but amongſt the ſageſt and moſt virtuous women, it is not ſo eaſie for me to judge of the humours of ſuch as are bred otherwiſe.

If we conſult with Hiſtories, we ſee millions of Lovers, who complain of the infidelity of their Miſtreſſes: On the other ſide, women wage warre with men, ceaſing not to accuſe their inconſtancy: and all your feigned Romans eternally chant forth the ſame ſong, which were able to tire ſpirits any thing ſerious: but it is evident, that theſe vices with which they reproch one another, chaſtiſing with ſeverity, that, which they commit through idleneſſe, proceedeth not ſo much from ſex, as from the nature of a ſhamefull paſſion of love, which hath no more ſtability, then the wind in the Spring, and the ſea in a Calm.

It is certain, that evil love hath its diſloyall ones every where but ſince we are inſenſibly engaged to treat of Amity, after ſo many excellent pens who have handled the ſame ſubject; we are rather to obſerve what is commonly done in virtuous love, then that which is acted out of the madneſſe of Concupiſcence.

Reaſons for which women ſeem leſſe capable of Amity.

Some have thought, women were not ſo proper for Amities, becauſe they reſemble a cloud in the Rainbow, which receiveth the impreſſion of all colours in their naturall diverſified forms: beſides, for that according to Pliny, they are imaginative more then any creature in the world, which ſuggeſteth to them infinite many thoughts, divers inflexions of the heart, taſtes, diſtaſtes, which thruſt on one another as the waves of the ſea. They likewiſe thereunto adde, that they very eaſily are turmoiled with ſuſpicions, jealouſies, and diſtruſts; the leaſt matters offend them, and many once diſpleaſed, are irreconcileable. And which is more, that the moſt part of them have narrow hearts, and hands nor open enough to help their good friends at a need, they being ordinarily much tyed to the intereſt of their family; ſo that there are many who love not ſo much for love, as for gain.

Velocitas cogitationum, animi celeritas, & ingenii varietas multiformes illis notas imprimit. Plin. l. 7 cap. 12.

Reaſons for the modeſt love of women.

Amor magis lenitur cum prodit eum indigentia. Auguſt. l. 10. de Trin. c. 12. S. Thom. 1. 2 q. 25.

This may well happen in certain humours, but there are ſome grievous ſpirits, who do not ſo eaſily receive the impreſſions of theſe ill qualities, and who perſevere till death in an unſhaken conſtancy of affection. And verily it ſeemeth, that contrary to what hath been ſpoken, nature more favoureth them therein, becauſe Love, as ſaith S. Thomas after S. Auguſtine, appears beſt in indigence, and thoſe love moſt fervently and powerfully, who beſides other attractives ſee themſelves bound unto it by ſome kind of neceſſity. Now, the inclination which a woman hath towards man, is (as it were) neceſſary: For it is more eaſie for a man to be without a woman (having regard to ſpirituall and temporall aſſiſtances, as Sacraments and Phyſick) then for a woman to be without a man. Adam was for a while all alone in Paradiſe, in a vaſte world, but God permitted not that Eve ſhould be there alone one moment: for this ſolitude would have gone hard with her to ſee ſo many living creatures, and in ſo divers kinds, and not meet with one to bear her reſemblance.

This being ſo, one may with reaſon ſay, that as we love things neceſſary, with more endeavour and ſtability, ſo women are tyed with the more indiſſoluble chains in virtuous inclinations. But not to ſpeak of this motive (which proceeding from a meer motion of nature) cannot be the moſt generous; we find men, who reſt upon Indifferency, and ſeek nothing but to content their own ſenſes and to idolatrize themſelves: but women very rarely ſtay upon neutrality, needs they muſt love or hate, there is no third condition for them; and ſince, according to the Philoſopher, it is fit to judge of Contraries by proportion, we will truly ſay, that if they be ſuſceptible of the impreſſions of hatred above all may be ſaid, ſo are they likewiſe capable of noble Amities. They think themſelves more engaged in honour to entertain them when they have begun, fearing to be diſparaged by the multitude of wandring and flitting affections.

Adde alſo to this, that they are more tender then men, and that ſoftneſſe of temperature, is to love, as the air to the ray of the Sun, ſeeing the affections more eaſily penetrate where they find diſpoſitions which have already prepared a way for them. Laſtly, as they commonly are more devout and religious then men, ſo they obſerve virtuous Amities with reſpect, and entertain them out of conſcience, and eſpecially ſuch as are grounded on piety, which is the thing that moſt powerfully predominateth over their heart.

I ſpeak this in reſpect of thoſe who are very virtuous, but as we find, few rare virtues and ſtrong amities accompanied with all neceſſary circumſtances, are not ſo frequent in their ſex.

It ſeemeth alſo, that the Examples we derive as well from Nature, as Civil life, inſenſibly lead us to the proof of that which we propoſe.

Among living creatures, the Females are the more ſharp and ardent, as well in their affection as in their anger: the cuttle-fiſh takes revenge on that which ſtriketh her male; but the male flyeth if his female catch a blow, as Ariſtotle hath obſerved in the ninth book of his living Creatures. I well remember the Antients ſtudiouſly reckoned up the pairs of friends which they had obſerved throughout all Ages, and that Lucian in his Toxaris, hath ſtrange examples of amity between men, as of him who left his whole family in a fire, to carry out his deareſt friend on his ſhoulders: and of another, who gave his own eyes for the ranſome of him whom he moſt tenderly affected. But who likewiſe would in particular decipher the notable acts of love, which many wives have witneſſed to their huſbands, ſhould find wherewith to be moved to admiration, and to ſettle his conſtancy. If we talk of preſerving a widdow-hood, inacceſſible to ſecond wedlocks, how many may we find of them, even in Gentiliſme, who, after the death of their dear husbands have ſaid, (what the antient Valeria did) My huſband is dead to others, but not to me. If we ſpeak of ſuffering great toils of body, Queen Hipſicrates followed King Mithridates her husband, as one Bodin. Theatri natur. l. 3. ſect. 6.

Luc. Toxaris.

Rare amities of women. Valer. Max. l. 4. c. 6.

of

